§. II. THE persons elected were C. Fabius Ambustus and C. Plautius Proculus. The hostilities of the Tarquinienses were soon followed by a new alarm from the Boii, who appeared on a sudden in the plain of Præneste, and advanced as far as Pedum. But, in the midst of these distresses of the Republick, the Latines (for what reason is uncertain) very seasonably renewed their ancient treaty of alliance with Rome, and furnished her with the same quota of men as formerly. With this re-inforcement she was in a condition to make head against all her enemies. C. Sulpicius was named Dictator to conduct the war against the Gauls. With the best Legions of the Consular armies strengthened by the Latin auxiliaries, he took the field, and met the enemy. Both armies were very ardent to engage; but the Dictator restrained the impetuosity of his troops, thinking it better policy not to run the hazard of a battle, since the Gauls must necessarily be distressed for want of provisions, having prepared no magazines, and being no longer supplied by the Latines. The soldiers however did not enter into their General's views, and universally murmured against him, as a timorous commander of brave men. They came in crowds to the Dictator's quarters, and demanded access to him, having named Sextus Tulius (a man of distinguished courage, and who for seven years past had been first Captain of the first Corps in the army) to be their speaker. Sulpicius was surprised to find himself surrounded by a number of mutineers, and especially to see Sextius, at their head, whom he had thought an unblameable officer. Sextius, in the name of the army, reproached him with the disadvantageous opinion he seemed to have entertained of the valour of his troops, and urged him to lead them to the enemy. His speech to the Dictator was followed by the acclamations of the multitude, who all cried out for leave to arm and march to battle. Sulpicius found himself under a necessity of promising to comply with their desires; but then, taking Sextius aside, he asked him, What it was that had put him at the head of a Faction? The brave Centurion replied, that it was not any want of respect to his General, or ignorance of the Martial Laws; but to prevent the soldiers chusing an insolent leader, who

Year of
R O M E
cccxciv
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-eight.
Ninety-sixth Consul-
ship.
Livy, B. 7.
c. 12.
Cic. in Eut.
Year of
R O M E
cccxcv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-seven.
Ninety-seventh Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 12,
13, 14.
Appian.
in Celtic.

might

Year of ROM E might do something injurious to the dignity of the Dictator. He then advised Sulpicius to yield to the desires of the soldiers, who otherwise seemed inclined to seize the first opportunity of fighting, whether he would or not. An accident presently convinced the Dictator of the truth of what Sextius had told him. Two beasts of burden, which escaped out of the Roman intrenchments, and were seized by the Gauls, had like to have been the occasion of a general action. The Roman soldiers were with difficulty restrained by their Centurions. Sulpicius therefore thought it no longer proper to delay the engagement, and gave notice in the camp that he would offer battle the next day.

The Romans being inferior to the Gauls in number, the Dictator, to remedy this disadvantage, made use of a stratagem which had never been practised before. He ordered his Muleteers to put upon their mules the furniture of war-horses, to mount them, march silently up to the hills, and hide themselves in the woods, till they received farther orders. This extraordinary body of troopers, to the number of about one thousand, appearing opportunely in the plain in the heat of the action, so intimidated the Gauls, who feared to be surrounded, that they presently dispersed and fled, losing more men in their flight than in the action, for few of them escaped the slaughter.

Sulpicius, when he had been honoured with a Triumph and had made a present of some of the enemies spoils to Jupiter Capitolinus, abdicated the Dictatorship, and the Government returned into the hands of the two Consuls for the year. Plautius vanquished the Hernici, and totally subdued them. But Fabius was defeated in battle by the Tarquinienfes, who, to shew their contempt of the Republick, cut the throats of 307 Roman prisoners. However, the Conciliation of the Latines, the total Overthrow of the Gauls, and the Reduction of the Hernici, made this a prosperous year for the Republick. Rome was now in almost as flourishing a condition as before it was taken by King Brennus.

§. III. SOME Roman Citizens being at this time sent into the Pomptin Territory, to stop the incursions of the Veliterni and Privernates, formed a new Tribe there, called Pomptina, which, with the Tribe Publicia, or Popilia, lately established in the territory of the Volsci, made the whole number of the Tribes twenty-seven.

At this time, likewise a law was made, at the motion of Poetilius the Tribune, and with approbation of the Senate, against openly canvassing for votes. It was occasioned by the ambition of the Novi Homines, or upstart Gentlemen, who, not content with soliciting suffrages in the Forum Romanum, went even to the country fairs, and other publick meetings, to buy voices. This, says Livy, was the first law of the kind preferred to the People; nevertheless, according to the same author, a law was passed in the year 321, forbidding the candidates to make their robes whiter than ordinary, and this * in order to give a check to the practice of canvassing for offices.

* To de ambi-tionis causa.

Under

Under the following administration of C. Marcius Rutilus and *Cn. Manlius * Imperiosus*, the interest of money, which before was arbitrary, was, at the motion of the Tribunes of the People, settled at One per Cent. per month^a. This regulation so displeased the avaricious Patricians, that, to revenge themselves on the Plebeians, they cited the famous Licinius Stolo to answer for the breach of one of the four laws (which he himself had so zealously promoted) prohibiting any Citizen to possess more than five hundred acres of land. Licinius actually possessed a thousand; but, to cover his breach of the law, had emancipated his son, and made him the nominal possessor of one half of them. However, he was convicted, before the Prætor, of fraud, and fined ten thousand ^b Asses of Brass. These intestine commotions being over, the Consul Marcius was ordered to conduct an army against the Privernates, who the year before had declared against Rome. Marcius routed the enemy in the field, and pursued them to Privernum, which, to preserve it from being plundered, they immediately surrendered.

Year of
R O M E
cccxcvi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-six.
Ninetyeighth Consul-
ship.
* A 2d
time.
Livy, B.
7. c. 16.
Val. Max.
B. 8. c. 6.
Plin. B.
18. c. 3.

But Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, gained little glory in his expedition against the Falisci, whom he had been sent to punish for several insults on the Republick. Nothing was talked of in Rome, but his attempt upon the Constitution. He had ventured to assemble the Tribes near Sutrium, and had there made a law in his camp, That the twentieth part of the price of every slave, thereafter sold, should be paid into the publick Treasury. The Senate had consented to this law, notwithstanding the irregularity of holding the Comitia by Tribes in the Camp. But the Tribunes of the People thought this step of the Consul of dangerous consequence to the publick liberty; and therefore got a law passed, forbidding any man to assemble the People in Comitia, any where but in Rome, upon pain of death. However, the law relating to the twentieth part of the price of slaves was not repealed.

^a Livy's words are, De UNCARIO Fœnore——rogatio est perlata, &c.
“ The interest of money, both in Rome
“ and Greece, was high for a considerable “ time. Simple interest was exacted month“ ly in both places, at the rate of one per “ cent. per month.——The Romans paid a “ Denarius a month for 100 Denarii; and it “ is mentioned by Cicero as monthly.——
“ And, because the As was reckoned any “ Integer, it was likewise called Asses Usuræ:
“ So that Asses Usuræ and Centesima Usuræ
“ are the same thing,——Livy and Tacitus “ mention the Fœnus Unciarum, and Semiun- “ ciarum, as high, which according to the “ proportion of the As, being but $\frac{1}{12}$ or $\frac{1}{12}$ in “ the month, must only make 1 or $\frac{1}{12}$ per “ cent. per Annum. And the Law of the XII.
“ tables forbids, Ne quis unciario fœnore am- “ plius exerceto.” So it is expressed by Tacitus.

“ These expressions cannot be interpreted “ according to the analogy of the tables, “ but differ from all the others; and they “ certainly denote the Centesima Usuræ:
“ But, how this way of expression in these “ two authors has happened, I can give no “ account: It seems they put the Uncia for “ the As or Integer.——Semisses Usuræ or “ $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per month, six per cent a year, “ which Pliny calls civilis et modica, came to “ be the publick and customary interest of “ money; for the Asses Usuræ came to be a “ grievance, and occasioned great tumults “ among the people; yet still he that took “ it was not reckoned to transgress any “ law; and there were some greedy Usurers “ that exacted double, triple, nay four “ times as much.” Arbutnot, chap. xxii.
Of the interest of money.

^b Or 32 l. 5 s. 10 d. Arbutnot.

§. IV.

Year of
R O M E
cccxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-four.
Ninety-
four.
Consul-
ship.
* A 3d
time.
† A 3d
time.

§. IV. THE Consuls for the following year, M. Fabius * Ambustus and M. Popilius † Lenas (both a second time) no sooner entered on their office, than they took their Military employments by lot. Popilius commanded the army which was to act against the Tyburtes. He found them shut up within their walls, and ravaged their lands without opposition. But Fabius had a more difficult war to manage against the united Falisci and Tarquinienses. They stirred up all Hetruria against the Republick. The Horatians advanced towards the Roman Territory, as far as the Salt-Pit, on the banks of the Tiber; and their approach obliged the Romans to have recourse to the usual remedy in great emergencies. The Consul Popilius was ordered to name a Dictator; and, as he was a Plebeian himself, he pitched upon C. Marcius Rutilus, the Plebeian Consul of the last year, to raise him to that dignity. The Dictator likewise chose a Plebeian, C. Plaucius Proculus to be his General of Horse: so that now the government of the Republick was almost intirely in the hands of men of true merit, chosen out of the People. The Patricians, stung with jealousy at these promotions, did all they could to hinder the Dictator from having the necessaries for the war: but, on the other hand, the People hastened the preparations for the campaign, and the General marched out to meet the enemy. He surprised their camp, forced it, and took eight thousand prisoners. Notwithstanding so complete a victory, the Senate opposed the Triumph of a Plebeian Dictator; but the People did him justice, and he entered Rome triumphantly the day before the Nones of May.

And now the time drawing nigh for electing new Consuls, and Fabius not being at Rome, the Nobility pretended that it was unlawful for any Plebeian, though a Dictator, to preside in the Comitia; because by the Pontifical Laws the election of chief Magistrates should be consecrated by Auguries; and Auguries, say they, belong of right only to Patricians. And for this time they prevailed. The Republick had recourse to an Inter-regnum; and, which is very extraordinary, the Plebeians, in the very year in which they triumphed most, were excluded from a share in the Government; two Patricians were chosen Consuls in the ensuing Comitia. The Tribunes of the People exclaimed against the election, as contrary to the custom practised for eleven years past, during which time one of the Consuls had always been a Plebeian. But the president of the cccxviii.

Year of
R O M E
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
fifty-four.

Comitia silenced the clamour, by citing a Law ‡ of the Twelve Tables, That only the last edicts of the People should be of force: For they inferred; that the People, by chusing two Patricians, had in effect abolished the former custom.

The new Consuls, C. Sulpicius § Peticus and M. Valerius Poplicola, after a slight battle, took Empulum from the Tyburtes, but did nothing else remarkable abroad during their administration. Their chief view was to keep the Consulate in Patricians hands; and, when the time came for new elections, they declared that they would never resign their dignity to any other than Patricians. This occasioned great commotions and tumults in the

1 See 8th Law of the 9th
Table, p.
320.

Year of
R O M E
cccxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-four.

100 Con-
sulship.
§ A 3d
time.
Liv. B. 7.
c. 18.

the Campus Martius, infomuch that the greater number of the People cried out, that a Seceſſion was neceſſary, and in reality quitted the aſſembly, leaving only the leaſt paſſionate behind them. This gave their ſuffrages for two Patricians, M. Fabius * Ambuſtus and T. Quintius Pennus; and thus the Nobility carried their point. The Conſuls took the field; the former againſt the Tyburtes, whom he totally ſubdued; the latter againſt the Tarquinienſes, on whom the Romans now revenged the cruelty committed on the three hundred and ſeven Roman ſoldiers formerly mentioned. Quintius, having defeated them in a bloody battle, put all the priſoners to the ſword, except three hundred and fifty-eight, whom he ſent to Rome, where, by order of the Senate, they were firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded. Theſe victories extended the reputation of the Romans; infomuch that the Samnites ſent an embaſſy to the Republick, courted her friendſhip, and concluded an alliance with her, probably upon the ſame foot as that with the Latines and Hernici. Without changing their Laws or Government, they engaged to furniſh the Romans with troops in their neceſſity; and the Romans promiſed to protect them againſt their enemies both at home and abroad. This was conſtantly the firſt ſtep taken by the politick Republick, in ſubduing the nations that lay neareſt to her. She flattered them with the title of Allies of the Roman People; and, when by their aſſiſtance ſhe had made herſelf miſtreſs of the more diſtant countries, thoſe who had ſuffered themſelves to be lulled aſleep under the title of Allies, found themſelves involved in her conqueſts; and, tho' they were ſtill called Allies, they were treated as Subjects.

Though the People were ſtill very deſirous to have one of the Conſuls Plebeian, the Nobility, as their creditors, had them ſo much under at this time, that they kept the Conſulſhip in their own hands; and G. Sulpicius † Peticus and M. Valerius ‡ Poplicola were again promoted to that dignity. While the Republick was preparing her levies to act againſt the Tarquinienſes, ſhe received advice from the Latines, that the Volſci were upon the point of entering the Roman Territory; and this obliged her to divide her forces between the two Conſuls. Sulpicius marched into Hetruria, Valerius againſt the Volſci. Valerius had already incamped on the confines of the Territory of Tuſculum, when he was recalled to Rome to nominate a Dictator. This was occaſioned by letters from Sulpicius, which imported, that the Cærites were undoubtedly diſpoſed to take part with the Tarquinienſes; that his army was not ſtrong enough to repreſs the insolence of theſe enemies united; and that even the Falſci had joined the latter. In order therefore to have a third army on foot, to oppoſe the Cærites, while the two Conſuls checked the progreſs, the one of the Volſci, the other of the Tarquinienſes and Falſci, Valerius was directed to name a Dictator. Accordingly he named T. Manlius Torquatus to that dignity, who appointed Cornelius Coſſus to be his General of Horſe. Though Manlius had never been Conſul (a neceſſary ſtep to riſe regularly to the Dictatorſhip) yet his merit was ſuch, that no oppoſition was made to his promotion.

Year of
R O M E
cccxcix.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-three 101 Con-
ſulſhip.
* A 3d
time.
Livy. B. 7.
c. 19.

Year of
R O M E
cccc.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-two.
102 Con-
ſulſhip.
† A 4th
time.
‡ A 2d
time.

Year of
R O M E
CCCC.
Esf. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-two.
102d Con-
sulship.
Livy, B.
7. C. 20.

But now the inhabitants of Cære, intimidated by the preparations made against them, instead of pursuing the war, sent an embassy to Rome to implore the clemency of the Senate. The Senate referred the Deputies to the People, who being moved to compassion by the repentance of the Cerites, and especially when reminded that Cære had been formerly the Asylum of the Vestals, and the Receptacle of their Gods, granted them a truce for an hundred years, and the Dictator, instead of marching against them, led his troops against the Falisci. But neither on this side did he find an enemy in the field to contend with; so that, having laid their country waste, he immediately returned to Rome.

C H A P. VII.

§. I. The Magistrates take effectual measures to relieve the Debtors, in order to maintain peace at home. §. II. The People suffer two Patricians to be declared Consuls. Nevertheless in this very Consulate the Commons prevail for the first time to have a Plebeian chosen to the CENSORSHIP. §. III. And notwithstanding that the present Consuls name a Dictator to hold the Comitia for the election of their successors, in order to get two Patricians chosen, M. Popilius Lænas, a Plebeian, is promoted (now a third time) to the Consulate with L. Cornelius Scipio. Cornelius falling sick, the Plebeian Consul has the sole conduct of a new war with the Gauls. A PRÆTOR acts as a General, for the first time. Two Patricians are chosen Consuls. The Gauls spread themselves on the sea-coast of Latium. M. VALERIUS (afterwards surnamed CORVUS) a Legionary Tribune, kills in single combat a Champion of the Gauls, and this occasions a general action in which the Romans obtain the Victory. Valerius, though but twenty-three years of age, is chosen to be one of the Consuls. §. IV. The Romans conclude a Treaty with the Carthaginians. §. V. The Interest money is lowered to Half per Cent. Valerius Corvus (now a second time Consul) defeats the Volsci, and takes from them Satricum. The Secular Games are celebrated for the second time. §. VI. A Dictator is named, on occasion of a war with a new enemy, the Aurunci. He builds a Temple, which he had vowed, during a battle with the enemy, to Juno Moneta. The year following, the Romans imagining that the Goddess, agreeable to her name MONETA, admonished them by Prodigies of the impending wrath of the Gods, P. Valerius is named Dictator, to order the celebration of the Feriæ Latinæ.

Livy, B. 7. C. 21. §. I. ALL things were quiet in the city, till the time came for new Elections. The Dictator, who was to have presided in the Comitia, had formed the design of hindering any Plebeian being chosen to the Consulship; but the Tribunes of the People perceiving his intention, opposed the assembling of the Centuries, till the expiration of his Dictatorship, and of the Consuls year, both which ended at the same time. An Inter-regnum num ensued; and the two parties were irreconcilable. The People began to make complaints about their debts, as well as of the infraction of the Licinian Law, relating to the election of Consuls; and the disputes grew to such a height, as seemed to threaten an open revolt. This apprehension induced the Senate at length to suffer the Licinian Law to take place, and to permit the Centuries to chuse one of the Consuls out of the Plebeians. C. * Marcus Rutilus, a Plebeian, was joined with P. Valerius Poplicola in the Consulate. These Magistrates made it their first care to reconcile the two Parties, by easing the Debtors. To this end, they chose out * five men of known probity, to take an account of all debts, and see them discharged. These five were called Bankers, and they had the command of the Publick Treasury, to enable them to perform their commission, which they did to the satisfaction of all parties. Those who through sloth and carelessness, rather than want, had plunged themselves in debt, either borrowed Money of these Bankers, giving security to the publick, or else deposited the value of their debts in their creditors hands, in effects which were valued by the Bankers. By this means the greater number of the Debtors were relieved without wronging any person, and with little loss to the publick.

§. II. BUT, while the Republick was taking these methods to secure peace at home, she was suddenly alarmed with the report of a new war, which she must quickly sustain abroad against the twelve Lucumonies of Hetruria; upon which the Senate immediately named Julius Iulus Dictator. The report however proved groundless, and was (probably) raised by the Patricians, only to get a man at the head of affairs, who might prevent the Licinian Law from taking place in the ensuing elections. And indeed he employed all his credit and power to that end, but without success; for the People were so warm and steady in opposing his design, that both he and the Consuls were out of office before they could get the Comitia assembled.

In the Inter-regnum which ensued, C. Sulpicius Peticus and M. Fabius governed by turns; and the People, by the complaisance which they had for these men, seem to have been actuated by some particular pique against the late Dictator, in their opposition to his desires; for now they readily suffered two Patricians to be raised to the Consulship. Sulpicius † himself was one of them, and T. Quinctius Cincinnatus the other. The former marched against the Terquinenses, and the latter against the Falisci: But these two nations being tired out by the calamities of war, submitted to the Republick, and obtained a truce for forty years.

The present interval of peace seemed a proper season for holding the Comitia, to elect new Censors. A day was accordingly fixed for this purpose, and it was the first time that any Plebeian was seen to stand Candidate

* C. DUILIUS,
P. DECIUS MUS,
M. PAPIRIUS,

Q. PUBLILIUS,
T. ÆMILIUS.

S f f 2

for

Year of
R O M E
CCCCI.
Ref. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty-one.
103d Con-
sulship.
* A 2d
time.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCII.
Ref. J. C.
Three
hundred fifty.
104th Consul-
ship.
† A 5th
time.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCII.
Def. J. C.
Three
hundred
fifty.

for that important office. C. Marcius Rutilus, having been twice Consul and once Dictator, thought he might well aspire to any dignity in the Republick. He was the first of the Commons who had been raised to the Dictatorship; and, in spite of the opposition of the Nobles, he had obtained a Triumph for his exploits in that station. And now, in the Comitia by Centuries, he was declared Censor, with Cn. Manlius a Patrician.

104th
Consul-
ship.

§. III. BUT, though the Patricians had not been able to exclude the Plebeians from the Censorship, they still hoped to secure the Consulship wholly to themselves; and, the better to succeed in that design, the present Consuls named M. Fabius Ambustus (who had been thrice Consul) Dictator to preside at the next election, imagining, that an absolute Governor would be more respected in the Comitia, and have more influence. But, notwithstanding these precautions, M. Popilius Lænas, a Plebeian, was now chosen Consul, a third time; and his Collegue, L. Cornelius Scipio, falling sick when he should have taken the field, the Senate had the farther mortification of seeing the Patrician Consul to be General of the Troops. Popilius immediately ordered levies to be made, to stop the progress of the Gauls, who were ravaging the Latine Territory, and approached towards Rome; and, to be the sooner in readiness for marching, he appointed the

Year of
R O M E
CCCCIII.
Def. J. C.
Three hundred forty-nine.

105th
Consul-
ship.

Liv. B.

7. c. 23.

Appian

in Celtic.

Livy, B.

7. c. 24.

Enrollment without the Gate Capena, and not upon the Capitol. So great a number of soldiers enlisted themselves on this occasion, that the Consul, by order of the Senate, divided them into two armies, and left one to guard the City, under the command of M. Valerius Poplicola, the present Prætor. And this was the first time that the Prætor was seen at the head of an army. Popilius with four Legions and some auxiliaries marched against the enemy, defeated them, plundered their camp, and led back to Rome his victorious army, enriched with spoil. He was decreed a Triumph at his return; but the ceremony was deferred on account of a wound he had received in the battle, and of which he was not yet recovered. His Collegue Scipio continued likewise still sick; so that the Republick, seeing both her chief Magistrates out of a condition to discharge their functions, desired them to name a Dictator to preside at the election of new Consuls. Accordingly they named L. Furius Camillus (son of the Great Camillus) to that dignity, who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio to be his General of the Horse. These two eminent Patricians employed their utmost efforts to make the election fall only on men of their own

Year of
R O M E
CCCCIV.
Def. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-
eight.

order, and they succeeded. The Dictator prevailed to have himself chosen one of the Consuls; and Appius Claudius, surnamed Cressus, another Patrician, was appointed his Collegue.

And now the Gauls, who after their late defeat had fled for refuge to the hills of Alia, came down again, and spread themselves upon the Seacoast in the country of the Latines. At the same time some Greeks (from

106th
Consul-
ship.

* The gate Capena, now called the gate of St. S. Lazzaro, led to the Appian Way; as we learn from Frontinus, who tells us, that the Censor Appius made a great road from this gate quite to Capua.

what

what part is uncertain) made a descent on the very same coast where the Gauls were ravaging and plundering, i. e. from the mouth of the Tiber to Antium; but the Gauls, jealous of their booty, forced these new invaders back to their ships. While the Greeks still hovered about the Coast, and the Gauls were yet in Latium, the Republick left one of her Generals, who should have acted against these Robbers; Appius, one of the Consuls, died during the preparations for the war. It seemed expedient to nominate a Dictator to act in concert with the surviving Consul, but the Senate were unwilling to give Camillus any superior. He had obliged them in the late Elections, his personal merit was great, and his very name of Camillus was a good omen in a war with the Gauls; all these considerations made them accept of him as sole Governor of the Republick; so that he wanted little more than a greater number of Liētors to commence a regular Dictator. His first care was to raise two armies. The Latines were summoned to furnish their contingent of Auxiliaries; but they refused to be commanded by a Roman General; and, in a National Diet, resolved to shake off the dishonourable yoke. However, the Consul found Roman Citizens enough, who by Law were obliged to serve, to compose a body of ten Legions, amounting to 45,000 men. Camillus left two of these Legions to guard the city; gave four to L. Pinarius the Prætor, whom he sent to defend the sea-coast against the Greeks; and he himself incamped with the other four in the Pomptin territory, a country full of marshes and rivers; for he had no design of coming to a battle with the Gauls; his only view was to harass the enemy in their posts, intercept their convoys, and, if possible, to starve them. While both armies continued unactive, a fierce Gaul of a gigantick stature appeared between the two camps, defying the bravest man in the Roman Legions to single combat. M. Valerius, a Legionary Tribune, great grandson of the famous Valerius Volusus, accepted the challenge, and is said to have obtained a victory by means of a Raven, which had perched upon his helmet ever since day-break, and which, during the fight, flew in the face of the Giant, and so blinded him with his wings, that Valerius easily stabbed him. The Gauls, seeing their champion slain, immediately crowded round his body, to hinder him from being stript of his armour; and the Romans at the same time ran to defend Valerius, and this by degrees brought on a general battle, in which the Gauls were again defeated. Those of them that escaped took their way through the country of the Volsi, and, crossing Campania, retired as far as the coasts of the Adriatick sea. As for the brave Valerius, the General rewarded him with a crown of Gold and ten Oxen; and he ever after bore the name of Corvus *.

* Raven.

Nothing now remained for the Consul to do, in order to finish his year with honour, but to drive away the Greek pirates that infested the coasts of Latium. With this view he joined his army to that of the Prætor Pinarius; but the obstinacy of those adventurers, who, though they durst not land, continued hovering at sea, obliged him to keep the field longer than he had imagined. In the mean while the time for the new election

Year of
R O M E
CCCCIV.
Bel. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-eight.
106th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 25.
Diod Sic.
B. 16.

Aul. Gel.
B. 9. c. 11.
Livy, B.
7. c. 26.
Auth of Lives of Illust.
Men. c.
29.

Year of of Consuls drew near, so that he was obliged to name a Dictator to pre-
 ROME side in the Comitia; and on this occasion the famous Manlius Torquatus ccccv. was again raised to that dignity. A Dictator could not fail to have a con-Bet. J. C. siderable influence in the assembly of the Centuries; and Manlius, who was Three extremely pleased with the exploit of Valerius, so much resembling his own hundred former victory over a gigantick Gaul, found means to prevail with the Peo-forty- ple to chuse him one of the Consuls, though but twenty-three years of age, seven. and too young to have a place in the Senate. With him they joined Po-pilius Lenas, now Consul a fourth time.
 10th
 Consul-
 ship.

As for Camillus, he made so good an appearance on the coast, that the Greeks not daring to come ashore, and at last wanting fresh water and other necessary provisions, put out to sea.

§. IV. THE armies were disbanded; and Rome, for a short space, had Livy, B. neither War abroad, nor Quarrels at home. Her Tranquillity however was 7. c. 27. not complete: a pestilential sickness disturbed it. The Senate directed the Decemvirs to consult the Sibylline Books, and, it being there found that the Lætiæsternium would be good against the plague, they ordered that notable ceremony to be performed.

But the most memorable event of the present year was A Treaty of Friendship and Alliance between ROME and CARTHAGE. It was made at the request of the Carthaginians, who sent Ambassadors to Rome for that end;
 and it seems to have been the first^{*} Treaty concluded between the two States:

Cum

^{*} Orosius, (lib. 3. cap. 7.) calls the TREATY made at this time the First—PRIMUM illud iustum cum Carthaginiensibus fœdus.

Polybius pretends, that, so early as the first year of the Republick, ROME and CARTHAGE entered into a TREATY, the record of which, in the old obsolete Latin, was, in his time, still extant: and he gives us the following Translation of it, as made with all possible exactness:

“ THERE shall be peace and friendship “ between the Romans and the Allies of the “ Romans, and the Carthaginians and the “ Allies of the Carthaginians, on the fol“ lowing conditions:

“ The Romans and the Allies of the Ro“ mans shall not navigate beyond the Fair “ Promontory^{*}, unless constrained by tem“ pest or an enemy. If at any time they “ shall chance to be forced ashore [beyond “ that promontory] they shall not be per“ mitted to take or buy any thing but what “ they need for repairing their vessels, and “ for their sacrifices. None shall make “ longer stay ashore than five days.

“ On those who shall come to traffick, no “ duty shall be imposed beside the Fees to “ the Cryer and Register; and for payment “ of whatever shall be sold, whether in A“ frica or Sardinia, in the presence of those “ officers, the publick Faith shall stand en“ gaged to the seller. If any Romans shall “ come to such places in Sicily as are in sub“ jection to the Carthaginians, they shall have “ justice done them in all things

“ The Carthaginians shall do nothing to “ the detriment of the people of Ardea, An-“ tium, Laurentum, Circeii, or Tarracina, or “ any other of the Latines whomsoever, if “ they be subject [to the Romans] and if any “ be not subject, yet the Carthaginians shall “ make no attempt on their towns, if they “ make seizure of any such towns, they shall “ deliver up the same unhurt to the Romans.
 “ They shall not build any fort in the coun“ try of the Latines; and in case they shall “ at any time land their arms, they shall “ not remain there one night.” *Polyb. B. 3.
 c. 22.* See what is said in relation to this Treaty, in p. xxvi. & seq. of the Dissertation

^{*} That is, to the Southward of it, towards the lesser Syrtis, as Polybius explains it. But the Romans were permitted to have trade and commerce with Carthage and the rest of Africa on the other side the Fair Promontory, as likewise in Sardinia and those parts of Sicily which are dependent on Carthage.

Cum Carthaginiensibus legatis Romæ FoEDUS Ictum, quum amicitiam ac societatem petentes venissent. Liv. lib. vii. cap. 27.

Year of
R O M E
ccccvi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-six.

§. V. IN the following Consulship of C. Plautius Hypsæus and T. Manlius Torquatus (who, though twice Dictator, had never been Consul before) nothing remarkable happened, except the reducing of the interest of money from one per Cent. [per month] to half per Cent. and the allowing the debtors, upon their paying down one fourth of their debts, three years to discharge the remainder by annual and equal payments; and the debtors had this further relief, that no levies were made, nor taxes raised this year.

108th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.

BUT the next year, when Valerius * Corvus and C. Poetelius Libo Visolus were in possession of the Fasces, news being brought from Latium that the Volsci were soliciting the Latines to take arms against Rome, Valerius received orders to march and attack the Enemy before their Confederates could join them. Satricum, which the Latines had destroyed in 377, had been rebuilt and repeopled by the Volsci in 405, and was now the rendezvous of their forces. Here Valerius gave them battle, put them to the rout, and, having taken the town, burnt it, sparing only the Temple of the Goddess Matuta; after which he returned to Rome, and entered it in Triumph with four thousand captives before his chariot. But according to the Capitoline Marbles, the Triumph of Valerius was not the most pompous show with which the Romans were entertained in his Consulship; the Secular Games ^b, which had been instituted in the year of Rome 297, were now celebrated for the second time.

7. c. 27.
Year of
R O M E
ccccvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-five.

109th Consul-
ship.
* A second
time.

§. VI. THE Romans, after the Victory over the Volsci, were attacked by the Aurunci, a petty nation near the confines of Latium, on the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea; and the Republick, being struck with the same terror on the Credibility, &c. prefixed to the Second Volume.

Polybius gives us another Treaty, as the second, between the two republicks, but does not tell us when it was made. It differed from the first in the following particulars:

The Tyrians and those of Utica were comprised in it. For it was a treaty between the Romans and their Allies on one side, and the Carthaginians, Tyrians, Uticenses, and their Allies on the other.

To the Fair Promontory were added Mastia and Tarscium, as places beyond which the Romans were not to go in search of Plunder nor build a City, nor carry on any commerce. [The Geographers know not the situation of these places.]

The Romans might trade to the towns of Sicily subject to the Carthaginians, but were to have no commerce in Sardinia, nor in any part of Africa, except the City of Carthage only. Here they were to be allowed the same rights and privileges [in point of Trade] as the Citizens themselves; and the Carthaginians were to have the like treatment in Rome.

If the Carthaginians should take any Town in the Territory of the Latines, not under the Roman dominion, they might keep the Pillage and Captives, provided they relinquished the town; but if the Carthaginians should make any Captives among those of the Latines, who, though not subject to Rome, were, by a written Treaty, in league of amity with her, and should bring such Captives into any Roman port, and these Captives should be discovered and challenged by any Roman, they should be set at liberty.

The Romans were to be subject to the like restrictions with regard to the Carthaginians and their Allies. Polyb. B. 3. c. 24.

^b The nature and origin of these Games will be spoken of hereafter.

Year of as if all Latium had declared against her, ordered the Consuls M. Fabius
 R O M E Decius and Servius Sulpicius Camerinus to nominate a Dictator; the Courts
 ccccviii. of justice were shut up, and the Levies made with the utmost rigour.
 Bef. J. C. *L. Furius * Camillus*, whom the Consuls named to the Dictatorship, Three hundred marched away to meet the enemy, and was greatly surprised, when he forty- came within sight of them, to find that they made no better appearance four. than a gang of robbers. Nevertheless, because they had the hardiness to be the aggressors, and readily to offer him battle when he appeared, he 111th thought it expedient to seek aid of the Gods; and therefore in the heat Consul- of the conflict vowed a Temple to Juno Moneta *. The Aurunci were too ship. weak to resist the Roman forces; Furius returned victorious to Rome;
 * A second time Dic- but, resigning his Dictatorship, left to others the care of performing his tator. vow. The Senate appointed Duumvirs to direct the building of the Temple, promised to the Goddess. It was erected on the Capitol, in the same place where the house of Marcus Manlius had stood. The Consuls employed the Dictator's army against the Volsci, and, coming upon them unawares, took from them Sora.

Year of The succeeding Consuls, C. Marcius † Rutilus and T. Manlius ‡ Imperi-
 R O M E osus, consecrated this new Temple the first || of June, a year after it had ccccvix. been vowed. This ceremony was immediately followed by prodigies; Bef. J. C. thick darkness in the day-time, and a shower of stones. After consulting Three the Sibylline Books, the Senate judged it expedient (the multitude being hundred full of superstitious fears) to name a Dictator, whose business should be forty- to order the solemnisation of the festival called Feria Latinae. P. Valerius, three. being raised to that office, not only obliged the Roman Tribes, but the Nations bordering on the Roman Territory, to observe the Festival, ap-111th pointing the day when each should perform their devotions.

Severe sentences (it is said) were, at the suit of the Ædiles, passed, this year, against the Usurers.

|| Macrobi.

Satur. * This name had been given to the Queen Book 1. of the Gods a little before the taking of chap. 12. Rome by the Gauls. It was pretended, that Oros. B. 3. from the Temple of Juno had come a voice, ch. 7. accompanied with an earthquake, and that Livy. B. the voice had admonished the Romans to avert
 7. c. 28. the evils that threatened them, by sacrific-

Cicero, de
 Divin. E.

1. n. 101.

ing a sow with pig. Hence she was called Moneta §. Afterwards the Temple of Juno Moneta became a publick Mint; and from thence the Medals, which were stamp'd for current coin in trade, took the name of Moneta, MONEY.

§ From monere.

C H A P. VIII.

§. I. In the administration of M. Valerius Corvus (a third time Consul) and Cornelius Cossus Arvina, happens the FIRST RUPTURE between the ROMANS and SAMNITES, on occasion of a war which the latter had carried on with success against the people of Capua in Campania. The Campanians, to engage the Romans to succour them in their distress, make a surrender of themselves and their country to the Republick. Hereupon Valerius is directed to march an army into Campania, and Cornelius to carry the war into Samnium. Valerius, in an action with the Samnites, has the advantage. §. II. Cornelius, on the other hand, by an imprudent march brings his army into danger of being intirely cut off by the enemy; however, he is delivered out of his difficulty by a stratagem, suggested and executed by a Legionary Tribune, named P. Decius Mus; and presently after, following the advice of the said Decius, he gains a victory over the Samnites. Decius is rewarded with many honours. §. III. Valerius obtains a second victory over the Samnites in Campania. These successes make the Romans respected abroad.

§. I. THE Dictator having, for some reason (not mentioned by the Historians) reduced the Government to an Inter-regnum, the President of it held the Comitia by Centuries, for electing new Consuls. The choice fell (as the last year) upon two Patricians. M. * Valerius Corvus was now raised a third time to the Consular dignity, and with him was joined Cornelius Cossus, surnamed Arvina. It was during their administration, that the Romans and Samnites first became enemies. A city to which the Republick had no relation at that time, sowed those seeds of discord between the two nations, which produced a lasting hatred. The Sidicini, a people of Ausonia, situated beyond the Liris, being attacked by the Samnites, who doubted not to make an easy conquest of their small territory, applied themselves to the Campanians for assistance. It was the interest of the latter to succour their distressed neighbours, and stop the progress of the Samnites; but they undertook the defence of the oppressed with more ostentation than real strength. For, though they possessed a very fruitful country, and tho' commerce daily increased their riches, this wealth of private persons was the weakness of the State. Luxury reigned universally; the Houses were magnificent, but the City without Fortifications. The Merchant, vain of his wealth, mistook his vanity for courage, and looked down with scorn upon enemies that were not so rich as he.

This contempt, ever imprudent, often fatal, of an enemy's strength, proved the ruin of Capua. The Samnites, who had a prospect of more glory and advantage in the conquest of the Campanians than of the Sidicini, turned their arms against the former, and having defeated them in two pitched battles, in which the vanquished lost all their youth, drew near to

Year of
R O M E
ccccx.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-two 112th
Consul-
ship.
* A 3d
time.
Livy, B.
7. c. 29.

Year of siege their City, that had now no other defence than weak walls, and ROM E inhabitants filled with consternation.

CCCCX.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-two

111th Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 30.

c. 31.

The Magistrates in this distress had recourse to Rome; they sent a pompous embassy to implore the alliance and assistance of the Romans. Their ambassadors laid before the Senate all the motives both of glory and interest, which could engage the Republick to undertake their defence; the extremity to which they were reduced, and the power of their enemies, which would be considerably augmented by the conquest of so rich a city as Capua. They added, “Such is the misery of our present condition, that, if we are not immediately succoured by our friends, we must fall under the power of our enemies. If you defend us, you will secure to yourselves allies full of fidelity and gratitude; we shall honour you as Founders of our State, as our Parents, nay, even as the immortal Gods. If you abandon us, what will be the consequence we dread even to imagine.” To this humble address the Senate, whether out of regard to the faith of Treaties, as Livy represents it, or to draw more solid advantages from the assistance they should give the Campanians, than a vain title and empty praises, answered the ambassadors by the Consul Valerius, That they thought the CAMPANIANS worthy of their assistance, and wished they could with honour succour them; but that the Republick had an ancient alliance with the Samnites, which would not allow her to take arms against them! that the Senate however would send Deputies to their camp, to intreat them as Friends and Allies to desist from their hostilities. The Campanian Deputies had hitherto spoken only of an alliance and confederacy with the Romans, but now, not thinking the answer they had received sufficient to build great hopes on, the chief of them (pursuant to the powers with which they had been invested before they left Capua) made this farther declaration: Tho’ the Romans refuse to protect us and ours against violence and injustice, they certainly will not neglect to defend their own. The People of Campania, the City of Capua, our Lands, our Temples, every thing we have divine and human, we absolutely give and surrender to you, O Conscrip Fathers, and to the ROMAN PEOPLE; from this time forward therefore all our losses will be yours. This said, the ambassadors prostrated themselves on the threshold of the Senate-house, and, holding up their hands to the Consuls, shed a flood of tears. Self-interest and compassion made new impressions on the minds of the Senators; they were moved, says Livy, at the sad revolution to which human affairs are liable; to see a nation, late so rich and flourishing, so proud and luxurious, and from whom its neighbours had implored assistance against oppression, reduced in a short time to so dejected a state of mind, as to give themselves and all their possessions into the power of a foreign people. And as the donation was made in due form, by Ambassadors authorised to make it, the Senate did not think their alliance with the Samnites obliged them to refuse it. Without hesitation therefore they sent away Deputies with instructions to intreat the Samnites, as friends, to spare a province which belonged to Rome; and, in case of refusal, to give them notice, in the name of the People and Senate of Rome, to quit the country immediately. But the Samnite Magistrates were so far from being intimi-intimi-

intimidated by the Majesty of the Roman name, that, in the very presence of the Deputies, they ordered the Commanders of their Troops to go instantly and ravage Campania.

This insult filled both the People and Senate with indignation; and the Romans applied themselves wholly to the making preparations for a war. All the due forms of demanding satisfaction and proclaiming war by the Feciales having been observed, the two Consuls took the field, each at the head of an army. It fell to Valerius's lot to command in Campania, and Cornelius was to enter the country of the Samnites. Valerius posted his troops near mount Gaurus in Campania; and, being there advantageously situated, he was in no haste to come to a battle, but tried the Samnites in slight skirmishes, to learn their way of managing their arms. At length he assembled his troops, exhorted them not to be afraid of new enemies, or of a new manner of fighting; bid them remember their former Victories, and by what General they were now commanded; that it was Valerius, who had thrice obtained the Consulship, not by Intrigue, or the Nobleness of his Birth (honour being now the reward of merit only) but by his bravery; reminded them that he was descended from the Great Poplicola, and had himself been always a Poplicola in the true meaning of the word. Go then, ROMANS, he added, fall upon the enemy, and, in return for my affection to you, gain me the honours of a triumph.

Never was Consul more popular; never was General more tenderly beloved by his soldiers. He took a pleasure in mixing with them, and sharing the labours of the meanest among them. Valerius frequently made one at their diversions, whether Wrestling or Running, and did not disdain to enter the lists with a common soldier. He always kept his temper, and, whether victorious or vanquished in these exercises, his countenance never changed. He was continually bestowing favours, but with a just regard to times and persons. He was easy in his private conversation, and gave every man full liberty to express his sentiments in his own manner; but, as for himself, he ever maintained a certain dignity in his discourses. It was natural for troops to love and respect a General of this character. They marched out of the camp with a more than usual ardour for victory.

When the two armies were drawn up, and faced each other, their numbers appeared to be pretty equal. The battle was fought with wonderful resolution on both sides; but the Samnites began at length to give ground, when the night put an end to the conflict. The Romans had never engaged with more stubborn enemies, and perhaps would not have known that they had gained much advantage, if the Samnites had not deserted their camp in the night.

§. II. BUT whilst Valerius was signalising his courage in Campania, his Colleague Cornelius Cossus, who had been advantageously posted near Saticula on the confines of Samnium, left his camp (for what reason is unknown) and marched his troops through a mountainous country into a forest, all the roads of which were narrow, and out of which there was but one passage,

Year of R O M E ccccx. Bef. J. C. Three hundred forty-two and that through a deep valley. It was not in his power to alter his march, when he discovered, that both the wood and the valley were lined with Samnites, and that he was in a manner furrounded by the enemy. In this distress P. Decius Mus, a Legionary Tribune, proposed to the Consul to detach him with the Principes and Hastati of one Legion, to take possession of an eminence which overlooked the Samnites, and which they had neglected. He added, When you see me posted there, continue your march, without fear, through the valley; the enemy will not dare to attack you while they are exposed to our darts. The Consul approved of the motion. Decius was not discovered by the enemy till he had just gained the eminence; and then the Samnites were in such a surprise, that they could come to no determination what to do, whether to attack the Consul, or Decius. In the mean time Cornelius took advantage of their irresolution, and marched through the valley without molestation; and soon after the night came on.

Decius had at first expected to be attacked by the enemy on his hill; and hoped by the advantage of the ground to be able to withstand them. When he found that they neither came to assail him, nor yet raised any Works between him and them, he assembled his soldiers, and exhorted them not to follow the enemy's example, but to form some design with expedition, and to execute it with courage. Then while it was yet daylight, changing his habit with a private soldier, and being accompanied by his Centurions, whom he made to do the like, that the enemy might not distinguish them to be Officers, he took a view of all the avenues to the hill, and placed centinels at them, with orders to return silently to the main body, at the second watch of the night. When at that hour all his men were re-assembled, he laid before them the necessity of leaving the place where they were, and put it to the vote, whether to stay for daylight, or march off immediately, and force a way through the enemy, while they were asleep. The latter being universally approved, Decius led his troops down from the rock in great silence; but, when they had got half-way through the enemy's camp, a Roman soldier struck his foot against the buckler of a Samnite, and, the noise awakening a centinel, he gave the alarm in that quarter. The Samnites ran to arms, without knowing whether it were Decius with his troops, the Consul with his army, or some Samnite of the camp, who had disturbed their rest. In the midst of this uncertainty, Decius ordered his men to give a great shout, which so increased the consternation of the Samnites, that they were in a manner frozen with fear, and the Romans easily made their escape. When they were come near the Consul's camp, Decius commanded them to halt: It is not fit, said he, that after so glorious an exploit you should enter the camp in silence and darkness; rest yourselves therefore here till the light returns. The next morning Decius and his troops marched into the camp, with the acclamations of the army, who called them their Preservers, and gave thanks to the Gods for their happy return. But when the Consul (having summoned all his soldiers to hear his harangue) was beginning to make the Panegyrick of Decius, this brave Tribune advised him, instead of losing time

A. A Roman Soldier in the Sagum.
 B. A Roman General in his Paludamentum.

time in Panegyrics, to march away immediately, and surprise the camp of the enemy, who, in all probability, had sent out detachments in quest of him. This advice was followed; the Romans surprised the Samnites scattered about the hills and woods, and pursued them into their camp, where thirty thousand of them were cut to pieces.

This success added much to the glory of Decius, who was honoured with all the military rewards that were ever given to a Subaltern. Beside a Crown of Gold, he received from the General a present of an hundred Oxen, and a white Bull with gilded horns. As for the soldiers of his detachment, the Consul, in recompence of their merit, assigned them a double quantity of Corn, not only for the present, but during life, and he gave each of them two Saga^a. The army likewise shewed their gratitude to their deliverer, by putting on his head an Obsidional Crown^b. And, lastly, his own detachment, which he had brought safely out of the danger into which he had led them, bestowed a mark of distinction on their leader, and crowned him with a Civick Crown, or a Crown of Oak-leaves, which was deemed the most honourable of all rewards. Thus adorned with three Crowns, he offered up his white Bull in sacrifice to Mars, and distributed his hundred oxen among the companions of his danger, and sharers of his glory.

§. III. BUT the campaign was not yet ended. The Samnites, having recovered their courage, and raised new forces, appeared before Suessula, a town situated between Nola and Capua. Valerius marched against them, and, when he came within a small distance of them, incamped his troops within as narrow a compass as he possibly could, and by this he deceived the enemy; for they taking a view of his camp, and finding it so small, imagined the Romans to be but weak in number, and therefore, full of confidence, offered them battle. Valerius kept close within his intrenchments, and made such a shew of fear, that the Samnite soldiers were for immediately forcing his lines. However the officers retrained their impetuosity; and, believing that the Romans must soon want provisions, they judged it a wise part to continue quiet in their camp, and watch them, not reflecting that the Romans were in a friend's country, whose interest it was to support them. In short, the Samnites themselves were the first who wanted necessaries, and were obliged to send out large detachments to convey provisions to their camp. Valerius, observing this, seized the moment when the greater part of the enemy's troops were dispersed about the coun-

^a The Sagum of the Romans was a military habit, open from top to bottom, and usually fastened on the right shoulder with a buckle, or clasp. It was not different in shape from the Chlamys of the Greeks, and the Paludamentum of the Generals. The only difference between them was, that the Paludamentum was made of a richer stuff, was generally of a purple colour, and both longer and fuller than the Sagum. The adjoining Plate will shew the form of this garment, which the Latin authors call Sagum, and Chlamys, and Paludamentum.

^b It was customary among the Romans for the garrison of a besieged place to crown the General who came to its relief, and raised the siege, with a Chaplet or Garland made of the Grass growing in the place. It was called Corona Obsidionalis. A. Gell. L. 5. c. 6.

Year of
R O M E
ccccx.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-two 112th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 37.
Aul. Gel.
B. 5.
Auth. of Lives of Illust.
Men. c.
26.

Year of
R O M E
ccc. x.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-two

try, attack their camp, forced it, made a great slaughter there, and then with his cavalry chased the several parties that were abroad foraging. In this action the Romans took one hundred and seventy standards from the enemy.

The successes of Valerius and Cornelius (to whom the Senate decreed the honours of the TRIUMPH), made the Republick respected abroad; the Falisci entered into a treaty of alliance with her, and that whole Lucumony of Uetruria became Roman. The Latines, who had stood neuter to see the event of the war, commenced hostilities against the Peligni (a Samnite nation) as it were to assist the Romans; and, lastly, the Carthaginians sent a compliment of congratulation to the Republick, with a present of a Gold crown of twenty-five pounds weight to Jupiter Capitolinus, by way of thanksgiving for her victories.

Euseb.
Chron.

By a Census taken this year it appeared, that the number of Romans able to bear arms amounted to 160,000.

C H A P. IX.

Some Cohorts of Roman soldiers, who had been left in Capua all the winter, plot to make that delightful City their own, and to settle there. The measures taken by one of the Consuls, to defeat this scheme, occasion a desertion. The deserters are joined by great numbers of malecontents from Rome. They force an old soldier, whom they find employed in husbandry, to be their leader. Valerius Corvus is hereupon named Dictator, to march an army against the mutineers. He meets them eight miles from Rome, and prevails with them to submit; yet they, besides pardon, obtain some concessions from the Republick.

Year of
R O M E
cccxi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-one

THE Consuls for the new year were C. Marcus Rutilus, a Plebeian, (now raised to that dignity a fourth time) and Q. Servilius Ahala, a Patrician. The latter incamped the army allotted him in the neighbourhood of Rome, while the former marched with another into Campania. A body of Romans had, at the request of the Campanians, been left in Capua all the winter to defend them from the enemies incursions. When Marcus arrived in that City, he perceived a great alteration in those soldiers of the Republick. Discipline had been neglected; their austerity of manners was changed into effeminacy, and their sobriety into intemperance. The charms of the climate and the air, which they breathed in idleness, had so far bewitched them, that they did not care to hear their own country mentioned; and the less, as at home they were oppressed by their creditors. They had entered into a plot among themselves, to drive the natives out of Campania, seize it for their own possession, and settle there. Marcus was informed of all this; and, as he was a man of great experience and prudence, he made use of the gentlest methods to induce them to drop their design. He checked the sedition for the present, by indulging them in the hope that they they might put their scheme in execution whenever they pleased: For he caused a rumour to be spread, that they should spend the following winter in the same places. This hope prevailed likewise among the other Romans dispersed up and down in Campania. In the mean time he contrived, under various pretences, to send away the most factious, at first one by one, and afterwards by whole Coborts; yet so, that no soldier was dismissed with disgrace. But at length the Troops observed the General's conduct, and penetrated into his intentions. They presently imagined, that their companions had been tried and condemned at Rome, and that they themselves must undergo the same fate. In this apprehension, the first expedient that occurred to them was desertion; and the soldiers of one Cohort were so bent upon it, that they straight marched away, and posted themselves near Anxur in Lautula, which was the name the Romans gave to the narrow pass there, between the sea on one side, and high mountains on the other. To these deserters all those whom the Consul had dismissed, or who were oppressed by debts, resorted; and, new desertions following close upon the first, the malecontents in a little time increased to a moderate army. But still they were at loss for a leader. To supply this want, they surprised by night in his bed one T. Quinctius (an eminent soldier, who had retired from publick life to his farm) and forced him to go along with them, and lead them as their General to Rome.

The City was so terrified at the approach of these Mutineers, that the Republick had recourse to her usual remedy in great emergencies; the Consuls named a Dictator. Valerius Corvus was the man pitched upon, and he, at the head of an army, met the Rebels eight miles from Rome, in the Appian Way. The Dictator had always distinguished himself by a tender love for his soldiers; and these very Mutineers were a part of the victorious army which he had commanded the last year. He endeavoured therefore to bring them back to their duty by gentle methods; and, advancing into the middle space between the two armies, expostulated with them in the softest terms on their strange and unaccountable behaviour, so contrary not only to the tender regard they owed to their country, but even to the grateful returns which he himself might have expected from them, considering how zealous he had ever been for their interests, and with what condescension and kindness he had always treated them in the highest stations to which he had been promoted, as well as in his private capacity. He told them, that his prayer to the Gods before he left Rome had not been to conquer them in battle, but to reconcile them to their country; and that he was so far from desiring to reduce them by force of arms, that, if they resolved to fight, they must be the first to sound the trumpet for the charge, and must begin the attack too, before he would draw his sword against them. Then addressing himself to Quinctius, “Whether it be willingly or by force, T. Quinctius, that you are engaged on that side, you will do well, in case of a battle, to retire into the hindmost ranks; it will be less dishonourable for you even to turn your back, and fly before your fellow-citizens, than to fight against your country. But, if it be only

Year of
R O M E
CCCCXI.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty-one.
113th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
7. c. 39.

Fast. Ca-
pit.
Livy B. 7.
c. 40
Auth. of the Lives of Illust.
Men.

“ in

Year of " in order to peace and reconciliation that you appear at the head of your R O M E " party, you may consistently with your honour and duty continue there to ccccxii. " be their interpreter. Speak then, make your demands, ask any condi-
 B. J. C. " tions that are reasonable, and they shall be granted. Nay, it will be better Three " to grant you even unreasonable terms, than that we should begin a de-hundred " testable Civil War, and Romans imbrue their hands in Roman blood."

113th Consul-ship. Livy B. 7. c. 41. Valerius had no sooner ended, than Quinctius, turning to the rebels, told them with tears in his eyes, that he could be of no service to their cause, unless in obtaining for them an advantageous peace; and he advised them to put themselves intirely into the hands of the Dictator, who had a fatherly affection for them, and leave it to him to manage their interests at Rome. This motion was followed by a shout of approbation; and then the Dictator, having given the Mutineers hopes of all reasonable concessions, returned to the City, and obtained from the Senate an Act of Grace, which was afterwards confirmed by the People in Comitia. And in the same assembly, and at the request of the Rebels, were passed some new Military Laws, which revenge alone inspired them to demand. Particularly they insisted that the pay of the Cavalry should be reduced; and this because not one single man of that corps had joined them in their revolt. Some authors say, that at this time all usury was abolished in Rome, by a Law made at the motion of Genucius, a Tribune of the People; and that the Commons passed likewise these other Laws: That no man should have the same office twice within ten years, or possess two different offices in the same year; and that the two Consuls might be chosen out of the Plebeians. If these articles were obtained at this time, it is evident, that the Rebel army must have been exceedingly formidable. Livy tells us, that the historians differ in most of the circumstances of this event.

c. 42.

C H A P. X.

§. I. Privernum revolts, but is quickly reduced. The Samnites turn their arms once more against the Sidicini, who, being refused succour by the Senate at Rome, give themselves to the Latines, already in arms. The Campanians join the Latines. An army formed of these three nations enters Samnium. §. II. The Samnites send an embassy to the Republick to complain of her suffering the Latines and Campanians to commit hostilities in Samnium. They receive an unsatisfactory answer. (Alexander King of Epirus, uncle of Alexander the Great, comes into Italy, and concludes a treaty of friendship with Rome.) §. III. The Latines demand of the Romans as the condition of renewing the alliance between the two nations, That one of the Consuls and half of the Senate of Rome be for the future chosen out of the Latines. This demand is rejected, and war is declared. §. IV. Manlius and Decius, the two Consuls, have one and the same dream concerning the event of the war. §. V. Manlius causes his own son to be beheaded, for a breach of discipline. §. VI. The Romans come to a battle with with the Latines. Decius, to secure the victory to his troops, devotes himself to death. The Latines are totally routed. Manlius gives them a second overthrow, after which both they and the Campanians submit. §. VII. The next year, T. Æmilius, the Patrician Consul, being directed by the Senate to name a Dictator, names Q. Publilius, his Plebeian Colleague; who obtains some new laws in favour of the Plebeians. §. VIII. The Romans determine the fate of the several conquered cities. The Latines, being Allies, are made Subjects of Rome.

§. I. THUS was tranquillity re-established in Rome; but the confusions shewn to rebels, and the war in which the Republic was engaged with the Samnites, induced some of her neighbours to fall off from her alliance. The Privernates, in the Consulship of C. * Plautius Hipseus and L. Æmilius Mamercinus, made it appear, by their revolt, that the dread of her power was diminished. However, the Consul Plautius, without difficulty, subdued these Enemies: He defeated them in battle, took Privernum, and, though he restored it to the inhabitants, deprived them of two thirds of their Lands, and placed a strong garrison in the town. Thence he marched against the Volsci of Antium, and had a bloody engagement with them near Satricum: A sudden storm put an end to it before victory had declared for either side. It was the purpose of the Romans to renew the fight the next day; but the Antiates having numbered their dead, and being disheartened by the great loss of men they had sustained, retired in the night to Antium, with the same haste as if they had been vanquished in the battle.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred forty.
114th Consul-
ship.
Livy B.7.
c. 42.
A 2d
time.
Livy B.8.
c. 1.

The other Consul, Æmilius, who led his forces into the country of the Samnites, and laid it waste, met with no opposition: They sued to him for a peace. He referred the Ambassadors to the Senate, of whom they requested two things; peace with Rome, and permission to make war on the Sidicini. Both these requests they obtained; and the Roman army returned home, after receiving from the Samnites a year's pay and three months provisions, pursuant to their agreement with the Consul, when he granted them a truce till their ambassadors should come back from Rome.

And now the Samnites turned their forces against the Sidicini. These, after the example of the Campanians in the like distress, had recourse to the Roman Republic for protection, offering to make an absolute surrendry to her of their Country and their Liberty: But the Senate with scorn rejected the offer as made too late, and as the mere effect of extreme necessity: Whereupon the Sidicini immediately gave themselves to the Latines, who, of their own motion, had already taken arms to attack the Samnites. Nor did the Campanians forbear to join the Latines in this war, so much deeper an impression did their minds retain of the injuries they had received from the Samnites, than of the benefits they had received from the Romans.

A considerable army, formed out of these three nations, entered Samnium, laying waste all before them; and in some slight engagements they

Year of had the advantage : Nevertheless their commander, who was a Latine, not ROME caring to lessen his strength (destined to more important service) by too
 CCCCXII. frequent skirmishes, withdrew his forces very soon out of the enemies Pef. J. C. country.

Three Hundred
 forty.

114th Consul-
 ship.

§. II. THE retreat of the confederates gave the Samnites an opportunity of sending Ambassadors to Rome: Who, when admitted by the Senate to an audience, complained of their hard fortune, in that they suffered no less since their alliance with the Romans, than they had done when in enmity with them; and humbly prayed, that the Romans would be satisfied with having snatched out of their hands a certain victory over the Campanians and Stacini, and not suffer them also to be subdued by those the most base and cowardly People of all Italy. They added, If the Latines and Campanians are subject to you, why do not you forbid them to enter our country in a hostile manner? If they are rebels, why do not you chastise them? These questions puzzled the Senators, unwilling to own that they had no longer any power over the Latines, and fearing at the same time to alienate them intirely by a censure on their proceedings. The Consul Plautius therefore in the name of the Senate gave this ambiguous answer: The Campanians are our subjects, and we will force them to desist from troubling you: But, as for the Latines, they are not restrained by our Treaty of Alliance with them from making war against whom they please: An answer which as it left the Samnites in a melancholy uncertainty with relation to the intentions of the Republick, so it wholly alienated the Campanians by the menace it contained; and, as for the Latines, they grew so proud upon it, as to imagine they could now demand nothing which the Romans would dare to refuse. Under colour of preparing to carry on the war with the Samnites, they convened frequent assemblies of their Chiefs, where they formed designs against Rome, in all which the Campanians took part. The Roman Senate, though the confederates used all endeavours to keep their consultations secret, received full information of what was doing; and, to the end that the Consuls who would have the management of so important a war, might be the sooner in commission, the Fathers obliged the present to abdicate before the expiration of their year: And because it was doubtful whether these Consuls quitting their Magistracy before the usual time, could, consistently with true religion, hold the Comitia for electing their successors, the government was reduced to an Inter-regnum.

§. III. M. FABIVS (the second Inter-rex) having convened the Centuries, they chose T. Manlius * Torquatus and Decius Mus to be Consuls for the new year *. And now, although the Romans had no doubt of the defection of their allies, and especially of the Latines, yet the Conscript Fa-

* A third
 time.

* Livy tells us (by mistake, as Dodwell thinks) that Alexander King of Epirus, and brother of Olympias, mother of Alexander the Great, came at this time into Italy, and would probably have attacked the Romans, had he succeeded in his first enterprises. Aulus

Gellius (B. 17. c. 21.) reports that this prince used to say, that the country he proposed to conquer was a country of Men; whereas the provinces which his nephew Alexander went to subdue were inhabited by Women only.

thers

thers cited ten of the chief leaders of the Latines to appear at Rome, to receive the orders of the Republick. The Latines had chosen themselves two Prætors, or Presidents of their great Council (who were likewise to be the managers of the war) L. Annius and L. Numicius, the one a native of Setia, the other of Circeii, two Roman colonies. These men, being especially summoned by name, assembled the Council, acquainted them with the summons, pointed out the heads upon which they presumed their examination would turn, and asked what answer they should make to the Roman Senate. The members of the Diet were divided in opinion; upon which Annius in a long harangue laid before them their own strength and flourishing condition; the credit they had with their neighbours, so as to be able to engage even the Roman colonies in their cause; the present weakness of the Republick, sufficiently discovered in the answer given by the Senate to the Samnite Deputies; and in conclusion exhorted the assembly to shake off all dependance upon Rome, and even to refuse an alliance with her, unless she would consent, that one of her Consuls and the half of her Senate should for the future be chosen out of the Latines: And he offered to go in person to Rome, and make this demand in the presence of the Senate and People, and even of Jupiter Capitolinus himself.

This motion being universally applauded, Annius with nine more Ambassadors appeared soon after in presence of the Conscript Fathers assembled in the Capitol. The Consul Manlius spoke first, and in the name of the Senate forbade the Latines to make war against the Samnites. To this Annius, more like a conqueror who had taken the Capitol by force of arms, than an Ambassador protected by the law of nations, answered, That the Romans had chosen an ill time to give their orders in such an arbitrary manner; when the Latines were in nothing inferior to them. That in an union between two nations, where the strength on both sides was equal, the authority likewise should be equally shared; and then he made the demand before-mentioned: which so highly provoked the Consul, a man no less haughty and passionate than the Latine Prætor, that, not being able to contain his anger, he loudly declared, That if the Conscript Fathers should ever fall into such a madness, as to receive the law from a Citizen of Setia, he would himself enter the Senate-house sword in hand, and kill every Latine he should find there. Then turning to the statue of Jupiter, he invoked the God to be witness of the pride and ingratitude of the Latines. The rest of the Senators joined their exclamations full of disdain to those of the Consul; while Annius, as some say, in return to their repeated invocations of the Gods, who had been witnesses of the leagues and treaties between the Republick and the Latines, raised his voice, and scoffed at the Roman Jupiter. Certain it is, that he left the Senate-house in a rage, and retired with such precipitation, that stumbling at the threshold of the door he fell from the top of the steps to the bottom, and for some time lay senseless. Manlius coming, by the Senate's order, to dismiss the Ambassadors and seeing Annius prostrate on the ground, loudly broke out into these expressions: It goes well!—Gods! You begin a holy war!—Yes, There is a Power above! Thou hast a Being, Great Jupiter!

Year of
R O M E
ccccxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
nine.
115th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
8. c. 3, 4.

c. 5.

c. 6.

Year of ROME And it is not without reason that we have consecrated this temple to thee, as the father of Gods and Men!—Why, Romans, Why, Conscript Fathers, do we delay one moment to take arms, when we have the Gods for our leaders? I will lay the Legions of the Latines as low, as their Ambassador now lies before you. These words, highly applauded by the People, raised such a spirit in them, that the care of the Magistrates, rather than any regard to the law of Nations, preserved the Ambassadors from being insulted at their departure.

cccxlii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
nine.

115th
Consul-
ship.

§. IV. THE Senate having passed a decree for a war with the Latines, the Consuls raised two armies, marched them through the Countries of the Marci and Peligni, and, being joined by the Samnites, incamped in the neighbourhood of Capua, where the forces of the Latines and their Confederates were assembled. The night following, Manlius and Deicius are said to have seen, in their sleep, a man of a gigantick stature and majestick look, who told them, That the victory was decreed to that army of the two, whose General should devote himself to the Dii Manes. As soon as it was day the Consuls communicated their dreams to each other; expiatory sacrifices were offered to avert the anger of the Gods; and the Aruſpices, being consulted, pretended to make such discoveries in the entrails of the victims, as confirmed the dreams. Hereupon, the Lieutenants, and the Tribunes of the soldiers, being called together, the will of the Gods was imparted to them, lest the voluntary death (not known to be such) of a Consul should strike a terror into the army; and it was agreed between the two Consuls, that he, whose troops should first give way, should rush into the midst of the enemy's battalions, and devote himself to certain death, to save his country.

§. V. IN the same council of war it was determined, that the ancient strict discipline should be observed, and that no officer or soldier should dare to fight with the enemy out of his rank; and this was proclaimed through all the camp; a precaution extremely necessary at this time, when the Romans were at war with the Latines, with whom they were personally acquainted (having often served together) who spoke the same language, were armed after the same manner, and observed the same way of fighting, and of marshalling their troops. It happened soon after, that young Manlius, the Consul's son, being at the head of a detachment of horse, met an advanced squadron of the enemy, whose Commander, knowing him, challenged him to single combat. Manlius, piqued in point of honour, and forgetting the late order of the Generals, accepted the challenge, killed his adversary, stript him of his armour, and, loaded with the glorious spoils, came straight to his father's tent: Father, I have followed your example, and proved myself your son: I was challenged, like you, by an enemy to single combat; I have slain him, and I here lay his spoils at your feet. The Consul turned his back upon his son, ordered the troops to be assembled, and then in their presence made him this reply: Since you, Titus Manlius, in contempt of the Consular Dignity and the Authority of a Father, and in contradiction to my express orders, have been so rash as to leave your rank to fight the enemy;
since

Livy, B. 8.
c. 7.

A. The Hastati.
B. The Principes.
C. The Triarii.

A Roman Army drawn up in Battalia.

D. The Roman Cavalry.
E. The Cavalry of Auxiliaries.
F.F.F.F. Light armed Soldiers.

since you have destroyed, as far as in you lay, that Military Discipline which has been hitherto the support of the Roman People, and reduced me to the hard necessity of forgetting myself and mine, or the regard I owe to the publick interest, Rome must not suffer the punishment of your fault; we must expiate it ourselves. A sad example shall we be, but a wholesome one to the youth of the Roman Soldiery. As for me, both the innate affection of a Father for a Son, and that specimen which thou, deceived by a vain appearance of honour, hast given of thy valour, move me exceedingly: But since either the Authority must be established by thy death, or quite destroyed by thy impunity, I cannot think, if there be any of the Manlian blood in thee, thou wilt be backward to repair the breach thou hast made in the Military Discipline, by undergoing the punishment due to thy offence. This said, he ordered the Lictors to tie him to a stake and strike off his head. All present were stunned at the cruel sentence, as if it had been pronounced against themselves; and, if they continued quiet, it was more out of fear and astonishment than modesty. And no sooner was the young man beheaded and his blood seen to gush out, than, coming to themselves, they vented their anger in imprecations and invectives against the Father: But, as to the son, they covered his dead body with the spoils of the Latine, whom he had vanquished, and expressed their affection for him by the most pompous obsequies which they could, in the field, perform to his honour. Extreme and excessive doubtless was this severity of Manlius: Nevertheless, it had this good effect, that it made his army wonderfully tractable for the future, and strictly observant of discipline, which proved of great moment in the general engagement with the enemy a few days after.

§. VI. THE Romans on a day of battle drew up their soldiers in three lines, distinguished by the names of the HASTATI, the PRINCIPES, and the TRIarii.

The HASTATI, who composed the first line, had their name from the javelins called Hastæ which they bore.

The PRINCIPES, who made the second line, were so called because originally they were placed in the front of the battle, and began the attack; and in those times they were generally the richest and the noblest of the Roman youth. They fought with swords.

The TRIarii were so named because they made the Third line. They were commonly veterans, or hardy old soldiers, the main strength and hopes of their party. They bore the javelin called Pilum, whence they had the name of Pilani Milites; and for the same reasons the soldiers of the two lines before them had that of Antepilani.

Originally

^a According to Zonaras, B.7. Manlius first crowned his son as a Victor.

^b Mr. Kennet thinks it probable, that this was before the institution of the Hastati.

^c How differently soever the Hastati, Principes, and Triarii might be arm'd in these times, they afterwards bore much the same arms; and therefore Polybius has not divided them in his description, but speaks of them all together.

In Polybius's time, a Legion of 4000 men had 600 Triarii, 1200 Principes, and as many Hastati;

Year of
R O M E
CCCCXIII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
nine.

115th
Consul-
ship.

Livy B.8.
c. 8.

Varro, B.
4. de Ling.
Lat.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxiii.
Ref. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-
nine.

115 Con-
sularship.

Originally each of these three lines was intire, there were no breaks or intervals between the Manipuli or companies that composed it; nor were there any void spaces left behind the lines, so that the whole body of infantry was close and compact, like the Macedonian Phalanx.

But,

Hastati; the rest were VELITES. If the Legion happened to be more numerous, each of the three last corps was increased in proportion, but the TRIARII never exceeded 600.

The VELITES were commonly young men of mean condition; they had their name à Velande, or à Veleritate, from their swiftness or expedition. They hovered in loose order before the army. Their arms were

The Spatha Suroa, which the Romans thought of the best shape and temper, and fittest for execution, being something like the Turkish Scymiter, but more sharp at the point. The soldiers wore it on their right side.

Hasta, or light and slender javelins. Each man had seven.

Parma, a kind of round buckler 3 feet in diameter, of wood covered with leather.

Galea, a light casque for their head, generally made of the skin of some wild beast.

The arms of the HASTATI, PRINCIPES, and TRIARII (beside the sword abovementioned) were the Scutum, the Pilum, the Galea, and the Lorica.

The Scutum was a buckler of wood, the parts being joined together with little plates of iron, and the whole covered with a bull's hide. An iron plate went about it without to keep off blows, and another within to hinder it from taking any damage by lying on the ground. In the middle was an iron Boss or Umbo jutting out, very serviceable to glance off stones and darts, and sometimes to press violently upon the enemy, and drive all before them. They are to be distinguished from the Clypeus, which were less, and quite round, belonging more properly to other nations, tho' for some little time used by the Romans. The Scuta themselves were of two kinds; the Orata and the Imbricata; the former is a plain oval figure, the other oblong, and bending inward like half a cylinder. Polybius makes the Scuta 5 or 6 feet long, and Plutarch * calls them πεντάγωνοι, reaching about to the Feet. And it is very probable that they covered almost the whole body, since in Livy; † we meet with soldiers who stood on the guard, sometimes sleeping with their head on their shield, having fixed the other part of it on the earth.

The Pilum was a missile weapon, which in a charge they darted at the enemy. It was commonly four-square, but sometimes round, composed of a piece of wood about three cubits long, and a slip of iron of the same length, hooked and jagged at the end. They took abundance of care in joining the two parts together, and did it so artificially that it would sooner break in the iron itself than in the joint. Every man had two of these Pila; and this number the Poets allude to:

Bina manu lato crispans hastilia ferro.

VIRG. Æn. i. 317.

Quæ duo sola manu gestans acclivis monti

fixerat, intorquet jacula——

STATIUS, Theb. 2.

C. † Marius in the Cimbrian war contrived these Pila after a new fashion; for before, where the wood was joined to the iron, it was made fast with two iron pins; now Marius let one of them alone as it was, and pulling out the other, put a weak wooden peg in its place; contriving it so, that, when it was stuck in the enemy's shield, it should not stand out-right as formerly; but, the wooden peg breaking, the iron should bend, and so the javelin sticking fast by its crooked point should weigh down the shield.

The Galea was a Head-piece, or Morrion, coming down to the shoulders, commonly of brass.

The Lorica was a Brigandine, or Coat of Mail, generally made of leather, and worked over with little hooks of iron, and sometimes adorned with small scales of thin gold; as we find in Virgil:

Loricam confertam hamis. Æn. iii. 467.

And,

Nec duplici squamâ lorica fidelis & nuro.

Æn. ix. 707.

* Plut. in P. Æm.

† B. 44.

‡ Plut. in Mari.

Sometimes

The different sorts of Roman Bucklers.

But, at the time of this war of the Romans with the Latines, the method of marshalling the troops was different.

Between the first and second lines was a space of fifty feet; and the TRIarii were drawn up at the distance of an hundred feet behind the PRINCIPES.

And, as spaces were left between the lines, so likewise between the MANIPULI, or companies of each line. But these openings were not so disposed, as to yield a direct passage to the enemy from the front of the army to the rear. The Manipuli of the second line stood behind the openings of the first, and the Manipuli of the third behind those of the second, so that the order of the whole resembled that of a Quincunx.

When the HASTATI happened to be overpowered, they retired softly towards the PRINCIPES, fell into the intervals of their ranks, and together with them renewed the fight. But, if the PRINCIPES and the HASTATI thus joined were too weak to sustain the fury of the battle, they all fell back into the wider intervals of the TRIarii; and then, all together being united into a firm mass, they made another effort much more impetuous than any before: If this assault proved ineffectual, the day was intirely lost as to the Foot, there being no farther reserves^a.

Livy speaks of the RORarii and the ACCENSI, as two corps of troops that were a kind of supernumeraries to the TRIarii, but not soldiers equal to them for strength or courage.

In the middle of the space between the PRINCIPES and the TRIarii, where stood the Roman Eagles, the Consuls and Lieutenant Generals took their posts. Behind the Generals, the TRIarii (while the Hastati and Principes were fighting) kept firm with their right knees on the ground,

Sometimes the Loricæ were a sort of Linen Cassocks, such as Suetonius attributes to Galba, and like that of Alexander in Plutarch; or those of the Spanish troops described by Polybius in his account of the battle of Cannæ.

The poorer soldiers who were rated under a thousand Drachms, instead of this Brigandine, wore a Pectorale or breast-plate of thin brass about twelve fingers square; and this, with what have been already described, rendered them complely armed; unless we add the Ocreæ, or Greaves, which they wore on their legs; which perhaps they borrowed (as many other customs) from the Grecians, so well known by the title of—εὐχρημίδες Ἀχαιοί.

In the elder times of the Romans, their horse used only a round shield, with a helmet on their head, and a couple of javelins in their hands, great part of their body being left without defence. But, as soon as they found the great inconveniencies to which they were hereby exposed, they began to arm themselves like the Grecian Horse, or much like their own Foot, only their shield was a little shorter and squarer, and their lance or javelin thicker, with spikes at each end, that, if one miscarried, the other might be serviceable. Kenn. Antiq. P. II. B. IV. Ch. IX.

^aThe stratagem of rallying thus by means of these openings in the lines, has been reckoned almost the whole art and secret of the Roman discipline, and it was almost impossible it should prove unsuccessful, if duly observed: For fortune, in every engagement, must have failed them three several times, before they could be routed; and the enemy must have had the strength and resolution to overcome them in three several encounters for the decision of one battle; whereas most other nations, and even the Grecians themselves, drawing up their whole army as it were in one front, trusted themselves and their fortunes to the success of a single charge. Kennet's Antiq. Part II. Book IV. Ch. X.

their

Year of
R O M E
CCCCXIII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
nine.
115th
Consul-
ship.
Julius Lipfius de
Mil. Rom.
B. 4. c. 1.

Year of their great bucklers on their shoulders, and resting themselves on their R O M E spears, which, pointing upwards, formed a kind of Palisade before ccccxiii. them.

Bef. J. C.

Three
 hundred forty-
 nine.

115th
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B.
 8. c. 9.

As for the Roman Cavalry, they were always posted at the two corners of the army, like wings on a body, and fought sometimes on foot and sometimes on horseback, like our Dragoons. At this time there were but 300 to a Legion of 5000 Foot. Of four such Legions and 1200 Horse the present army consisted.

The Consuls Manlius and Decius, before they drew their troops out of the camp, offered sacrifices to the Gods. It is said that the Aruspex shewed to Decius the liver of his victim wounded in the friendly * side (a bad omen for him;) but declared that the beast had no other mark of being unacceptable to the Gods; and that, as to Manlius's victim, the signs were as favourable as could be wished. 'Tis enough, said DECIVS; all is well, if my Colleague has engaged the Gods to be propitious to him.

When the day of battle came, Manlius commanded the right wing, Decius the left. It was fought on both sides at first with equal strength and courage; but at length the Roman Hastati of the left wing were forced to give ground, and retire into the intervals of the Principes. This disadvantage put Decius in mind of his agreement with his Colleague on occasion of their dreams. He called out therefore to Valerius the Pontifex Maximus, to perform on him the ceremony of Consecration, in order to his Devotement to death to save his Legions. Valerius bad him put on his Pratexta^b, cover his head, put forth his hand under his robe to his chin, and then standing with both his feet upon his javelin repeat after him the following words: "O Janus, Jupiter, Father Mars, Quirinus, tos.

* Indige-

"Bellona; O ye Lares, ye Novensiles^c, ye Deified * Heroes, ye Gods who have power over us and our enemies, ye Gods of Hell, I honour you, invoke you, and humbly intreat you to prosper the arms of the Roman People, and to strike their enemies with terror, affright, and death; and I do for the safety of the Roman People and their Legions devote myself, and, with myself, the Legions and Auxiliaries of our enemies, to the Infernal Gods and the Goddesses of the Earth."

Having made this prayer, he ordered his Lictors to go in all haste, and tell his Colleague Manlius, that he had devoted himself for the safety of the Roman army. Then tucking up his robe, and girding it about him, he mounted his horse and rode full speed into the thickest of the enemies battalions. Livy says, that he appeared to them more than human, and that, at the sight of him, they seemed as if they were planet-struck; and that he was no sooner fallen to the ground with numberless wounds, than the La-

* A familiari parte. The other was the Enemy's side of the liver, where their Doom was to be read.

^b White Robe, bordered with purple.

^c Nine Deities, according to Varro, brought to Rome by the Sabines; viz. Lara, Vesta, Minerva, Feronia, Concord, Good Faith, Fortune, Chance, Health. Some take them to be the nine Muses. C. & R.

tine Cohorts all around him dispersed themselves ^a and fled. As for the Hastati and Principes of the Roman left wing, they instantly renewed the charge like men who had just received the signal to begin to fight; and they were strengthened by the Rorarii from the rear; the Triarii, with their right knees on the ground, still keeping their post.

The battle continued, and the Latines, superior in number, had the better in other parts of the field, when the news was brought to Manlius of his Colleague's death. Having let fall some tears, and given him the praises due, he remained a short moment in doubt, whether he should then give the signal for the Triarii to rise; but, judging it more prudent to reserve them for the finishing blow, he commanded the Accensi ^b from the rear to the van. The enemy, taking these fresh troops to be the Roman Triarii, instantly ordered their own Triarii to the charge; and this proved the loss of the battle to the Latines: For when they had wearied themselves, and broken or blunted their weapons in repulsing the Romans once more, and when, after they had repulsed what they fancied to be the last reserve of their enemies, they thought themselves sure of the victory, the Roman Triarii by order of Manlius appeared on a sudden, as if they had started out of the ground. Their arms were shining and their strength intire. Having received the Hastati and Principes into the intervals of their ranks, they first gave a shout that dismayed the enemy, and then fell upon them with such fury, and made so terrible a slaughter, that scarce a fourth part of the army escaped.

This battle was fought not far from mount Vesuvius. During the action the Samnites, drawn up in Battalia, at the foot of that Mountain, served to keep the Latines in fear: Or perhaps (as some writers reported) they came to the assistance of the Romans, after the conflict was over. Manlius acquired great honour by his conduct in this important day; both Latines and Romans agreeing afterwards in opinion, that whichever army he had commanded must have been victorious.

Those of the Latines who escaped the slaughter, and were scattered about ^{c. 11.} the country, collected themselves soon after into one body, and took shelter at Vescia, near the Liris. Here Numicius their General exhorted and encouraged them to try the fortune of arms once more with the Romans; and his motion was approved. In order to get an augmentation of his troops, he artfully caused letters to be spread about in Latium, and the country of the Volsci, representing the flight of the Latines as only an

^a Cicero (B. 3. de Nat. Deor.) derides that superstitious credulity, which ascribed such wonderful effects to these Devotements. He could not conceive, how men of sense could form to themselves any such beings as mischievous Gods, who thirsted after human blood. So that he looked on these voluntary Devotements as no more at bottom than heroick acts of valour, or the last efforts of Generals, who, when their troops were disheartened and broken, threw themselves into the midst of the enemy's battalions, in order to engage their soldiers to follow them. C. & R.

^b Father Rouillé on this occasion speaks of the Accensi, as light-armed soldiers, who fought with slings; but, if so, how could the Latines mistake them for the Roman Triarii?

Year of
R O M E
CCCCXIII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
nine.
115th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
8. c. 10.

Year of R O M E
ccccxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three hundred thirty-nine.
115th Consul-ship.

honourable retreat, and by this means he drew to his camp many, who had not assisted at the late action; and, having thus hastily formed a new army, he marched immediately away, taking the road to Capua. Manlius, informed of the enemy's motions, met them in their march, gave them another overthrow, and then entered Latium to lay it waste. He met with no resistance; the Latine towns surrendered at discretion, as did Privernum in the territory of the Volsci. Campania was likewise totally brought into subjection. The Consul dispossessed the Campanians, Latines, and Priver-nates of their estates, and distributed them among the Commons of Rome. However, the Latines and Campanians were not all deprived of their estates without distinction. The Laurentini in Latium, and the Campanian Knights to the number of sixteen hundred, had not been concerned in the revolt; and they were therefore continued in their possessions and privileges; nay, the latter were made Citizens of Rome, but without right of suffrage; and an annual pension of 450 * Denarii was assigned to each of them out of the publick revenues of Campania.

Fast. Ca- pit.
Livy, B. 8. c. 12.

Manlius had deserved the honours of a Triumph, and doubtless he obtained them (though Livy says nothing of it.) But he could not recover the good-will of the Roman youth; they bore him an implacable hatred for his severity, none but the old men went out to meet him at his return to Rome. Soon after, he fell sick; and, as a Roman General was wanted in the field to oppose some fresh incursions of the Antiates, he named to the Dictatorship L. Papirius Crassus, who appointed L. Papirius Cursor to be his Master of the Horse. The Dictator kept his troops some months in the field at free quarter, and then returned to the city to preside at the election of new Consuls.

Year of R O M E
ccccxiv.
Bef. J. C.
Three hundred thirty-eight.
116th Consul-ship.
Ibid.

§. VII. IT had been customary, for some time past, to observe the law which directed to chuse one of the two Consuls out of the Plebeians; and now Q. Publilius, a Plebeian, was joined with Tib. Æmilius, a Patrician, in the Government. The former proving successful in an expedition against a body of Latines (rebellng on account of their lands being taken from them) obtained the honours of a Triumph. Upon which, Æmilius, jealous of his Colleague's glory, demanded the same honours, as the reward for some advantage he had gained over another body of Latines assembled at Pedum, though he had not finished his expedition; but the Conscript Fathers absolutely refused his request, till he should take that place either by surrendry or assault; a refusal so highly resented by Æmilius, that never did any Tribune of the Commons inveigh more bitterly against the Nobility, than the Patrician Consul did on this occasion. The subject of his harangues was the unequal distribution the Senate had made of the Lands in Latium; and he began to raise a disturbance. The Senate, to put an end to it, ordered him to name a Dictator, under pretence of carrying on the war more vigorously against the Latines. Æmilius obeyed, but at the same time revenged himself on the Conscript Fathers, by nominating his Plebeian Colleague Publius, who appointed Brutus Scæva, another Plebeian, to be his General of the Horse. The Dictator, being a man intirely devoted to the Commons, immediately seized this favourable opportunity to establish their rights, and even to extend their privileges. And these things he effected by three Laws which he passed, 1. That the Decrees, made by the Commons at the request of their Tribunes, should be observed by all the Romans [the Quirites.] 2. That, for the future, the laws which were to be passed by the Centuries should be authoris'd^b by the Senate before they were put to the vote in the Comitia; whereas hitherto the Comitia Centuriata had used to pass the laws first, and the Senate to accept or reject them as they pleased. 3. That one of the Censors should always for the future be a Plebeian.

* 14 l. 10 s. 7 d. $\frac{1}{2}$ Arbutnot.

The Senate, much mortified at this downfall of the Patricians, resolved to revenge themselves on Æmilius; and, knowing him to be very tender of his honour, attacked him on that side. To shew the Romans how negligently he had conducted himself in the discharge of the commission he had received to finish the Latine war, they ordered the new Consuls, L. Furius Camillus, grandson of the Great Camillus, and C. Menius, a Plebeian, to undertake the same enterprise, and to lay siege to Pedum. And, that the Generals might not be foiled in the attempt, they plentifully furnished them with men, provisions, arms, and proper engines. Upon the report of Camillus's march to besiege Pedum, the forces of Tybur, Præneste, Aricia, Lanuvium, Velitræ, and Antium hastened to relieve the place; but these troops were defeated, and Camillus the same day took the town by assault. The Consuls having finished the war, and totally subdued Latium, returned to Rome, where they not only had the honours of a Triumph, but, by order of the Republick, two Equestrian statues erected for them in the Forum.

And now the great affair in the Senate was to determine the fate of the conquered. Camillus, in his harangue upon this occasion, told the Fathers, that the success of their arms against the Latines had been such, that it now depended on their pleasure whether LATIUM should be any more; but that it deserved their consideration, whether it would not be of greater advantage to the Republick to shew mercy to the conquered, and admit them to the privileges of Roman Citizens, thereby increasing the number of her subjects, than utterly to exterminate them, and reduce their country to a desert. The Consul declared himself for the first, and the Conscript Fathers in general were inclined to clemency: But, as some of the Latine Cities had been more criminal than others, they made a distinction in their treatment of them. Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, and Pedum, were made Roman^c Municipia; their soldiers were to be incorporated in the Legions, and

Year of
R O M E
ccccxiv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-
eight.
116th
Consul-
ship.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-seven.

117th
Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
8. c. 14.

^a Ut Plebiscita omnes Quirites tenerent. This Law seems to be of the same import with that passed by Horatius and Valerius in 304. the year after the Decemvirate.

^b Ut legum quæ Comitiis Centuriatis fer-

X x x 2

rentur, ante initum suffragium patres auctores fierent.

^c The privileges granted by the Romans to the Municipal Towns were more or less, according to the services they had done the Republick.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-seven.

117th
Consul-
ship.
• Flor. B.
1. C. 11.

and to be no longer upon the foot of Auxiliaries. Tusculum had had the same privilege before, and it was now confirmed. But Velitræ was razed, and its Senate and inhabitants banished to another city, beyond the Tiber, because it had often rebelled since it was made a Roman Colony (in the year 261.) Antium was not destroyed; the Antiates were granted the freedom of Roman Citizens; but they were forbidden the sea; and their fleet, consisting of six * Gallies, was partly burnt, and partly carried away into the Roman ports. With the brass Beaks [Rostra] of these vessels the Consul Menius adorned the Pulpit from whence the Roman Magistrates harangued the People, and hence it was ever after called the Rostra. The inhabitants of Tybur and Prænestæ were deprived of all their lands, for having formerly assisted the Gauls; and, lastly, all the Latines in general were forbidden to assemble their Diets as formerly; to marry out of their respective cities; or to have common markets or fairs for trade.

As for Cumæ and Suessula, and the other cities of Campania, they were treated as Capua had been, i. e. their lands were all taken from them and divided among the Romans. Thus a three years war was ended in the subduing of two fine countries to the Republick; and the Latines, from being the Allies of Rome, became her Subjects.

Republick. The Citizens of some Municipia had only the Title of Roman Citizens. Others enjoyed all the privileges and served in the army upon the foot of properly belonging to that title. They were enrolled in the Tribes, had a right of suffrage, could stand candidates for offices, and Legionaries.

C H A P. XI.

§. I. PUBLILIUS, though a Plebeian, obtains the PRÆTORSHIP; so that all the great Dignities in the State, except those of the Priesthood, are now common to the two Orders.

From this year 416, to the year 425, the most memorable events are The invention of Moveable Towers and Covered Galleries, by the Consul M. Valerius Corvus (in the year 418) at the siege of Cales, the chief City of the Aufones, allies of the Sidicini. The Republick's changing the custom of raising a new army upon every change of Consuls. The reduction of the Sidicini (probably in 420.) The addition of two new Tribes (in 421) to the 27 old ones. A plot formed (in 422) by some hundreds of Roman Women to poison their Husbands. The revolt of Privernum (in 423.) The reduction of that City (in 424,) and the courageous and noble answer given by one of the Citizens, when questioned by the Roman Senate concerning the conduct which the Privernates would observe for the future.

§. I. R O M E had never been in a better condition to attempt the Conquest of all Italy than now, when those warm contentions for power at home, which had often retarded the progress of the Roman arms abroad,

A. Different Sorts of Covered Galleries.
B. Vinea for covering Besiegers.

A. A Tower of twenty Stories.

B. A Tower with a Draw-Bridge.

Act. Terrapies.

abroad, were at an end. The Plebeians shared almost all the great offices in the State with the Patricians; the Consulship, Quæstorship, Ædileship, and Censorship: they were excluded only from the Prætorship and the Sacerdotal Dignities. And in the following year, when C. Sulpicius Longus and P. Ælius Pætus were in possession of the Fasces, Publius, a Plebeian, stood candidate for the Prætorship, and obtained it. The Consul Sulpicius had refused to admit his name among those of the other candidates; but the Senate were easy in the matter, thinking it perhaps unreasonable and absurd, that a Plebeian, who had been Consul and Dictator, should merely on account of his birth be excluded from the Prætorship. And thus the Plebeians being arrived at the height of their desires, (for they did not yet pretend to the Pontificate and Augurate) all pretences for faction were entirely taken away. Real, personal merit, not high birth, not the merit of mens ancestors, was now chiefly regarded in the distribution of honours: So that this period of time may more properly, than any of the former, be called The Age of ROMAN VIRTUE.

The Republick, through the indolence of her present Consuls, neglected to revenge the Aurunci on their enemies the Sidicini, who this year had invaded their country, and made themselves masters of their principal City. The Aurunci had submitted to the Romans in the Consulship of Manlius Torquatus, and had continued faithful amidst all the confusions of the Latine war. They well deserved therefore to be succoured; and accordingly the Consuls of the new year, L. Papirius and Cæso Duilius, were now ordered to lead an army to their assistance; and, though the Aufones joined their neighbours the Sidicini, these united forces were easily put to the rout. They fled for shelter behind the walls of their Cities; and the Consuls returned to Rome, without reaping much glory from the campaign.

But in the following Consulship of M. Valerius Corvus (now raised to that dignity a fourth time) and M. Atilius Regulus, the former (to whom his Collegue, at the request of the Senate, had yielded the command of the army without drawing lots) laid siege to Cales, the chief city of the Aufones. He invented Covered Galleries and Moveable Towers for screening his men, and carrying on the attacks, and at length took the place by assault.

After this the two Consuls, having first nominated a Dictator to preside at the ensuing elections, joined their forces, and marched against the Sidicini; but, notwithstanding that they used all expedition to finish their conquest before the expiration of their year, they were forced to leave the completion of it to their successors, T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Posthumius Albinus. As soon as these new Magistrates were named, and before they entered on their office, they, to make themselves acceptable to the Commons, solicited and obtained a decree for settling a Colony of Roman Citizens at Cales, and dividing the district of that City among them; and, that the distribution of the lands might be made the more equally, the Senate chose out

Year of
R O M E
ccccxvi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-six 118th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B. 8.
c. 15.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty-five.
119th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
8. c. 16.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxviii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred-thirty-four.

120th
Consul-
ship.
Fall. Ca-pit.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxix.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred-thirty-three.

three 121st Consul-
ship.

Year of three persons of known equity to conduct and settle the Colony, consisting R O M E of two thousand five hundred men.

cccccix. The Romans seem at this time to have quite abolished that custom Bef. J. C. they formerly had, of raising a new army upon every change of chief Three Magistrates. An army raised by one General now passed from him to hundred his successor, and so on till the end of the war. Accordingly Veturius thirty- and Pestumius put themselves at the head of the troops which Corvus had two. commanded, and entered the country of the Sidicini; who, to avoid a battle, suffered their territory to be laid waste, and appeared no more in the field. Nevertheless, a report was spread at Rome, after the return of the Consuls, that the Sidicini had once more assembled a formidable army, and were joined by the Samnites, which caused so great an alarm, that the Consuls, by order of the Senate, named a Dictator, as in a time of imminent danger. Their choice fell upon P. Cornelius Rufinus. This supreme Magistrate however soon abdicated, upon some pretended defect in his inauguration. Nay, superstition prevailed so far at this time, that because a plague raged at Rome, and because the College of Augurs declared, that all the Auspices of the year had been infected by the contagious air, the chief Magistrates were all displaced, and the Republick fell into an Inter-regnum.

Year of Livy says nothing of what happened in the year 420, when *L. Papirius
 R O M E Curior and C. Poetelius Libo Visolus were Consuls, according to the Fasti cccccc. Capitolini. It was very probably a year barren of events, unless the Si- Bef. J. C. dicini were then subdued, which is not unlikely, since we find no other Three epoch of their reduction.

In the succeeding Consulship of *A. * Cornelius* and Cn. Domitius, a rumour that those terrible enemies, the Gauls, were preparing for a war with the Republick, occasioned the sudden nomination of M. Papirius Crassus to be Dictator; but, while he was levying troops to oppose their attempts, more certain accounts came that all was quiet on that side. Some suspicion of the Samnites at this time prevailing, the Dictator would not withdraw from the country of the Sidicini a Roman army that was there incamped. The Samnites were indeed raising troops, but it was to defend Italy against Alexander King of Epirus, who under pretence of succouring the Taren- tines (then at war with the Lucanians and Bruttians) had made a descent at Pestum, and began to grow formidable to all the eastern parts of Italy.
 What suspended the progress of his arms is unknown; but, after some small advantages obtained against the enemies of the Tarentines, he made a Treaty with the Romans.

The late addition of so many new Citizens as Rome had received, since the reduction of the Latines, made it necessary to take a new Census, and to increase the number of the Tribes. To the twenty-seven, already in being, were added the Mecian and Scaptian; [the first near Lanuvium, the second between Tybur and Praneste.]

Year of
 R O M E
 cccccxi.
 Bef. J. C.
 Three
 hundred thirty-
 one.
 123d
 Consul-
 ship.
 * A 2d
 time.
 Liv. B.
 8. c. 17.
 Justin, B.
 12. c. 2.
 Livy, B.
 8. c. 17.

But

But in the midst of this repose from foreign alarms, and in the beginning of the new Consulship of M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Valerius Potitus, there sprung up in the bosom of the Republick a new kind of monsters, more terrible than any army of invaders from abroad. Some women of distinction, to the number of 170, according to some, or 360, according to others, formed a plot to poison their husbands, and took the opportunity of an epidemical distemper to put their design in execution. Their wickedness being discovered to Fabius, one of the Curule Ædiles, by a slave of one of the Ladies, and their persons being seized, two of the prisoners, Sergia and Cornelia, both Patrician women, were brought before the assembly of the People. Being there examined, they denied that in the medicines which they had prepared, and which had been found with them, there were any poisonous ingredients. The slave, to verify her accusation, proposed, that the two Ladies should take their own potions; and the experiment was immediately ordered to be made. Upon this, Cornelia and Sergia desired to confer with their accomplices, which being granted, they all by agreement drank their own poison, and so delivered themselves from a more lingering death. The Republick ascribed this unheard-of prodigy to a spirit of madness, sent as a punishment from the angry Gods; to appease whom they nominated a Dictator, to drive a Nail into the Wall of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

This transient Dictatorship quickly gave way to the Consulship of *L. Papirius * Crassus* and L. Plautius Venno. In the beginning of their administration, a deputation came to Rome from the Poluscans and the inhabitants of Fabrateria (both in the territory of the Volsci) to demand protection against the Samnites, by whom they were threatened with an irruption. The Senate did not reject their petition, but sent Ambassadors to desire the Samnites to put a stop to their hostilities against those two nations. The Samnites complied, and then the Republick immediately turned her arms against the Privernates. These rebels, in conjunction with some of the inhabitants of Fundi, were headed by Vitruvius Vaccus, originally of that town, which after the Latine war had been admitted to the rights of Roman Citizenship. Vitruvius had made himself an inhabitant of Rome, and had enjoyed all the privileges of a Citizen born there, but through the vanity of commanding an army had excited his countrymen to revolt. However, he durst not keep the field when the Consuls appeared; he fled for refuge to Privernum. L. Plautius, with one part of the army, entered the territory of Fundi, the Senators of which City came out to meet him, and endeavoured to justify themselves from having any share in the revolt. The Consul wrote to Rome in their favour, and then marched to rejoin his Colleague, who had already blocked up Privernum. The siege of this place was not yet over, when the Senate recalled one of the Consuls to Rome, to preside in the Comitia for electing new ones.

The Romans were the terror of their neighbours, but the Gauls in Italy were the terror of the Romans. And the Republick being alarmed at the news of

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirty.
124th Consul-
ship.
Oros. B.
3. c. 10.
Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 5.
Livy, B. 8.
c. 18.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred-twenty-
nine.
125th Consul-
ship.
* A 2d
time.
Livy, B. 8.
c. 19.

c. 20.

Year of of the Gauls being in motion, thought fit to bring on the elections before the usual time, in order to provide fit Generals for so important cccxxiv. a war^a.

Bef. J. C.

Three hundred twenty-eight.

126th Consulship.
 * A 2d time.

Fall. Capit.

L. * Æmilius and C. Plautius, the new Consuls, entered on their office the very day of their election, and they drew lots for their commands. It fell to Æmilius to act against the Gauls; his Collegue was to carry on the siege of Privernum. How much the very shadow of the Gauls terrified Rome may be judged of by the extraordinary preparations at this time to oppose them. The levies were made with the utmost rigour; no excuse was allowed; the meanest artificers, and those of sedentary occupations, were without distinction put into the roll. But, after all these precautions and many other, advice came that the Gauls were quiet; so that Æmilius joined his Collegue before Privernum. The town was taken, and the rebel Vitruvius, being made prisoner, was condemned by the Senate to be first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. Æmilius and Plautius both triumphed on account of this new conquest; and the former, who had spent but little time before the place, obtained the surname of Privernas^b.

Livy, B. 8. c. 21.
 Val. Max. B. 6. c. 2.

What now remained was to punish the Privernates. Those of their Senators, who had staid in Privernum after its revolt, were condemned to the same punishment which had been inflicted on the Citizens of Velitræ, that is, they were banished beyond the Tiber, and forbid to appear any more on this side of it under the penalty of a great fine. And though the Consul Plautius interceded with the Senate for the innocent multitude, and particularly for the prisoners taken in the war, whom he brought to the door of the Senate-House, he did not immediately draw the Conscript Fathers over to his sentiments; they were divided in opinion. One of the Privernates, by an haughty answer, indangered all his fellow-captives. Being asked by a Senator, who inclined to rigour, what punishment he thought the Privernates deserved? The same, said he, which is due to men who think themselves worthy of LIBERTY. So brisk an answer exasperated some of the assembly, which Plautius perceiving endeavoured to prevent the ill effect of it, by putting a milder question to the prisoner, and which should naturally draw a softer answer from him: Suppose, said the ^a In the midst of these apprehensions the Romans did not forget their sports and diversions. They at this time built sumptuous Porticoes at the entrance of the Circus, for a shelter to the Horses, which were before so exposed to the sun, that they were often fatigued before they began the race. C. & R. All that Livy says, is, Carceres eo anno in circo primum statuti.

^b The Romans are sometimes reproached with unjustly giving all the glory of an enterprise to the last General concerned in it, and who finished it, notwithstanding that the former commanders had brought it to such a maturity, as to be past the danger of abortion. But it should be considered, that this conduct in a people, whose chief aim was to extend their empire, was founded in wise policy: By giving all the honour of a successful war to him who ended it, they animated their Generals to exert themselves on all occasions to make a rapid conquest. C. & R.

Consul,

Consul, we should pardon you: In what manner may we expect you will behave yourselves for the future? The prisoner answered, If the peace you grant us be a good one, we shall maintain it faithfully and inviolably; if the terms of it be hard, do not count upon us long. These words made different impressions on the judges. Some construed them as menaces, and as indications of a disposition to a new revolt; but the greater part and the wiser found a magnanimity in them worthy of a man and of a free man. Those especially of the Senators who had been CONSULS adhered to Plautius's opinion, who loudly declared, and repeated it often, That a people whose only desire was LIBERTY, and whose only fear was that of losing it, were worthy to become ROMAN. Accordingly the Senate passed a decree in favour of the prisoners, and Privernum was made a Municipium.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxiv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-eight.
126th
Consul-
ship.

C H A P. XII.

§. I. The Romans give umbrage to the Samnites, by planting a Colony in their neighbourhood. And the Palæopolitans make an irruption into the Roman Territory. §. II. A remarkable instance of the Romans abhorrence of Malice, in the prosecution of a criminal. §. III. A new rupture between the Roman Republick and the Samnites. §. IV. The Romans take some Towns from the Samnites. And Publius takes Palæopolis by means of a stratagem laid and executed by two of the Citizens: For which exploit, though he be but a Proconsul, he is decreed a TRIUMPH. §. V. The Tarentines, being jealous of the growing power of Rome, by an artful stratagem seduce the Lucanians from the Roman interest into a league with the Samnites. §. VI. About this time the infamous passion of a Roman, named Papirius, for one of his insolvent Debtors, occasions the passing of a law at Rome, whereby CREDITORS are disabled from seizing the Persons of their DEBTORS.

§. I. IT was now customary for the Romans either to send Colonies to the conquered Cities, or to give the inhabitants the right of Roman Citizenship. For they had found to their cost the ill consequences of that independence in which they had left the Latines after their first reduction of them. In pursuance of this new policy, the Senate, in the Consulship of C. Plautius Proculus and P. Cornelius Scapula, sent a Colony of Romans to Fregelle, a City in the Territory of the Sidicini, which the Romans had rebuilt after the Samnites had razed it. The repairing and fortifying of this place, and the planting a Colony in it, gave umbrage to the Samnites, and proved the occasion of that furious war which soon after broke out between them and the Republick.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-seven.
127th Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
8 c. 22.

In the mean time the inhabitants of Palæopolis made incursions into the Roman Territory. These People were originally Eubæans, who came into Italy and built Cumæ. From thence they spread themselves farther;

Year of and a Colony of Cumans built Naples, or Neapolis, i. e. The New City; R O M E and, finding in the neighbourhood of Naples a Town ready built, they cccxxv. possessed themselves of it and called it Palæpolis, or Palaiopolis, i. e. The Old
 B. S. J. C. City.

Three hundred and twenty-seven. §. II. THE news of this irruption of the Palæopolitans was brought to Rome just before the holding of the assemblies of the Tribes and of the Centuries; the first for the Election of Tribunes of the People, the second for that of Consuls. It is remarkable, that in the Comitia by Tribes the People at this time chose one Q. Flavius, a man of a most infamous character, to be one of their Tribunes. The occasion of it was extraordinary. He had been accused not long before of doing violence to a Lady. Valerius, one of the Curule Aediles, was his chief prosecutor; and the evidence was clear. Fourteen of the twenty-nine Tribes had already voted him guilty, when the accused, in order to move the rest of his judges to favour him, made vehement protestations, and called heaven and earth to witness his innocence. Upon this Valerius cried out with a louder voice, What is it to me whether thou art guilty or innocent, provided thou be destroyed! The Tribes were so offended at these words, that they acquitted the criminal by a majority of suffrages. Flavius, soon after, lost his mother; and, it being then customary to offer sacrifices in honour to the dead, he offered a greater number of victims than usual, and, in gratitude to the People for their late favour, distributed the flesh among them. They in return now chose him Tribune, though absent.

Year of §. III. THE Comitia by Centuries appointed L. Cornelius Lentulus and R O M E *Q. Publius * Philo* to be the new Consuls. Publius marched an army cccxxvi towards Palæpolis, and, foreseeing that this place would not easily be taken while supplied with men and provisions from Naples, he prudently incamped his troops in the narrow tract of ground between the two Cities. In the mean time Cornelius, who had posted himself with another army near Capua, to keep the Campanians in awe (who were thought to be gained over by the Samnites to join them against Rome) received undoubted intelligence, that the Samnites openly solicited the Roman Colonies to revolt. Upon this the Senate dispatched Ambassadors into Samnium, to learn the reason of a conduct so contrary to the faith of Treaties. The Ambassadors met with a haughty reception. The Samnites complained of the proceedings of the Republick, and particularly of the rebuilding and fortifying of Fregelle, which (they said) was a wrong done to the Samnite nation; and to reproaches they added even menaces. The Ambassadors, without losing their temper, proposed to refer the matter to the arbitration of their common allies. Arbitrators! cried the Samnites, we will have none, but the Gods and our Swords; Battles will determine our pretensions better than Words and Judges; Mars shall put an end to our disputes, in the plains of Campania. Let our armies face each other between Capua and Suessula, and there try, whether the Samnites or the Romans shall be Lords of Italy. The Ambassadors replied, We shall not go whither our enemies invite us; but whithersoever our Generals shall think fit to lead us.

§. IV.

§. IV. SUCH was the situation of affairs abroad when the time drew near for the new Elections. The Senate, without recalling the Consuls to Rome, ordered a Dictator to be named to preside at them. But when Cornelius had nominated M. Claudius Marcellus, a Plebeian, the Augurs pretended, for some frivolous reason, that the nomination was invalid; and though the Tribunes charged the College with imposture, and with pretending Religion, when their view was only to wound the Plebeian interest, the Government fell into an Inter-regnum; and then the Comitia chose C. Petilius Libo and L. Papirius Mugillanus Consuls for the ensuing year. They put themselves at the head of the army which Cornelius had commanded, and with which he had already entered Samnium, and they had the good fortune to be joined by the People of Lucania and Apulia, two nations to which the Romans had been hitherto almost utter strangers. With this reinforcement they penetrated farther into the enemy's country, ravaged their lands, and took three Towns from them.

But these conquests were of little moment in comparison of that made by Publius, whom the People, at the motion of their Tribunes, had continued in the command of the army before Palæpolis, with the title of Proconsul. He had already, as was beforementioned, cut off the communication between that place and Naples, so that the besieged were much streightened for want of provisions. Nor was this the greatest calamity which the Palæpolitans suffered. Four thousand Samnites and two thousand of the inhabitants of Nola, a City of Campania, under pretence of defending Palæpolis, had, before it was invested, got into the Town, where they kept the citizens in a state of cruel slavery, treating them as prisoners of war, and even doing violence to their wives and to their children of both sexes. In this distress having long waited in vain for relief from the Tarentines, whose presence they hoped would deliver them from the oppression of their defenders, the inhabitants at length resolved to put the place into the hands of the Romans. The Palæpolitans, as has been observed, were originally Greeks, and the stratagem they made use of had in it much of Grecian artifice. Nymphius and Charilaus, the two chief Magistrates of the City, undertook, with the consent of the principal inhabitants, to act two different parts in order to the execution of the common design. Charilaus escaped as a deserter to the Roman camp, where he applied himself to the Proconsul, and imparted to him the desire of his countrymen to purchase the friendship of the Romans by surrendering their City to them. He declared, that he had nothing in view but the interest of his Country and of the Roman Republick, and demanded no condition to his own private advantage. Publius received him kindly, applauded his generosity, and readily entered into the scheme proposed. He put him at the head of 3000 Romans, who at a proper time were to attack the place in that part which was defended by the Samnites. In the mean time Nymphius, who had staid in Palæpolis, inveighed most vehemently against his Colleague for his desertion, and by his counterfeited anger so effectually blinded the Samnite Commanders, that without any suspicion they fell into the snare he

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxvii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-five.
127th Consul-
ship.
Livy B. 8.
c. 25.

c. 23.
c. 25.

c. 25.

Year of
R O M E
cccxvii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-five.

129th Consul-
ship.

had prepared for them. He advised them, as the surest method to force the Romans to withdraw their troops from the neighbourhood of the City; immediately to equip the fleet which lay in the Port, and make a descent in the Roman Territory; and he offered to undertake in person the execution of his project. This motion was highly approved, and, as the ships lay dry on the shore, all diligence was instantly used to set them afloat. Nymphius contrived to have the Samnite Troops chiefly employed in that laborious work, which, under pretence of better concealing the design, he ordered to be done in the night; and when by this means he had left that part of the wall, by which the Romans were to enter, but weakly guarded, he gave notice to his Colleague, with whom he all along kept a private correspondence, to begin the attack. Charilaus with his 3000 Romans advanced without loss of time, and, being favoured by the inhabitants, easily made himself master of the place. As for the Samnites (who were most of them busied without the Town) finding themselves betrayed, they made the best of their way to their own country, without arms or baggage, being ever after the derision of their countrymen, who continually reproached them with the Paleopolitan Equipment.

Notwithstanding that the Romans had got possession of the Town by the good-will of the inhabitants, yet, inasmuch as it was by means of the siege that the latter were brought to take those measures they did in favour of the Republick, the Proconsul was decreed a Triumph for his success. Livy observes, that two particular honours were done Publius, which had never been done before to any Roman: The being continued after the expiration of his Consulship at the head of the same army he had commanded when Consul, and the being decreed a Triumph for exploits performed in an inferior station.

Livy, B.
B. C. 27.

c. 24.

§ V. THE taking of Paleopolis made the Tarentines jealous of the growing power of the Republick. They had a little before this lost their chief support by the death of Alexander King of Epirus, who, being warned by an Oracle to avoid the Waters of Acheron and the City of Pandofia, had left his own country, in which were a City and River of those names, and met his fate in Italy, where there happened to be another Pandofia and another Acheron. The story, as related by Livy, is to this effect: The King of Epirus had made a descent in Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Bruttians and Lucanians; and having taken some towns of importance from the enemy, he divided his army into three bodies, and encamped them on three different hills separated by deep vallies. The Italian Acheron rolled its waters in one of those vallies, and the little City of Pandofia stood on the banks of it. The violent rains, which came on a sudden, filled up the vallies, and cut off the communication between Alexander's three bodies of Troops. The enemy seized this occasion to attack them separately, while they could not assist each other, and, having easily defeated the two divisions of the army where the King was not, they straightencompassed the hill where he had posted himself. Alexander, by his bravery, forced a passage through the enemy, and, having rallied his scattered soldiers, diers, came to a river, where the fresh ruins of a bridge, which the flood had broken down, pointed out the right road for him to take. While they attempted to pass the stream, uncertain whether it were fordable or not, an Epirot soldier, oppressed with fear and fatigue, made this sudden exclamation, Justly indeed art thou called Acheron! (i. e. River of Sorrow.) The King hearing this, and remembering the Oracle, stopt short, unresolved whether to go forward or not; but in that instant Sotimus, one of his Pages, telling him that his own Guards (consisting of 200 Lucanian Exiles whom he had taken into his service) had in concert with the enemy plotted his destruction, and the King seeing them in reality advancing to assault him, he sword in hand pushed on his horse, and had almost reached the opposite shore, when one of those faithless guards at a distanced lanced a javelin at him, which pierced him through, and killed him.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxvii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-five.
129th Consul-
ship.

The Lucanians and Apulians, by going over to the Romans, and declaring for them against the Samnites, had much increased the uneasiness of the Tarentines. These therefore, who were very ready at tricks and artifices, contrived a stratagem to deceive the Lucanians, and bring them off from the party they had espoused. They bribed a company of young Lucanians, of good families, though of little honour; to tear their backs with whips, and then shew themselves to the People, pretending that they had been treated in that cruel manner by order of the Roman Consuls, to whose camp curiosity had led them. The Lucanians were so stupid a people, that, without examining into the truth of so improbable a fact, they immediately demanded a National Assembly, which being convened, it was there decreed, That war should be declared against the Romans; that the ancient alliances should be renewed with the Samnites; and that an Embassy should be sent to the latter for that purpose. The Samnites could scarce believe the deputation real; and, before they would hearken to the Ambassadors, demanded hostages, and insisted on the Towns of Lucania receiving Samnite garrisons. These things were readily granted; nor did the Lucanians discover the cheat till it was too late to repent.

Livy B. 8.
c. 27.

§. VI. AT this time the poor Debtors at Rome had the good fortune to shake off the heaviest yoke that lay upon them. By one of the laws of the Twelve Tables, Creditors were impowered to seize the Persons of their insolvent Debtors, and keep them in irons. These wretches, till they had discharged their debts by their labour or otherwise, were in all respects slaves, except in name. They were called Nexi, i. e. Bound, whereas the Slaves were called Servi. A young Plebeian, named Publius, of extraordinary beauty, and of a good family, had voluntarily made himself a slave to one Papirius, in order to pay his father's debts. Papirius conceived a detestable passion for the young man, and, upon his refusing to comply, caused him to be whipt unmercifully. Publius made his escape out of the house, complained publicly of the cruel usage, and told the occasion of it. The story filled the People with compassion for the young man, and with resentment and fury against his master. They gathered together tumultuously,

c. 28.
Varro de Lingua Latina,
B. 6.

Year of multuously, and having, by their clamours, obliged the Consuls to assemble the Senate, presented Publius before them, with his back all bloody and torn, and then on their knees demanded justice. The Senate had regard to their intreaties; and though they decreed nothing against Papirius (perhaps for want of sufficient proof) they passed a law, which was afterwards confirmed by the People in Comitia, That for the future no person whatsoever should be held in fetters or other bonds unless for some crime that deserved it, and only till the criminal had suffered the punishment due by law; and that CREDITORS should have a right to attach the Goods only, and not the Persons of their DEBTORS.

R O M E
ccccxxvii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-five.
length
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
2. c. 28.

C H A P. XIII.

§. I. The Vestini, a People on the coast of the Adriatick sea, take arms against Rome to their own loss. §. II. L. Papirius Cursor is named Dictator to conduct the war against the Samnites. His General of the Horse, Quintus Fabius, is guilty of a breach of discipline. The severity of the Dictator on this occasion. §. III. Finding his soldiers ill affected to him because of his severity in command, he changes his manner on a sudden, and in a little time gains their affections. After which he reduces the Samnites to sue for peace. §. IV. The Senate grant the Samnites only a year's Truce, which the latter break so soon as they hear that Papirius has quitted the Dictatorship. The Romans obtain a complete victory over them. §. V. The Samnites, repenting of their breach of the Truce, endeavour to pacify the Romans.

Year of §. I. T H E Republick, in the following Consulate of L. Furius Camillus and D. Junius Brutus, began to be embarrassed by the great numbers of enemies she had to deal with. Beside the Samnites and Lucanians, the Vestini had declared against her. These were themselves an inconsiderable people upon the coast of the Adriatick sea; but they had powerful neighbours, who in all probability would arm in their defence, if the Republick should attack them. This consideration made the Senate demur; but at length pride prevailed over prudence; it was not for the honour of Rome to let herself be insulted without revenging it. The two Consuls therefore took their commands by lot, and it fell to Camillus to conduct the war against the Samnites, and to Brutus to act against the Vestini. Brutus's first care was to hinder the Vestini from joining the Samnites, which he did, by incamping on the frontiers between the two nations. He soon after defeated them in battle, and took from them Cutina and Cingilia.

R O M E
ccccxxviii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-four.
length
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
2. c. 29.

§. II. CAMILLUS, who had made it his business to keep the Samnites upon the defensive in their own country, fell sick, and was obliged to return to Rome; and, being there ordered to name a Dictator, he pitched upon L. Papirius Cursor, the greatest Captain the Republick could then boast of, who appointed Q. Fabius Rullianus to be his General of the Horse.

Aurel.
Vict. de Viris Il-
lust. c. 31.

Horfe. These took possession of the command of the army in Samnium: But, there having been something obscure in the Auspices consulted before their departure from Rome, scruple and superstition tormented the Dictator when he came to enter upon action. To remove the pain of his doubts and fears, he returned to the City to renew the Auspices; but first forbade Fabius, with whom he intrusted the command of the army in his absence, to venture a battle with the enemy.

Fabius being fond of glory, and beloved of the army, and disdaining to have his hands so tied up, resolved to hazard an action, notwithstanding the Dictator's prohibition. He attacked the Samnites, whom he found in less disorder than he had at first expected, and was once very near losing the day: But then the Roman cavalry, unbridling their horses, drove upon the enemy with such a sudden and irresistible impetuosity, that the latter were put into confusion, and intirely broken and defeated. Twenty thousand of them remained dead upon the field of battle. This victory made the young Conqueror grow insolent; and, instead of lodging the spoils of the enemy in the Quæstor's hands, to be sold for the advantage of the publick, he caused them all to be burnt, that they might not do honour to the Dictator, by being carried in his Triumphal Procession; neither did he send any account of his victory to the Dictator, but only to the Senate; an instance of great disrespect to the General under whose Auspices he had fought.

These proceedings incensed Papirius, and he hastened to the camp to punish his disobedient General of the Horfe. Fabius having timely notice of his coming, and of his design, called together the troops, and made an harangue to them, wherein he inveighed against the Dictator, whose resentments, he said, threatened not only his life, but the lives of many of the other officers, and even of the private Soldiers, who had helped him to gain the victory. That therefore it was the common interest of the army to protect him; and that to them he committed the defence of his life and fortune. The soldiers with one voice cried out to him to take courage, and they promised to defend him to the last breath. Papirius, not long after, arrived. Having instantly assembled the Troops, he ordered the Crier to call Quintus Fabius, General of the Horfe, to appear before him. When Fabius was come near the Tribunal, and silence made, the Dictator questioned him concerning his violation, not only of the common laws of Military Discipline, but of the express orders of a Dictator, whom he could not but know to have a sovereign authority in the Republick, and whom even the Consuls themselves, Magistrates who succeeded to the Regal Power, obeyed. Fabius had a bad cause to defend, and was confused in his answers; one while complaining that the Dictator was both accuser and judge, and then exclaiming loudly, that he would sooner lose his life, than the glory of his exploits; this moment he attempted to excuse himself, and the next accused the Dictator: which provoking Papirius still more, he commanded the Lictors to strip the criminal, and prepare the Rods and Axes. But, when these executioners were beginning to tear off his clothes, he

Year of
R O M E
CCCCXXVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-four.

130th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B. 8:
c. 30.
Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 2.

Liv. B. 8.
c. 30.

c. 31.

c. 32.

Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 7.

Year of he cried out to the Soldiers for assistance, and by some means made his ROM E escape, retiring among the Triarii. These things put the army into a great cccxxxiii. commotion, and raised a clamour throughout the whole assembly; some Bef. J. C. beseeching, others threatening. The officers who were near the Dictator
 Three endeavoured by reasoning and by intreaties to mitigate his resentment hundred against a young man of great hopes, and of a family so highly and so justly twenty- honoured in Rome. They represented to him the danger, to which he might four. expose himself by too far exasperating the multitude, who, blind with an-130th ger, might be carried to do something extravagant and desperate. All was in Consul- vain, Papirius continued inflexible; and their remonstrances seemed more to ship. increase his indignation, than to soften him towards Fabius. But, when he would have commanded silence, the noise was so great that neither his criers nor himself could be heard, and night alone put an end to the tumult.
 Entrop. Fabius, though summoned to appear again the next day, did not think it
 B. 2. c. 8. prudent to stand a second trial, but escaped to Rome, there to present him-
 Livy, B. self before less passionate judges.
 8. c. 33.

As soon as he arrived, his father (who had been thrice Consul, and once Dictator) thought it necessary to get the Senate assembled without delay, and obtain a favourable decree for him before the return of the Dictator. The Senate was met, young Fabius had already worked upon the Fathers, and made them think Papirius both unjust and barbarous, when on a sudden a great noise was heard at the door of the Temple where they were sitting. It was Papirius himself, attended by his Lictors who were dispersing the crowd at the entrance of the sanctuary. Upon his appearance the scene changed. He took his place, ordered his Lictors to seize young Fabius, and was immediately obeyed. In vain did the oldest and most venerable Senators intercede for the criminal; Papirius was inexorable: so that the father of the young man, having no other remedy left, appealed to the people in Comitia; and, though the appeal was unprecedented, the Dictator did not hold it expedient to dispute the superior authority of the Roman People.

When the Comitia were formed, both the Fabii ascended the Rostra with Papirius; which he observing, sternly ordered the Master of the Horse to be pulled down. Young Fabius immediately descended, and his father followed him; but then the father, placing himself at the foot of the Rostra, broke out into bitter invectives against Papirius for his haughtiness and barbarity; he cited some former * cases (not much to the purpose) where faulty Generals had not been so severely punished; he complained, that no distinction was made between a fortunate and an unfortunate disobedience; and, in short, omitted nothing that could be said in so bad a cause. He clamoured, he brangled, he complained, he called upon Gods and men for help, and, throwing his arms about his son's neck, wept over him a flood of tears. The whole assembly was moved. On the side of the Fabii, says Livy, were the majesty of the Senate, the favour of the People, the aid of the Tribunes, and a remembrance of the absent army. Year of Papirius, on his own part, spoke in a high strain, of the Dignity of his R O M E.

* The case of Minucius (see p. 318.) and that of L. Furius (see p. 403.)

 Office, the Military Laws, Dictatorial Edicts revered as the Oracles of ccccxviii.
 Heaven, Manlius's rigour to his own son : He reproached the Romans with Bef. J. C. degeneracy from that heroick love of their country, which used to prevail Three over all paternal affection and private considerations : He urged the many hundred ill consequences of admitting appeals from a Dictator to the People, and twenty-especially in cases of disobedience in war ; and concluded with admonish- four.
 ing the Tribunes not to load themselves with the blame of being the au- 130th thors of those mischiefs to the Republick, by their protection of the guilty Consul-Fabius. ship.
 Livy B.8.
 c. 34.

His discourse threw both the People and their Tribunes into great perplexity : For, tho' to receive Appeals from the sentence of a Dictator was to extend the exercise of the People's power, yet they were afraid of the consequence of interposing (in such a cause especially) against that high authority, which they had so often found it necessary, for the safety of the Republick, to lodge with a single Magistrate. Instead therefore of taking upon them to judge in the affair, they only became intercessors for the criminal, humbly beseeching the Dictator in the most earnest manner to pardon his General of the Horse. The Fabii themselves likewise fell prostrate at his feet, and implored his clemency. Upon this Papirius ordered silence to be made, and then declared, That he was satisfied :
 MILITARY DISCIPLINE has prevailed, the DICTATORIAL AUTHORITY has gained the victory. The delinquent is not acquitted, but condemned, and is pardoned at the intercession of the Roman People and of their Tribunes :
 They have succoured him, not as innocent, not by a just exercise of power, but by their prayers for mercy on a convicted criminal. Live then, QUINTUS FABIUS, more fortunate in this unanimous consent of your Country to your preservation, than in the victory you a while ago so insolently boasted of. Live, FABIUS, though you have dared to commit a crime which your own Father, in my place, would not have forgiven. You shall be received again into my favour——upon my terms. But as for the Roman People, to whom you owe your life, the best return you can make to them is to let this day teach you, whether in war or peace, to obey your lawful commanders. Go, you are at liberty. Thus ended this affair ; and the Romans afterwards confessed, to the Dictator's honour, that the perils into which he brought Fabius had conduced as much to the support of Military Discipline, as the death of young Manlius, condemned by his own Father.

§. III. BUT, while Papirius staid in Rome, the Samnites took advan- c. 36.
 tage of his absence to insult his army ; whose Commander, M. Valerius, a Lieutenant General, was so intimidated by the example of Fabius, that he durst not oppose the hostilities of the enemy. He suffered a party of his foragers to be cut in pieces, rather than stir out of his camp to relieve them. This accident helped to exasperate the troops yet more against the Dictator ; who, when he came to the camp, (with L. Papirius Cressus, a relation of his own, whom he had appointed to command the horse in

Year of the room of Fabius) found all his men so ill-affected to him, and so little disposed to gain him glory, that he had no hopes of making any progress with them in the war. However, as the enemy offered him battle, and he could not in honour decline fighting, he posted himself so advantageously, and drew up his troops with so much dexterity, that it was not possible for them to be intirely defeated. When the battle was over (in which, though they had fought but faintly, they had not been routed) Papirius acted a part which surpris'd every body. Not one officer or soldier, who had behaved himself negligently in the fight, was so much as reprimanded by him. He went about with his Lieutenants visiting the wounded soldiers, put his head into their tents, asked them how they did, charging their officers to have particular care of each of them by name; and all this he seems to have done without the least appearance of affectation: for we find that the army, which had always held him in esteem, came, in a short time, to have a most tender affection for him.

Year of The People at Rome, being informed of this great alteration in the dispositions of the soldiers towards their commander, continued him in his employment^a, and no Consuls were chosen for the year 429. As for Papirius, he no longer doubted of victory, and he soon gave the enemy a total overthrow; after which he over-ran Samnium (leaving all the booty to his soldiers) and reduced the Samnites so low, that they sued for peace, which he granted them on three preliminary conditions: That they should cloath all his Troops, give them a year's pay, and get the Treaty confirmed by the Senate.

Year of §. IV. PAPIRIUS, having triumphed for his late victories, held the Comitia by Centuries, where C. Sulpicius Longus and Q. Aulius Cerretanus were chosen Consuls for the next year. When the Conscript Fathers came to consider of the Peace to be made with the Samnites, they disapproved of the terms offered by them, and therefore granted only a Truce for a year, which the Samnites broke so soon as they heard that Papirius was no longer in command. At the same time the Apulians declared for them against Rome. The Republick thought it necessary therefore to divide her forces between the two Consuls. Aulius led an army into Apulia, and Sulpicius another into Samnium; but, both Samnites and Apulians keeping themselves close in their fortified places, the Roman Generals reaped little glory from the campaign.

This year the Tusculans were tried before the Roman People upon a bill preferred by the Tribune, M. Flavius, to punish them for ad-

^a Livy confines Papirius's Dictatorship to the foregoing year 428, and places the events of this year 429 in that. So that he makes Papirius's two Dictatorships to have been but one. Nevertheless it appears that Papirius was continued in his office, and created Dictator a second time. We have a convincing proof of it in the Fasti Capitolini. They say that L. Papirius triumphed over the Samnites in the year 429, on the the third of the Nones of March. This makes us believe that Papirius's Dictatorship was prolonged to the year 430; and Livy's silence confirms us in this opinion: for he makes no mention of any Consuls for the year 429, which is likewise omitted in the consular Annals. C. & R.

vising and assisting the People of Velitræ and Privernum in the war they made upon the Romans. The Tusculans, with their wives and children, came to Rome, and in the humblest manner solicited the People to have pity on them. All the Tribes, except the Pollian, rejected the bill. The Pollian would have had all the men scourged and beheaded, and their wives and children exposed to sale. Of this the Tusculans, who were incorporated into the Papirian Tribe, retained so lasting a resentment, that, almost to the times of Livy, scarce any person of the Pollian Tribe, who stood candidate for an office, could get the vote of the Papirian.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxi.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty-
one.

Quintus Fabius (who had been General of the Horse to the Dictator Papirius) and L. Fulvius Corvus, the next year's Consuls, marched their joint forces against the Samnites (who had raised a formidable army) and gave them an intire overthrow, but not without great difficulty. The Samnites had surpris'd the Romans, while incamped in a place very disadvantageous both for subsisting their army and for sustaining an attack; and, when, for these reasons, the Romans attempted to retire in the night, the enemy watched them so narrowly, and pursued them so close, that the next day they found themselves under a necessity of hazarding a battle. It lasted from nine in the morning till two in the afternoon, without either side's giving way, or so much as changing the order in which they were first drawn up. The imprudence of the Samnite cavalry determined the fortune of the day: For, having received advice, from one of their most advanced squadrons, that the Romans had left their baggage a good way behind them without any troops to defend it, greediness of plunder induced them to wheel off in order to seize the prey; and the Consuls, to whom early notice of their motion was brought, allowed them all the time that was necessary to load their horses with booty, and put themselves out of a condition to fight; and then ordered away the whole body of Roman cavalry to fall upon them. The cavalry executed the order with expedition and success: After which, fetching a compass, they came upon the rear of the Samnite Infantry; an unexpected attack, which struck them with terror, and soon after threw them into confusion. The Romans pursued their advantage, and made a dreadful slaughter: Those of the Samnites, who kept their ground, were cut in pieces by the Roman Foot; and those who fled fell most of them by the swords of the Horse, and, among the rest, the General himself.

132d
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
8. c. 38.

Faß. Ca-
pit.

c. 39.

§. V. SO terrible a defeat made the Samnites reflect seriously on their unjust breach of the Truce with the Romans; and they imputed their late misfortune to the anger of the Gods, whom they supposed to be offended at the violation of their oaths. To appease them, they resolved to sacrifice the chief author of that breach; and one Brutulus Papius, a man of distinction, but of a turbulent spirit, was universally pitched upon to be the victim. They passed a decree that he should be delivered up to the Romans; and, that the spoil and captives taken within the time of the Truce, and in short, whatever their Feciales had demanded, should be restored to them. In pursuance of this decree, Brutulus, with all his effects,

Year of R O M E cccxxxii. Bef. J. C. Three hundred twenty-one. was put into the hands of some Samnite ambassadors, to be carried to Rome; but he killed himself before he got there. However, they surrendered his dead body to the Romans, who, of what was offered by way of restitution, accepted only the captives and a part of the effects, rejecting whatever could not be claimed by any private Roman as his own.

After this the Consul Fulvius returned to Rome, while his Colleague Fabius led an army into Apulia. That he succeeded in his expedition appears by the Capitoline Marbles, where he is said to have triumphed over the Samnites and Apulians, Fulvius over the Samnites only. One A. Cornelius was this year chosen Dictator, but it was only to preside at the Games in the absence of the Consuls, and during the sickness of the Prætor. However Livy, finding that at the time of the defeat of the Samnites the Government was in the hands of a Dictator, ascribes by mistake that exploit to him. The Capitoline Marbles rectify the error,

C H A P. XIV.

§. I. The Samnites, being refused a Peace, prepare to carry on the war with vigour: and they appoint one Pontius, an able officer, to be their General. Pontius, by a stratagem, draws the Roman Legions into a dangerous pass (called afterwards the Caudine Forks) where they are surrounded by the Samnites, and have no possibility of forcing their way out of it. To save their lives, they submit to shameful conditions imposed by the enemy. §. II. The base expedients, to which the Romans have recourse, to evade the treaty. §. III. Satricum revolts from the Romans; and the Samnites surprise Fregellæ, a Roman Colony.

Year of R O M E cccxxxiii. Bef. J. C. Three hundred twenty-two. 133d Consulship. Livy, B. 9. c. 1. c. 2. §. I. IT had been a constant maxim with the Romans to pardon the nations which submitted, and to treat none with rigour but the proud and untractable; but their late successes made them now deviate from this rule; and, notwithstanding that the Samnites sued to them for a peace, and endeavoured to merit it by the methods which have been related, the Senate rejected their petition, and thereby put them under a necessity of continuing the war at all hazards. And, while the Centuriate Comitia at Rome were chusing T. Icturius and Sp. Posthumius Consuls for the new year, the Samnites in their Diet appointed one Pontius, an able General, to command their troops. Pontius exhorted the assembly not to fear a war with a People who had received restitution of wrongs with haughtiness, and had refused peace when offered upon the most reasonable terms. The Gods, said he, are now no longer our enemies; Justice accompanies our arms, and we cannot fail of success. He then immediately led his troops near to Caudium (a little Town in Samnium) and there incamped as covertly as possible. When the Consuls were come within a league of him, he caused a report to be spread, that the Samnite army was laying siege to Luceria in Apulia; and, the more effectually to deceive the Romans, he ordered ten of his soldiers in the habit of herdsmen to lead some cattle into different parts, but still in the neighbourhood of the enemy, with instructions to agree all in the same report when taken prisoners by their Foragers. The stratagem succeeded. The Romans in a council of war resolved to march to the relief of Luceria; and, there being two ways thither, one broad and open, but farther about than the other, which was through certain streights (called since The Claudine Forks) they chose the latter. The nature of the ground was this: Between two circling ridges of mountains, so covered with trees and briars as to be absolutely unclimbable, was a pretty large marshy meadow, through the middle of which lay the road. At the hither end, the way into it was very deep and narrow through a hollow rock; the way out, at the farther end, more narrow, deep, and difficult. When the Romans, having passed the first, came to this, they found it intirely barred with huge stones and trees laid across: and then they also discerned great numbers of the enemy on the tops of the eminences. To avoid being invested, they instantly turned back, thinking to retire through the pass by which they had entered; the Samnites had already blocked it up. The consternation of the Romans was inexpressible, when they perceived themselves shut in, without a possibility of escaping. They stood silent and fixed their eyes on one another, each to see whether he could discover any glimmering of hopes in his companions looks. At length the soldiers seeing the Consuls tent pitched, and preparations making towards fortification, set themselves to work, without waiting for orders, to raise a rampart along the water, though they well knew it to be a fruitless labour, and were all the while scoffed at by the enemy. As soon as the army was incamped, the principal Officers repaired of their own accord to the Consuls tent; but the case was such as allowed no room for counsel or debate. The Gods themselves, says Livy, could hardly have given them assistance. Night came on: Without taking any refreshment, officers and soldiers spent the hours of rest in discoursing on their unhappy situation.

On the other hand, the Samnites could not come to any determination what to do with their enemies, who were absolutely at their mercy. After much debate it was at length universally agreed to consult Herennius, the father of Pontius a wise old man whom they looked upon as a kind of Oracle. The messenger whom they sent to him for his advice brought back this answer: That he counselled them not to do the least harm to the Romans, but to open them a free passage home. This advice being rejected, the same messenger was dispatched a second time; and then the old man sent word, That he would not have them spare the life of one single Roman. The strange difference between these two answers made the Samnites imagine that there was some mystery in the matter, and they pressed Pontius to have his father brought to the camp, that he might explain himself. When the wise Herennius was come, he let them know, that in good policy there was no medium between treating the Romans in the kindest manner, and destroying them absolutely. That by the first (which he thought

Year of ROMAN CCCCXXII
Lef. J. C.
Three
hundred
twenty.
—
133d
Consul-
ship.
Eutropius, Florus, Zonaras,
Orosius,
&c.

Year of thought the best) they would gain the friendship of a powerful nation ;
 R O M E. that by the second they would greatly lessen the strength of a dangerous cccxxxii enemy ; but that no third way could produce any advantage of either Ref J. C. fort. However, this prudent advice was not followed. Pontius and his Three Officers chose a middle way, such as their foolish vanity suggested : They hundred would spare the lives of the Romans, but at the same time treat them as twenty. conquered enemies.

133d
 Consul-
 ship.
 Livy, B.
 9. c. 4.

Whilst the Samnites were in these deliberations, the Romans sent a deputation to them to desire a truce upon equitable terms, and in case of refusal to invite them to a battle. Pontius with a haughty air answered, That the Samnites had no battles to fight ; that the victory was already gained ; and that not a man of the Roman Legions should escape, till they had been disarmed, and had passed one by one under the Yoke : That, besides this, he expected that the Romans should quit Samnium, and withdraw their Colonies from all the Cities they had usurped from the Samnites. And he concluded with forbidding the Deputies to appear any more in his presence, if the Consuls did not accept the terms proposed.

The report of this answer threw the Legions into the utmost despair. The Consuls were struck dumb, and durst not declare themselves for so shameful a Treaty. L. Lentulus, a considerable Officer in the army, and who had been at the head of the Deputation to the Samnites, was the first who broke silence ; addressing himself to the Consuls, he spoke to this effect : I have often heard my father say, that, when the Gauls besieged the Capitol, he was the only man in the Senate, who opposed the redeeming of Rome with Gold ; and the reason he gave for his opinion was, that, the enemy not having shut up the Capitol by intrenchments, nor raised any rampart round it, it was still possible for the Romans, though difficult, to force a passage through the besiegers. Were the case with us the same ; were there any possibility of escaping ; could we make sallies, as they sometimes did, or could we force the Samnites to a battle, I should soon convince you by my counsel, that I have the same courage as my father ; I should speak the same language, and endeavour yet more by my example, than my words, to animate you to the fight, though in never so disadvantageous a situation for it. For my own part, I would gladly rush into the midst of the enemy, and devote myself for the Roman People, if that could be of any avail to their preservation ; for I am truly sensible, that no fortune can be so glorious as to die for the safety of our Country. But our Country at present is here ; its chief stay and strength, the Roman Legions, are in this valley. Shall they devote themselves to death for their own preservation ? To what end then ? To save the Walls of Rome ? the Houses ? the croud of People that inhabit the City ?—And which way can even these be preserved, if this army perish ? Will a weak, unarmed, despondent multitude defend them ? Just as they did against the Gauls after the battle of the Allia.—But it is shameful, say you, to give up our arms like cowards. I grant it : Yet the love of our Country should be such, as to make us ready, if need be, to suffer Ignominy as well as Death ; to sacrifice, not only our Lives, but our Glory

Glory to preserve it. For the sake of ROME then let us submit to the conditions imposed, be the indignity never so great; nor scruple any longer to obey Necessity, to which the GODS themselves are subject.

Year of
R O M E. ccccxxxii.
Bef. J. C.

This advice was followed. The Consuls signified to Pontius, that they consented to lay down their arms, and pass under the Yoke; upon which they obtained a conference with him. As to a treaty of Peace, they declared, That they could not conclude any that would be binding on the Roman People without their approbation, and the ministry of the Feciales. That their power extended no farther than to make promises, which they were ready to strengthen by giving Hostages. The stipulation was accepted on these terms, and the Consuls, Lieutenant Generals, Quæstors, and Legionary Tribunes all signed the Convention; six hundred Roman Knights were to be given as Hostages; and the Samnites were to have power to cut off their heads, in case the Republick did not perform the Consuls promises.

Three
hundred
twenty.

133d
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
9. c. 5.

When the day came for the Roman army to pass under the Yoke, or Gallows, the six hundred Knights marched first out of the camp, unarmed, and with only their under garment; and these were taken into safe custody. The Consuls followed next, then the inferior Officers, and at last the Soldiers one by one. The Samnites insulted them as they passed; and, if any Roman returned but a fierce look, he was immediately knocked down or killed.

c. 6.

The Romans could have reached Capua the same day; but partly out of distrust of that City, and partly out of shame to be seen there in so wretched a condition, they threw themselves on the ground in the neighbourhood of it, resolving to pass the night in the open air; which when the Magistrates of Capua understood, moved with compassion, they sent clothes, horses and arms, Lictors also and Fasces to the Consuls, and food for the whole army. And when, the next day, they drew near the city, the Senate and People went out to meet them with all demonstrations of kindness. Nevertheless the Romans, overwhelmed with shame, seemed unaffected with this hospitality: They kept their eyes fixed on the ground, and shunned all discourse. They were accompanied to the frontiers by several young men of the Campanian Nobility; but they still observed the same behaviour, and shewed the same dejection of mind; which, when it was reported to the Senate of Capua by the young Nobles at their return, made the assembly in general conclude that the Roman courage was for ever lost, and their affairs desperate. One of them, however, a venerable old man, declared, that he judged differently of the dumb confusion of the Romans: This obstinate silence, their eyes fixed on the ground, their ears deaf to all consolation, are tokens of an inward rage that ferments without evaporating. If I am not wholly unacquainted with the temper of the Romans, their remembrance of the Caudine Treaty will be more fatal to the Samnites than to them. The Romans will have it in their thoughts wherever they shall encounter the Samnites; but these will not every-where find Caudine Streights.

c. 7.

In

Year of
R O M E
ccccxlii
Bet. J. C.
Three
hundred twenty.

132d
Consul-
ship.
Liv. B.
9. c. 7.

In the mean time the People at Rome, without orders from the Senate, and as it were by tacit consent, put on the deepest mourning. The shops all round the Forum were shut up; there was a vacation in all the Courts of Justice, before any proclamation for it; gold rings and robes of magnificence were laid aside; and the city was more dejected, if possible, than the army itself. Before the arrival of the troops, it was the language of the People, angry not only with the commanders, but with the guiltless soldiers, that they ought not to be received into the city: But, as soon as they appeared, the publick indignation changed into pity. Nevertheless, they did not enter the city till night; and then every one stole home, and hid himself in his own house: Even the Consuls banished themselves from society, after they had performed the indispensable duty of naming a Dictator to hold the Comitia. They pitched upon Q. Fabius Ambulius; but, some defect being found in the nomination, Amilius Papus was substituted in his room. Nor did this Dictator hold the Assembly for the Elections; no Magistrate of this unfortunate year could please the People; the Government fell into an Interregnum.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxliii
Bet. J. C.
Three
hundred nineteen.

133th
Consul-
ship.
Liv. B.
9. c. 8.

§. II. AND now all eyes were cast on two of the greatest men in the Republick, *Papirius * Cursor* and Publius || Philo. These, being chosen Consuls in the Comitia, entered upon their office the very day of their election. Their first care was to obtain a decree of the Senate, importing, that there had been no defect in point of religion in their inauguration: After which the Fathers took into consideration the Treaty made with the Samnites by the late Consuls. Posthumius, one of those unfortunate Generals, was called upon to speak first. He addressed himself to the assembly with an air of great modesty and humility, owned the Treaty to be infamous, but declared, that the Roman People were not bound by it, since it had been made without their orders; and that the Republick was obliged in justice to nothing more, than to deliver up into the hands of the Samnites those of the army who had signed it. And he advised therefore that the new Consuls should lead a new army into the field; but that, before they entered upon action, they should surrender to the mercy of the Samnites his Colleague and him, with all the other officers who had been parties to the convention. The Senators were struck with admiration at the generosity of Posthumius; and their compassion for him did not fall short of their esteem of his heroick virtue. However, they all approved of the proposal, except two Tribunes of the People, who had (probably) been raised to that office since their return from the Caudine Forks. These contended, not only that the motion made by Posthumius was unjust with regard to the persons concerned in the Treaty, but that it was by no means sufficient to discharge the demands which the SAMNITES had upon Rome; and that, as to themselves, they were Sacrosanct Magistrates, inviolable, and not to be delivered up to the enemy. To the last of these pleas Posthumius replied, That the Senate might defer the delivering up of the Tribunes till their Holinesses were out of Office, and then (if his advice might be followed)

cause

cause them to be beaten with rods in the publick Forum, by way of Usury for the delay. But as to himself, and the rest of the Profane Officers concerned in the Treaty, he pressed the immediate execution of his proposal; and he offered such plausible arguments to prove the invalidity of the Caudine Convention, and the sufficiency of the satisfaction designed for the Samnites, that the Senate, whether convinced or not, were universally pleased with his discourse, and acquiesced in his project. Nay, the two Tribunes themselves, who had at first opposed it, consented at length to follow the fate of their companions, and to that end abdicated their office.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred nineteen.
134th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B. 9.
C. 10.

Posthumius's proposal was no sooner passed into a decree of the Senate, but it dispelled that cloud of sorrow, with which the Romans had been covered ever since the misfortune of Caudium; it seemed to them like the breaking out of the sun upon the city after a total eclipse. Nothing was talked of but the generosity of Posthumius, whose Devotement they compared to that of Decius; and the Roman youth were so animated, that there needed no orders to raise Troops; a new army was formed almost wholly of Volunteers, and the Caudine Legions were again enrolled. As soon as these forces came near the enemy's camp, preparations were made for surrendering up the Roman Officers in due form by a Fecialis. Cornelius Arvina was the person appointed for this purpose; who, having conducted the Prisoners bound into Pontius's presence, addressed himself to him in the following words: Since these men undertook without any commission to conclude a Treaty of peace with you, and committed a crime in so doing, we deliver them up to you, in order to free ourselves from any share in the punishment which they alone have deserved. The Fecialis had scarce uttered these words when Posthumius, as if offended with what he had said, gave him a hard blow on the thigh with his knee, and looking sternly at him, I am now, said he, a Samnite, and you an Ambassador of Rome: I have therefore by this blow violated the Law of Nations, and you are thereby authorised to make war upon us. But this little low artifice served only to raise the indignation of the Samnite General, and make him despise the author of it. He laid before Posthumius and the Fecialis the injustice and baseness of their proceedings. He told them, that if the Roman People would preserve their honour untainted, and maintain the rules of equity, they must either perform the conditions of the Treaty, or send the Roman army again into the Caudine Forks. And, as to Posthumius's behaviour to the Fecialis, he thus expostulated: Will you be able to impose on the Gods by these thin disguises? Will they take Posthumius for a Samnite, and consider the blow he has given, as an insult offered to the Roman People by a Samnite? Is it thus that you sport with Religion and the Faith of Treaties? Are such ludicrous transactions becoming the Gravity of a Consul, and the Dignity of a Great Nation? Lictors, untie the Prisoners, and leave them free to go where they please. And thus the Romans were dismissed.

C. 11.

Year of
ROM E
cccccxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred nineteen.
134th
Consul-
ship.
Liv. B.
9. c. 12.
c. 26.

§. III. BUT now the Samnites repented too late of their not having hearkened to the wise counsels of old Herennius; they had a foreboding, says Livy, of the misfortunes that afterwards befel them; while the Romans, on the other hand, looked upon the liberty they had obtained of making war as equal to victory. Not long after, the inhabitants of Samnium joined with a body of Samnites, who surprised Fregelle, a Roman Colony, in the night, and, having by a promise of quarter engaged the greater part of the inhabitants to lay down their arms, burnt them afterwards alive. Capua likewise at this time prepared for a revolt; the chief Citizens entered into a plot to shake off the Roman yoke. This, with some other alarms, induced the Republick to name a Dictator, the Consuls being employed in the war. C. Menius was chosen to that dignity, and he appointed M. Fostius to be his General of Horse. The new Dictator's commission extended only to the making inquiry into state Crimes, and punishing them. And there needed no more to put a stop to the revolt of Capua; for the terror of a judge from whom there lay no appeal became so great throughout all Campania, that the heads of the conspiracy killed themselves to avoid punishment.

After this, the Dictator pretending that the powers given him by his commission were not confined to the taking cognizance of traitorous persons and practices at CAPUA only, but extended to the cognizance of all conspirators and conspiracies whatsoever and wheresoever against the Roman State; and pretending farther that all intriguing and canvassing for offices was a kind of Treason against the Commonwealth; he cited several of the Patricians to appear before him on accusations of that kind. The accused, having no other resource, called upon the Tribunes to interpose their negative, and put a stop to the prosecution; but not one of them would interfere in the matter. Hereupon the whole body of the Nobles took the alarm. They exclaimed in all places, that the Patricians, to whom, being nobly born, the way (if not obstructed by indirect practices) was naturally open and easy to all Honours and Dignities, were not the persons on whom this crime should be charged; but certain upstart Gentlemen, such as the Dictator himself and his Master of the Horse, who indeed ought rather to be prosecuted themselves, than sit as judges of other men; and they threatened that they would make the two inquisitors know this, so soon as their Magistracy should be expired.

Menius, though free from guilt, yet fearing lest his reputation should suffer by the calumny, assembled the People, and laid before them the uprightness of his intentions and the impartiality of his conduct; and then, to give them a farther proof of his innocence, abdicated the Dictatorship, that he might be brought to a trial. Fostius also, for the like purpose, resigned his office at the same time. The Senate, by a special commission, appointed the Consuls of the year (probably recalled to Rome on this occasion) occasion) to be their judges; who, having heard the witnesses, and fully examined the affair, honourably acquitted the accused *.

This kind of inquisition descended afterwards to men of less distinction, and in a short time was intirely stopt by force of those very intrigues and cabals against which it was levelled.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxiii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
nineteen.

* The account which has been given of MÆNIUS's affair is taken from Livy, who adds, that PUBLILIUS also was soon after brought to a trial on the same sort of accusation, and acquitted; but then Livy refers both these trials to the year 439, when Mænius was indeed Dictator, according to the Capitoline Marbles, but Publilius was not Consul.

If Publilius stood his trial the same year that he was Consul, we must suppose that he also, as the Jesuits Catrou and Rouille have well observed, abdicated his office in order thereto. These learned Fathers conjecture that this was the case, and that Papirius, being thereby left sole Consul, named to the Dictatorship L. Cornelius Lentulus, who appointed Papirius to be his General of the Horse, intending to be governed in all difficulties by his advice, as the ablest man in all the Commonwealth to conduct the present war: and what confirms the opinion, that the war was conducted by PAPIRIUS this year in quality only of Master of the Horse, is, that he had no TRIUMPH for his conquests.

What induces the Jesuits (who have been followed in the Text) to place the trial of Mænius in the year 433, is not the authority only of the Capitoline Marbles (which make Mænius Dictator this year) but a passage of Livy * himself, who in the year 443 makes Sempronius the Tribune speak of MÆNIUS being created Dictator, to inquire into State Crimes, and of his abdication in order to stand his own Trial, as things which had happened within ten years: an expression which he probably would not have used, if those events had happened four years before.

It is indeed very difficult to reconcile the Capitoline Marbles with Livy, who seems to be at a loss in this part of the History, and to have made some confusion of times and events, not distinguishing the several Dictatorships of Mænius as they are marked on those Marbles.

The Marbles give us three Dictators this year, C. Mænius, L. Cornelius, and T. Manlius. Livy mentions only the second, and in this manner; though he ascribes the exploits of the campaign, we are going to enter upon, to Papirius and Publilius, the Consuls of the year, yet he owns that the thing is doubtful, and that some give those exploits to L. Cornelius created Dictator, and Papirius Curfor his Master of the Horse.

134th
Consul-
ship.

* Livy, B. 9. c. 34.

C H A P. XV.

§. I. The Romans give the Samnites a great overthrow, and take from them Luceria in Apulia; §. II. And Ferentum; and recover Satricum. The character of Papirius Curfor. §. III. A two years Truce is granted to some Cities of Samnium. The Roman arms prosper in Apulia. Campania is turned into a Roman Præfecture. Two new Tribes are formed, which make the whole number thirty-one. §. IV. All Apulia is subdued. Antium receives laws from Rome for its future government. Saticula, a Campanian City, and Sora (in the country of the Volsci) both in alliance with the Samnites, are taken by the Romans. §. V. The Cruelty of the Romans towards three Cities of the Ausones. The Samnite war continues.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred nineteen.

134th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
9. c. 12.

c. 13.

c. 14.

§. I. IT seems highly probable from some passages of Livy, joined with the authority of the Capitoline Marbles, that the operations of the campaign were this year governed by Papirius Cursor, not in quality of Consul, and Collegue to Publius, but of General of the Horse to L. Cornelius Lentulus, created Dictator.

The chief view of the Roman Generals being to rescue the 600 Knights, who had been delivered up to the Samnites as hostages, they to that end divided their forces. Cornelius put himself at the head of the same troops that had passed under the Yoke, and led them against the victorious Caudine Legions of the Samnites. Papirius marched towards Luceria in Apulia, where the Roman hostages were kept prisoners. Pontius the Samnite General was for some time in suspense, whether to march to the relief of Luceria, or stay to make head against the Dictator. He feared that, if he marched, the enemy would fall upon his rear; and that, if he did not march, Luceria would be lost. His resolution at length was to put all to the hazard of a battle. The Dictator no sooner perceived the intention of the enemy, but he assembled his soldiers, and would have exhorted them, as was usual on such occasions, to behave themselves with the courage becoming Romans; but he found his harangue to be intirely needless. The soldiers, mindful of their late disgrace, were so eager to fight, that they gave no attention to him; with one voice they all cried out, To Battle. When they drew near the Samnites, they pressed their Ensigns to march faster, and, being spirited by revenge to a degree of fury, rushed upon the enemy without observing their usual order, or waiting the command of their General. Nothing could stand before them; the Samnites were routed, and their camp taken and plundered.

On the other hand Papirius having entered Apulia, and being assisted by the people of Arpi (old enemies of the Samnites, their neighbours) had laid siege to Luceria, but was so straitened by the difficulty of getting provisions, that the arrival of the victorious army at his camp proved very seasonable. The Dictator dispersed his Legions about the country, intercepted the convoys that were going to the besieged, and facilitated the bringing of provisions to the camp of Papirius. The Samnites, who had likewise an army incamped near Luceria, finding that the place could not hold out long, resolved to give the besiegers battle. Every thing was getting ready on both sides for a general action, when Ambassadors arrived from Tarentum, to put a stop to all hostilities by their mediation; and they threatened to declare themselves against whichever party should persist in carrying on the war. Papirius, pretending to listen seriously to what they said, told them, that he would consult the Dictator; and accordingly he did so, but it was only on the measures to be taken in the engagement, for which he instantly prepared. While the Romans were sacrificing, as was customary before a battle, the Tarentine Ambassadors came for their answer. The Chickens, cried Papirius feed perfectly well; so the Keeper of them tells us. The Gods too are much pleased with our Sacrifices: under their protection therefore we are going to to fight, as you perceive. He then led his troops out of the camp, ridiculing the vanity of a little insignificant People, who would needs make themselves mediators of a peace between two powerful nations, when at the same time Tarentum could hardly support itself under its own intestine divisions.

But now the Samnites absolutely declined the fight, alledging that Papirius had deceived them by false hopes of an accommodation, and declaring that out of respect to the Tarentines they would keep themselves upon the defensive within their camp. This timorousness of the enemy encouraged the Romans to attack them in their intrenchments, which they did with so much success, and with such a spirit of vengeance, that scarce any of the Samnites would have escaped the slaughter, if the Roman Generals had not restrained the fury of their troops, in regard to the six hundred Knights in Luceria whom the besieged might, perhaps in revenge and despair, put to death. The Town being sorely distressed by famine, the garrison sent an offer to release the six hundred Hostages, on condition that the Romans would raise the siege. Papirius told the Deputies who came to him with this proposal, that they should have consulted Pontius about the treatment proper to be expected by the vanquished; and peremptorily insisted, that all the soldiers in the place, to the number of 7000, should unarmed, and with only one garment each, pass under the Yoke, and Pontius, who had thrown himself into the Town, at the head of them. These conditions were accepted; and thus the Romans retaliated the ignominy they had undergone at the Caudine Forks and recovered their hostages.

§. II. A F T E R the return of Papirius with the army to Rome, Cornelius laid down his Dictatorship, and another Dictator, T. Manlius, was chosen (as it seems probable) only to hold the Centuriate Comitia, where Papirius * Cursor was again raised to the Consulate, and Q. Aulius † Cerretanus given him for a Colleague. The latter defeated the Ferentani in Apulia, and took their City, Ferentum. The former reduced Satricum, a City of Latium, which, as we have before observed, had gone over to the Samnites, though its inhabitants had obtained the privileges of Roman Citizens.

The Satricans, as soon as the Roman army appeared before the walls, sent out a Deputation to sue for Peace. Papirius refused to grant it, unless they would kill all the Samnite garrison, or deliver them alive into his hands. And, when they expostulated with him, asking, How it was possible for them, who were but weak and unarmed, to master a garrison armed and strong? he bid them advise with those by whose counsel they had received that garrison into the Town. The Satrican Senate, upon the report of this answer from the Consul were divided in opinion what measures to take, one part consisting of those who had counselled the revolt to the Samnites, the other of the adherents of Rome. It happened that the garrison, for want of provisions to hold out a siege, had resolved to march away the night following. That faction therefore which had called the

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred nineteen.

134th
Consul-
ship.

Livy B. 9.
c. 15.

Oros. B. 3.
c. 15 and others.

* A 3d
time.

† A 2d
time.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxiv

Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eighteen.

135th Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
9. c. 16.

Samnites

Year of Samnites in, thought it sufficient to give the Consul notice at what hour R O M E they would begin to move, through what gate they were to pass, and ccccxix what road they were to take; but the other party, not content with this, Bef. J. C. opened another gate to the Romans at the same hour; so that the Sam-
 Three nite garrison were surprised, and cut to pieces, and the town seized the hundred same instant. Papirius, after an inquisition by torture concerning the eighteen chief authors of the revolt, caused the most guilty to be scourged and 135th beheaded, disarmed all the Satricans, and placed a strong body of troops Consul- in the place.
 ship.

For this conquest Papirius, at his return to Rome, had the honour of a Triumph, which had not been granted him for his more important exploits the year before, (probably) because he had acted under the Auspices of a superior Magistrate.

This Papirius is the man whom Livy represents as a Hero, who would have been a match for Alexander the Great, had that Conqueror turned his arms Westward, and come into Italy. He was no less remarkable for his vigour of mind, military skill and courage, than for his strength of body, and wonderful agility in running, which got him the surname of Curſor: and whether it were owing to his robust constitution, or continual exercise, no-body eat or drank more than he; but he was also indefatigable in war, sharing the severest toils of it without hurting his health.
 Never had the Roman Horse or Foot a General that kept them to harder service. 'Tis reported of him that, his Cavalry having taken the freedom to desire a little relaxation from their fatigues, after an expedition which had been successful, he answered, Yes, by all means; when you alight from your Horses, I excuse you from the trouble of stroaking their backs. Papirius, so severe in point of discipline, was naturally facetious, but not very gentle even in his jests. Walking one day before the door of his tent, while he was Dictator, he ordered a certain Prætor of Præneste, who in battle had behaved himself shamefully, to be called, and, as soon as he appeared, bid the Lictor prepare his Ax: When he saw the poor Prænestine ready to die with fear at the sound of those words, he presently added, Dispatch, Lictor, cut away this stump of a tree that spoils my walk: After which he only fined the Prætor, and dismissed him. Such was the character of the renowned Papirius.

Year of §. III. IN the following Consulship of L. Plautius Venno and M. Fostius
 R O M E Flaccinator, many of the Samnite Cities sent Deputies to the Roman Senate ccccxv. to ask Peace; but these being referred to the People in Comitia (where Bef. J. C. the Caudine Legions doubtless made a part of the assembly) the Samnites Three could obtain, by urgent intreaties, no more than a two years Truce.
 hundred
 seventeen.

And now the terror, spread throughout Apulia by the Roman army, which Plautius conducted thither, was so great that the two Cities of 136th Teanum and Canusium surrendered, to avoid being pillaged. Capua like-Consul- wise being so divided by intestine seditions, as to be no longer in a con-ship. dition to govern herself, desired the Romans to give her a Governor and Livy, B. 9. a new
 c. 20.

new Laws ; and it was at this time that the Romans first turned Campania into a Præfecture^a, and sent thither a Præfēt.

It was perhaps to make the Campanians some sort of amends for their liberty, which they had voluntarily given up, or rather to keep them to their duty, that a new Roman Tribe was formed in their country. It was called the Falernian Tribe, doubtless from the hill Falernus, this Tribe possessing the delightful plain which surrounded that hill. Another Tribe was also established on the borders of the Ufens, and was therefore called Tribus Ufentina. So that the Romans had now thirty-one Tribes, all which had a right of suffrage in the Comitia by Tribes.

By a Census taken this year, the number of men in Rome fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred and fifty thousand.

§. IV. THIS happy war was followed by another as prosperous, under the administration of Q. Æmilius Barbula and C. Junius Brutus, who subdued and quieted Apulia. Antium followed the example of Capua, in asking a Governor and Laws from Rome. But this City was not made a Roman Præfecture, nor did she receive laws from a single Magistrate sent thither for that purpose. The care of making the laws by which the Magistrates were to govern was left to the Patrons of the Colony. It was then customary not only for private families, but likewise for Cities and afterwards for Provinces to have their Patrons, who were often of the principal Nobility of Rome. The Patrons of the Municipia were generally of the families of those Consuls who had conquered them ; and the Protectors of the Colonies were the children of those who had received the commission to plant them.

The succeeding Consuls, Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius, were scarce entered upon their office, when the Republick, either from a distrust of their abilities, or for some other reason unknown, obliged them to nominate a Dictator to carry on the war. They named L. Æmilius, who immediately put himself at the head of the Legions. He invested Saticula, a City of Campania, in alliance with the Samnites, and defeated the Samnite army that came to relieve it ; but his Dictatorship expired before he could take the place. The Samnites, not hoping to defend it, laid siege to Plisfia.

The Romans had now got such a habit of suffering none but Dictators to command their armies, that, tho' the famous *Papirius * Cursor* and Pub-

^a All the Cities which the Republick subdued were not upon the same foot. Some were called Colonies, some Municipia, and some Præfectures.

The Colonies chose their Governors out of their own inhabitants, and, tho' subject to the Roman People, were a kind of petty Republicks, modelled after the plan of Rome.

The Municipia kept their old laws, and the customs they had among them before they became Roman.

The Præfectures were in a worse condition than either the Colonies or Municipia. The Præfets, who were sent to them annually from Rome, had a power of changing their laws, and wholly swallowed up the authority of the other Magistrates. Some of these Præfets were chosen by the Roman People ; and others received their commissions from the Prætor of Rome, and were, properly speaking, no more than his substitutes in the Provinces. The discord among the Campanians gave the first occasion to the institution of Præfets. And afterwards the Romans established this form of Government in several parts of Italy. C. & R.

Year of lilias Philo * were chosen Consuls for the following year, we find Q. Fabius R O M E Maximus, who had been formerly General of the Horse to Papirius, and ever since his implacable enemy, raised at this time to the Dictatorship, and commissioned to carry on the siege of Saticula. While he was making his attack, the Samnites came from before Plifia, and their cavalry insulted the Roman camp, in which he had left his Cavalry under the command of Aulus Cerretanus, his General of the Horse. Aulus, without consulting the Dictator, sallied out with the Roman Knights, and, having discovered the General of the Samnites, rushed on him, and laid him dead with the first push of his lance; but, having penetrated too far into the enemy's squadrons, he could not retire; and the Samnites gave their General's brother the glory of revenging his death: He dismounted Aulus, and then stabbed him as he lay upon the ground. Hereupon the Roman Knights alighted from their horses, to recover their General's dead body; the Samnite cavalry did the same, and a battle was fought between them on foot, in which the Romans prevailed. The Samnites returned to the siege of Plifia † (a City in alliance with the Romans) and took it by assault.

† The situation of this place is unknown. Livy B. 9. c. 23. In the mean time Saticula capitulated, and then the Dictator marched to besiege Sora, on the banks of the Liris, in the country of the Volsci. The Sorans had gone over to the Samnites, having first massacred a Roman Colony which had been settled in their city. To defend this place the Samnites followed the Dictator with all expedition. When Æmilius understood that they were not far behind him, he faced about, marched to meet them, and came to an engagement with them near the narrow pass of Lautula. The success of the battle was doubtful, night put an end to it, and both armies continued their march towards Sora.

And now the Dictator chose a new General of the Horse, L. Fabius, a kinsman of his own, to succeed Aulus. He ordered him to go to Rome, fetch thence some fresh levies, conceal his march from the enemy, and, when he had posted his men in some secure place near Sora, to wait the signal for moving. This was no sooner executed, than the Dictator pretended fear, and kept close within his intrenchments, in hopes thereby to draw the Samnite army near his camp; and it did not fail to have the desired effect. Then on a sudden giving the signal for battle, he sallied out of his intrenchments, without letting the soldiers know the succours he had in readiness. They imagined it was some great distress, which made their General so suddenly change his resolution; and he confirmed them in this opinion, by telling them that their case was such, that they must either conquer or perish: That he had ordered fire to be set to their tents and baggage, but that they might soon make up the loss by the plunder of the rebellious cities. However, his private orders were to set fire only to those tents which were next the ramparts, and this was to be the signal for the General of the Horse to move to his assistance, and fall upon the enemy in the rear. Every thing was executed with wonderful harmony, and by this stratagem the Samnites were intirely defeated, and their camp plundered; and the Roman soldiers had had the farther joy of finding at their return to their own camp, that their tents and baggage were not burnt.

After this the Dictator laid siege to Sora, and the siege was continued by his successors in the command of the army, M. Poetelius Libo and *C. Sulpicius * Longus*, the new Consuls. They pitched their camp almost close to the walls of the Town. While they were deliberating and in doubt in what part to make their attacks, a deserter from the besieged suggested to them a stratagem for getting possession of the place. What he proposed appeared to the Consuls practicable; and, in order to its execution, they, by the advice of the deserter, removed their camp to the distance of six miles from the Place: to the end that this might throw the garrison into carelessness and security. Next night the deserter, having posted some cohorts near the town, in a woody spot, where they could lie concealed, stole with ten chosen Roman soldiers into the citadel. Then placing his men in a narrow steep path, that led from the Citadel to the Town, and where they might easily defend themselves against a great multitude, he hastily ran down into the Town, crying out, To arms, to arms, the enemy are in possession of the fortress. A fright seized the inhabitants; and in their haste to escape they broke down the gates. The Roman cohorts, roused by the noise, rushed in at one of them, putting all they found in the streets to the sword. In the morning by day-break the Consul, with his army, entered the Town, already in the possession of the Roman cohorts. Two hundred and twenty-five of the prisoners, who had been the chief authors of the revolt, and of the massacre of the Roman Colony there settled, he sent to Rome, where they were first beaten with rods and then beheaded.

§. V. THE reduction of Sora was followed by the surprising of three Cities of the Aufones (Aufona, Minturnæ, and Vescia) on the same day and at the same hour. The Romans seized these places, and barbarously massacred all the inhabitants, merely upon an accusation (without proof) brought to the Consuls by twelve traitors of the nation, of their having formed a design to revolt. But Livy tells us, that this barbarity was owing to the absence of the Generals when the Towns were seized.

Luceria, which had rebelled, being taken by assault, not only the Samnite garrison, but the Citizens were put to the sword, and a Colony of two thousand five hundred men sent thither from Rome, to secure it for the future against all attempts.

Notwithstanding all these examples of severity, the restless Campanians prepared once more to shake off the Roman yoke; so that the Republick thought fit to name a Dictator^a, C. Manius, to go with an army into their country, and keep them in awe. In the mean time the Consul Sulpicius appeared with his army near Caudium, where the Samnites had drawn together a great body of troops, and were waiting for the insurrection of the Campanians, who they hoped would join them. The two armies came ^a See the Note at the end of Chapter xiv.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxix.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred thirteen.
140th
Consul-
ship.
* A 3d
time.
Livy, B.
9. c. 24.

c. 26.

Fast. Ca-pit.
Liv. B.
9. c. 27.

Year of R O M E to an engagement, in which the Samnites lost thirty thousand men killed or taken *. And the conqueror marched his army to Bovianum, one of the principal Cities, if not the Capital of Samnium, and passed the winter before it.

Three hundred twelve. 141st Consulship. Fast. Capit. Livy, B. 9. c. 28. L. Papirius Cursor (a fifth time) and C. Junius Brutus (a 2d time, were now raised to the Consulate: but soon after, for what reason is unknown, the Fathers ordered a Dictator to be created. The nomination fell upon C. Poetelius Libo, and he was appointed to command the forces. He repaired to the camp near Bovianum, and in a short time quitted that post to retake Fregellæ from the enemy. They evacuated the place without standing a siege, and then the Dictator appeared before Nola, a City of Campania, which he quickly reduced, together with Atina and Calatia, both in the same province. This year the Romans planted a Colony at Suessa, a city of the Aurunci; and another in Pontia, an island which the Volsci had inhabited, and which lay within sight of their coast. And the Senate passed a Decree for planting a Colony at Interamna and Casinum.

Year of R O M E carrying on the war against the Samnites, and P. Decius Mus, the other, was lying sick at Rome, the Senate received advice, that the Hetrurians threatened the Republick with an invasion, upon which they ordered Decius to name a Dictator *. C. Sulpicius Longus, being promoted to that dignity, raised a powerful army, and made all the preparations which the apprehension of a war with so populous a nation and so near a neighbour required. Nevertheless he was not in haste to enter upon action; he kept himself upon the defensive, and waited till the Hetrurians should begin the hostilities; and this moderation had the effect he desired. The Hetrurians upon farther reflections suspended their design, and continued quiet within their own bounds.

* Livy gives the Consul Poetelius a share in this victory.

was named Dictator; but according to the Fast. Cap. Junius was General of the Horse to Sulpicius.

According to Livy, C. Junius Bubulcus

C H A P. XVI.

§. I. Appius Claudius, one of the Censors of Rome, admits the SONS OF FREED MEN into the Senate. The People reform this abuse the next year, and make some new regulations. §. II. Rome has war with the Hetrurians and Samnites. §. III. Appius obstinately refuses to quit his office, though his eighteen months (the legal time for its duration) are expired. He is prosecuted before the People.

Pomponius de Origine Juris. §. I. THE domestick tranquillity of the Republick was at this time a little disturbed by Appius Claudius, one of the Censors. He was an able Lawyer, and an Oracle among the Romans in all knotty points of law, but a lover of innovations, taking great delight in overturning the most most ancient institutions, and in setting up for a Legislator. Hitherto none but Patricians, or the most considerable of the Commons, had been admitted into the Senate; but Appius introduced there the Libertini, i. e. the sons of those who had been slaves, and had obtained their liberty. Having thus debased the Senate, he attacked the Priesthood, which had always been confined to the Nobility. The oldest Priesthood in Rome was that belonging to the Altar, called Ara Maxima, erected by Evander to Hercules; it had been given at that very time to an old man of the Aborigines, named Potitius, and had continued ever since in his family. The Censor prevailed with the Potitii^a to resign this Priesthood to the Slaves belonging to the publick, and employed in the publick works.

But, if Appius thus brought a blemish on the Senate and Priesthood, he made his country amends by the useful works he undertook with success; particularly an Aqueduct seven miles long, whereby he supplied Rome with plenty of wholesome water, which it before wanted. He likewise made that famous road from Rome to Capua, which was called the Appian Way, and which Julius Cæsar afterwards continued from Capua to Brundisium on the Adriatick. It lasted intire above eight hundred years.

The succeeding Consuls, C. Junius * Brutus and Q. Æmilius † Barbula, were no sooner entered on their office, but they complained to the People in Comitia of Appius's new list of Senators, and cancelled it, so that the Senate resumed its former lustre. The people at the same time not only recovered an old privilege, but extended it farther than before: By a law in the year 391, the Comitia had assumed the privilege of chusing six out of twenty-four Legionary Tribunes in the Consular armies, consisting of four Legions. This privilege had been for some time past usurped from them by the Consuls and Dictators; but now it was decreed, that the People should, instead of six, name sixteen of the twenty-four Tribunes. At this time likewise the People, at the motion of Decius Mus, one of their Tribunes, appointed two ‡ officers to take care of the naval affairs of the Republick.

§. II. WHILEST the Romans were employed in these regulations, their Consuls prepared to lead two armies^b into the field. It fell to Brutus's

Year of
R O M E
ccccxli.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred eleven.

142d
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. B.
1. c. 40.
Val. Max.
B. 1. c. 1.
Livy B. 9.
c. 29.
Frontinus
de Aquæductis, B.
1.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxlii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ten.

143d
Consul-
ship.
* A 3d
time.
† A 2d
time.
Livy, B.
9. c. 30.

1 Drum-viri Na-
lot vales.

^a Livy (B. 9. c. 29.) speaks of a tradition, that the whole name of the Potitii, consisting of twelve families, in which were thirty persons at or past the age of puberty, perished within the year; a warning from the angry Gods not to attempt innovations in Religion: And that Appius also was struck blind some years after, as a punishment for his profaneness.

^b Livy tells us (B. 9. c. 30.) that, while the Romans were burthened with the care of two dangerous wars, an adventure happened too trifling to be mentioned in History, were it not for the relation it had to Religion. All the publick Pipers, or Players upon the Flute, ran away together on a sudden to Tybur in great dudgeon, because the Censors had forbid them to feast and carouse in the Temple of Jupiter, as they used to do; so that there was no-body to play during the pomp of the sacrifices. The Senate, with a pious concern, dispatched some Deputies to Tybur, who were to endeavour to prevail with the People of that place, that the Pipers might be sent back to Rome. The Tyburtes, not being able to win upon these fellows, by persuasion, to return, contrived, on occasion of some festival, to make lot to carry on the war in Samnium, and to Æmilius to march against the Hetrurians, who had now begun hostilities. Æmilius found the enemy ready to lay siege to Sutrium, a Town in alliance with the Romans, about thirty miles from Rome, and a sort of key to the Roman State on that side. The Hetrurians, trusting to their numbers, ventured a battle, and were defeated by the Consul, who obtained a Triumph at Rome. Nor was Junius Brutus less successful against the Samnites. He first took Cluvia by assault, and then Bovianum, the spoils of which he gave to his soldiers. And now the Samnites, no longer daring to contend with a Consular army in the open field, had recourse to artifice, and endeavoured to draw their enemies into new Caudine Forks. Between Cumæ and Puteoli in Campania was the forest of Avernus, so called from the lake Avernus in the middle of it, from whose sulphurous waters exhaled such a nauseous stream, that the birds which attempted to fly over it were believed to be suffocated by the exhalations. The Poets make it one of the vents of Hell. Into this forest, where the Samnites had posted great numbers of men, they allured the Roman Troops by the hopes of booty. But the Romans, upon the first discovery of the ambush, drew up in order with such expedition, and behaved themselves with so much resolution and bravery, that they defeated the enemy, and left 20,000 of them dead upon the spot.

Year of R O M E ccccxlii. Bef. J. C. Three hundred ten. 143d Consulship. Livy B. 9. c. 32. c. 31. Zonaras, B. 6.

Year of R O M E ccccxliii. Bef. J. C. Three hundred nine. 144th Consulship. *A second time. Livy, B. 9. c. 33. Pomponius de Origine Juris. Livy, B. 9. c. 34.

§. III. IN the following Consulship of Q. Fabius * and C. Marcius Rutilus, the tranquillity and concord at home, to which so much prosperity abroad was owing, was greatly disturbed by the ambition and obstinacy of the Censor Appius. In the year 319, a law had been passed, enacting, that no Censor should continue in his office longer than eighteen months: But Appius refused to comply with this regulation, and to resign the Censorship (tho' his Colleague did) at the expiration of his term, depending on the favour of the People, who were pleased with his Aqueduct and new Road. Nevertheless Sempronius Sophus, one of the Tribunes, made no scruple to impeach him for this infraction of the ÆMILIAN Law. Appius, upon a summons, appearing before the Assembly of the People, the Tribune asked him, how he would have behaved himself, had he been one of the Censors when that Law was passed? To this Appius answered that his case was not the same with theirs, and that the Law in question bound only the Censors of that year. Sempronius, finding that nobody applauded this answer, immediately ordered him to prison. But then Appius appealed to the whole body of the Tribunes, of whom three took him under their protection, while the other seven were against him; and as no person could be condemned at their make them all dead-drunk, and then sent them home in carts. When they awaked in the morning, they found themselves in the middle of the Forum. The People, who were got together about them, having prevailed upon them to stay, the privilege of feasting in the Temple was restored to them, and a new one was granted them of strolling about the city three days every year in masquerade, piping and singing. This custom still prevailed in Livy's time.

Tribunal;

Tribunal, unless they were all unanimous, he by this means escaped, and alone held the Censorship more than three years longer, contrary to the inclination of the Publick.

Year of
R O M E.
ccccxliii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
nine.

C H A P. XVII.

§. I. The Consul Fabius defeats the Hetrurians. He penetrates into the Ciminian Forest, deemed impervious; after which he gives the enemy a second overthrow. §. II. The Roman arms have not equal success against the Samnites. The Senate orders Fabius to name Papirius Cursor (the man he most hates) to be Dictator to carry on that war. §. III. He continues (with the title of Proconsul) successfully to conduct the war against the Hetrurians. §. IV. The Dictator Papirius is no less successful against the Samnites. He returns to Rome, and retires for the rest of his life from publick business. §. V. The Samnites, assisted by the Marſi and Peligni, are defeated. The Hetrurians sue for an Alliance with Rome. The Romans subdue all Umbria. §. VI. They send an army against the Salentines. The HERNICI rebel and are subdued; and the SAMNITES are frequently defeated. §. VII. The Samnites request and obtain a renewal of their old alliance with Rome. The ÆQUI, who had lately rebelled, are totally subdued.

144th
Consul-
ship.
Auth. de Viris Il-lustris
c. 34.

§. I. THIS intestine disturbance did not stop the progress of the Roman arms. Fabius marched against the Hetrurians, and defeated them near Sutrium. The run-aways took refuge in the Ciminian Forest, a forest, says Livy, more impassable and dreadful than those of Germany, and through which not even a single merchant had ever yet made his way. Fabius was almost the only man in the army who had the boldness to think of entering into it: they were afraid of finding Caudine Forks in Hetruria. The General had with him at this time a near relation, named Cæſo Fabius, who had been educated at Cære in Hetruria, and spoke the language of the country perfectly well. Cæſo undertook to examine the forest and the places about it. He was accompanied in this enterprize by only one servant, who, having been brought up with him, was also well acquainted with the Tuscan language. Before they set out, they took care to inform themselves of the names of the several Governors, and of the nature and situation of the places through which they were to pass, that in conversation they might not be discovered through their ignorance of any thing that was notorious to all the natives. They were clad in the habit of shepherds, bearing each a cleaving bill and two javelins after the manner of the peasants. But neither their dress, their arms, nor the familiar use of the language, was so good a security to them against a discovery, as the general notion that no stranger would dare to enter that forest. In this disguise they are said to have travelled

Livy B 9.
c. 35, and 36.

Year of as far as to Camerinum * in Umbria, where they discovered themselves to be ROM E Romans, treated with the Senate of the City in the name of the Consul, and ccccxliii. obtained a promise from them to furnish the Roman army with a reinforce-Bet. J C. ment of men, and with thirty days provision, in case it should come into Three those parts.
 hundred
 nine.

144th
 Consul-
 L. P.

Upon the report made by Cæso at his return, Fabius, when it grew dark, first sent away his baggage, and soon after his infantry, to enter the forest. He himself stayed in the camp with his cavalry, and early the next morning began to skirmish with the advanced guard of the Hetrurians that were posted without the wood. When by this means he had long enough amused the enemy, he retired into his camp, from whence he went out at another gate, and overtook his main army before night. The next morning by day-break he reached the top of the hill Ciminus, which was on the further side of the forest, and gave name to it: From hence he surveyed a while the fertile plains of Hetruria, and then sent out a detachment of soldiers, who not only brought off a great booty, but defeated a tumultuous army that had got together to rescue it out of their hands. After this the Romans returned to their camp near Sutrium, where they found two Tribunes of the People, with five Deputies from the Senate, dispatched expressly to forbid Fabius to enter the Ciminian Forest. These messengers were extremely pleased, that they had come too late to hinder an expedition which had succeeded so well. They returned to Rome with the joyful tidings, that a way was opened into Hetruria.

The detachment which Fabius had sent out to plunder, had alarmed all the country near the foot of the hill Ciminus, and even the people of Livy, B. Umbria on the confines of Hetruria, so that prodigious numbers of each
 9. c. 37. nation took the field and came to the camp before Sutrium. And now the Hetrurians not only brought their camp forward, but came out and drew up their forces in order of battle in the plain, leaving a space for the enemy to do the like. Finding that the Romans declined the fight, they advanced almost to their very trenches; and the soldiers cried out with one voice to their officers, that the remainder of their allowance of provision for that day might be brought to them, for they would stay there under arms, and attack the Roman camp either in the night or early the next morning. Fabius, to deceive the enemy, still pretended fear, and kept close within his intrenchments; but he bid his men refresh themselves, and be ready for action upon the first signal. To raise their courage, he made a short harangue to them, extolling to a high degree the exploits of the Roman arms in Samnium, and assuring them, that the Hetrurians were not soldiers comparable to the Samnites for strength or courage; to this he added some dark words, by which he made them believe he had a secret correspondence with the enemy's camp, and was sure of the victory. About

* From Sutrium, whence Cæso had set out to Camerinum in Umbria, it was a two days journey.

the fourth watch of the night he drew up his army in order of battle with- Year of in the intrenchments of the camp, caused the rampart to be levelled, and R O M E the ditch to be filled, and then marched out and surprised the enemy while ccccxliiii.
half asleep, and lying scattered over the plain. Of the Hetrurians were sixty Bef. J. C. thousand men slain or taken prisoners. Those who could escape fled into Three the wood. Their camp was seized and plundered. Some say, that this ac- hundred tion happened in the country beyond the hill Ciminus near Perusia. Be nine.
that as it will, three of the most considerable Lucumonies, after this over- 144th throw, sent Deputies to Rome to sue for Peace; they obtained a Truce for Consulthirty years. ship.

§. II. BUT the Roman arms under the conduct of the Consul Marcus Livy, B. 9.
had not the like success against the Samnites, tho' he gained at first some c. 38.
advantages over them. The Roman fleet, commanded by P. Cornelius, met with misfortunes. This was the first fleet the Romans had ever put to sea. The Admiral made a descent at Pompeii, in Campania, and his troops, meeting with no opposition at first, were, by the eager desire of booty, carried farther into the country than was consistent with prudence, so that the inhabitants had time to get together, and they had the good fortune to intercept them in their return. They forced the Romans to relinquish their spoil; slew some of them, and chased those who escaped the sword to their ships.

This news, with a false report that Fabius had met with Caudine Forks in the Ciminian forest, revived the courage of the Samnites, and they gave Marcus battle. Much blood was spilt in the action on both sides, and it was not known which had the advantage. Nevertheless, as fame gave it against the Romans, (because some of the knights, and of the Tribunes of the Soldiers, and one of the Consul's lieutenants had been killed, and the Consul himself wounded) the Senate judged it necessary to create a Dictator; and nobody doubted but Papirius would be the man. How to get him nominated was the question: For, whether Marcus were alive or not, no one at Rome could tell; and the Samnites had guards upon all the roads that led to his Camp: And, as for Fabius, the other Consul, he had a private and personal quarrel with Papirius. In this difficulty, the Fathers determined to send to Fabius some eminent members of their body, men of consular dignity, who to the publick authority should add the weight of their own, to engage him to suppress his resentments for the sake of his country. When the deputies, being arrived at his camp, had notified to him the Senate's decree, and had thereto added some discourse to the style of exhortation and intreaty to comply, he stood silent for a while, with his eyes fixed on the ground, and then withdrew without making any answer. At midnight (according to custom) he declared Papirius Dictator. Nevertheless, he plainly shewed the violence he had done to himself: For, when the deputies returned him thanks for mastering his resentment, he dismissed them without any reply, they could not draw one word from him.

We have a remarkable instance at this time of the excessive superstition of the Romans. Papirius, after his nomination to the Dictatorship, and after

Year of R O M E had recourse ^a as seems to have been the custom in these days at least, to an assembly of the People by Curia to obtain his commission. It having fallen by lot to the Curia called Fauzia to vote first, the assembly would not proceed in the matter, because to the same Curia had fallen the like prærogative in those unfortunate years, when ROME was taken by the Gauls, and the Roman Legions were surprised in the Caudine Forks. The business was put off to the next day, and then Papirius obtained his commission without any ominous circumstance.

He marched away with an army which had been suddenly raised upon the alarm, formerly mentioned, of Fabius's danger in passing the Ciminian forest, and arrived at Longula on the frontiers of the Volsci, where Marcus delivered up to him the troops under his command. Papirius offered the Samnites battle, but they declined it; and for some days after both parties continued quiet in their camps.

§. III. IN the mean time Fabius, who in quality of Proconsul had been continued at the head of the forces in Hebrunia, not only put to flight without difficulty an army of Umbrians, but obtained a notable victory over the Hebrurians, who had assembled on the banks of a little lake called Vadimonius (near Viterbo) a more numerous and more courageous army than they had ever had before. All the soldiers of it were men who had chosen ^b one another to the service, and (as some think) made a vow to conquer or die. This is supposed to be the meaning of their Lex sacra, by which they were bound: whoever violated this oath might by any man be slain with impunity. Be that as it will, the extraordinary engagement, by which they had bound themselves, had such an effect upon them, that during the action the Romans could not believe that they were contending with the same people they had so often vanquished. The first line of the Roman army was cut to pieces, and the second repulsed; so that the Proconsul was obliged to bring his Triarii to the charge; nor was even this sufficient; it became necessary for the Cavalry to dismount, and go to the assistance of the Foot. But when the Roman Knights, who were quite fresh and in full strength, passing over heaps of slain, had placed themselves in the front of the battle, they made so furious an attack on the enemy, and were so well seconded by the Legionary Soldiers (tho' much fatigued) that the Hebrurians were soon broken, and their whole army put to flight. They lost the flower of their troops in this action.

§. IV. NOR was Papirius less successful against the Samnites, who, to give their soldiers more pride and spirit, had furnished them with finer arms and finer habits than usual. They divided their troops into two bodies, one of which they cloathed in stuff of various colours, and proquod utroque anno ejusdem curiæ fuerat principium. Livy, B. 9. c. 38.

^a Ei [Papirio] legem curiatam de imperio ferenti, triste omen diem diffudit, quod Fauzia curia fuit principium, duabus insignis cladibus, captæ urbis & Cardinæ pacis:

^b Lege sacra coacto exercitu, quum virum legisset. Livy, B. 9. c. 39.

vided with gilt bucklers; the other had silvered bucklers, and were cloathed in white habits; and they had all crests to their helmets, to make them look taller. That this novelty might have no ill effect upon the Roman soldiers, their officers put them in mind, that the true dress of a soldier was a sword and courage; that gold and silver were of no use in battles, and made but an ugly figure when distained with blood, but would be a very good booty to enrich the conquerors.

Year of
R O M E
cccxlii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
eight.

Papirius commanded the right wing of the Romans, which faced the many-coloured troops of the enemy; and his General of the Horse Ju- nius Brutus, commanded the left, which faced their white battalions; Bru- tus cried out, as he advanced towards the enemy, I devote these white men to Pluto: His attack presently threw the Samnites into disorder, and they began to give ground; which Papirius observing, called out to the Romans of the right wing, What! you have the Dictator at your head, and shall victory begin in the left? While Papirius thus animated the Infantry of the right to make a vigorous charge, his two Lieutenants (both eminent men, who had been Consuls) M. Valerius (on the right) and P. Decius (on the left) quitted the Foot, and putting themselves at the head of the Cavalry, each on his own side, made a sudden and furious attack on the enemy's flanks. The Samnites finding themselves almost surrounded, a terror seized them, they instantly broke their ranks and fled to their camp; but their loss in the battle had been so great, that they durst not think of defending it. Before night it was taken and burnt.

144th
Consul-
ship.

The Dictator, after the victory, returned to Rome, and had a Triumph, Fast. Ca.
of which the fine arms taken from the Samnites were the chief ornaments. pit.
They were afterwards delivered to the Goldsmiths company, to beautify the Roman Forum with them: And hence arose the custom of the Ædiles adorning the Forum, on those days when the images of the Gods were carried in procession through the streets of Rome in chariots.

The Triumph of the Proconsul Fabius followed that of the Dictator, and, though less splendid, was accompanied with more applause, because he had had no sharer in his glory; whereas the other had been much indebted for his success, not only to his General of the Horse, but to his two Lieutenants, Valerius and Decius.

§. V. PAPIRIUS was now grown old. He appeared no more in any publick station, but for the future left all the glory of heroical exploits to his rival Q. Fabius, who was now (the 3d time) with P. Decius Mus (the 2d time) raised to the Consulate. Samnium fell by lot to the former, and Hetruria to the latter. Fabius took Nuceria, [the last town in Cam- pania, on the other side of mount Vesuvius,] from the Samnites, and defeated them afterwards in a battle, but a battle so inconsiderable, that it would not deserve notice in History, had it not presented the Republick with new enemies who had not before appeared. The Marfi and Peligni, two petty nations in the neighbourhood of Samnium, northward, had joined the Samnites, though with little benefit to their allies.

Year of
R O M E
cccxlv.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred seven.

145th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
9. c. 41.

Year of R O M E ccccxlv. B. J. C. Three hundred. 145th Consulship. As for Decius, he made such a happy progress in his province, that all Hebruria desired an alliance with Rome: But the Republick, having (doubtless) formed the design of conquering this country, granted the Hebrurians only a Truce for one year. Soon after the Umbrians assembled all their forces, and, being joined by great numbers of Hebrurians, they confidently boasted, that, leaving Decius behind them in Hebruria, they would march directly to Rome. This put both the Consuls in motion. Decius made long marches from Hebruria, and incamped his army in the Pugillan field, near the river Liris, about eight miles distant from Rome. But the enterprising Fabius no sooner received orders from the Senate (alarmed by the preparations of the Umbrians) than he quitted Samnium, crossed Sabina, entered Umbria, and incamped in the very heart of the country near Mecania, on the banks of the Citurnus. The Umbrians were terrified at his unexpected appearance among them; and, though they ventured to give battle, they behaved themselves like women in the action: The Romans hardly made use of their swords; they beat down the enemy with their bucklers alone, so that little blood was spilt; but the whole army were made prisoners, and the whole nation soon after submitted. After this Fabius returned to his camp in Samnium.

Year of R O M E ccccxv. B. J. C. Three hundred. 146th Consulship. Livy, B. 9. c. 42. §. VI. THE time being now come for a new election of Consuls, Appius Claudius, who had held the Censorship five years contrary to law, stood candidate for the Consulate, and obtained it. L. Volunnius Flamma was appointed his Collegue. Appius not being qualified for the command of armies, the Senate obliged him to stay in Rome; and, notwithstanding his opposition to it, continued Fabius in quality of Proconsul, and without any associate, in the command of the troops in Samnium, where he obtained a considerable victory over the enemy near Alifia, on the banks of the Volturnus. In the mean time Volunnius made war against the Salentines, in the extreme part of Italy, with good success, and for the first time spread the terror of the Roman name in those parts.

Fast. Capit. Year of R O M E ccccxvii. B. J. C. Three hundred. 147th Consulship. Livy, B. 9. c. 43. In the election of Magistrates for the following year, the Romans chose Appius to be Prætor, a post much better suited to his talents; and at the same time raised Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina to the Consulate. The former was ordered to march against a body of Hernici, who had taken arms on account of the severe treatment which some of their countrymen (made prisoners in the last battle of the Romans with the Samnites, had suffered at Rome. The rebels lost three camps in a few days, and were forced to surrender at discretion. This war being ended, Marcius hastened to join his Collegue, who had suffered himself to be invested in narrow passes by the Samnites. The enemy, to prevent the uniting of the two armies, gave Marcius battle, while his troops were fatigued and in some disorder. The place where they attacked him being not far from the camp of Cornelius, the latter could hear the shouts of the combatants, and see the clouds of dust that they raised; judging therefore that his Collegue was engaged in fight with the enemy, he sallied out of his intrenchments, fell upon the Samnites in flank, broke through them, and and made his way to their camp, which he found empty, and set fire to it. The sight of the fire totally discouraged them, so that they immediately dispersed themselves and fled, leaving thirty thousand men dead on the spot. But this action was no sooner over, than the Romans found themselves obliged to enter upon a new engagement with a body of fresh troops coming to reinforce the Samnite army. The success of this battle being the same with that of the preceding one, the Samnites were reduced to sue for peace. The Consuls referred their Deputies to the Senate and People of Rome.

Year of.
R O M E
ccccxlvii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred five.
147th
Consul-
ship.

Whilst Marcus and Cornelius were yet in the field, the time came for electing new Magistrates; so that a Dictator was named to preside in the Comitia by Centuries, who chose Posthumius Megellus and Tib. Minucius Consuls. Before they took possession of their office, the Senate determined the fate of the Hernici. Those of their cities that had continued faithful were allowed to chuse whether to live according to their ancient laws, or to have the right of Roman Citizenship, and they preferred the former. The rest were declared Roman Citizens, and obliged to be governed by Roman Laws, whether they liked it or not, yet without having the right of suffrage.

Livy, B
9. c. 44.

At this time Deputies arrived from Carthage, with a compliment and presents to the Republick; and some Historians say, that a third treaty was now made with the Carthaginians.

c. 43.

The new Consuls were both ordered into Samnium, each at the head of two Legions. Posthumius directed his march towards the city of Tifernum, and Minucius incamped in the neighbourhood of Bovianum. The first came to a battle with the Samnites, the success of which was equal on both sides; but he pretended to be worsted, retired the next night to the mountains, and there fortified himself in an advantageous place. The Samnites followed and incamped within two miles of him. Posthumius hereupon finished his intrenchments, with all expedition, and leaving a sufficient number of troops to guard them, marched out at midnight with the rest, and joined his Collegue, who lay in sight of another body of Samnites that waited for an opportunity to engage. Minucius, by the advice of Posthumius, advanced into the plain with only his two Legions, and offered the enemy battle. The victory was long disputed; but at length Posthumius appearing with his fresh troops, and falling suddenly upon the Samnites, whose strength was exhausted, the latter suffered a terrible slaughter. They lost one and twenty Ensigns. This action over, the two Consuls led their joint forces to Posthumius's camp, and thence fell upon that body of Samnites which was posted near it. This proved a bloodier battle than the former; Minucius was killed in it, and Statius Gellius, the Samnite General, taken prisoner. Victory declared for the Romans, who took twenty-six Ensigns from the enemy.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxlviii
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred four.
148th Consul-
ship.
Liv. B. 9.
c. 44.

The People at Rome, on the news of Minucius's death, immediately appointed Fulvius Cereus to succeed him, and to finish the campaign,

Year of which he did by reducing Bovianum and several other cities to surrender, R O M E for which he had a Triumph at his return home.

CCCCXLIX.

Bef J. C.

Three

Hundred

three.

149th

Consul-

ship.

Faft. Ca-

pit.

Livy, B.

9. c. 45.

§. VII. IN the beginning of the administration of the succeeding Consuls, C. Sempronius Sophus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio, the Samnite nation sent Deputies to Rome to desire a renewal of the ancient confederacy with the Republick: But the Romans, before they would grant this request, dispatched Sulpicius with an army into Samnium, to examine the sincerity of the Samnites, and discover their real sentiments. They received the Consul every-where with great marks of respect and friendship; and, upon his report of the seeming alteration in their dispositions, a new alliance was made with them on the old foot.

And now the Republick prepared to punish her old enemies the Æqui, who, notwithstanding the Treaty between them and Rome, had many times privately sent succours to the Samnites, and had of late openly espoused their cause, following the example of the Hernici. They had likewise returned this haughty answer to the Roman Feciales, who had been sent to them to demand satisfaction: That they supposed it was only a trial, whether through the fear of a war they would suffer themselves to be made Roman Citizens; which, how desirable a thing it was, the Hernici had taught them; seeing those of that nation, who had been left free to chuse, had preferred their own Laws to Roman Citizenship; and those who had been compelled to be Roman Citizens looked upon it as a punishment. War was therefore declared against the Æqui, and both the Consuls were ordered to enter their country. The long subjection and inaction of this people had enervated their courage, and untaught them Military Discipline. They assembled an army, but there was no order, no subordination among the soldiers, nor could they come to any agreement what measures to take. At length they all unanimously left their camp at midnight, and every one made the best of his way home. The Consuls, who the next morning drew up their troops with an intention to offer battle, were much surpris'd at the inaction of the enemy, and the silence that reigned in their camp. No advanced guards appeared, no centinels upon the ramparts. At first they suspected an ambush, and proceeded with caution; but, when they discovered the truth, resolved to lay siege to the Cities whither they had retreated. In fifty days the Consuls took forty-one Towns, most of which they razed or burnt, which intirely reduced the Æqui; and this rapid destruction spread such a terror among the neighbouring nations, that the Marfi, Peligni, Ferentani, and Marrucini, all sent to solicit an alliance with the Republick. Their request was granted.

C H A P. XVIII.

§. I. The renowned Q. Fabius, being CENSOR this year, acquires the surname of MAXIMUS, for his reformation of an abuse introduced by APPIUS.

§. II. Colonies are sent to the Conquered Cities. The art of Painting is introduced roduced at Rome by C. FABIVS, surnamed PICTOR. Cleonymus, son of Cleomenes King of Sparta, brings a fleet upon the coast of Italy, and makes two descents there. §. III. An insurrection of the Marfi is quelled. After a victory over the Hettrurians, a Truce is granted them, for two years.

§. I. THIS success of the Roman arms abroad was followed by re-formations at home. The famous Q. Fabius Rullianus, being this year (with P. Decius Mus) in the Censorship, employed his power to rectify an abuse introduced by Appius Claudius into the State. Appius, as we have already * seen, to make himself Master in the Senate, had brought the sons of Freed-men into it; but this novelty had not lasted above one year; his list of Senators was cancelled, and the old one took place. Not succeeding therefore in that enterprise, he, in order to govern the Elections in the Comitia, dispersed the Freed-men and the very lees of the People, men wholly devoted to him, into all the Roman Tribes, and this occasioned endless broils in the Republick. It was owing to the same cause, that the Curule Ædileship fell this year into the hands of two very mean persons, the one a native of Præneste, the other Cn. Flavius, the grandson of a Freed-man, and whose first profession had been that of a scribe †. Having by some means learnt the rules by which the Ponti-fices settled the Term-days, or the days for hearing Causes, and such other matters as were within their peculiar province, he composed a Calendar, transcribed it, and fixed it up in the Forum for the use of the People †; who, being thereby freed from their dependance on the Ponti-fices in this respect, rewarded him with several honourable employments, to which they raised him successively, and at length with the Curule Ædileship. The Nobles were so deeply affected with the indignity offered them by this promotion of Flavius, that many of them laid aside their ornaments, and particularly their Gold-Rings, as in a time of mourning.

Fabius, to re-establish peace in Rome, and to hinder the great dignities from being bestowed on worthless men, reincorporated into the four City-Tribes those mean fellows whom Appius had taken thence, and dispersed among the Country-Tribes; so that for the future they could influence no more than four Tribes, and in these they were not the strongest: a reformation so agreeable to the Republick, that on this account alone the Romans gave Fabius the surname of Maximus, which he had not acquired by all his military exploits. It was perpetuated in his branch of the Fabian family.

* Pliny (B. 33. c. 1. §. vi) says, that Flavius had been scribe to Appius Claudius Cæcus, and, at his instigation, both made himself master of the secret (by artful inquiries) and published it.

† Flavius published likewise what Livy calls, Civile jus repositum in penetralibus pontificum. See TAYLOR's Elements of Civil Law, p. 77—81, where this matter is satisfactorily explained.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxlix.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred
three.

149th
Consul-
ship.

* In the year 441.
Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 2.

Aul. Gell.
B. 6. c. 9.
Livy, B.
9. c. 46.
Pomponius de Origine Juris.
Cicero pro Muræna, 11.
Livy, ibid
Plin. B.
33. c. 1.
§. 6.

Year of
R O M E
452. B.
J. C. 500.
Fast. Ca-
pit.
In this Cretyship likewise an ordinance was made, that the Roman Argers should every year on the Ides or July appear on horseback dressed in purple, and crowned with Olive, and march in procession from the Temple of Mars to the Capitol, [in honour of Cajus and Polus who fought for the Romans at the lake Regillus.]

§. II. THE Republick being now in peace with her neighbours, the year of the Consuls S. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Genucius Aventinus was almost wholly spent in sending Colonies to the conquered Cities. To Sora 4000, to Antia in the country of the Aequi, 6000 men were sent. The same year to the Arpinum and Trebulan were granted the privilege of Roman Citizens; but from the Fri States was taken a third part of their land, because they had solicited the Samniti to make war on the Romans. The publick tranquillity suffered a short interruption by a gang of Robbers in Umbria, who ravaged the country far and near. Their retreat was a great cave with two entrances: and the Romans, having found them both, lighted great fires at them, so that some of the wretches whose whole number amounted to two thousand were stifled with the smoke, and the rest threw themselves into the flames.

This expedition was followed by an inconsiderable war. In the beginning of the Cretyship of M. Livius Dentor and M. Fufius Paulus, the Aequi took umbrage at the Colony of six thousand men which the Republick had lately sent to Ater, and they laid siege to that place. But Junius Brutus, whom the People named Dictator upon this occasion, marched against them, and by a speedy victory put an end to the war in eight days time. At his return home he dedicated to The Goddess of Health a Temple, which he had vowed when he was Consul, and of which he had laid the foundation when he was Censor. And this is the first time that History mentions the use of the art of Painting in Rome. C. Fabius (afterwards Consul) painted all the walls of the new Temple in Tusco, and thence got the surname of Pictor.

At this time Cleonymus, the son of Cleomenes King of Sparta, came with a great fleet on the coast of Italy, with design to make a settlement there, and he took Thuriae [anciently called Sybaris] a City of Lucania. Being driven thence by the Romans he made a second descent, in the place where Venice now stands. But, this expedition proving as unfortunate as the former, he returned to his own country, having lost four-fifths of his fleet.

§. III. THE following year the Republick had no Consuls, but was governed by two Dictators, one after another, each of whom fulfilled his six months. The first was Fabius Maximus. The revolt of the Marfi induced the Romans to put this eminent warrior at the head of their troops. He marched an army against them, and by one single victory quieted that insurrection. Valerius Corvus, who succeeded Fabius, was named to the Dictatorship, to conduct a war against the Hetrurians, in which the Republick was engaged by taking part in the civil broils of that people. But the Roman Legions, having entered Hetruria, were no sooner advanced within a small a small distance of the enemy, than a religious scruple seized the Dictator. He called to mind that there had been some defect in the ceremony of his inauguration, upon which he straight returned to Rome, to renew the Auspicia. In his absence Sempronius Sophus, his General of the Horse, imprudently made an incursion into the country, fell into an ambush, and lost a great number of men, and some colours. The news of this defeat, which was much magnified, caused an extraordinary terror at Rome, and the Dictator hastened away with new levies to the camp. At his arrival he found things in a much better condition than had been reported. Sempronius had changed his post for a more safe and advantageous one; the Manipuli, who had lost their Colours, were impatiently waiting in great shame and disgrace without the camp (where they continued day and night without covering) for an opportunity to recover their honour, and the whole army desired nothing so much as a battle, that they might have their revenge. Valerius, seeing this good disposition of his troops, led them into the fields of Russelle, one of the twelve chief cities of Hetruria. The Hetrurians, flushed with their success, followed him, and endeavoured by a stratagem to surprise Fulvius, one of the Dictator's Lieutenant-Generals, who, with a detachment, had possessed himself of a fort at some distance from the Roman camp. Some Hetrurian officers, in the dress of shepherds, came with their flocks near the walls of the fort. This was a bait to draw the Romans out; a body of troops lay ready in ambush to fall upon them. Fulvius, discovering their artifice by their speech, which was more elegant than that of shepherds, bid some of his men call out to the pretended shepherds, and tell them, That they would find it as hard to deceive the Romans as to conquer them. When the Hetrurians perceived that their stratagem would not take effect, they presently after appeared, and besieged Fulvius in form. The Dictator had notice of his distress, and hastened to his relief, and this brought on a general action. Valerius, to surprise the enemy, instead of posting his Cavalry in the wings of his army, as was usual, drew them up behind his Infantry, leaving spaces in the lines for the horse to advance upon a signal. And in reality, when the Romans had given the first shout for the combat, it was not their Infantry but their Cavalry that began the charge. Passing through the intervals before-mentioned, they drove full speed upon the enemy; and this unexpected attack so terrified and disconcerted the Hetrurians, unprepared for it, that the battle was neither long nor doubtful. They quickly gave ground, dispersed themselves, and fled; and the victory of the Romans was complete. The Hetrurians, humbled by this fresh blow, once again sued for peace, but could obtain no more than a truce for two years.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCCLII.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred.
151st
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
10. c. 4.

c. 5

C H A P. XIX.

§. I. In the year of Rome 453, a Law is passed, to qualify PLEBEIANS for the Pontificate and Augurate. §. II. The Lex Valeria is confirmed anew. §. III. Q. Fabius Maximus declines the Consulship, and at his own request obtains the Curule Ædileship.

Year of
R O M E
CCCCIII.
Ref. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
nine.
—
153d Consul-
ship
• A fifth
time.
Fast. Ca-pit.
Livy, B.
12. c. 6.

§. I. AT the next election of Magistrates, Valerius Corvus, though absent, was again * promoted to the Consulship; and the Comitia appointed Q. Apulcius Panfa to be his Collegue. During their administration the Hetrurians and Samnites continued quiet, and the Republick enjoyed an interval of tranquillity abroad. But as it had ever been the fate of Rome to have commotions at home, when she had no foreign enemies, so now two Tribunes of the Commons, brothers, of the name of Ogulnius, set on foot a new contest with the Patricians, concerning honours and dignities. The only important offices which the Plebeians did not share with the Nobility, at this time, were the Pontificate and the Augurate. Numa had appointed only four Pontifices, and that number had never been increased. The Augurs, though but three in number at their first institution by Romulus, had been augmented to six. However, the Augural College consisted now but of four, probably by the death of two. The Ogurnii presented a petition to have four additional Pontifices chosen out of the Plebeians, and to have five Plebeian Augurs added to the four in being. The Patricians were highly offended with this proposal; but, as they had experienced the fruitlessness of their endeavours to exclude the Plebeians from the Consulate and the other great dignities, they made no other opposition to this new incroachment on their prerogatives, than by declaiming in all places against the innovation, as an affront offered to the Gods themselves: May Heaven grant that so wicked a profanation of our sacred mysteries draw no calamity on the Republick! The matter was first debated before the assembly of the Curiæ where Appius Claudius, so famous for his attempts to humble the Nobility, became now their most zealous advocate. But, as his harangue contained nothing more than a repetition of the old arguments that had been so often employed against the admission of Plebeians to the Consulate, History has not transmitted it to us. On the other hand, P. Decius Mus, who had been twice Consul, and once Dictator, spoke in behalf of the Plebeians. He put the assembly in mind of his father Decius, who devoted himself to death for the Roman Legions, and thereby made them victorious: If Decius was as pure and as agreeable a victim to the Gods as his Patrician Collegue Manlius would have been, had he offered himself; what should hinder, but that the same Decius might have been chosen to officiate in our Religious Ceremonies and Sacrifices? And, after all, whence is it that the Patricians derive this peculiar privilege of being alone worthy to minister in sacred things? Did they descend from Heaven with the quality of Patricians? or did Romulus give give that title to their ancestors, only because they could tell who were their Fathers and Grandfathers, that is, because they were men of free condition? If this be all, I am able to name a Consul for my Father; and my son may boast, that both his Father and Grandfather have been honoured with the highest dignities in the Republick. But to what purpose should I reason any longer? The Patricians have nothing solid to offer, they only seek to amuse us with words and noise, and they know very well that we shall carry our point. My opinion therefore is, that the People by their suffrages do immediately pass the Petition of the Ogulnii into a Law.

Year of
R O M E
ccccliii.
Bef. J. C.
Three
hundred ninety-
nine.
152d
Consul.

This Debate was in the assembly of the Curiae; but, in order to decide the affair, it had been before agreed to summon the Tribes; and there both points were carried in favour of the People, and Decius was chosen one of the new Pontifices.

§. II. VALERIUS took the opportunity of the present tranquillity to revive an old Law*, made by Valerius Poplicola, and afterwards renewed † by another of his ancestors, enacting, That in capital causes the accused should have a right of appealing to the Tribunal of the People. The Patricians, by their interest and power, had hindered the effect of this law, and rendered it obsolete; but it was now once more restored, and expressed in stronger terms than before; with no other sanction however, but That the transgressors of it should be deemed guilty of a dishonest action; a penalty which should have been of little influence in a more corrupt age, but sufficient at this time to restrain the Romans, who piqued themselves upon their virtue, and had no hope of rising to great employments, unless they had preserved their reputation pure and untainted.

* In the
year 244.
† In the
year 304.

§. III. IN the following Comitia for electing new Consuls, Q. Fabius, finding that the People were inclined to raise him again to that dignity, though he had not entered his name among the Candidates; and considering that he should gain but little glory, in a time of tranquillity; desired the assembly to reserve that mark of their esteem for him till a more tempestuous season, and declared, that a civil employment at present would be more agreeable to him. Accordingly they placed him (with Papirius Cursor, the son of the Great Papirius) in the Curule Ædileship; nor did his superior merit appear less conspicuous in this station than in military command: For, when, not long after, there happened to be a great scarcity of corn at Rome, he took such effectual care to guard the People against famine, by bringing corn from abroad, and by making a proper and wise distribution of it, that the poorer sort confessed they owed their lives to him.

c. 9.
c. 11.

C H A P. XX.

§. I. The Hetrurians break the truce with Rome. Picenum obtains an alliance with the Republick. Valerius Corvus being declared Consul (the 6th time) the very name of this renowned warrior strikes such a terror into the Hetrurians, that they desist from the war. §. II. A report being spread that both

4 D

both the Hettrurians and the Samnites were making mighty preparations to attack the Republick, the Romans oblige the great FABIVS to accept the office of Consul contrary to his inclination; and, at his request, give him P. Decius Mus to be his Collegue. The Hettrurians ask peace; so that the Consuls march their two armies into Samnium.

Year of
R O M E
cccliv.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
eight.

153d Consul-
ship.
Livy B.
10, c. 10.

a 11.

Plin. B. 7.
c. 48.
Val. Max.
B. 8. c. 13.
Cicero, in Catone Majore.
Plut. in Mario.

§. I. THE Consuls chosen for the new year were M. Fulvius Petinus and T. Manlius Torquatus. Fulvius went into Umbria to carry on the siege of Nequinum (which Apuleius, one of the former Consuls, had begun) and, by the treachery of some of the inhabitants, he made himself master of the place. The Romans sent a Colony thither, to keep the rest of the Umbrians in awe.

In this Consulate the Hetrurians broke their truce with Rome. But, when they were preparing to enter the Roman territory, an irruption of the Gauls into their country suspended the design; however, they did not drop it. On the contrary, that they might execute it with the better success, they endeavoured by large sums to engage the Gauls not only to forbear pillaging Hetruria, but to join with them against Rome. The Gauls seemed to listen to the proposal, took the money, and withdrew their troops. But, when the time came for marching against the Romans, they excused themselves, unless the Hetrurians would assign them a part of their territory to settle in; and this was absolutely refused.

During these negotiations between the Hetrurians and Gauls, Picenum, on the borders of the Adriatick, sent Deputies to Rome to ask an alliance with the Republick; a request which the Romans easily granted in the present necessity of their affairs, and then they dispatched away an army to punish the Hetrurians for their breach of faith. The command of it had fallen by lot to Manlius; but, this General losing his life by a fall from his horse, the Centuries met to chuse him a successor, and (which had never happened since the birth of the Republick) all the suffrages were given in favour of one and the same man, Valerius Corvus, now the sixth time created Consul. His first Consulship was in the year 405, according to the Capitoline Marbles^a. Though now in a very advanced age, he made the campaign with all the vigour of a man in the bloom of life. His very appearance at the head of the Roman army so terrified the Hetrurians, that they durst not continue in the field, but shut themselves up in their fortified places; nor could the burning of their villages, and the laying waste their country, provoke them to hazard a battle. This was the last of Valerius's Military expeditions. In what year he ended his days is unknown, but it is certain that he lived to above an hundred. He was promoted one and twenty times to offices, that gave him a right to sit in the Curule Chair, which can be said of no Roman but himself; and, when not in any publick station, he made Agriculture his chief employment and amusement. He was not only a worthy Patriot and good pattern of that Affection which men owe their country, but an excellent model of the Paternal Care which the head of a great family ought to have of his children and relations. Great in Peace and great in War, Valerius Corvus shone eminent even among those Heroes who appeared in the most glorious, because the most virtuous, age of Rome.

^a According to Plutarch, Cicero, Val. Max. Val. Corvus's first Consulate and his last; imaz, and others, there were 46 years between according to the Fast. Capit. 48.

§. II. TOWARDS the close of the year ^a the Republick (by what accident is unknown) fell into an Inter-regnum. When the Comitia were held for a new election of Magistrates, Appius Claudius took it into his head to oppose the admitting of any Plebeian into the Consulship: But all his rhetorick proved ineffectual, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus a Plebeian, was made Collegue to L. Cornelius Scipio. During their administration the Hetrurians took arms again, and the Samnites broke their alliance with Rome. Scipio marched against the former, and gave them battle, the success of which was doubtful. However, the Hetrurians, after the action, were seized with an unaccountable terror, deserted their camp in the night, and returned to their respective Lucumonies; and the Consuls pillaged and laid waste the whole country. This is Livy's account. But the Fasti Capitolini make it more probable, that this expedition of the Romans into Hetruria was under the conduct of Fulvius, who afterwards marched against the Samnites, and gained an unquestionable victory over them near Bovianum.

Before the expiration of the present Consulship, a report prevailed of mighty preparations that the Samnites and Hetrurians were making to attack the Republick once more. Hereupon, the first care of the Romans was to chuse able Generals for the next campaign; and all eyes immediately turned upon Fabius. But he (from what motive is hard to guess) declined the honour, and excused himself to the People on pretence of his age, and the decay of his strength and vigour. And, to shew that he was in earnest, he ordered the law to be read, which forbad any man to bear the office of Consul twice within ten years^b; a law made in the year 411, but which had not been strictly observed. Nevertheless, the People, being bent upon having him for one of their Consuls, made such a clamour when the statute was going to be read, as quite drowned the voice of the person appointed to read it; nay, the Tribunes themselves threatened Fabius, that, if he did not desist from opposing his election, they would get the People to dispense with the law by a formal decree. When Fabius found that there was a necessity of complying, he resisted no longer; but then he desired that they would at least oblige him so far as to give him a Collegue to his own mind, and proposed to them Decius Mus, who had been joined with him in his last Consulship, and with whom, he told them, he had lived in perfect concord and harmony. The

^a Two new Tribes, Aniensis and Terentine, were this year added to the 31 in being.

^b According to Livy and the Fast. Capit. there had been ten Consulates since Fabius was in that station; so that if his objection was good, we must conclude, that the Consular years were not always complete years, and are therefore a very uncertain measure of time. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
cccliv.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
eight.

153d Consul-
ship.
Cicero in Bruto, c.

14.
Year of
R O M E
ccclv.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
seven.

154th
Consul-
ship.
Liv. B.
10 c. 12.
c. 12.

Year of Comitia granted his request, and those Centuries who had not yet voted gave R O M E their voices unanimously for Decius. The rest of the year was spent in recccclvi. straining the avarice of those who, contrary to law, possessed more than five Eef. J. C. hundred acres of land.

Two While the new Consuls Fabius * and Decius † were considering together hundred in a friendly manner, which of them would be able to conduct the war in ninety- this or that province, with most advantage, and what number of forces it six. would be necessary to employ in each, Deputies arrived at Rome from 155th Sutrium, Nepete, and Falerii, who all agreed in their report, that the He- Consul- trurans in their last Diet had resolved to desire a peace. Upon this both ship. the Consuls marched into Samnium, but entered it different ways. Fabius
 * A 4th took the shortest cut, by Sora; and being informed by his scouts, that time. the Samnites had laid an ambush for him on the banks of the Tifernus, † A 3d and were waiting for his coming into a deep valley, that they might fall time. upon him from the hills, he resolved to attack them in their concealment.
 Livy, B. But they, finding their project discovered, left their ambush, and drew up 10. c. 14. in order of battle in the plain. The brave resistance they made in the beginning of the engagement gave Fabius some uneasiness. He commanded his Cavalry to give their horses the reins, and to rush upon the enemy with their usual impetuosity; but this proved ineffectual. His next recourse was to stratagem. He ordered Scipio, one of his Lieu-Frontini tenants, to take the Hastati of the first Legion, march them by round-about Stratag. ways in silence to the top of a neighbouring hill, and thence fall on the
 B. 2. enemy in the rear; and this motion was made without being perceived, either by the rest of the army, or by the Samnites. In the mean time the latter, proud of having repulsed the Roman Cavalry, pushed the first line of the Infantry briskly, and forced them to retire through the spaces in the second line, which consisted of the Principes. But, when these began likewise to lose ground, Scipio appeared with his detachment in the rear of the enemy. Fabius, to encourage his men, made them believe, that it was the army of his Colleague Decius come to his assistance. And, the same persuasion prevailing among the Samnite Troops, they immediately disbanded and fled. The slaughter was not great, but the Romans took twenty-three colours.

Livy, B. Decius, whose name had been of service in this action, had likewise in 10. c. 15. another respect contributed to the victory, by having defeated the Apu- lians, who were to have joined the Samnites. After this the two Consular armies continued five months in Samnium, and made incredible devasta-tions; Decius changing his camp forty-five times, and Fabius his eighty-six for that purpose.

C H A P. XXI.

§. I. Appius Claudius makes a fruitless attempt to get the Consular Fasces for Fabius and himself to the exclusion of all Plebeian Candidates. Fabius, being

being President in the Comitia, opposes his own re-election. Great advantages are gained over the Samnites. §. II. Appius, though much embarrassed with a war against the Hetrurians, pretends to be displeased with the arrival of his Colleague Volumnius to his assistance from Samnium. The united armies of the two Consuls came to a battle with the enemy, and totally defeat them. §. III. Volumnius returns into his own province, and gains a new victory over the Samnites.

§. I. FABIVS returned to Rome to hold the Comitia. The Centuries, first Year of called, had all voted for him to be one of the Consuls, when he him- R O M E self opposed the proceeding. At first he offered the same objection which cccclvi.
he had employed the year before. But when Appius Claudius (who had Bef. J. C. probably secured his own election) and the whole body of the Nobility, Two surrounded his chair, and pressed him in the most earnest manner to take hundred this opportunity of excluding the Plebeians from the Consulship, and thereby ninety-restoring both to that Magistracy and to the Patricians their pristine dignity, six.
he answered, That he should not have refused to receive the names of two Pa- 155th tricians, if he had observed an intention to join any other but himself with Ap- Consul-pius Claudius; but would never give so bad an example, as that of standing ship.
candidate, contrary to Law, in an assembly where he himself presided. Here- Livy, B. upon Volumnius Flamma, a Plebeian, was chosen Colleague to Appius. The 10. c. 15.
Patricians, much dissatisfied with Fabius, imputed his refusal of the Con- Year of sulship to his dislike of Appius for a Colleague, a man who far surpassed him R O M E in eloquence, and the arts of civil government. cccclvii.
Bef. J. C.

Both the Consuls of the last year received orders to continue the war in hundred Samnium, in quality of Proconsuls, for six months; so that the Republick five.
had very soon four armies on foot under four Generals.

Fabius, after his return into Samnium, was obliged to lead his army a- 156th gainst the Lucanians, who had lately rose up in arms; and he spent his Pro- Consul-consulate in keeping them in awe, and hindering them from joining the ship.
Samnites. In the mean time Decius pushed the Samnites to the last extremi- Livy, B.
ty, drove their army even out of Samnium, and then laid siege to their 10. c. 16.
Towns. When he had taken and sacked Murgantia, he persuaded the sol- c. 17.
diers to sell their booty for money, that they might not be incumbered with it in their future expeditions. After this, Romulea and Ferentinum were both taken by assault; and, to complete the destruction of Samnium, a new army of two Legions and fifteen hundred auxiliaries advanced thither under the command of the Consul Volumnius.

§. II. THE war with the Hetrurians had fallen by lot to Appius. The c. 18. storm was now gathered on that side. For the Samnites, who had been driven out of their own country by Decius, had taken refuge in Hetruria, and there, in a Diet held at their request, had pressed the Chiefs of the Lucumonies to exert their utmost strength against the Romans, offering to serve under them at their own expence, and to follow them even to the foot of the Capitol. The Hetrurians, pleased with this proposal, had raised a formidable army, which was strengthened with some Troops of the Gauls, whom

Year of whom they had engaged by the force of money to join them. Upon the ROM E news of so powerful a confederacy formed against the Republick, the cccclvii. Romans dispatched away Appius at the head of two Legions and twelve
B. 6. J. C. thousand auxiliaries; but it was rather to keep the enemy within bounds, Two hundred than in expectation of any notable advantage from the conduct of their the y- Consul. And indeed he was worsted, for want of military skill, in every five. skirmish and slight action in which he ventured to engage; insomuch that 1565 the soldiers had no longer any confidence in their General, and the General Cocili- became distrustful of his soldiers. In this extremity he is said (for the thing 1567 is not certain) to have written to his Collegue to leave Samnium, and 1568 hasten to his assistance. Volumnius came with all expedition, and the 1569 troops of Appius were overjoyed at his arrival. But Appius himself seemed surprised at it, disowned the letter, and reproached his Collegue with acting dishonourably, in quitting the province assigned him, in order to gain the credit of giving assistance to others who did not want it. Volumnius upon this would have immediately returned to Samnium, if the officers of both armies had not intreated him to have no regard to the unaccountable behaviour of Appius, but to consider the interest of the Republick, which required his presence in Hetruria: We are just ready to give battle, and, should matters go ill with us for want of your assistance, will it be inquired, whether Appius treated you with arrogance, or not? No, the Roman People will consider only the ill success of the battle, and impute it to your too hasty resentments. The Officers, while they remonstrated these things, insensibly led both the Consuls to that part of the camp where the soldiers were wont to meet when the General was to harangue them; and where they were actually assembled. There the two Collegues in longer discourses, than before in their more private conversation, made their complaints of each other; and, as Volumnius had the better cause, he surpassed himself on this occasion in speaking, for he was naturally no Orator: Upon which Appius could not forbear rallying: ROMANS, you are much obliged to me, I have made a dumb Consul speak. I remember, that, the first time Volum- nius and I were joined together in the Consulate, he scarce opened his mouth for some months; he had then no tongue, and now, you see, he is grown even eloquent, a perfect Orator. Volumnius answered, I should have been better pleased if, instead of your teaching me how to talk, I had taught you how to fight. The service of the Republick requires at present an able General, more than a fine Speaker; and, if you have a mind to know which of us understands better the conduct of an army, that may soon be decided. There are two provinces, Samnium and Hetruria; make your choice, I am ready to undertake the war in either of them. At these words the soldiers cried out, that they should both in conjunction carry on the war in Hetruria. Volumnius answered, Since I have already made one mistake, and have misrepresented the intention of my Collegue, I should be sorry to fall into another, by misunderstanding your inclinations. So put the matter therefore out of all doubt: If you would have me stay here, signify it by an acclamation. Instantly the army gave a general shout, which was heard in the camp of the enemy, who immediately

immediately took the alarm, and drew up in order of battle. Volumnius without delay marched out to meet them; Appius is said to have hesitated a while, undetermined whether he should fight or not, till he found that his Troops were disposed to follow his Collegue in defiance of the orders of their own General. But then an emulation for glory, and the shame of being obscured by a rival, roused him to such a degree, that he exerted himself beyond what could have been expected. He performed the part of an able and brave Commander, having first made a vow to Bellona to build her a Temple, in case he proved victorious. The united Samnites and Hetrurians were intirely defeated, and their camp taken and plundered.

Year of
R O M E
ccclvii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
five.
156th
Consul-
ship.

§. III. THIS victory put an end to the misunderstanding between the two Consuls, and they agreed to act jointly against Hetruria. But Volumnius, by an unexpected event, was called back into his own province. The Samnites, though so much exhausted, had raised new levies, spread themselves over Campania, and ravaged it; which obliged Volumnius (the Proconsulate of Fabius and Decius being expired) to hasten to the assistance of the Campanians. When he came to the foot of Mount Massicus, in the district of Cales, he learnt that the intention of the enemy (who were incamped near the Vulturnus) was to break up their camp about midnight, march home, disburthen themselves of their booty, and then return to make fresh devastations. Volumnius made so much expedition, that he came upon them, when they were unprepared for battle, slew six thousand of them, and recovered all the spoil they had taken. This success quieted the minds of the People at Rome, who had been much alarmed at the last enterprize of the Samnites; and they now took into consideration the proper means to secure Campania from the like incursions for the future. It was judged proper to settle two Colonies, one at the mouth of the Liris, called the Colony of Minturnæ, the other at Sinuessa. However, the Senate deferred the execution of that design, on account of matters of greater importance, which at this time indispensably required their immediate attention.

Livy, B.
10. c. 20.
c. 21.

C H A P. XXII.

§. I. Q. Fabius is elected the 5th time to the Consulate, and at his request the Comitia grant him Decius again for a Collegue. §. II. A rivalryship between the Patrician and Plebeian Ladies for the reputation of strict Chastity. §. III. The Senate decree the conduct of the war against the Hetrurians to Fabius, the Patrician Consul. His Plebeian Collegue Decius appeals from the Senate's decree to the People. §. IV. In an engagement which the Romans have with a confederate army of Gauls and Samnites, Decius (who commands the Roman left wing) to recover the courage of his troops, terrified and broken by the armed chariots of the Gauls, devotes himself to death in the same manner his father had done on a like occasion: After ter which Fabius obtains a complete victory. §. V. The Samnites are again routed by the forces of Appius, now Prætor of Rome, and the Proconsul Volumnius. Rome is afflicted by a Plague, and terrified by Prodiges.

Year of
R O M E
cccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Two Hundred
ninety-
five.

176th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
10. c. 21.
c. 22.

§. I. CERTAIN advice came to Rome, that the Hetrurians had concluded a fresh treaty with the Samnites, Umbrians and Gauls; and that the armies of the four nations were already assembled in two camps in Hetruria, where was only Appius with his troops to make head against them. The Comitia for the new elections being soon after held, Volumnius (who had been recalled from Samnium to preside in them) before he took the suffrages of the Centuries, put the assembly in mind, that they were that day to elect two Consuls who would have four nations to contend with; he added, that he doubted not but, in so perilous a season, they would chuse the ablest General in the Commonwealth to the Consulate; otherwise he would have named a Dictator. At these words all eyes were immediately turned again upon Fabius. But when the Centuries, first called, had voted for him and for Volumnius, he started difficulties, as formerly, and excused himself on account of his age. However, he at length signified his consent, provided he might again have Decius for his Colleague: He will be a support to my old age. One Censorship and two Consulates, in which Decius and I have been already Collegues, have made me know what a happiness it is to the Commonwealth to have her Magistrates live in concord. It is hard for an old man to suit himself to a new Partner in Power. It will be much easier to communicate my thoughts freely to a friend with whom I am thoroughly acquainted. Volumnius approved of Fabius's request, and made a fine encomium upon Decius, insisting much on the great advantages which would flow from the harmony between two Generals in such strict friendship. The day being spent in these harangues, the elections were put off to the next, and then Fabius * and Decius † (though the latter was absent from the assembly) were declared Consuls; Appius chose Prætor, and Volumnius continued in the command of the army in Samnium, with the title of Proconsul.

* A fifth
time.
† A fourth
time.

Livy, B.
10. c. 23.

3 Padici-tia.

§. II. IN this crisis of an approaching terrible war, the People being very superstitious multiplied their publick acts of Devotion; and these gave rise to a quarrel among the Roman Ladies. In the Ox-market was a Temple built to the honour of Patrician Chastity; and none of the wives of Plebeians, how illustrious soever their husbands might be, were ever admitted into it. However, Aula Virginia, being herself nobly descended, and being the wife of the Plebeian Consul Volumnius, claimed a right of assisting at the ceremonies with the Patrician Ladies. And when the latter opposed her pretensions, What! said she, is my virtue ‡ suspected? Was I meanly born? Or have I married two husbands? (Second marriages were at this time so great a blemish on the Roman women, that it excluded them the Temple of Chastity.) But all that Virginia could say was to no purpose. She was absolutely refused admittance into the sanctuary. Upon this this she formed the resolution of having a Temple dedicated to Plebeian Chastity: She divided a part of her own house from the rest, caused an altar to be erected and consecrated in it, and, having there assembled the Plebeian women of the greatest distinction, complained to them of the pride of the Patrician Dames, told them her design, and pressed them to an emulation with those haughty Ladies in the point of Modesty and Virtue. This scheme was readily approved, Ceremonies were instituted and observed, much like those practised in the other Temple; and this fervour continued for some time: But at length, women of little merit and doubtful characters being admitted into the assembly, it sunk into disgrace, and no more mention was made of Plebeian chastity.

Year of
R O M E.
ccclvii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
five.
156th
Consul-
ship.

The same year, the Curule Aediles (Cn. and Q. Ogulnius) cited some usurers to trial; and the effects of these being, by sentence, confiscated to the Publick, those Magistrates purchased, with the produce, brazen gates for the Capitol; silver vessels sufficient to furnish three Tables in the chapel of Jupiter; a statue of this God in a chariot drawn by four horses, which was placed on the pinnacle of his temple; images of the two infants (founders of the city) suckled by a she-wolf. This monument they placed at the Ruminal Fig-tree, i. e. in the place, where had stood the wild fig-tree, under which Romulus and Remus were said (in the fable concerning them) to have been carried by the stream*.

§. III. WHEN the time came for Fabius and Decius to enter upon office, it was natural to suppose that the latter would be induced by gratitude, as well as by the age and superior merit of his Colleague, to compliment him with the command of the army in Hetruria, without drawing lots. But, as the Patricians made it a point of honour not to permit any other than Fabius to have the conduct of the Hetrurian war, the Plebeians, on the other hand, would not suffer Fabius to have it, unless it fell to him by lot, lest the Patrician Consuls should for the future claim a right of chusing their provinces; and the pacifick-minded Decius was compelled to go with the stream of his party. The question being carried against him in the Senate, he appealed to the People in Comitia. There the two competitors pleaded each his own cause in few words, and more in the language of Soldiers than of Orators. What! said Fabius, have I planted a tree, and shall another gather the fruits of it? It was I who first opened a way into Hetruria through the Ciminian Forest, till then deemed impracticable. To what purpose did the People force me, at my age, to put myself at the helm of affairs, if they intended to give the conduct of the war to another? After this he fell by degrees to complain of his own choice of a Colleague, who seemed rather to be an adversary than a friend, and to

Year of
R O M E.
ccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
four.
157th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
10. c. 24.

* The Aediles, from the same fund, paved with square stone the road from the gate Capena to the Temple of Mars, which was not far from it, at the entrance of the Appian way. About the same time, Aelius and Fulvius, the Plebeian Aediles, from the money raised by fines laid on the farmers of the publick pasture grounds, entertained the People with some shews, and presented some gold cups to Ceres.

Year of
R O M E
ccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
four.

repent of the concord in which they had lived together during their partnerships in office. And he concluded with assuring the assembly, that, notwithstanding any thing he had said, he pretended to no other right to command in the present war, that what their opinion of his abilities should give him; and that, as he had submitted his cause to the determination of the Senate, he was equally ready to abide by the decision of the People.

157th
Consul-
ship.

Decius began his harangue with complaining of the partiality of the Senate, who, he said, envied the Plebeians every degree of honour; he then pleaded the established custom of the Consuls drawing lots for their provinces, after which he thus proceeded: Did the question relate only to the honouring of Fabius, He has so well deserved of the Publick, and I in particular am so much obliged to him, that I should never be backward to contribute to his glory, if I could do it without shame and disgrace to myself. But who can be so blind as not to see, that, if, in the case of a dangerous war, the conduct of it be given to one of the Consuls without drawing lots, the other must be deemed insufficient, useless, and supernumerary? Fabius boasts of his exploits in Hetruria, and Decius is ambitious of being able to boast of the like exploits; and perhaps it may be his fortune to extinguish that fire which Fabius only covered, and which has often since broke out afresh. As for Honours and Rewards, I shall be ever ready to yield them to my Collegue, out of respect to his Age and Dignity; but, when the question is of Difficulties and Dangers, I can never willingly yield these either to him or to any other. When Decius had ended, Fabius made only this short reply: I desire, Romans, that, before you decide on the present dispute, you will hear Appius's letters read. This said he left the Assembly. Appius, in his letters, had painted the dangers with which the Republick was threatened in very lively colours; and there needed no more to induce the Comitia to have recourse to the surest remedy. The People instantly and unanimously determined that the conduct of the war in Hetruria should be committed to Fabius.

Livy, B. 10. c. 25. §. IV. AND now all the Roman youth were eager to serve under the command of so able a General. But he, either to dispel the publick fears by a shew of confidence, or to prevent any associates being joined with him, declared, that he would take no stronger a reinforcement to the army than four thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse. With these he marched towards the camp, which the fearful Appius was still strengthening with new fortifications. Not far from it he met a detachment, sent to cut wood in a neighbouring forest. Whither are you going, soldiers? said Fabius. They answered, To the forest, for wood to fortify the camp. What! cried the General, is it not already fortified? Doubtless it is, replied the Soldiers; and we are surrounded by a double ditch and a double rampart, yet we are still afraid. You have wood enough, said Fabius; return to the camp, and level the rampart. The detachment immediately returned, and put the Consul's orders in execution, which much alarmed both the Army and its General, till the workmen informed them, that what what they were doing was by the command of Fabius, who would soon be in the camp. Fabius arrived the same day; and the next Appius set out for Rome, to take possession of the Prætorship, to which he had been chosen, as an employment better suited to his talents and capacity, than the command of an army.

Fabius observed a quite different conduct from that of his predecessor, Instead of shutting up his soldiers within fortifications, he kept them in continual motion. He said, nothing was more healthful for soldiers than a frequent change of place, and to march from one country to another; and indeed he obliged them often to make as long marches as was possible at that time of the year, for the winter was not yet over; and by this means he gave his troops an air of confidence.

But, before the season permitted him to enter upon action, he went back to Rome, either of his own motion, or by invitation of the Senate. (Some authors say, that Appius at his return had made a dreadful representation of the forces of the enemy, and had urged the necessity of sending either Decius or Volumnius with a second army to his assistance; and they add, that Decius had upon this occasion declared it to be his opinion, that Fabius ought to be left at full liberty to determine concerning the wants of his army, and the interest of the Republick; and had moved, that he might be sent for to Rome, to give his judgment of the state of affairs.) When Fabius arrived, he gave such an account of things to the Senate and People, as neither to increase the apprehensions of the Republick, nor to let her sleep in security. As to another General's being joined with him, he said, he should acquiesce in it, on account of the fears of others, not his own, nor because he thought the Republick to be in any danger; but then he desired that Decius might be the person: How is it possible that I should forget the good intelligence in which we formerly lived? There is no man that I can prefer before him. With him I shall never want forces, nor have too many enemies to deal with. But if my Colleague has other views, and cares not to act in conjunction with me, I am willing that Volumnius be sent in his stead. The Senate, the People, and Decius himself left the matter wholly to the determination of Fabius. Decius declared, that he was ready to go either to Samnium or Hetruria, as his Colleague judged best; a declaration so pleasing to the assembly, and which spread such a joy among them, that they congratulated one another as if victory had been already gained, and they were decreeing their Generals a Triumph, not the conduct of a war.

Before the Consuls left Rome, they sent away the Proconsul Volumnius into Samnium, and, in order to cover the city on the side of Hetruria, directed two camps to be pitched, one on the hill Vaticanus, close by the Janiculum; the other in the country of the Falisci. After these regulations they set out for Hetruria, and upon the road received the news of the total defeat of a Legion which Fabius had left under the command of Scipio, near old Clusum. A numerous body of those Gauls called Senones had surrounded the Romans, and cut them all off. However, the Consuls were not

Year of
R O M E
ccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
four.

157th
Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
10. c. 26.

Year of discouraged by this accident. Their army consisted of four Legions, a R O M E good number of Roman Knights, a thousand Campanian Horse, and a body cccclviii. of auxiliaries, more numerous than the forces of the Romans. They divided Bef. J. C. it into two parts, and incamped separately, but not far from each other, in Two the plain of Sentinum, about four miles from the enemy. It is said, that the hundred army of the Gauls and Samnites, who incamped together, consisted of a ninety- hundred and forty-three thousand three hundred and thirty Foot, and forty-four. six thousand Horse. What the number was of the Hetrurians and Umbrians 157th (who jointly made another camp) is not told. It was agreed among these Consul- Confederates, that the Gauls and Samnites only should engage the Romans ship. in the field, whilst the Hetrurians and Umbrians attacked their two camps.
 Livy, B. Fabius had notice, by deserters, of this design; and in order to disconcert
 10. c. 27. it, and make a diversion, he sent directions to the Proprætors, Fulvius and and 28. Posthumius, who were incamped near Rome, to march their two armies into Hetruria, and ravage it. This stratagem had the desired effect. The Hetrurians and Umbrians hastened to the relief of the poor People, whose houses were plundered, and lands laid waste; and, during their absence, the Consuls brought the Gauls and Samnites to a battle. This is the first time that we read of armed Chariots used in the wars of Italy. The Gauls surprised the Romans, soon after the action began, with this new way of fighting. Not only the Roman Cavalry, but the Infantry too of the left wing, which Decius commanded, was disordered, and intirely broken by them; nor could he by his utmost efforts engage his terrified soldiers to rally. In this extremity he remembered the example of his father, and in the very same manner devoted himself to the Dii Manes to save his army. Assisted by M. Lælius the Pontifex, he performed the same ceremonies, pronounced the same form of words, and rushed unarmed among the enemy. The loss of the General usually occasions the defeat of his Troops; but such was the superstition of the Romans, that the death of their General, in this way of sacrifice, gave them new courage. The
 c. 29. Pontifex, who was himself a brave soldier, took advantage of their prejudices, put himself at their head, and easily brought them to renew the attack, in which they were seconded by some troops, sent by Fabius from the rear, under the command of his two Lieutenants. The fortune of the day quickly changed in favour of the Romans in the left wing.

In the mean time Fabius, who had hitherto done little more than act upon the defensive, artfully managing his troops till the first fury of the Samnites was abated, now ordered his Cavalry to wheel about, flank the wings of the enemy, and be ready to charge upon a signal given. He then began to press upon the enemy in front; and, as soon as he perceived that their strength was greatly exhausted, he made Horse and Foot, troops of Reserve, all charge at once; nor could the Samnites sustain the shock; they fled to their camp, leaving the Gauls by themselves to make good the fight.

To break the Gauls, who yet kept their ground, Fabius detached a body of five hundred Campanian Horse to fetch a compass, and fall upon their

their rear, commanding the Principes of the second Legion to follow this detachment of Horse, and, wherever they should see the enemy's ranks broken by them, to press on, and hinder the Gauls from rallying. This motion succeeded so well, that the Gauls were at length defeated.

In the mean time Fabius forced the camp of the Samnites, and made a terrible slaughter there. Twenty-five thousand of the enemy were killed in the action of this day, and eight thousand taken prisoners. Among the former was Gellius Egnatius, an eminent Samnite Commander, who by his negotiations had brought about the formidable alliance of the four nations. The Romans lost of the left wing seven thousand men, and one thousand two hundred in the right. The Consul's first care, after the victory, was to perform a promise he had made in the heat of the battle, to burn the spoils of the enemy in honour to Jupiter the Conqueror. He then caused search to be made for the body of Decius, which, being hidden under heaps of the slain, could not be discovered that day, but the day following was found; due Obsequies were performed for the dead Hero, and Fabius spoke his Funeral Oration.

As for the Proprætors, Fulvius and Posthumius, they gained great advantages in Hetruria; and the Proconsul Volumnius obtained a considerable victory over the Samnites at the foot of mount Tifernus. But, notwithstanding all these victories, neither Samnites nor Hetrurians were yet brought into subjection. The latter took courage, and assembled fresh forces as soon as Fabius left the country, so that he was obliged to lead his army thither again. A new victory obtained over them was the last of this Hero's exploits, in the station of Chief Commander.

Fabius had a son whose surname was Gurges, or The Gulph, an appellation given him on account of his excessive intemperance in his youth. This man afterwards corrected his way of living, and, though he never equalled his father in any kind of merit, became worthy of Publick Offices. He was now Curule Ædile, and, in order to wipe off the shame of his past excesses, turned a zealous reformer of manners. He brought before the Tribunal of the People accusations of Adultery against great numbers of women of distinction, who, being convicted, were condemned to pecuniary fines. The money arising from these fines he consecrated to the building of a Temple to Venus near the great Circus.

§. V. BEFORE the end of this year the Samnites brought two new armies into the field in different places, and even acted on the offensive. Upon which Appius the Prætor was dispatched from Rome to put himself at the head of those troops which Decius had commanded, and was ordered to go to the assistance of the Proconsul Volumnius. These two Generals, having united their forces, defeated the enemy (whom they had constrained to join theirs) in a pitched battle fought in the Campi Stellates in Campania. The Samnites lost sixteen thousand three hundred men.

Rome had never before made war in so many places at the same time with more success. But, in the midst of her rejoicings for such signal victories, she was visited with a dreadful Plague. It was a melancholy contrast,

Year of
R O M E
ccclviii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
four.
157th
Consul-
ship.

Livy, B.
10. c. 30.
c. 31.

Macroh.
Satur. B.
3. c. 13.

Orof. B.
contrast, 3. c. 22.

Year of contrast, as Orghus observes, to behold the Triumphal Procession of Fabius
 R O M E often interrupted by Funerals; and the applauses of the People by the laccccliii. mentations of those who bewailed the dead, or the dying.

Def. J. C. Prodigies were never in greater plenty than this year. In three days
 Two there flowed successively, from the altar of Jupiter Capitolinus, three dif-hundred ferent liquors; the first day blood, the second honey, and the third milk; ninety- and in divers places it rained earth. The Augurs and Sybilline Books four. were consulted upon these imaginary prognosticks, and the joy for past 158th victories was much damped by the present calamity, and by the appre-
 Consul- hension of impending evils.

ship.
 Z. naras,
 B. 6.
 Liv. B.
 10. c. 31.

C H A P. XXIII.

§. I. The war was carried on against the Samnites with various success. §. II. Three of the Lucumonies of Hetruria are reduced to sue for peace. §. III. The Samnite war is continued. The Samnites make 16000 of their soldiers bind themselves by oaths and imprecations to conquer or die. The Romans gain the victory by a new stratagem. §. IV. The war breaks out afresh in Hetruria. The Hetrurians are reduced to buy a truce for a year. In this year a Sun-dial is, for the first time, seen at Rome. §. V. A new regulation is made relating to the Guardianship of Orphans, and another relating to the Publick Games.

c. 31. §. I. THE Republick had now been forty-eight years in war with the Samnites, almost without interruption; and, though the latter had been so often vanquished, they did not relinquish the hope of being finally the Conquerors. Four times (says Livy) they had been defeated the very last year; they had lost their ablest General; they saw their Allies in the same adverse fortune as themselves; they could neither by their own strength, nor by foreign aid, maintain their ground; yet they did not desist from the war: They were never weary of fighting, even unfortunately, in the defence of liberty: They chose rather to be vanquished than not strive for victory.

Livy, B. So considerable were the preparations they made to take the field once 10. c. 32, more, that the Senate thought it necessary to employ against them both and 33. the new Consuls *L. Posthumius * Megellus* and M. Atilius Regulus: But,
 Year of Posthumius falling sick, Atilius was dispatched away without him, to at-R O M E tack the enemy before they could get out of Samnium. The two armies cccclix. met just upon the confines of Campania; and here the Consul was no sooner Def. J. C. incamped than the Samnites formed the bold design of forcing his lines.
 Two By the help of a very thick fog they approached the Roman camp, sur-hundred prised the advanced guards, made themselves masters of the Decuman gate, ninety- and penetrated as far as to the Quæstor's tent, where the military Chest three. was kept. The alarm reaching to the General's quarters, he awaked, put 158th himself at the head of some Manipuli, and, in short, repulsed the enemy, Consul- but
 ship.
 * A 2d
 time.

but durst not pursue them for fear of an ambush. Though this enterprize of the Samnites did not prove successful, yet the courage with which they had felt themselves animated to make the attempt gave them new confidence; and they kept the Romans so closely shut up, that they could not enter Samnium, to live there upon free quarter.

The disadvantageous situation of Atilius's army alarmed the Senate and People at Rome; so that Posthumius, tho' not perfectly recovered, thought himself obliged to set out for Samnium with the two Legions allotted him. Upon his arrival the Samnites, being in no condition to make head against two Consular armies, decamped in haste, and left their country open to be pillaged. Posthumius applied himself to the besieging of Towns, and took Milionia and Triventum; the latter without fighting.

Atilius met with more difficulties and danger in his expeditions. Having received intelligence that the Samnites were besieging Luceria, in Apulia, he hastened to its relief, but found the enemy in his way. The two armies came to an engagement, in which the Romans suffered most; and this misfortune so mightily dejected them, that they passed the night in great uneasiness, expecting every moment to see the enemy approach to force their lines. But it happened on the other hand, that the Samnites were no less terrified, and thought only of returning home. The difficulty was how to put their design in execution, because the place where they were posted was a kind of defile and much confined, and the Romans were between them and Samnium. They resolved at length to go directly towards the Roman camp, endeavour to march along by the side of it, and make the plain. The Consul, imagining that the enemy was come to attack him, gave orders to his Legions to prepare for battle, and to follow him out of the camp. But, though the officers were ready enough to obey him, the Soldiers were so fatigued and intimidated, that he could not, even by soft words, prevail with them to stir. In the mean time the Samnites drew near, and the Roman Soldiers pretended to discern, that they were loaded with stakes, as if they meant to form a Palisade round the camp. The Consul hereupon expostulated with his men on the disgrace of suffering themselves to be shut up in their camp to starve there; and shame at length made them march out, though very slowly and unwillingly. The motion of the Romans was a disappointment to the Samnites, for they had hoped to avoid a battle; however, when they found in necessary to fight, they prepared for it; and thus two coward armies were brought to an engagement intirely against their inclinations. The Romans, gave ground, and would have fled into their intrenchments; but Atilius ordering some troops of Horse to the rear of his Infantry, with directions to kill every Roman who should attempt to enter the camp, the run-aways were hereby brought to rally and renew the fight. The victory at length fell to the Romans, after they had lost 7300 men. Atilius soon after, in his march homeward, met with a body of Samnites, who having made an incursion into the country of the Volsce, and brought thence a considerable booty, and many Roman prisoners, were marching home in great disorder;

Year of
R O M E
cccclix.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
three.
158th
Consul-
ship.
c. 34, 35,
36.

Year of order; he cut them in pieces, recovered the booty, and released the R O M E captives. After this he returned to Rome, to preside at the new eleccccclix. tions.

Bef. J. C.

Two

hundred

ninety-

three.

158th

Consul-

ship.

Livy, B.

10. c. 3-

A Triumph he was * refused for two reasons, for having lost so many men in the battle, and for having released his prisoners on the sole condition of their passing under the yoke.

§. II. THE other Consul, Posthumius, because he could find no employment for his Troops in Samnium, marched them, without any order from the Senate, into Hetruria. Here he defeated the Volfiniensis, took Rufellæ by assault, and reduced Volfinii, Perusia, and Arretium (three principal cities) to sue for peace. The Senate granted them a truce of forty years, on condition of their paying each 500,000 pounds of brass into the treasury of the Republick. For these exploits the Consul, without scruple, petitioned the Senate for a Triumph; not that he expected the Fathers would grant it, but because it was customary, on such occasions, to make the first application to them. Some opposed his request on pretence that he had not taken the field early enough; others, because he had left his province without the Senate's direction. Posthumius perceiving that the members who made these objections were influenced partly by their enmity to him, partly by their friendship for the other Consul (whom, having met with the like refusal, they would console, by putting his Colleague on the same foot with him) frankly addressed the house in these terms: "Conscript Fathers, I shall not have my mind so wholly possessed with the remembrance and contemplation of your majesty, as to forget that I am a Consul. The wars, which I undertook, I have conducted with success; I have subdued Samnium and Hetruria; I have obtained for the Republick victory and peace; and now, in right of the same authority by which I made war, I will triumph." This said, he left the assembly. A contest hereupon arose among the Tribunes of the Commons: Some said, they would forbid his Triumph, as unprecedented, and of bad example; others declared they would support him in his pretension. The affair came at length before the People; and Posthumius was summoned to the Assembly. He put them in mind, "that the Consuls Valerius and Horatius *, and lately Marcus Rutilus, father of one of the present Censors, had triumphed, not by the Authority of the Senate, but by the will of the People:" He added, "That, if he had not known that some of the Tribunes, mere vassals to the nobles, would have employed their Veto against his bill, he should have made his first application to the Comitia; for that the good pleasure and favour of the People, unanimous, did, and ever would, with him, supply the place of all Decrees and Commands." The next day, contrary to the will of the whole Senate, and in spite of the † opposition of seven of the Tribunes, the Consul, aided by the other three, obtained the honours of the

* In 304.

† Adversus intercessionem.

* The Fal. Cap. give Atinius a Triumph over the Volscians and Samnites.

Triumph;

triumph; and the people solemnised the day with extraordinary rejoicings².

BY a Census taken this * year, the number of Roman Citizens, fit to bear arms, appeared to be 262,322. Livy transfers this Census to the next year, and calls the Lustrum that followed it the nineteenth, reckoning only from the institution (in the year 310) of the Censorship; and even then there is the difference of one between his reckoning, and that of the Fasti; according to which the Census of this year was the twentieth, and the Lustrum the thirtieth.

§. III. T O L. Papirius Cursor (son of the famous Hero of that name, five times Consul) and Sp. Carvilius were transferred the Consular Fasces. Atilius, the late Consul, obtained the Pratorship. His Collegue Posthumius, to avoid a trial before the People, to which a certain Tribune, named Scantius, had cited him [probably for having left his Province without orders] engaged Carvilius to appoint him one of his Lieutenants.

AT this time the Samnites, to make another vigorous effort, published a new Law, importing that whoever, of an age fit to bear arms, should not appear in the field on a summons from the General, or should leave the service without permission, his head should be devoted to Jupiter: (i. e. it should be lawful for any one to kill him wherever found) and they appointed Aquilonia [a town of Hirpinia situated between Beneventum and Luceria] to be the place of rendezvous.

A numerous army being by this means assembled, the General caused to be erected, in the center of the camp, a tent or booth two hundred feet square, covered on the top with linnen cloth, and so close on all sides, that nothing of what passed within could be seen by those without. Here sacrifices were offered according to an old Ceremonial, which Ovius Pacius, an old priest, pretended to have found in an old linnen book. This rite being performed, the General summoned all the principal men, men distinguished either by their birth or exploits, and introduced them one by one into the tent. Here, to their unspeakable terror, they beheld altars surrounded with slaughtered victims, and Centurions standing by with drawn swords, and each person introduced was led to the altars more like a victim, than an assistant at a sacrifice. Immediately was administered to him an oath of secrecy as to every thing he should hear or see in that place; after which he was constrained to pronounce a curse upon himself, his family, and his posterity, if he did not follow wherever the Generals should lead him to fight, if he ever fled himself, or if he did not kill those whom he should see flying. Some of the first, refusing to swear, were instantly killed; and their bodies, thrown among the carcases of the

² Livy, at the end of this account, acquaints us, that there is no certainty concerning the military actions of this year, or the commanders who performed them; and he mentions some particulars, as related by Claudius, others as related by Fabius, which are not in the foregoing narrative, but are in some things inconsistent with it.

Year of
R O M E
ccclix.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
three.
158th
Consul-
ship.
* Fast Ca-pit.
Year of
R O M E
ccclx.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
two.
159th
Consul-
ship.
Livy, B.
10. c. 47.

Year of ROME
ccclxv.
Bef. J. C.
Two hundred
ninety-
two,
159th
Consul-
Ship.

victims, were, to those who followed, an effectual lesson to comply. Of the principal men of the Samnites, when they had all gone through this Ceremony, the General selected ten, commanding that each of these should, for the service, chuse^a, out of his acquaintance, the man upon whose bravery he could most rely, and that this man should chuse another of whom he had the like opinion, and so on, each man chosen choosing another, till the number of 16,000 was completed. These were called the Linnen-Legion (Legio Linteata) from the covering of the Tent where the Nobility were sworn; and they had finer helmets and bucklers than the rest of the Troops, amounting to above 20000, who, nevertheless, made a fine appearance.

Livy, B.
10. c. 39.

While these things were doing, Carvilius, at the head of the army which Atilius had left near Interamna, made his way towards Samnium; and his first exploit was the taking of Amiternum, a city of Sabinia, belonging to the Samnites. Papirius in the mean time hastened the new levies at Rome, and, as soon as his Legions were complete, entered upon action. He took Furconia (Livy calls it Duronis) in the neighbourhood of Amiternum, and, then joining his Collegue, they went together to ravage that part of the Volscian territory, which was under the domination of the Samnites. After this, Carvilius prepared to lay siege to Cominium, in the extremity of the eastern part of Samnium; and Papirius marched to Aquilonia, where the main strength of the Samnites was assembled.

c. 40.

PAPIRIUS, after some slight skirmishes with the enemy, acquainted his Collegue, by a messenger, that he intended to give battle the next day, in case the Auspices were favourable; and desired him to press the siege of Cominium vigorously, that no detachments might be sent from thence to strengthen the Samnite army. Then calling his Troops together, he exhorted them not to fear the enemy for the extraordinary methods they had taken to make themselves valiant; told them, That Oaths, extorted by fear and violence, would never give true courage; put them in mind of his Father's victory over a Samnite army, which had made themselves fine, as they had done, with proud Crests to their Helmets, and magnificent Bucklers. Animated by these words, the soldiers, with one voice, called out to lead them to battle: Nay, so universal was the desire of coming to an engagement, that one of the Pullarii, or Keepers of the Chickens, made a false report of their behaviour, and declared, that they had leapt presently out of their cage, and fed so greedily as to let some of their meat drop out of their mouths upon the pavement: Good omens these, but the facts were not true. The General seemed overjoyed at the Augury, and ordered preparations to be made for fighting. When, the next day, he had assigned his several officers their posts, and had made all the proper dispositions to charge the enemy, his nephew Papirius, a youth born in an age (says Livy)

Tripadium Solif-tium.

^a This seems to be the meaning of Livy's eis dictum, ut vir virum legerent, donec words: Decem nominatis ab imperatore, sexdecim millium numerum confecissent.

when men were not yet acquainted with that philosophy which teaches a Year of contempt of the Gods, discovered to him the error he was in; and he did R O M E this at the instigation of some Roman Knights, who had overheard the cccclx. keepers of the Chickens disputing about the Augury of that day. The Bef. J. C. General answered, I commend your pious zeal and care: But, if the Augur Two hundred has given a false account, the vengeance will fall upon his head alone. The ninety-two Augury, as reported to me, was good and fortunate for the Roman People. He then commanded, that the Keepers of the Chickens should be placed 159th at the head of the first line; and, before the two armies came to a close Consul- engagement, he who had made the false report was killed by an un- ship. known hand [probably by order of the Consul.] The news being Val. Max. brought to Papirius, he pretended to consider it as a stroke from heaven: B. 7. c. 2. The Gods are with us, he cried, their vengeance has spent itself on the guilty head. In the beginning of the action the Samnites, especially those who Livy, B. had bound themselves by oath not to fly, made a vigorous resistance; till 10. c. 41 on a sudden they perceived at some distance a cloud of dust, such as is 42d wont to be raised by the march of a considerable army. This dust was caused by the servants and muleteers of the Roman camp, whom Papirius had ordered one of his officers to mount upon mules and beasts of burden, and lead them, together with some Manipuli of the allies, by round-about ways to the top of a neighbouring hill, from whence they were to fall upon the enemy in the heat of the battle. These troops had provided themselves with branches of trees, which they had trailed along Frontini the ground to raise the greater dust. Nothing could be seen but the tops Strat. B. of some standards and lances, and something like cavalry, which seemed 2. c. 4. to flank a body of infantry on each side. Both armies were deceived by this appearance; and, the better to carry on the deceit, Papirius himself pretended to be surprised, and cried out with an air of joy: COMINIUM must certainly be taken, and my Colleague is come to my assistance. Courage, soldiers, let us make haste to gain the victory, before another army can arrive to share the glory of the day. Then making the signal for his Cavalry to charge, they instantly gave the reins to their horses, drove full speed thro' the files of the Infantry (that widened and made room for that purpose) upon the enemy's Battalions, and quickly put them to the rout. Twelve Oros. B. thousand of the Samnites, according to Orosius, were slain; but, accord- 3. c. 22. ing to Livy, above thirty thousand; and Aquilonia, whither most of the fugitives fled for shelter, was soon after taken.

It is recorded (says Livy) that Papirius, whether from natural temper, or from a confidence of success, shewed, in the important battle of this day, a cheerfulness, such as had hardly ever been seen in any other General on a like occasion. From the same strength of mind it was, that a doubtful Augury could not divert him from fighting, and that, in the heat of action, when it was customary for commanders to vow temples to the Gods, he only vowed, that, in case of victory, he would make to Jupiter a Libation of wine mixed with honey, before he tasted wine him-

Year of self. The Gods were pleased with the vow, and turned the bad omens to good.

ROM E CCECLX.
Ref. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
two.

159th
Consul-
ship
Liv. B. 10
c. 43, &
seq.

§. IV. CARVILIUS was preparing to make a vigorous attack upon Cominium, according to the agreement between him and his Colleague, when he received a letter which Papirius had wrote to him before the battle, with notice that the Samnites had sent away a large detachment of their army to relieve the place. Upon this news he dispatched Brutus Scæva, with the first Legion and twenty Coberts of auxiliaries, to meet the Samnite reinforcement, with orders to amuse or fight them, wherever he should find them. In the mean time, with the rest of his army he gave an assault to the town, and took it. The besieged, to the number of 15400, surrendered at discretion, 4380 had been slain.

Such was the success at Cominium and Aquilonia. Both these towns were given up to the soldiers to be plundered, and then were burnt. The two detachments did not come to an engagement; for, that of the Samnites being recalled when within seven miles of Cominium, Brutus Scæva did not meet with it.

After these conquests, the two armies incamped together, but, in a council of war it being judged expedient to push the advantages gained over the Samnites, to the total reduction of them, by taking the rest of their cities, Carvilius went to lay siege to Volana (in Lucania near Cape Palinurus), dependent doubtless on the Samnites; and Papirius to attempt the conquest of Sepinum, a town situated at the foot of the Apennines, near the head of the Tamarus.

45.

The news of the great success of the Roman arms in Samnium was the more agreeable at Rome, as an account came at the same time, that the Hetrurians were beginning to take arms again; which account was soon after confirmed by deputies sent from some cities in alliance with the Republick. Nor was this all; the Falisci, who were the nearest neighbours to Rome on the side of Hetruria, revolted and joined the enemy. It was necessary therefore to recall one of the Consuls, with his army, from Samnium; they were ordered to cast lots for the conduct of the Hetrurian war, and it fell to Carvilius, who by this time had taken Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum from the Samnites.

46.

Papirius, after the departure of his Colleague, took Sepinum by assault, and gave the booty to the soldiers. He then returned to Rome, full of glory, in the month of February, and was honoured with a triumph. The rich spoils taken from the Samnites made his procession very magnificent. Papirius had brought away from the conquered countries 2,533,000^a pounds weight of brass, and 1330 pounds weight of silver. But, though these riches swelled the pomp of the victor's Triumph, he lost the good-will of his soldiers, by giving all into the publick treasury. And the People's discontent was yet greater, when a tax came to be laid upon them to pay his troops, which might have been satisfied by distributing among them a part of that wealth. Papirius on this occasion dedicated a Temple (to Quirinus) which his father, when Dictator, had vowed. He adorned it with the fine spoils taken from the Samnites. Upon this Temple was also fixed a Sun-dial, the first ever seen at Rome. Anaximenes the Milesian had many years before, as Pliny tells us, discovered the secret, but the invention had not reached to Rome. The Romans for a long while marked only the rising and setting of the sun; afterwards they observed the hour of noon, but in a very gross manner. When the sun shined between the Rostra and the house appointed for the reception of Ambassadors, one of the Consul's heralds used to proclaim with a loud voice, that it was mid-day. But now they could mark the several hours of the day; and the Water-clock, invented soon after, enabled them to reckon the hours of the night.

^a Between 6 and 7000l. Sterling.

As soon as Papirius had triumphed, he left Rome again, to lead his troops into the territory of Vesuvia, which the Samnites still infested, and there he passed the rest of the winter. In the mean time Carvilius, in Hetruria, took Troilium by assault, and reduced the Falisci to sue for peace. He granted them however no more than a year's truce, and for that he made them pay dear. After this he returned to Rome, and had a Triumph. He brought with him 390,000 Asses of brass for the publick treasury, without reckoning a considerable sum which he reserved to build a Temple to Fortune. And he gave besides to each private soldier of the Foot 102 pounds of brass, and twice that sum to each Centurion and Horseman; a small present, but well received, and which the remembrance of Papirius's parsimonious conduct made still more agreeable; and by this means he became popular enough to prevail with the People to drop the prosecution, which the Tribune Scantius had begun against Posthumius, one of the Consuls of the last year.

§. V. I T was probably at this time that Atilius, the other Consul of the last year, now Prætor, made a new law relating to Guardianships. The Twelve Tables had not provided for those orphans, whose fathers died intestate, and who had no near relation to take upon him the guardianship of them. The Atilian Law ordained, that the Prætor and the Tribunes of the People should by a plurality of voices assign such Orphans a Guardian. At the same time the Curule Ædiles published an ordinance, that those who had received crowns, as the rewards of their military exploits, might wear them at the publick Games; and that Palm-branches should be put in the hands of the victors in those Games.

^a 1259 l. 7 s. 6 d. Arbuthnot.

^b 6 s. 7 d. Arbuthnot.

C H A P. XXIV.

§. I. Q. Fabius Gurges (son of Fabius Maximus) is chosen to the Consulate, tho' his father had opposed his promotion. Through his ill conduct, he is shamefully vanquished in a battle with the Samnites. Old Fabius serves under his son the remainder of the Campaign, which proves successful.

§. II. The

§. II. The Romans, to put a stop to the Plague, send Ambassadors to bring from Epidaurum the God Æsculapius, worshipped there under the form of a serpent. §. III. The God arrives. The haughty behaviour of Volturnus one of the Consuls. He succeeds in the war, but is punished at his return to Rome. §. IV. The Consul CURIUS DENTATUS (a Hero famous for living in a voluntary poverty) reduces the Samnites to ask Peace. §. V. He reduces SAMNIA to a state of subjection to the Republick. He is accused of embezzling some of the spoil taken from the enemy. §. VI. Colonies are sent into the conquered Cities. To relieve the Prætor of Rome, three new Judges are created to try Malefactors. The cruelty of a Creditor to his Debtor occasions a new Secession of the People. The Patricians are obliged to make concessions. Fabius Maximus in his old age is named Dictator to finish the accommodation. He soon after dies.

Year of the ROMAN REPUBLIC. 493. B. C. Two Hundred ninety-one. §. I. P.APIRIUS held the Comitia for the election of Consuls. The choice fell upon two men of small abilities for war, 1. Fabius Gurgus (the son of Fabius Maximus) and Junius Brutus Scaeva. It is undoubted, that Fabius the father opposed the promotion of his son; but it is very uncertain for what reason; whether, as Valerius Maximus thinks, from a Republican principle, and because he thought it of pernicious example to have one family loaded with so many honours, he having himself been promoted to that dignity; or whether on account of some domestick quarrel, or whether because he judged his son unqualified for so high a station. Rome being at this time visited with a Plague, which made terrible havock, this, together with the incapacity of the new Consuls, encouraged the Falisci to break their truce, and the Samnites to take arms again, and spread themselves over Campania. It fell to Brutus's lot to march into Hetruria against the Falisci. The Republick, to supply his defects, appointed Carvilius to be his Lieutenant, and by his assistance the Consul made a successful expedition.

But, on the other hand, Fabius Gurgus, having all the fire of the Fabii, without their usual prudence, rashly, and without drawing up his troops in order of battle, engaged with the Samnites, and lost three thousand men, he himself escaping only by the favour of the night. The account of the ill conduct of Gurgus so exasperated the publick against him, that the Senate were going to remove him from the command of the army; but then the zeal of Fabius Maximus for the honour of his family was roused, and he undertook his son's cause. Without excusing the precipitate conduct of the Consul, he desired the assembly to pardon it, in consideration of the many victories which he himself had formerly obtained for the Republick. He represented to them, that his son's disgrace had not been owing to a want of bravery, but to youthful imprudence, which time and experience might correct. And, lastly, he offered to go and serve under his son, and promised soon to repair the loss which the State had suffered by his son's mismanagement. The People accepted this offer, and were appeased.

Fabius

Fabius Maximus accompanied his son into the field against the Samnites, in quality of his Lieutenant, and not only assisted him by his advice, but, when in a battle, which was soon after fought, the Consul, following the impulse of his courage, and eager to recover his honour, had indiscreetly penetrated too far among the enemies, and was surrounded by them, rescued him out of their hands by his personal bravery. So gallant an action, in a man of his years, animated the Roman Legions to exert themselves with more than ordinary vigour, and they soon put the Samnites to the rout. Twenty thousand of the enemy were slain, and four thousand taken prisoners; among the latter was their famous General Pontius Herennius, who had commanded them in this and the former battle.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxi.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred ninety-
one.
160th
Consul-
ship.
Oros. B. 3.
c. 22.

§. II. THE joy at Rome for so complete a victory would have been much greater if it had not been damped by the Plague, which still continued to make dreadful devastation. In this distress the Romans had recourse to the usual remedy, Superstition. The Sybilline Books were consulted, and it was there read, that, to put a stop to the pestilence, the God Æsculapius, adored under the form of a Serpent, must be brought to Rome from Epidaurus, a City of Peloponnesus. An Embassy was accordingly appointed for that purpose.

Livy, B.
10. c. 47.

§. III. THE time for the new Election drawing on, and the Consuls being both in the field, a Dictator was named to hold the Comitia; but, his nomination being found defective, the Government fell into an Interregnum; and then Posthumus (the very same man who had so lately escaped a condemnation) holding the assembly, contrived to get himself elected* one of the new Consuls. With Posthumus was joined Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

* A 3d
time.

Posthumus, now the third time Consul, and as proud in office as he had been ambitious in procuring to himself the Consular dignity, disdained to draw lots with his Plebeian Colleague for their provinces. He insisted upon having the Command of the army in Samnium; and Brutus, finding that his Colleague had a powerful party in the Senate, consented to command in Ætruria, without waiting for a decree.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred.
ninety.

About this time the God *Æsculapius*², that is to say, a tame Snake, which the Roman Ambassadors had bought of the Priests belonging to the Temple

161st
Consul-
ship.
Suidas in Postum.
D. Hal. in excerptis
à Valesio.

² Æsculapius * was a native of Messene, a city of Peloponnesus. As soon as he was born, his parents exposed him in the midst of a forest, where he was found by some hunters. These had compassion on him, and caused him to be suckled by a bitch. When he was old enough to be capable of instruction, he was committed to the care of the famous Chiron, who taught him Physick, or, if you will, Surgery; for the two arts were then confounded. The disciple soon excelled his master, and, being grown an able Physician, settled at Epidaurus, a city of Argia, and practised his art there. It must be granted, that Æsculapius made some discoveries in the cure of diseases and wounds. He is said to have invented the Probe; to have first made use of Bandages; and to have been the first who invented Purges, and the art of drawing Teeth.

And,

* The particulars concerning Æsculapius are taken from D. Hal. in excerpt. à Valesio. LaFart. ex Tarquitio, Cicero de nat. Deor. B. 3. Plut. in Quest. Rom. Pausanias, Arb. de V. r. lib. 5. c. 24. Ovid. Met. B. 15. Val. Max. B. 1. c. 8. Pliny, B. 29. c. 1.

Year of Temple at Epidaurus, arrived at Rome, to the great joy of the People; and the Plague is said to have soon after ceased.

R O M E

cxcvii.

Bef. J. C.

Two

hundred

ninety.

16th

Consul-

ship.

And, as he lived in an age wherein it was usual to deify those who distinguished themselves by any useful discoveries, the people were pleased to call him the son of Apollo, and to rank him among the Gods. After which he soon had a Temple erected to him in Epidaurus; which was built upon an eminence without the city, because the most airy and wholesome situations are most suitable to the Gods of Health. There the Priests, who presided over the worship of this new God, bred one of those snakes, which are easily tamed, and taught to follow any persons where they please, without any danger of being bit by them; and the silly vulgar honoured this Snake as the God himself. His usual hole was under the feet of the fine stone statue of Æsculapius; which the famous sculptor Phrygiades of Parus had made; and, whenever he came out of it, his appearance was understood to prognosticate the cure of the sick. The Envoys of Rome were brought into this Temple, to which the love of life drew all Greece, and which gratitude for cures imagined to be there obtained had exceedingly enriched. Ogulinus was at the head of the embassy: and it is probable the Epidaurians made the Romans pay very dear for the relief they sought; their reputation and interest being then very small in Greece. Be that as it will, the Epidaurians granted their request, and suffered them to carry away with them the important Snake. It is reported as a prodigy, that the Snake came out in sight of the Ambassadors, while they were attentively viewing the statue of Æsculapius: and that he left the Temple of Epidaurus of his own accord, and, winding his great body along, passed all thro' the city, and went directly to the port where the Roman ship was at anchor. To which it is added, that he entered the vessel of his own accord, went directly to Ogulinus's cabin, and, curling himself into several circles, continued quietly there. An account which is neither incredible nor miraculous, if we suppose (which might have been the case) that the master of the Snake, who had tamed him, went before him to the ship. Besides, this was not the first time that one of these Snakes had been taken out of the Temple of Epidaurus. The Sicyonians had already carried one from thence to their city, in a chariot; and an unknown woman, named Nicagore, had conducted him thither. Thus the impostures of the Greeks furnished the nations, who were willing to be cheated, with Æsculapius's; and thus the Romans, among others, were bubbled by them.

The other adventures of the pretended Æsculapius, in his passage from Epidaurus to Rome, have been celebrated both by the Historians and Poets. They relate, that the Ambassadors experienced the good effects of the God's presence in their voyage, it being exceeding prosperous and happy. Nevertheless, the sea became boisterous towards the coast of Italy, and the violence of the winds forced the seamen to put in at the port of Antium, where there was a Temple dedicated to Æsculapius. The Snake had hitherto confined himself to Ogulinus's cabin; but here he escaped, and gliding along came to the court of the sanctuary where he was worshipped. This place was planted with Myrtles and Palm-trees, and the pretended Æsculapius got upon the largest of those trees, and twisted his long body round it. For three days it was much feared that the divine animal would continue there; all endeavours to bring him back to the ship proved vain. It availed nothing to offer him his usual food; he continued three days twisted round the Palm-tree. But at length he returned to the gallery of his own accord. Antium was at no very great distance from the mouth of the Tiber; and up that river the snake was carried to Rome. The joy the Romans shewed at the arrival of this salutary God is not to be expressed. Altars were erected all along the shore; and incense and sacrifices offered, even to profuseness. While the citizens expected soon to receive the God within their walls, and were thinking to build him a temple there, he is said to have chosen his own abode. In the midst of the Tiber, over-against the walls of Rome, was an island, formed in the infancy of the Republick, by straw, trunks of trees, sand, and the rubbish of the city; and thither the Serpent retired, swimming gently through the water. From that time it was called the Island of Æsculapius; and a Temple was soon erected to him there, and enriched with numberless presents. The Temple was built in the shape of a ship; the higher part of it resembled the stern, and the lower part the prow. But whatever the History says nothing of any exploits of Brutus in Hetruria. But young Fabius, who had been continued in the command of the army in Samnium in quality of Proconsul, being assisted by his father (who governed and directed all his motions, without letting him perceive it) had already reduced the Canton of the Pentrini, and was besieging Cominium (an important Town, formerly taken and burnt by Carvilius, but since rebuilt by the Samnites) when Posthumius prepared to enter Samnium with a new Consular army. Before he left Rome, he employed a detachment of his troops in the servile work of grubbing up a forest in his own estate; and he proceeded in the same spirit of tyranny when he came into the field. He sent orders to the Proconsul to desist from the siege of Cominium, and to leave that enterprise to his conduct. Young Fabius had received his commission from the Senate; and the Fathers supported his pretensions, and commanded the Consul to bend his forces another way; but Posthumius had the messenger tell the Senate, That it was their duty to obey their Consul, and not his to submit to their commands. He then marched straight towards Cominium, resolving to give the Fabii battle, if they did not yield to his will. Fabius Maximus prevailed with his son, for the sake of the publick good, to give way to the imperious Consul. And then Posthumius, having a clear stage, and being a man of courage and expedition, soon made himself master of Cominium. Thence he turned his arms against Venusia, which he likewise took in a short time. In the letter which he wrote to the Senate to inform them of his success, he proposed that a Colony might be sent to the last-mentioned place, and his proposal was approved; but the Fathers, who preferred Obedience to Valour, took occasion from it to humble him. Instead of appointing him, agreeably to custom, to be one of the founders of the new Colony in the city he had conquered, they named three others, and allowed him no share in that honour; nay, to mortify him yet more, they decreed young Fabius a Triumph. Pontius Herennius, that famous Samnite General who surprised the Roman Legions in the Caudine Forks, and made them pass under the Yoke, now followed the Chariot of the Triumphant Conqueror. (He was afterwards, by an inhumanity unworthy of Romans, condemned to lose his head.) But the most surprising sight of all was old Fabius on horseback in his son's train. He had formerly in his own Triumphs carried his son in the Chariot with him; and he was now overjoyed to mingle in the croud, and make one of his attendants.

Historians

Historians say of it, it is very uncertain whether the plague was not stopped before the Serpent arrived; and if we believe Pliny, who gave no credit to vulgar traditions, the Romans themselves would not suffer this Æsculapius, who had been brought from beyond-sea, to be placed within their walls. He says they had an aversion to Physicians and their art, and despised even Æsculapius himself, the prince and head of Physicians. Nevertheless, the Temple of this God of Health was very much frequented by the Commonalty of Rome; the sick came and passed the night in it; and imagination, or the strength of nature, sometimes wrought cures there, which were ascribed to the power of the God. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred
ninety.
161st
Consul-
ship.
Dio Coc-ceianus in excerptis
à Valesio.
Livy,
Epit. 11.
D. Hal. in excerptis
à Valesio.
Plut. in Fab.
Cunct.
Val Max.
B. 5. c. 7.

Year of R O M E cccclxi. Bef. J. C. Two hundred ninety. As for Postumius, when he found himself treated with so much contempt, and his rival so much honoured, he not only declaimed with passion against both Senate and People, but did all that was in his power to revenge himself. He would not give the least part of the booty brought from the two conquered Cities into the publick Treasury, but distributed it all among his soldiers, and then disbanded them before his successor could arrive.

161st Consulship. D. Hal. in excerptis à Valefio. Year of R O M E cccclxiii. Bef. J. C. Two hundred eighty-nine. Some Historians say, that, notwithstanding these extravagant proceedings, and the opposition of the Senate, he obtained a Triumph by a decree of the People; but this is highly improbable, since it appears by what followed soon after, that the People were no less exasperated against him than the Fathers. For the succeeding Consuls, P. Cornelius Rufinus and Marius Curius Dentatus, were no sooner entered upon office, than he was brought to a trial before the Comitia by Tribes. His chief accusation turned upon his having employed his soldiers in a slavish work for his own private profit; a crime which touched the People much more than his disobedience to the Senate. They condemned him to pay a considerable fine; and his reputation continued for some time blasted.

§. IV. THE Samnites, having lost their brave General and able Governor Pontius, were no longer in a condition to oppose the progress of the Roman arms. Curius Dentatus laid waste their country, took their towns, and, in short, obliged them to sue for peace. The Republick consented to a treaty of alliance with them for the fourth time, and left the conditions of it to Curius.*

162d Consulship. Liv. Epit. 11. Eutrop. B. 2. This Consul was remarkable for living, without ostentation, in that voluntary Poverty, which some Philosophers have with great vanity cried up and recommended. The Samnite Deputies found him sitting on a sorry wooden seat near a fire, dressing his own dinner, which consisted only of some roots; and they offered him a present of a considerable sum of Money. Curius expressed his indignation by a disdainful smile. "Without doubt, said he, my indigence makes you hope that you may corrupt me: But you are mistaken. I had rather be the commander of rich men, than be rich myself. Take away that metal, which men make use of only to their destruction, and go tell your nation, that they will find it as difficult to bribe me, as to conquer me." A treaty being concluded upon such conditions as Curius thought fit to prescribe, he returned to Rome to triumph. And never did the People express more joy than upon this occasion, being at length freed from the care and burthen of a dangerous war, which had lasted forty-nine years. The conqueror, in the distribution of the conquered lands among those Romans who had none of Nico. Dam. in excerptis à Valefio. * It is uncertain what sort of Government was in use among the Samnites; but it is most probable that they were divided into Cantons, and annually assembled a Diet, where resolutions were taken for the publick good. In time of war they chose a Head, who was invested with Sovereign Authority.

It is said that the Samnites had one very singular custom in relation to Marriages. Every year, all the marriageable young men and women were assembled before certain judges who matched them according to their merit. C. & R.

their own, prevailed to have no more than seven acres allotted to each man, and accepted no more himself, though a much larger portion was offered him. He said, that, to preserve the Roman frugality, it were to be wished that no man had more land than was necessary for his subsistence.

§. V. THE conquest of Samnium was followed by the reduction of the Sabines to a state of subjection, who had been almost ever since the foundation of Rome upon the foot of allies, and had been governed by their own laws. They had feared that the ruin of the Samnites would affect their own liberty, and had therefore not only lent them assistance, but had ravaged a part of the Roman Territory. Curius intirely subdued them; but the Romans, in regard to old friendship, treated them gently and admitted them to Roman Citizenship, yet without the right of suffrage. For the conquest of Sabinia, Curius had a second Triumph decreed him the same year; an honour which had never been granted to any of his predecessors in the Consulate.

The eminent virtues of this Philosophical Hero did not secure him from envy: There were not wanting those to whom his reputation of disinterestedness gave offence, and they endeavoured to cast a stain upon it. They accused him of having applied a part of the booty taken from the enemy to his private use. The accusation being general, he was put to his oath; and then he confessed, that he had reserved a little wooden oil-vessel for making libations to the Gods, but protested that he had kept nothing more: He was believed; and the malice of his accusers served only to heighten the lustre of his virtue. Before the expiration of his Consulship, he led an army against the Lucanians, and obliged them to raise the siege of Thurium, the inhabitants of which had implored the protection of the Romans, and had gained Ælius (one of the Tribunes) to be their friend. This Town was situated near the Gulph of Tarentum, §. VI. THE same Comitia, which chose M. Valerius Corvinus and Q. Cædicius Noctua to be Consuls for the new year, appointed Curius Dentatus to carry on the war in Lucania in quality of Proconsul. His expedition proved successful; and he thereby established the Roman domination through almost the whole extent of the country that reaches from the Adriatick to the Tyrrhenian and Sicilian seas. The new Consuls employed their year altogether in works of peace, and in sending out Colonies; particularly to Adria, a maritime Town, which some say gave name to the Adriatick sea; Castrum in Picenum, and Sena, another City on the Adriatick at the mouth of the Seno in the country of the Senones.

At this time the Romans, finding that the Prætor alone was not sufficient to preserve good order in the City in a time of peace, when malefactors always multiply, the People appointed three new Judges to try delinquents, and pronounce sentence without appeal: But their power of punishing extended only to pecuniary fines; the People would not divest themselves of the sole power of life and death. These new Magistrates were chosen annually in the Comitia by Tribes. The number of Roman Citizens fit to

Year of bear arms, appeared, by a Census taken this year, to be two hundred and R O M E seventy-three thousand.

ccccxv. And now, when all was quiet abroad, new disturbances were raised at Bef. J. C. home, and the poor Debtors began again to murmur against the rich Two Usurers. This spark of dissension was blown up into a flame in the hundred Consulship of Q. Marcus * Tremulus and P. Cornelius † Arvina, on the eighty-eight following occasion: T. Veturius, one of those unfortunate Consuls, who 163d in the year of Rome 432 had been surprised in the Caudine Forks, died Consul- insolvent. His son, a youth of great beauty, and virtuously educated, ship. borrowed a considerable sum of C. Plotius, his father's chief creditor, to Liv. Epit. defray the expence of his father's funeral. Being afterwards pressed to 11. pay, and having neither money nor credit, he was forced to submit to Zonar. slavery, and to work for his creditor in order to discharge the debt. Plot-

Annal. tius conceived a detestable passion for the young man, and treated him
B. 8. unmercifully for his virtuous resistance. Veturius one day, when his body
Y. of R. was all bloody with stripes, made his escape out of the house, got upon
465. an eminence, shewed himself to the People, and published the infamy
Bef. J. C. of his tyrant. The People laid hold on the occasion to decry the Usurers,
287. and to demand the abolition of the law which subjected those to slavery
164th who could not pay. This law had been repealed before upon a like occa-
Consul- sion in the year 427, but the Patricians had got it renewed. As for Plotius, ship. he was cited by the Tribunes of the People before the Centuries, and condemn-
* A 2d ed time. ed to death.
† A 2d time.

D. Hal. in In the following Consulship of M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Nautius excerptis Rutilus, the People kept no longer any measures with the Patricians.
à Valerio. They insisted upon the abolition of the law before mentioned, and, find-Val. Max. ing the rich obstinate in opposing it, they made a Secession upon the
B. 6. c. 1. hill Janiculus, on the other side of the Tiber. The city being thus left
Y. of R. destitute of artificers and labourers, and no provisions being brought 466. thither from the provinces (for the country people had likewise their com-Bef. J. C. plaints) the Patricians and rich Citizens found themselves under a necessity
286. of making concessions, and they named Q. Hortensius Dictator to negotiate 165th with the Separatists. The terms of reconciliation were the repeal (doubt-Consul- less) of the law in question, and the strict observation of two laws, made in ship. the year 414. but to which the Nobility had paid no regard. 1. That the Liv. Epit. Plébiscita [the Decrees made by the Commons at the request of their Tribunes]
11. should be observed by the Patricians as well as Plebeians. 2. That laws should
S. Aug. de first pass the Senate, and be brought afterwards to the Comitia to be there Civitate approved or rejected, and not vice versa. The complaint of the coun-
Dei, B. 3. try people was, That they could not get their causes heard by the Judges
Cic. in on Market-days, when they came to Rome, but were obliged to leave their Orat. pro work, and return thither again. This was rectified. But when these Planc. several articles of reconciliation were drawn up, and the storm began Liv., B. to be appeased, Hortensius died of a sudden, before the expiration of his
8. c. 12. Dictatorship. It being necessary therefore to create another Dictator, to Varro complete what he had begun, the Consuls nominated the illustrious Fabius, apud No- who
nium.
Macrob. Sar. 1.
c. 16.
Fragmen-
tum Hist.
Capit.

who now, in an extreme old age, was President or Prince of the Senate. He happily finished the accommodation; and this was the last publick scene in which he appeared. He died soon after. The Republick had considered him in his life-time as a prodigy of Roman Valour, Prudence, and Virtue; and now upon his death the People contributed to the expence of his obsequies with so much emulation, that his son, with the victims offered at his funeral, gave a publick entertainment to the whole City.

Fabius, while Dictator, had (probably) presided in the Comitia, when M. Valerius Potitus and C. Ælius Potus were chosen Consuls. Their year proved barren of remarkable events; but the Republick was never more happy than under their administration. The People, having gained the highest pitch of their desires, thought only of enjoying the sweets of tranquillity. The balance of power leaned now rather to their side; and the Patricians had no advantage over them, but in the great riches they had acquired, while they kept the ascendant, and in that respect which naturally is paid to persons of high birth.

C H A P. XXV.

§. I. The Tarentines endeavour privately to stir up both old and new enemies against Rome. The Gauls, called Senones, give the Roman army a terrible overthrow. Curius Dentatus revenges this defeat. §. II. The next year the Romans vanquish in battle the Senones, the Boii, and the Hetrurians. The Samnites revolt. The year following, almost all Italy rises in arms against the Republick. Fabricius defeats the confederate forces of the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnite. §. III. The Tarentines fall in a hostile manner upon a Roman fleet, which chanceth to come into their port. The Romans send to demand satisfaction. The Tarentines insult the Ambassadors, and then turn their thoughts to an alliance with Pyrrhus King of Epirus. [A short account of this Prince, and the state of his affairs at this time.] §. IV. The Senate and people of Rome decree a war against the Tarentines. An army marches directly for Tarentum. The mad and ridiculous behaviour of the Citizens on its approach. They resolve to invite Pyrrhus to their assistance. §. V. Pyrrhus accepts the invitation, and sends before him to Tarentum the famous Cyneas, his prime minister.

§. I. R O M E was now not only in perfect tranquillity at home, but in a flourishing condition with respect to her affairs abroad. The Latines, Sabines, Hernici, Æqui, Marfi, and Campanians were all brought into subjection to her. The Volsi were no more a people. The terror of the Roman arms reached to Apulia, and kept it in awe. A part of Lucania on one hand, and on the other Umbria and Picenum, quite up to the frontiers of the Senones, were all either obedient to the Romans, or awed by Roman Colonies near them. On the other side of the Tiber one ccclxvi.

Year of
R O M E
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty-six.
165th
Consul-
ship.
Auth. de Viris Il-
lustr. c.
32.
Year of
R O M E
ccclxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty-
five.
166th
Consul-
ship.

Year of ROM F part of Hetruria was subdued, and that which was more distant observed the truce which had been granted it. Samnium, in all appearance, was quieted; and the Gauls, both Senones and Boii, lived in peace with the Republick, always ready however to fight for those who would employ them. Such was the State of Rome, when C. Claudius Canina and M. Æmilius Lepidus entered upon the Consulship. Nothing memorable happened during their administration; and the Festus were transmitted to C. Sertius Tucca and L. Cecilius Metellus. In their year the Tarentines (formerly a Colony of austere spartans, but now sunk into idleness and vice) growing jealous of the prosperity of the Romans, and fearing an interruption in their pleasures, as much as the loss of their liberty, employed all their Græcian subtlety to stir up both old and new enemies against the Republick; and this without appearing to be concerned.

At the same time the Senones prepared to besiege Aretium, a City of Hetruria, about forty leagues from Rome, not far from the river Arno, and which was in truce with the Republick. The Romans, at the request of the Aretini, raised an army to defend them; but, before any act of hostility, they sent a deputation to the Senones, to persuade them to desist from their design. These proud Gauls, instead of listening to the mediation of the Romans, killed the Ambassadors, and then immediately brought their troops before Aretium. The Consul Cæcilius hastened to the relief of the place, and came to an engagement with the enemy, in which he himself was killed, with seven Legionary Tribunes, many of the nobles, and thirteen thousand private men. Upon the news of this terrible defeat, Curius Dentatus (probably Prætor at this time) was dispatched from Rome, at the head of some new levies to supply the Consul's place. But this able and experienced Commander, instead of attacking the army of the Gauls, flushed with success, or of attempting to succour Aretium, marched along the confines of Hetruria, and entered the enemies country, where he took ample vengeance for the murder of the Roman Ambassadors. With fire and sword he laid waste and destroyed all before him, so that in a little time he reduced it to a vast desert, in which there scarce remain any appearances of its having been cultivated or inhabited; all the men that were found were put to the sword, and the women and children carried into slavery.

§. II. IN the mean time, and in the beginning of the administration of P. Cornelius Dolabella and Cn. Domitius, the Republick began to feel the effects of the secret negotiations of the Tarentines. The Boii, Hetrurians, and Samnites, all declared against her at once, and she had already the army of the Senones before Aretium to deal with. These Gauls, to revenge the devastation made in their country, left the siege of that Town, and were advancing straight to Rome, when Domitius met them in Hetruria, and gave them a total overthrow with great slaughter. After this, Cornelius came to a pitched battle with the united Hetrurians and Boii; the troops of the former were almost all slain, and those of the latter, who escaped, being vanquished a second time, sued for peace. As for the Senones, Senones, they were so utterly destroyed, that there scarce remained any footsteps of them in Italy.

In the following Consulship of C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, almost all Italy, through the secret intrigues of the Tarentines, rose up in arms against the Robbers, as the Romans were then called. On one side the remains of the Hetrurians and Boii, on the other the Lucanians and Bruttians, in conjunction with the Samnites, all conspired together for the destruction of the imperious Republick. It fell to Æmilius to carry on the war in Hetruria, and to Fabricius to command in Lucania. The latter marched to the relief of Thurium, a city on the Gulph of Tarentum, and besieged by the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnites. He defeated this confederate army, but found it a difficult enterprise to force their camp. The means by which he succeeded in it, and which had something of the air of a miracle, was probably a stratagem of his own contriving. Whilst he seemed to be in suspense what measures to take, a young man full of strength and vigour, wearing feathers in his helmet; appeared on a sudden in the midst of the Legions, exhorted them to decline no danger for the honour of their country, and then, seizing a ladder, advanced to the rampart through a shower of darts, planted his ladder against it, and mounted the wall. This bold action intimidated the confederates, and inspired the Romans with such intrepidity, that they soon made themselves masters of the camp. Twenty-five thousand of the enemy, with their General Statilius, were slain. After the victory the Consul ordered the young man who had first mounted the rampart to be sought for, in order to reward him; and, because he was not to be found, the Romans presently imagined, that it was the God Mars himself, and returned him solemn thanks for his assistance, by publick Supplications.

§. III. AS for the Tarentines, the real authors of this war, they had not yet openly declared against Rome. An accident at length made them throw off the mask. Valerius one of the Maritime Duumvirs, or Admirals of the Roman fleet, happened to come with ten ships to the mouth of their port, while they were celebrating their Games in the Theatre, which looked towards the harbour. The sudden appearance of the Roman ships interrupted their diversions; the Tarentines imagining that the Romans were come with hostile intentions, they all with one consent ran down to the port, fell upon the fleet with the fury of mad men, sunk one ship, and took four, the other five escaping. All the prisoners fit to bear arms were put to the sword, and the rest sold to the best bidder. Upon the news of this unexpected insult, the Republick sent a deputation to Tarentum to demand satisfaction. Posthumius Megellus, who had been thrice Consul, was at the head of the Embassy. He was admitted to an audience in the Theatre, where he harangued the assembly in Greek. The Tarentines, heated with wine, instead of listening to his discourse with that seriousness which the importance of the matter required, burst into loud laughter, or hissed him, whenever he hesitated, was incorrect in

Year of
R O M E

CCCCXXXI.
Bef. J. C.

Two
hundred eighty-
one.

170th
Consul-
ship.

Pliny, B.
34. c. 6.

Ammian.
Mar. B.

24. c. 15.
Val. Max.

B. 1. c. 8.

Flor. B 1.

c. 18.

Oros. B 4.
c. 1.

D. Hal. in
Legat.

Year of in his expression, or even pronounced a word with a foreign accent ; but, ROM E when he began to speak of Reparation of Wrongs, they flew into rage, called him Barbarian, and, in a manner, drove him out of the assembly. Nor was this all : As he was walking off with an air of gravity and dignity, a buffoon named Philonides, coming up to him, urined upon his robe ; a new source of immoderate laughter to the mad and drunken multitude ; some of them even clapped their hands for extreme joy at the outrageous insolence. Pestibumius, turning about to the assembly, only shewed them the skirt of his garment so defiled ; but when he found that this had no effect, but to increase the loudness of their contumelious mirth, Laugh on, TARENTINES, laugh on, now while you may. The time is coming, when you will weep ; yes, TARENTINES, you will long weep. It is not a little blood that must wash and purify this garment. Having thus spoken, he straight withdrew, left the city, and embarked for Rome.

1731
Consul-
ship.

When the Tarentines came to themselves, and began to reflect on the enormity of their conduct never to be forgiven, and at the same time on the inability of their neighbours in Italy to defend them, they concluded it absolutely necessary to look for succours from beyond-sea ; and they cast their eyes on Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, who, for personal bravery and martial skill, was renowned above all the Grecian Commanders of that time.

Plot. Life
of Pyrrhos, p.
383. &
seq.

This Prince was descended from Achilles, by his son Neoptolemus (or Pyrrhus) who conquered Epirus, reigned there himself, and left the throne to his posterity. Being yet an infant at the breast, when his father Æacides was dethroned by his subjects, he was conveyed through variety of dangers into Illyricum, where Glaucias, the King of that country, took care of him, and educated him with his own children. When Pyrrhus had attained to 12 years of age, Glaucias, at the head of a great army, entered Epirus, and placed him on the throne of his ancestors ; but, when he was 17 years old, the Epirots rebelling again, drove him from his kingdom, and forced him to seek refuge in the dominions of Demetrius, the husband of his sister Deidamia. Demetrius was then master of Greece and a great part of Asia. Pyrrhus served under him in his wars against Ptolomy King of Ægypt, and gained great applause by his courage and conduct at the famous battle of Ipsus, in Pbrygia, where so many Kings were present ; and, when a peace was made between Demetrius and Ptolomy, Pyrrhus was sent to Ægypt, as one of the hostages to secure the performance of the Treaty. Here he behaved himself with so much prudence and address, as to gain universal esteem and admiration ; and he made his court so successfully to Berenice, the favourite Queen, that she gave him in marriage Antigone, her daughter by a former husband. Having by this alliance engaged Ptolomy to assist him with money and troops, he recovered his own Kingdom ; after which he made himself master of Macedon ; but, being dispossessed of it again by Lyfimachus, retired into Epirus, and was at this time in peace with all the neighbouring States. However, as he naturally loved action, and the bustle and hurry hurry of war, the ambassadors whom the Tarentines sent to him (perhaps only to try his pulse and observe the state of his affairs) found him in a disposition to hearken to any proposals, which would furnish him with employment worthy of his ambition.

§. IV. THE Tarentines, to amuse the Romans till it could be known what might be expected from Pyrrhus, besieged Thurium defended by a Roman Garrison, and took it. This news came to Rome soon after the return of Posthumius and the other ambassadors who had been so ill treated at Tarentum. The Republick had just raised L. Æmilius Barbula and Q. Marcus Plautius to the Consulate. These Magistrates having assembled the Comitia Fathers represented to them on one hand the shameful indignity offered to their ambassadors, which required vengeance; and, on the other, the danger of engaging in a new war, when the Republick had already so many enemies to contend with: For the Ætrurians and Samnites were still in arms, and the Lucanians and Bruttians grown more confident, since the taking of Thurium. To the necessity of chastising the Tarentines, the Hostilities they had committed against the Republick, and the insult they had offered to Posthumius, whose robe was produced in the assembly, left no room for deliberation upon that point; the only question was concerning the proper time; and this the Fathers debated from Sun-rising to Sun-set for several days together, being divided in opinion. Some were for deferring the war with the Tarentines, till the intermediate Provinces should be subdued; others for beginning it immediately. The question being put to the vote, the latter opinion prevailed by a majority of voices; and the Senate's Decree was confirmed by the people. Hereupon, Æmilius, who had intended to make the campaign in Samnium, received orders to lay aside that Expedition, and march directly to Tarentum.

The approach of the Romans made the Tarentines carry on their deliberations with a little more seriousness than formerly; and when the Consul sent once again to demand satisfaction, before he began Hostilities, the oldest and richest declared for peace: but the populace who had little to lose insisted upon a war; and what put an end to the debate was a speech of one of the common citizens, who renewed the proposal of bringing Pyrrhus into Italy, a motion highly applauded by the multitude. The wiser part of the citizens, finding themselves overborne by numbers, came no more to the assemblies. Only, the day that a public Decree was to pass for inviting Pyrrhus to Tarentum, and when the people were all placed in the Theatre, one Meton, a sober worthy citizen, with a withered garland on his head, and a flambeau in his hand, (as was the manner of drunken debauchees) and accompanied by a woman playing on a flute, came dancing into the midst of the assembly. This silly sight was sufficient to divert the Tarentines from their most important deliberations. They made a Ring, and called out to Meton to sing, and to the woman to play; but when, expecting to be entertained with a song, they were all silent, Meton assuming an air of great seriousness,

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxi.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty-
one.
170th
Consul-
ship.
Y. of R.
ccclxxi.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty.
171st
Consul-
ship.
D. Hal. in Legation.

Zen.B.3.

Diod. in Eclog.
Plut. Life
of Pyrr-
hus, p.
390.

Year of nefs, " You do well, Tarentines, not to hinder those from diverting R O M E " themselves who are disposed to mirth; and, if you are wise, you will cccclxx.i. " yourselves make advantage of the present liberty you enjoy to do Ref. J. C. " the same. When Pyrrhus comes, you must change your way of life;
 Two " your mirth and joy will be at an end." These words made an im-hundred " pression upon the multitude, and a murmur went about, that he had eighty- spoken well: but those who had some reason to fear that they should be 171st delivered up to the Romans in case of an accommodation, being in-Consul- raged at what he had said, reviled the assembly for suffering themselves ship. to be so mocked and affronted, and, crowding together, they thrust Meton out of the Theatre. After this the decree was passed, and ambassadors were sent into Epirus, not only from the Tarentines, but from all the Italic Greeks, with magnificent presents for the King, and with instructions to say, that they only wanted a general of fame and experience; that, as for troops, they could themselves furnish a numerous army, 20000 horse, and 350000 foot, Lucanians, Messapians, Samnites, and Tarentines.

As soon as the news came to the Roman camp, that a deputation to Orat. B. 4. Pyrrhus was decreed, Æmilius straight began Hostilities, burnt and
 c. 1. destroyed all before him, and forced the Tarentines in the field to take Zon. B. 8. refuge within their walls. However, not to drive them to despair, and to induce them to lay aside the design of receiving Pyrrhus, he used some moderation, and sent back the prisoners he had taken. These highly extolled the generosity of the Consul; insomuch, that many of the inhabitants were brought over to the Roman party; and they all in general began to repent of their rejecting a peace, and sending for Pyrrhus. This was evident by their chusing Agis, a friend of the Romans, to be their General, and the Governor of the City.

§. V. IN the mean while the Tarentine ambassadors, pursuant to the Plut. Life powers they had received, made an absolute treaty with the King of Epirus.
 of Pyrr- He was very ready to accept the invitation into Italy, his head being turned hus, p. with the exploits of Alexander the Great in the East, which he thought to 391. imitate by mighty conquests in the West.

There was then at the court of Epirus a Thessalian, named Cyneas, a man of sound understanding, and who had been a Disciple of Demosthenes.
 He was thought to approach nearer than any other orator of this time to the vehement and forcible eloquence of that great master. Pyrrhus usually employed him, as his ambassador to those cities with whom he had any affair to transact, and the able minister succeeded so well in these negotiations, that the King was wont to say, He had made more conquests by the tongue of Cyneas than by his own sword. And for this reason he not only held him in the highest esteem, but loaded him with honours, making him his chief minister and favourite.

Cyneas, perceiving that Pyrrhus was eagerly bent to pass into Italy, and finding him one day at leisure, and in a humour for free conversation, thus began: The ROMANS, SIR, are reported to be great warriors,
and

and to rule over many brave and warlike nations. Should God grant us, nevertheless, to vanquish them, what use shall we make of our victory?—The thing speaks of itself, answered Pyrrhus; the Romans once conquered, there is no city, Barbarian or Greek in Italy, that will dare to resist us. We shall be immediately masters of that whole country; whose extent, wealth, and power, no-body is better apprized of than yourself.—Cynceas, (after a short silence) And when we have conquered Italy, What are we to do next?—Pyrrhus (not yet perceiving his drift) Next? Why, there is Sicily just by. She opens her arms to receive us, a rich and populous Island, and easily subdued; for, since the death of Agathocles, the cities are all in confusion and anarchy.—What you say, replied Cynceas, seems very probable indeed. But is the conquest of Sicily to put an end to our expeditions?—No certainly, cried the King; these successes will be only preludes to greater enterprises. Who, in such a case, could forbear passing into Africk, and to Carthage? It is but a step thither. And, when we have subdued these, what think you? Will any of those enemies, who now give us uneasiness, have once the boldness to withstand our arms? We shall then easily recover Macedon, and not only so, but in a little time be masters of all Greece.—Very true, said Cynceas, nothing can be clearer: But when we have completed all these Conquests, What shall we do then?—Pyrrhus smiling, Do then? Why, then we will live at our ease, my Good Friend, and drink, and feast, and spend our days in agreeable conversation.—Ah, Sir, replied the Philosopher, What binds you from immediately possessing that happiness which you propose to purchase at the expence of so much danger? *

These

* Monsieur Paschal, in his discourses of the Misery of Man, has a much admired reflection on this advice of CYNCEAS to PYRRHUS.

THERE is nothing more capable of letting us into the knowledge of human misery than an inquiry after the real cause of that perpetual hurry and confusion, in which we pass our lives.

The soul is sent into the body, to be the sojourner of a few days. She knows that this is but a stop, till she may embark for eternity; and that a small space is allowed her to prepare for the voyage. The main part of this space is ravished from her by the necessities of nature; and but a slender pittance left to her own disposal: And yet this moment which remains does so strangely oppress and perplex her, that she only studies how to lose it: She feels an intolerable burthen, in being obliged to live with herself, and think of herself; and therefore her principal care is to forget herself; and to let this short and precious moment pass away without reflection, by amusing herself with things which prevent her notice of its speed.

4 H 2

This is the ground of all the tumultuary business, of all the trifling diversions amongst men; in which our general aim is to make the time pass off our hands without feeling it, or rather without feeling ourselves; and, by getting rid of this small portion of life, to avoid that inward disgust and bitterness, which we should not fail to meet with, if we found leisure to descend into our own breasts. For it is undeniably certain that the soul of man is here incapable of rest and satisfaction. And this obliges her to expand herself every way, and to seek how she may lose the thoughts of her own proper being in a settled application to the things about her. Her very happiness consists in this forgetfulness: and, to make her exquisitely miserable, nothing more is required but the engaging her to look into herself, and to dwell at home.

We charge Persons from their very infancy with the care of their own fortunes and honours, and no less of the estates and dignities belonging to their kindred and friends. We burthen them with the study of languages,

Year of
R O M E.
ccclxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty.
171st
Consul-
ship.

Year of Their words rather vexed the King, than diverted him from his design;
 R. O. M. E. for he could not part with the pleasing hopes he had entertained.

ccclviii.

Ref. J. C.

Two

hundred eighty.

17th

Consul-

ship.

guages, of exercises, and of arts. We enter them in business, and persuade them that they can never be truly blessed, unless by their industry and caution they in some measure secure the interest and glory of themselves, their families, and their dependents; and that unavoidable unhappiness is intailed upon the failure of any one particular in this kind. Thus we teach them to wear out their strength, and to rob themselves of their rest. A strange method (you will say) of making them happy! What could be done with more effect towards the insuring them in misery (Would you know what? Why, only to release them from these cares, and to take off these burthens. For then their eyes and their thoughts must be turned inward, and that is the only hardship which they esteem insupportable. Hence if they gain any relaxation from their labours, we find them eager to throw it away upon some sport or diversion, which takes up their whole activity, and pleasantly robs them of themselves.

It is for this reason, that when I have set myself to consider the various agitations of human life, the toil and danger, to which we expose ourselves in the court, in the camp, in the pursuit of ambition, which give birth to so much passion and contention, to so many fatal and desperate adventures, I have often said that the universal cause of men's misfortunes was their not being able to live quietly in a chamber. A person who has enough for the uses of this world, did he know the art of dwelling with himself, would never quit that repose and security for a voyage or a siege; nor would take so much pains to hazard his life, had he no other aim than barely to live.

But, upon stricter examination, I found, that this aversion to home, this roving and restless disposition proceeded from a cause, no less powerful than unive sal; from the native unhappiness of our frail and mortal state which is incapable of all comfort, if we have nothing to divert our thoughts and to call us out of ourselves.

I speak of those alone who survey their own nature, without the views of faith and religion. It is indeed one of the miracles of Christianity, that, by reconciling man to God, it restores him to his own good opinion; that it makes him able to bear the sight of himself; and in some cases renders solitude and silence more agreeable, than all the interest and action of mankind. Nor is it by being man in his own person, that it produceth these wonderful effects; it is by carrying him to God, and by supporting him under the sense of his miseries, with the hopes of an assured and complete deliverance in a better life.

But, for those who do not act above the principles of mere nature, it is impossible they should, without falling into an incurable chagrine and discontent, undergo the lingering torment of leisure. Man, who loves nothing but his own person hates nothing so much as to be confined to his own conversation. He seeks nothing but himself, and yet flies and avoids nothing more than himself: because when he is obliged to look within he does not see himself as he could wish: discovering only a hidden store of inevitable miseries, and a mighty void of all real and solid good, which it is beyond his ability to replenish.

Let a man chuse his own condition, let him embellish it with all the goods and all the satisfactions he can possess or desire; yet, if in the midst of this glory and pride he is without business, and without diversion, and has time to contemplate on his fortunes, his spirits must unavoidably sink beneath the languishing felicity. He will of necessity torment himself with the prospect of what is to come; and he that boasted to have brought home all the ingredients of happiness, must again be sent abroad, or condemned to domestick misery.

IS Majesty itself so truly great, and sufficient, as to support those whom it adorns and incircles, under the bare thought of their own grandeur? Is it necessary that this thought should be here likewise diverted, as in the common herd of men? A vulgar person will be abundantly happy, if he may ease himself of his secret troubles, by applying all his care to excel in the perfection of dancing. But dare we say this of a king?

Or,

To conceal his design of making himself master of Tarentum, as well as of the rest of Italy, he artfully inserted a clause in the treaty with his allies, Year of ROME cccclxxii. Bef. J. C. Two

Or, will he be more charmed with so vain and petty amusements than with the contemplation of his royal dignity and estate? What nobler, what more sublime object than himself, to engage and to satisfy his spirit? Might it not seem an envious lessening of his content to interrupt his princely thought with the care of measuring his steps by an air of music, or of exactly ordering a ball, instead of leaving him to survey the glories of his throne, and to rejoice in the excellence of his power? Let us presume to make the experiment: Let us suppose a prince in solitude, without any entertainment of sense, any engagement of mind, any relief of conversation; and we shall find that a prince with his eyes upon himself is a man full of miseries, and who feels them with as quick and piercing a resentment as the lowest among his slaves. And therefore it has been a standing maxim to banish these intruding and importunate reflections from court, and to keep about the Regal Palace those who shall constantly purvey for the amusement of their master, by having a train of diversions to succeed after business, and by watching his hours of leisure, to pour in immediately a fresh supply of mirth and sport; that no vacancy may be left, in life, that is, the court abounds with men, who have a wonderful activity in taking care that His Majesty should not be alone, well knowing that solitude is but another name for misery, and that the supreme pitch of worldly greatness is too nice and weak, to bear the examination of a thought.

—WHENCE comes it to pass, that men are transported to such a degree with gaming, hunting, or other diversions, which seem to have taken an absolute possession of their souls? not because there is any real and intrinsic good to be obtained by these pursuits; not because they imagine that true happiness is to be found in the money which they win at play, or in the beast which they run down in the chase: For, should you present them beforehand with both these, to save their trouble, they would be unanimous in rejecting the proposal. It is not the gentle and easy part which they are fond of, such as may give them leisure and space for thought; but it is the heat and the hurry, which divert them from the mortification of thinking.

—A MAN, that by gaming every day for some little stake, passeth away his life without uneasiness or melancholy, would yet be rendered unhappy, should you give him every morning the sum which he could possibly win all day, upon condition to forbear. It will be said, perhaps, that it is the amusement of the play which he seeks, and not the gain. Yet, if he plays for nothing, his gaiety is over, and the spleen recovers full possession. Bare amusement, therefore, is not what he proposeth; a languishing amusement without heat or passion would but dispirit and fatigue him: He must be allowed to raise and chase himself, by proposing a happiness in the gaining of that which he would despise, if given him not to venture; and by creating a fictitious object, which shall excite and employ his desire, his anger, his hope, and his fear.

—WE have seen the utmost that human invention can do, in projecting for human happiness. Those who content themselves barely with demonstrating the vanity and littleness of common diversions, are indeed acquainted with one part of our miseries; for a considerable part it is to be thus capable of taking pleasure in things so base and insignificant. But they apprehend not the cause and principle which renders these miseries even necessary to us, so long as we remain uncured of that inward and natural infirmity of not being able to bear the sight of our own condition. The hare which men buy in the market cannot screen them from this view; but the field and the chase afford an approved relief. And therefore when we reproach them with their low and ignoble aim, and observe to them how little satisfaction there is in that which they follow with so much contention and ardour, did they answer upon mature judgment, they would acknowledge the equity of our censure and would ingenuously declare, that they proposed nothing in these pursuits but the bare violence of the motion, such as might keep them strangers to the secrets of their soul; and that therefore they made choice of objects, which, how worthless soever in reality, were yet of an engaging and attractive nature, and able to engross the activity of all their powers. And the reason why they do not answer in this manner is the want of this acquaintance with their own.

Year of allies, That, when he had delivered them from their dangers, he should not be
 R O M E bordered from returning to Epirus. And, to secure their fidelity, he detained CCCCLXXII. some of their ambassadors under pretence of wanting their assistance. After these precautions, he sent away Cynas with three thousand men to Ta- rentum. This eloquent minister soon found means to depose Agis from the Government, and to get possession of the Citadel.

In the mean time Emilius, the Roman Consul, finding that there was no possibility of attempting any thing with success against Tarentum this campaign, resolved to march his army into winter quarters in Apulia.
 Being obliged to pass through certain defiles, threatened by the sea on one side, and high hills on the other, he was there attacked by the Epiracts and Tarentines from great numbers of barks fraught with Balists (Engines for throwing stones of a vast weight) and from the hills which they had covered with archers and slingers; nevertheless by placing, between him and the enemy, his Tarentine prisoners, whom they were unwilling to hurt, he preserved his Legions from suffering any considerable loss.
 Having quartered his troops, he himself repaired to Rome, where his colleague Marcus had a Triumph for some conquests he had made in Hebruria.

C H A P.

own bosom. A gentleman believes with all sincerity that there is somewhat great and noble in Hunting, and will be sure to tell you, that it is a Royal Sport. You may hear the like defence and encomium of any other exercise or employment, which men affect or pursue. They imagine that there must needs be somewhat real and solid in the objects themselves. They are persuaded, that, could they but gain such a point, they should then repose themselves with content and pleasure; and are under an insensibility of the insatiable nature of this desire.
 They believe themselves to be heartily engaged in the attainment of rest, while they are indeed employed in nothing else but the search of continual and successive drudgery.

Men have a secret instinct, prompting them to seek employment or recreation; which proceeds from no other cause but the sense of their inward pain and never-ceasing torment. They have another secret instinct, a relique of their primitive nature, which assures them, that the sum of their happiness consists in ease and repose. And upon these two opposite instincts they form one confused design, lurking in the recesses of their soul, which engages them to prosecute the latter by the intervention of the former, and constantly to persuade themselves, that the satisfaction they have hither to wanted will infallibly attend them, if by surmounting certain difficulties, which they now look in the face, they may open a safe passage to peace and tranquillity.

Thus our life runs out. We seek rest, by encountering such particular impediments, which if we are able to remove, the consequence is, that the rest which we have obtained becomes itself a grievance. For we are ruminating every moment either on the miseries we feel, or on those we fear.
 And, even when we seem on all sides to be placed under shelter, the affections, which are so naturally rooted in us, fail not to regret their lost dominion, and to diffuse their melancholick poison through the soul.

AND therefore when Cynas so gravely admonished Pyrrhus, who proposed to enjoy himself with his friends, after he should have conquered a good part of the world, that he would do much better to anticipate his own happiness, by taking immediate possession of this ease and quiet, without pursuing it through so much fatigue: The counsel he gave was indeed full of difficulty, and scarce more rational than the project of that young ambitious Prince. Both the one and the other opinion supposed that which is false, that a man can rest satisfied with himself and his present possessions, without filling up the void space in his heart with imaginary expectations.

Pyrrhus

Pyrrhus must inevitably have been unhappy, either without or with the conquest of the world; and perhaps that soft and peaceful life, which his minister advised him to embrace, was less capable of giving him satisfaction, than the heat and tumult of so many expeditions, and so many battles, which he was then forming and fighting in his mind. See Pensees de Paschal c. 26. as translated by Mr. Basil Kennet.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred eighty.

C H A P. XXVI.

171st
Consul-
ship.

§. I. Pyrrhus (whose character is given) being arrived at Tarentum takes measures to turn the Tarentines from the pursuit of Pleasures, to which they are intirely addicted. The villainous behaviour of a Legion of Campanian Soldiers, which had been sent by the Roman Republick to garrison Rhegium at the request of the inhabitants. §. II. Pyrrhus sends a letter to the Consul Lævinus, requiring him to submit the quarrel between Rome and Tarentum to his arbitration. Lævinus, in answer, returns a defiance. The Romans force Pyrrhus to a battle. §. III. The King, though victorious, declines a second battle with Lævinus, and returns to Tarentum. §. IV. His conversation with Fabricius, sent from Rome to treat with him concerning the ransom of Prisoners. The King sends Cyneas to Rome with proposals of Peace. The Senate moved chiefly by a warm speech of Appius Claudius (now blind) unanimously refuse to enter into any treaty of Peace with the King while he continues in Italy.

§. I. THE Consuls for the new year were P. Valerius Lævinus and T. b. Coruncanius, the latter not a Roman by birth, but raised to the Consulate purely for his merit. He was of Camerium, one of the Roman Municipia in Latium. It fell to him by lot to carry on the war in Herruria, and to his Collegue to conduct that against the Tarentines. Æmilius was continued in the command of his own Troops in quality of Proconsul, and was ordered to march against the Salentines (in Iapygia), who had declared for the Tarentines. The present exigence of affairs obliged the Romans to enlist the Proletarii. These (as has been formerly observed) were the meanest of the People, and esteemed not capable of doing the State any service except that of peopling the city; hitherto they had never been suffered to bear arms: A wise part of Roman Policy, to make it an ignominy to be excluded from serving their country in war.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
nine.
172d Consul-
ship.
Tab.
Claud.
Cæsar. apud Lug-dunenses.
Oros. B.
4. c. 1.

Pyrrhus was now arrived at Tarentum, having narrowly escaped shipwreck. The Tarentines, soon after the arrival of Cyneas, had sent to the King a great number of Gallies, flat-bottomed Vessels, and other Transports, whereon to embark his forces; and he had sailed from Epirus with 20 Elephants, 3000 Horse, 20000 heavy-armed Foot, 200 Archers, and 500 Slingers. When he was got out to sea, the wind rising suddenly at North, and blowing hard, he was driven out of his course. Nevertheless,

Justin. B.
18. c. 1.
Zon. P. 8.
Plut. Life
of Pyrrhus, 392.

Year of
R O M E
ceeded in 1790, O.
Two
hundred fourty-
three.

read Confu-
ship.

Year of
R O M E created 1000 1000 hundred thousand more.

1-23 Conful-
ship.

less, by the great skill and diligence of the pilot, and seamen, the King's ship bore with the land, and kept the Italian coast; but the rest of the fleet could not get up; some of the ships were driven into the Iapygian and Ionian seas; others, not being able to double the Cape of Iapygia, and a very boisterous sea throwing them in the night upon a rocky shore, they all suffered great damage. The Admiral, by her strength and bulk, resisted the violence of the weather; but the wind coming about, and blowing directly in her teeth from the shore, and the vessel keeping up her head against it, she was in danger of opening at every shock she sustained from the high billow that broke over her. On the other hand to be driven off again to sea in a raging tempest, and when the wind was continually shifting about, seemed the greatest of all evils. In this extremity, the vessel not being far from land, Pyrrhus without hesitation threw himself into the sea. His friends and guards instantly followed him, striving with emulation to assist and save him, which the darkness of the night, and the impetuosity of the waves, that were repelled with a roaring noise from the shore, made extremely difficult. However, by day-break, the wind being then quite laid, he got ashore, much fatigued and weakened in body, but with undiminished courage, and a strength of mind superior to the most adverse fortune. The Magnates, upon whose craft the King was cast, hastened to give him all the assistance in their power, and they also went out to meet and succour some of his vessels, which were not far off, and in which were found a few Horses, two Elephants, and about 2000 Foot. Pyrrhus, having drawn these together, marched with them directly towards Tarentum. Cynus, upon the news of the King's approach, led out his troops to meet him, and conducted him into the city, where he was received with the acclamations of the People.

Pres. in
C. G. R.
1977

P. in
 1. ab. P.
 307.

PYRRHUS (as we learn from Plutarch, had in his countenance a Majesty that was rather terrible than august. In a day of battle he was thought to resemble Alexander in look, agility, impetuosity, and strength of arm. His consummate knowledge in the art of war appeared even from the books he wrote upon that subject. Antigonus being asked, Who was the greatest Captain of that time answered, Pyrrhus, if he lives to be old: But Hannibal afterwards, speaking of great Commanders in general, gave Pyrrhus the first * place in the whole list. War was indeed his only study, and the only science he thought worthy of a Prince. Nevertheless he had a great share of humanity in his natural temper, was affable and familiar to his friends, not easily provoked to anger, and the most ardent of all men living to requite obligations. For which reason when Æropus died, who had done him important services, he could not bear it with any moderation: Not because his friend had paid the indispensable tribute to nature, (to die, he said, was common to all) but because he himself, by delays, had lost the opportunity of requiting the kindnesses he had received from

• Plutarch, in his life of Flaminius, makes Hannibal give Alexander the first place, and Pyrrhus the second.

bin :

him: For, as PLUTARCH adds, though money-debts may be discharged by payment to the heirs of the creditor when he is dead, a debt of kindness can never be satisfied but by a return of kindness to the friend himself: and, if he dies unrequited, it will always be a pungent grief to the person obliged, if he have a good and honest heart.

Year of
R O M E
ccccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
nine.

His chief faults were boundless ambition and a strange inconstancy in the pursuit of its objects. Fond of a new enterprise, he was always ready to quit it how successfully soever begun, the moment that a newer presented itself to his imagination. Whatever, says PLUTARCH, he acquired by his exploits, he lost by his vain hopes; his impatience to pursue what he had not yet attained would not let him secure what he had already won; which made Antigonus compare him to a man at Dice, who has admirable fortune, but plays ill.

172d Conful-
ship.
In Pyrrh.
p 400.

While Pyrrhus was waiting for the arrival of his scattered forces, he observed the dispositions of the Tarentines, and was surpris'd to see how their minds were intirely bent to pleasures, in which they thought to indulge themselves as usual, while he and his Epirots were to fight in their defence. To remedy this mischief, which must otherwise naturally end in the ruin of themselves and their defenders, he, as soon as his troops had joined him, shut up the publick gardens and walks, where the inhabitants used to meet to talk of news and politicks; he forbid publick feasting, plays, and masquerades, and incorporated the best-bodied men of the people in his Phalanxes. The effeminate Tarentines groaned under these wholesome regulations, in the execution of which the King was very rigorous. They found they had got a Master instead of an Ally; many of them rather, than endure such strict discipline, withdrew from the city, while others expressed their discontent by secret murmurs and loud complaints. Pyrrhus had his spies in the city, who insinuated themselves into all companies, and brought him an account of the discourses of the malecontents. One day some young debauchees, heated with wine, gave their tongues an unbounded liberty in talking against the King's measures. Pyrrhus, being informed of it, ordered them to be brought before him: Is it true, said he, that you have uttered against me those outrageous things you are accused of? It is very true, answered one of them; and we should have said more, if our wine had not failed us. Pyrrhus smiled and dismissed them.

Plut. in Pyrrh. p.
392.

Val. Max
B. 5. c. 1

But (if we may believe Zonaras) he was not so moderate with regard to some of the Citizens, whose intrigues he suspected and feared; he caused the most factious of them to be dispatched by private assassinations. To get rid of one Aristarchus, a great Orator, and much in credit with the People, he commissioned him to go to his son in Epirus, on some business which he pretended to be of great importance. Aristarchus saw through the artifice; and, the master of the vessel in which he was to sail being at his devotion, instead of going to Greece, he steered to a port of Italy, and went thence to Rome. What advice he gave the Romans is uncertain: But Fabricius was dispatched away to visit the Colo-

Zonaras,
B. 8.

Dion. apud Fulv. Urnium.

Year of nies and allies of the Republick. Nor was the precaution unnecessary at R O M E a time when a Prince, so illustrious for his exploits in the East, undertook cccclxxiii to deliver the Italians from the domination of the Republick.

Bef. J. C. An extraordinary event, which had happened a little before, had also Two given the Romans much uneasiness, and brought a great discredit on them hundred in their Colonies and among their Allies. While Pyrrhus was coming to seventy- Tarentum, and the Carthaginians infested all the coasts of the Ionian sea, nine. the inhabitants of Rhegium, situated in the southern extremity of Italy, 172d near Sicily, applied to the Republick for a Roman Garrison to defend them Consul- from an Invasion. A Legion was raised in Campania for that purpose, and ship. sent to them under the command of one Decius Jubbellus. These soldiers, Polyb. B. who had been used to a laborious life, began soon to envy the inhabitants
 1. c. 7. the pleasures and ease in which they lived, and it was not long before they Liv. Epit. formed and executed a scheme to make those advantages their own. They 11. forged letters from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, importing an offer to put the place into his hands; and under this pretext they massacred all the chief men of the place at a banquet, and then fell upon the rest, whom they either put to the sword, or drove out of the city. As for the women, they obliged them to marry the murderers of their fathers and husbands.
 This news was brought to Rome at the time when the circumstances of the Republick would not allow the Romans to take vengeance on the perfidious Legion.

Plut. in §. II. PYRRHUS, hearing at Tarentum that the Consul Lævinus was Pyrrh. p. come with an army into Lucania, a province in alliance with the Taren-
 392. tines, and was committing hostilities there, thought it shameful to continue longer shut up within walls; and though he had not received any reinforcements from the Samnites and Messapians, or other allies of the Tarentines, he took the field. But first he wrote the following letter to

Zon. B. 8. Lævinus: PYRRHUS to LÆVINUS Healtb. I am informed that you command an army which is to make war against the Tarentines. Disband it without delay, and then come and expose your pretensions before me. When I have heard both parties, I will give judgment, and I know how to make my sentence be obeyed. To this Lævinus answered: Know, Pyrrhus, that we neither admit you for a Judge, nor fear you as an enemy. Does it become you to assume the character of a Judge over us, you who have yourself injured us by landing in Italy without our consent? We will have no Ar- bitrator but Mars, the author of our race, and the protector of our arms.
 The King, who expected no other kind of answer, marched his army without delay into the plain between the cities of Pandosia and Heraclea; and understanding that the Romans were incamped not far from him on the other side the Siris, (a river which waters the country then called Lu- cania, and which empties itself into the Gulph of Tarentum) he rode up to the banks of it to take a view of their camp. When he had considered it well, its form and situation, with the manner in which the Romans posted their advanced guards, and had observed some other parts of their discipline, he was much surprised, and turning to one of his friends

Plut. Life
 of Pyrr-
 hus, p.
 393.

friends who stood near him, Megacles, said he, this ORDER of the Barbarians is not Barbarian. What they are able to do in fight we shall see hereafter. And, being now a little more anxious about the success of the war than before, he resolved to wait within his camp for the arrival of his confederates; and he posted some troops on the banks of the river to hinder the Romans from passing it. Lævinus nevertheless, knowing of what consequence it was to come to an engagement with the Epirot before he could receive the reinforcements he expected, and having exhorted his troops not to be intimidated by the reputation of Pyrrhus, or by his Elephants (animals which they had never yet seen) made his Infantry ford the stream in the very face of the enemy's advanced guard, while his Cavalry passed the river in different places, and wherever they could; so that the Epirots, fearing to be surrounded, retired in all haste to their main body. Pyrrhus upon the first notice of this motion, which much surprised him, directing the Officers of his Infantry to range their troops in battalia, and keep them ready to march upon the first signal, he himself, with the Horse amounting to about 3000, advanced with all diligence to charge the Romans, before their whole army could recover firm footing, and get into order. But the Roman Cavalry, being already formed, received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious attacks. The beauty and lustre of the King's arms made him very conspicuous, and his actions presently convinced all who observed him, that his reputation did not exceed his merit; for in this fight neither did his courage transport him beyond the duties of a careful General, nor his attention to direct others hinder him from displaying his personal Valour.

During the heat of the combat, Leonatus a Macedonian, observing that an Italian horseman had singled out the King, whose every motion he watched and followed, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, advising him to beware of that Barbarian, who, he said, seemed to have formed some great design. PYRRHUS answered: No man, LEONATUS, can avoid his Destiny; be assured, however, that neither that Italian, nor any other, shall have much satisfaction from an Encounter with me this day. He had scarce ended these words, when the Italian quickening his horse, and making directly at the King, aimed a furious stroke at him with his lance, but wounded only his horse; Leonatus, at the same time, wounded that of the Italian, and both horses fell to the ground with their riders. Pyrrhus was instantly surrounded by a troop of his friends, who carried him off, having slain the Italian, who fought with great bravery.

This adventure taught Pyrrhus to be more cautious. Seeing his Cavalry shrink, he ordered his Infantry to advance; but, before he put himself at their head to renew the charge, he gave his mantle and arms to Megacles, in exchange for his. The battle was obstinately fought on both sides, and the victory continued a long time doubtful. The King's changing his arms (though prudently done for the safety of his person) had like to have lost him the day. For MEGACLES, being mistaken for the KING, was attacked by great numbers of the enemy, and

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
nine.
172d Consul-
ship.

Year of at last wounded and unhorsed by a Roman Knight, who, pulling away his R O M E helmet and mantle, rode full speed with them to Lavinus, crying out.
 cccclxxiii that he had slain Pyrrhus. These spoils being carried as in triumph through Bef. J. C. all the ranks filled the Roman army with inexpressible joy, so that the air
 Two rung with shouts of victory; while the Grecians troops were struck with hundred consternation and dismay.
 seventy-
 nine.

172d
 Consul-
 ship.
 Plat. p.
 334.

The King no sooner perceived the ill effect of this mistake, but with all diligence he flew along the Lines bare-headed, stretching out his hands to his soldiers, and by his voice confirming the evidence of their eyes. The combat was then renewed, and Pyrrhus, bringing his elephants into the wings, quickly obtained the victory. For the Roman Battalions seeing their Cavalry put to rout by those huge animals, whose unusual form, noises, and smell, terrified the horses, and finding themselves both charged in flank, and overborne by the force and bulk of those strange beasts, gave way to necessity, and saved themselves as well as they could by hasty flight; nor did they stop to defend their camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both that and the honour of the day intirely to Pyrrhus.

Dion.
 apud Plutarch.

Dionysius writes, that near 15000 Romans were slain in this battle, and that Pyrrhus lost 13000 of his men. But other authors lessen the loss on both sides. The King treated the prisoners, mounting to about 1800, with all possible humanity, and esteemed them the more for refusing to enlist themselves in his service.

Plat. in Pyrrh.
 p. 394.
 Zon. B. 8.

The fame of this victory was soon spread over all Italy, much to the reputation of Pyrrhus; for it was a rare thing, that a Roman Consul, with a select army, should lose in a pitched battle not only the field, but the camp itself. And this honour was the more bravely won by the Epirot, as he had none of his Italian Allies to assist him, except the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content in having the glory of this action so peculiarly his own. His satisfaction was visible in his face, even while he was severely reprimanding the Lucanians and Samnites (who joined him soon after the battle) for their tardiness. To attach them the more firmly to him, he gave them a share of the booty.

§. III. BUT now the King of Epirus, with his victorious army, broke like a torrent into the countries in alliance with the Republick, and, many cities surrendering to him, he advanced within 30 miles of Rome *. Zonaras relates, that the King, being disappointed in his designs upon Capua and Naples, thought to march into Hetruria, join the enemies of the Roman Republick in that country, and thence go and besiege Rome; but that hearing there was an alliance just concluded between the Hetrurians and Romans, and that the Consul Coruncanius, who by a successful

* Florus, (Book I. c. 18.) in his poetick strain tells us, that Pyrrhus from a hill near Prænestæ took a view of Rome, and filled the eyes of the trembling inhabitants with smoke and dust at twenty miles distance à vicefimo lapide oculos trepidæ civitatis fumo ac pulvere implevit.

campaign had effected that alliance, was advancing against him, he proceeded no further in his march. It appears, indeed, by the Capitoline Marbles that Tib. Coruncanius had a Triumph for his victories this year over the Volturnenses and Volcienes in Hetruria. And it is not improbable that these victories completed the reduction of that country. Be that as it will, it is certain that Pyrrhus returned to Tarentum.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
nine.

The Romans, notwithstanding the great loss they had sustained, were not so dejected, as to have any thought of asking peace from the victor; nor, tho' Fabrizius said publicly, that the Epirots had not vanquished the Romans, but that Pyrrhus had vanquished Lævinus, did they recall the unfortunate Consul: Their whole attention was to recruit his army, and enable him to try a second engagement. Pyrrhus, in his return to Tarentum, found him in Campania, with a more numerous army than that which he had vanquished on the Banks of the Siris; and hereupon he is said to have cried out, I see plainly I was born under the star of Hercules, I have to do with an Hydra, whose Heads are no sooner lopped off, but new ones spring up from its blood. The Consul offered him battle; Pyrrhus, unwilling to refuse it, drew up his army, and commanded the conductors of his elephants to force them to make their strange and dreadful noises, in order to frighten the Roman Legions; but these noises were answered by so universal and terrible a shout from the Romans, that the King who found his soldiers dismayed thought 'fit to decline the engagement, pretending that the Omens were not favourable; and, the Consul not forcing him to fight, he pursued his march to Tarentum.

172d
Consul-
ship.
Zonaras,
B. 8.
Florus, B.
1.
Zonaras,
B. 8.

§. IV. WHILE Pyrrhus continued quiet in this city, he had time to reflect on the bravery, conduct, and strength of the Romans. He considered that they were better able to endure many such losses as they had suffered, than he many such victories as he had won. And he concluded therefore, that the only means to save his reputation was an honourable peace. He was full of these reflections, when to his inexpressible joy he heard that an embassy was coming to him from the Senate; he

* Authors are not agreed concerning the time of this embassy, whether it was after Cyneas had been to Rome or before. Plutarch (whom Mr. Rollin follows) makes it posterior to Cyneas's journey thither; and Dionysius seems to do the same. But if we consider the haughty manner in which Cyneas was dismissed by the Senate, with an absolute refusal of entering into any treaty with the King while he continued in Italy, at least it is very unlikely that Fabrizius, after such a refusal, should apply himself to Pyrrhus in the manner Dionysius represents, preaching about the inconstancy of fortune, and as if he was asking a favour. He is made to speak more like an ambassador from a people who sued for peace, than from the proud Roman Senate, who rejected it even upon reasonable terms. Hannibal, indeed, before the battle of Zama, talks much to Scipio of the mutability of fortune, and the vicissitudes of war; but this was in order to dispose him to grant peace to the Carthaginians, whom he had reduced to extremity.

FlorEpit.
and Zon.
L. 8.

Neither can I see what there was unbecoming in Fabrizius's proposal, even upon the supposition that the Romans had rejected a peace offered. A release of prisoners by way of ransom or exchange, is what surely without any indecency may be proposed to an enemy, notwithstanding that a peace has been refused to that enemy upon his terms. Yet Dionysius makes Pyrrhus reprove the ambassadors as guilty herein of an unworthy proceeding—Σχέτλιόν τι πρᾶγμα ποιεῖτε, &c.—D. Hal. in Legat. p. 711. Dr. Hudf. edit.

See D.
Hal. in Legat.

pleased

Year of R. O. 100. ccccxxii. Def. J. C. 703. hundred seventy-nine. 172d Consulship. Dion. Hal. in Legat. Zeal. L. 8. pleased himself with the imagination, that it was to ask that peace, which he himself so much desired. But when the three Roman Ambassadors, Cornelius Dolabella, Fabricius, and Æmilius Papus, after a splendid reception, were admitted to an audience, they proposed nothing more than a release of the Roman Prisoners, either by way of exchange, or for such a ransom per head, as should be agreed upon. Pyrrhus, after a moment's silence, answered, That he would consider of the matter, and let them know his resolution. Accordingly he assembled his Council; and there Cyneas, who knew his master's inclination, proposed that an embassy should be immediately sent to Rome to negotiate a peace, of which one of the conditions should be the release of the Roman Prisoners without ransom. The rest of the Council declared themselves of the same opinion, and the King gave the Romans an answer conformable to it.

Pyrrhus after this desired a private conference with Fabricius, who, he had heard, was the man most esteemed, for his virtue, of any in the Republick, a brave and able warrior, and very poor. The King, taking him apart, told him, He had been informed of his distinguished merit, and of his poverty so unmixable to it; that he thought a prince could never employ his wealth and power to a nobler purpose, than that of raising the fortune of an indigent great man; and that for this reason he had resolved to bestow such riches upon him, as should put him, at least, upon an equality with the most opulent nobles of Rome. The King added; nor yet imagine, FABRICIUS, that my intention is to ask any thing, in return, that can be inconsistent with the regard you owe your country. I demand nothing but your aid in negotiating the peace which I am desirous to conclude with the Roman Senate. You know very well, that I cannot with honour abandon the Tarentines, and the other Greeks who are settled in this part of Italy, before I have secured to them a peace with Rome upon equitable terms. Some pressing affairs call me back into my own country, and this makes me the more solicitous to finish our war by an amicable treaty. If my being a KING^a renders me suspected by the Senate, because

Plat. in Pyrrh.

^a The Greek Historians seldom lose any occasion of letting us know their unfavourable opinion of Kings. Plutarch, speaking of this very Pyrrhus, says, KINGS have no reason to complain when inferior men change sides, and violate faith for private advantage, seeing, in this, they do but imitate them who are the great masters in perfidy and treachery; and whose maxim is, that no man pursues his own interest with so much prudence, as he who has no regard to justice.

And Polybius (L. ii. p. 202.) reproves the folly of Polyarchus, an historian, who, in giving an account of the miserable end of Aristomachus, King of Argos, whom (as he pretends) the Achaians had put to death by torture, endeavours to heighten the glory of the sufferer, and excite the greater indignation against his persecutors, by saying, "That Aristomachus was not only an ABSOLUTE PRINCE, but descended from ancestors who had been ABSOLUTE PRINCES. What more bitter accusation (says Polybius) could any one easily have brought against him? What charge heavier with crimes could he have loaded him with? For surely this name of ABSOLUTE PRINCE expresses the very height of impiety; it imports all the kinds of injustice and wickedness, that can be committed by man." Καίπερ ὁ συγγραφεὺς βέλτερος αὐτῷ τὴν δόξαν καὶ παραστήσθαι τὸ ἀκρόντας εἰς τὸ μᾶλλον αὐτῷ συζηταντικῆν ἐφ' οἷς ἔπαθεν, ἢ μόνον αὐτὸν φησὶ γεγενῆσθαι τύραννον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐκ τυράννων πεφυκεῖναι. ταύτης δὲ μείζω κατηγορίαν τὴν πικροτέραν cause other princes have made no scruple to violate the faith of treaties, be you yourself my security. When the peace is made, come and assist me with your counsels; I will undertake nothing without your advice; you shall be my chief minister, my lieutenant in the field, nay a sharer with me in all that I possess. I have need of an honest man and a faithful friend, and you have need of a generous Prince, a Prince, whose munificence may enable you to make your virtues and your talents for great affairs more conspicuous, and more useful: Let us therefore mutually contribute to each other's happiness.

FABRICIUS answered in words to this effect:

You have, indeed, been rightly informed concerning my poverty. My whole estate consists in a house of but mean appearance, and a little spot of ground, from which, by my own labour, I draw my support. But if, by any means, you have been persuaded to think that this poverty makes me less considered in my Country, or in any degree unhappy, you are extremely deceived. I have no reason to complain of Fortune. She supplies me with all that nature requires, and, if I am without superfluities, I am also free from the desire of them. With these, I confess, I should be more able to succour the necessitous, the only advantage for which the wealthy are to be envied: but, as small as my possessions are, I can still contribute something to the support of the state, and the assistance of my friends. With regard to Honours, my Country places me, poor as I am, upon a level with the richest: For Rome knows no qualifications for great employments but virtue and ability. She appoints me to officiate in the most august ceremonies of religion; she intrusts me with the command of her armies; she confides to my care the most important negotiations: my poverty does not lessen the weight and influence of my Counsels in the Senate; the Roman People honour me for that very poverty which you consider as a disgrace; they know the many opportunities I have had, in war, to enrich myself without incurring censure; they are convinced of my disinterested zeal for their posterity; and, if I have any thing to complain of in the return they make me, it is only the excess of their applause. What value then can I set upon your gold and silver? What King can add any thing to my fortune? Always attentive to discharge the duties incumbent on me, I have A MIND FREE FROM SELF-REPROACH, and I have an HONEST FAME.

Year of
R O M E
ccccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred i venty-
nine.
172d Consul-
ship.

πικροτέρῳ δὲ ἂν εἰπεῖν παῖδες δὴ αὐτὸ ἔδει· αὐτὸ γὰρ τὸ πικρὸν πικρὸν ἐστὶν. ἀρετῆς αὐτῷ εὐφρανῶν καὶ πικρὰν ἐπιβλέποντες τὰς ἐν αὐτῷ αἰτίας ἀδικίας καὶ πικρὰν οὖσαν.

The reader observes that the word which, in this passage of Polybius, has been translated ABSOLUTE PRINCE, is τυραννός [TYRANT] an appellation frequently used by the ancients to signify only A prince with absolute and perpetual power; in which sense it is used by Polybius on the present occasion. We cannot possibly suppose him so very unskilful in the Pathetick, as to endeavour at exciting either indignation or pity for the sufferings of Aristomachus, by telling us, that he not only was a TYRANT himself, but descended from ancestors who had been as great TYRANTS as he.

Cornelius Nepos, speaking of Miltiades, has these words.—Chersonesi omnes illos quos habitarat annos, perpetuam obtinuerat dominationem, tyrannusque fuerat appellatus, sed justus. Non erat enim vi consequutus, sed suorum voluntate, eamque potestatem bonitate retinuerat. Omnes autem et habentur, et dicuntur tyranni, qui potestate sunt perpetua in ea civitate, quæ libertate usa est.

The

Year of
R O M E
cccclxviii
Bef J C.
The
hundred seventy-
nine.

172d
Consul-
ship.
Pyrr. p.
395.

Plat. ib.

Plat. ib.
p. 396.

The King, perceiving by this answer that Fabricius absolutely refused his offers, pressed him no farther. The next day, knowing that he had never seen an elephant, and being desirous to try whether he could surprise and discompose him, he commanded the largest he had of those animals to be armed, and led to the place where he intended to converse with the ambassador. The beast was to stand concealed behind some hangings till a sign should be made for his appearance. The King's order being punctually executed, the signal was given, the hangings were suddenly drawn aside, and the enormous animal, stretching out his trunk over the head of the Roman, made a most terrifying noise. Fabricius betrayed not the least emotion, but turning towards Pyrrhus said with a smile, Neither your Gold yesterday, nor your Great Beast to-day, have made any impression upon me.

While they were sitting at table in the evening, discoursing of various subjects, but especially of Greece, and the philosophers of that country, Cyneas happened to mention Epicurus; and he began to relate the principles of the Epicurean doctrine: That the DIVINITY, far removed from love and hatred, compassion and anger, and wholly regardless of human-kind lived through all ages, without action, and without providence, totally absorbed in an uninterrupted flow of delights. That PLEASURE was all the SOVEREIGN GOOD of MAN; and, that for this reason, all publick employments, all solicitude for the publick weal, should be carejully shunned by the wise, as inconsistent with a life of happiness.——Cyneas was going on, when with a loud voice, O HERCULES, cried FABRICIUS, May PYRRHUS and the TARENTINES be heartily of this SECT, while they are at war with us! The King greatly admiring the wisdom and virtue of the Roman became more desirous than ever to conclude an alliance with his Republick. He therefore, once more, took him apart, and warmly pressed him to imploy his endeavours for a speedy accommodation, earnestly requesting of him at the same time, that, as soon as the peace should be made, he would come and live at his court, where he promised him the first place among all his friends and captains. Fabricius answered in a kind of whisper, You do not consider, SIR, your own interest in what you propose; for, if those who now honour and admire you, come once to have experience of me, they will chuse rather to have me for their King than you. Pyrrhus was not in the least offended with this answer, but to his friends highly commended the exalted soul of the Roman; upon whose single parole he also suffered the * prisoners to go to Rome to celebrate the festival of the Saturnalia.

And now Pyrrhus having resolved to send Cyneas to negotiate a peace with

* The Senate (according to Plutarch) careful of Fabricius's honour and their own, commanded every prisoner upon pain of death to return to Pyrrhus, as soon as the festival should be over.

With respect to this affair there is a great diversity in the accounts of Plutarch, Justin, Florus, and Zonaras. Some say the prisoners were absolutely released, and that the Senate, to punish them as cowards, would not suffer them to serve again in the field, but sent them to garrison Towns.

† Other

with the Roman Senate, instructed him, if we may believe Plutarch, to ask nothing of the Romans but their † friendship, and a sufficient security for the Tarentines. Upon which conditions he offered to cease all hostilities, release the captives, and assist the Republick in the conquest of Italy.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
nine.

172d
Consul-
ship.
P. 394.
Just. Plut.
& Flor.

Together with these instructions, Pyrrhus furnished his Ambassador with magnificent presents for those persons whose assistance would be necessary to compass what he desired; nor did he forget rare and precious toys for the Roman Ladies, by whose means he hoped to smooth the rugged spirit of their Husbands, in his favour. Some authors report, that Cyneas found both men and women so steady and uncorrupt, that not one of either sex would receive any of his presents: but Zonaras affirms, that many even of the Senators were gained by the liberality of Pyrrhus. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, after Cyneas had had his audience in the Senate, several of the Conscript Fathers discovered a strong inclination to accept the peace proposed, assigning for reasons the battle they had already lost, the hazard they were in of losing another (Pyrrhus's strength being now greatly augmented by the junction of his Italian allies) and the fatal consequences that might attend a second overthrow. A rumour of this disposition in the Senate, being spread through the city, came to the ears of Appius Claudius. He had for some time, on account of his great age and the loss of his sight, retired from all publick business, * and confined himself wholly to his family. Upon hearing the report of what passed in the Senate, he caused himself to be carried in the arms of his domesticks to the door of the Senate-house. There his sons and his sons-in-law met him, and led him into the assembly, which was hushed into a profound silence the moment he appeared. The venerable old man was hardly entered, when he thus began:

“ Hitherto, Romans, I have borne the loss of my sight with weariness
“ and impatience; but my great affliction now is, that I am only blind,
“ and that I am not deaf too; that I am able to hear of those shameful “ resolutions you are taking, and of that infamous Treaty which is to “ extinguish the glory of the Roman name. What then is become of “ all those brave discourses, those lofty, sounding words, with which “ you are wont to make all places ring, That if Alexander had come into “ Italy when we were young, and our Fathers in the vigour of their age;

† Other writers make his demands to be more extensive, and say, that he required, in favour of all the Greek cities in Italy, the enjoyment of their laws and liberty; and further, that the Republick should restore to the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians, whatever she had conquered from them. These demands, if they were made, may well account for the warm indignation which Appius Claudius the Blind expressed, as we shall presently find, at the Senate's listening to Pyrrhus's minister. But then it will be difficult to reconcile them with the offer which Pyrrhus at the same time made the Romans, to assist them in the conquest of Italy. The Jesuits, aware of this inconvenience, have made Cyneas speak only of the West of Italy.

* This Appius Claudius had been Quæstor in the Y. of R. 435; Curule Ædile in 438; and, a second time, in 440; Censor in 441; Consul in 446; Prætor in 448; Consul, a second time, in 457; Prætor, a second time, in 458; Dictator in 461, (according to Pighius.)

|| Appian. apud Fulv. Urfin.

Year of " that, if the Great Alexander had dared to contend in arms with Us, he R O M E " would not now be styled THE INVINCIBLE, but by his death or flight have cccclxxxii. " added new Lustre to the Roman Glory? An idle tale! vain and empty Bef. J. C. " *boasting! Heroes indeed! you that are afraid of the Cbaonians * and* Two " Molossians, ever the prey of the Macedonians! you, that are trembling hundred " at the name of Pyrrhus, an assiduous humble courtier of one of Alex- seventy- " ander's life-guards! a vagabond in Italy, come hither not so much to nine. " succour the Italick Greeks, as to seek a shelter from his enemies at 172d " home! And yet this mighty man, this Pyrrhus, it seems, is to con- Consul- " quer Italy; he is to subdue all Italy to Us with those very forces that ship. " were not able to preserve to Him a small portion of Macedonia! No, * People " Romans, suffer not his arrogance to escape unpunished; if you conde- of Epirus. " scend to treat with him, your glory is at an end; Pyrrhus will himself
 " despise you; his allies will insult you as a nation easy to be terrified;
 " and one dishonourable peace will involve you in a hundred wars."

Plat. ibid. Appius, by these and some other words to the like effect, so awakened
 p. 395. the Roman spirit in the Senators, that without further debate they unanimously passed a decree, instantly to dismiss the Ambassador with this answer, That the Romans would enter into no Treaty with King Pyrrhus so long as he continued in Italy; but with all their strength would pursue the war against him, though he should vanquish a thousand Lævinus's.

Cyneas left Rome the same day, and returned to Tarentum. It is said, that, when Pyrrhus asked him his opinion of the Roman City and Senate, he

Plat. ibid answered, that ROME was a TEMPLE, and the SENATE an ASSEMBLY OF Flor. B 1. KINGS. His account of what he had observed greatly increased the
 c. 18. King's admiration of the Romans; but, finding that there was no hope of peace, he made all possible preparations for the next campaign.

C H A P. XXVII.

§. I. The Romans come to a second battle with King Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus re- tires to Tarentum, and the Consuls into winter-quarters. §. II. The Carthaginians send a fleet to the assistance of the Romans against Pyrrhus.
The Senate refuse the assistance offered. §. III. The Romans and Epirots having again taken the field, the Consuls give the king notice of the treachery of his Physician, who had offered to poison him for a reward. Pyrrhus once more sends Cyneas to Rome with proposals of peace, but to no effect. §. IV. Pyrrhus passes with his army into SICILY.

Y. of R. §. I. IN the mean time the Republick chose new Consuls, P. Sulpicius 474. Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, (whose father and grand-father Bef. J. C. were both famous for their Devotements.) The two Generals joined
 278. their armies, and marched together into Apulia, where they found Pyr-173d rhus incamped near a little town called Asculum, and where they in-Consul- trenched themselves in a plain at the foot of the Apennines. This plain ship. was divided by a large deep stream, which likewise separated the two Zonaras. camps. For some time the Romans and Epirots seemed to stand in awe
 B. 8. of

of each other. The latter had entertained the foolish belief, that the Decii transmitted from father to son some unaccountable art of Necromancy, by which they secured the victory to their side, whenever they lost their lives in battle. Pyrrhus endeavoured to destroy this dangerous prepossession among his soldiers; and not only so, but he sent a message to Decius, That, if he attempted to devote himself, he would find the Epirots upon their guard, who would take him alive, and make him suffer the most cruel kind of death after the battle. To this message the Consuls returned the following answer: PYRRHUS is not formidable enough to reduce us to Devotements. To shew how little we fear him, we offer him his choice: Let him pass the river unmolested, or suffer us to do so, and we shall then see which of us has the most need of extraordinary methods to gain the victory. Pyrrhus chose to let the Romans pass the river. The Historians are not agreed concerning the circumstances of the battle of Asculum, nor the success of it, and some make two battles of it. The Romans had prepared, against the Elephants, armed Chariots filled with soldiers, who were to throw fire-brands and other combustible matter against those huge beasts and the Towers on their backs. It is certain, that Pyrrhus was dangerously wounded in the action, and that the Consul Decius lost his life; but whether in fighting, or by a voluntary Devotement in imitation of his father and grandfather, as Cicero thinks, is not known. Fifteen thousand men, including the loss on both sides, were left dead upon the field. Pyrrhus after the battle, making a march unperceived by the Romans, retired to Tarentum; whereupon the Consul Sulpicius led his troops into winter-quarters in Apulia.

§. II. AND now the Republick placed at the helm of her Government two men of the most distinguished merit, C. Fabricius * and Q. Æmilius Papus. The Carthaginians at this time sent Mago with a fleet of 120 sail to assist the Romans against Pyrrhus, who, they heard, would make a descent upon Sicily, after he had forced the Roman Republick into a peace; for the Syracusians had invited him thither to protect them against the tyranny of the Carthaginians, who not long before had invaded their country. Mago, coming to Rome, told the Senate, That the Carthaginians, full of concern to see the Romans attacked by King Pyrrhus, had sent a fleet to their assistance, that in a war with a foreign power they might have foreign aid. The Fathers returned a compliment of thanks for the kind offer, but would by no means accept it. However, they entered into a new treaty with the Carthaginians, in which it was stipulated, that the Romans should furnish Troops to assist the Carthaginian Republick, in case Pyrrhus attacked it; and that the Carthaginians should assist the Romans, when desired, with their fleet. After this Mago sailed to Tarentum, where he had a conference with the King of Epirus. Finding that his intention was to pass very soon into Sicily, he, in order to prevent it, sailed with his fleet into the Streights between that Island and Italy, under pretence of besieging Rhegium. This obliged Pyrrhus to continue at Tarentum, and carry on the war for some time longer against the Romans.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxiv
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
eight.
173d
Consul-
ship.
Zonaras
B. 8.
Cicero, in Tusc. B.
1. c. 37.
Zonaras,
B. 8.
Y. of R.
475.
Bef. J. C.
277.
174th Consul-
ship.
A second
time.
A 2d
time.
Justin, B.
8. c. 2.
Polyb. B.
3. c. 25.
Liv.
Epir. 13.
Justin, B.
18. c. 2.
Diod. in Eclog. B.

Year of
R O M E
ccccixv.
Bef J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-seven.

174th Conful-
ship.
Plut. Life
of Pyrrh.
p. 335.

§. III. WHEN the spring was fufficiently advanced, the Consuls marched their troops into the territory of Tarentum, and Pyrrhus came and incamped within fight of them; but the high opinion he had of Fabricius made him avoid a battle. While the two armies were watching each other, Fabricius § received a letter from Nicias, the King's principal Physician, offering to take off his matter by poison, and fo end the war without farther hazard to the Romans, provided he might have a reward proportionable to the greatness of his service. Fabricius detesting the villainy of the Physician, and finding his Colleague of the same sentiment, they immediately difpatched the following letter to the King: C. FABRICIUS and Q. AMILIUS, Consuls, to King PYRRHUS, Health. You have made an unhappy choice both of your friends and of your enemies. When you have read the letter sent us by one of your own people, you will fee that you make war with good and honeft men, while you trust and promote villains. We give you this notice of your danger, not for your fake, nor to make our court to you, but to avoid the calumny which might be brought upon us by your death, as if, for want of ftrength or courage to overcome you, we had recourfe to treachery. Pyrrhus, upon receipt of this letter, is faid to have cried out, This is that Fabricius, whom it is harder Europius to turn afide from the ways of juftice and honour, than to divert the fun B. 2. c. 14. from its courfe; and, in acknowledgment of the benefit, he immediately fet all the Roman prifoners free without ransom. Rome was however too generous to accept a prefent from an enemy, much lefs a reward for not consenting to an execrable deed. In return therefore fhe released an equal Plut. in number of Samnite and Tarentine prifoners. But though Pyrrhus, more P. r-hus, ardent than ever for a peace, difpatched Cyneas once more to Rome, to p. 396. try the force of his eloquence and prefents, this able minifter had no better fuccefs than before; the Senators were fteady in their refolution to enter into no treaty with the King, till he had withdrawn his troops out of Italy.

§. IV. IT has been already faid, that the Syracusians had invited Pyrrhus into their ifland to affift them againft the Carthaginians. The King laid hold of this pretext to quit the war againft the Romans, in which he had now but little hope of fuccefs, having in the laft action loft his beft Troops and his braveft Commanders. Befides, the Sicilian expedition was a new enterprife, and therefore very agreeable to the natural inconfiftancy of his fpirit. But juft at this time he received intelligence, that Ptolemy Ceraunus King of Macedon was dead, and that the Macedonians wanted a King to guard them againft an inundation of Barbarians. This news kept him fome time in fufpenfe, and he pleafantly complained of fortune for loading him with too many favours at once. Macedon had formerly been in his poffeffion, and he wifhed to be mafter of it again; but as Sicily would open him a paffage into Africa, and conduct

§ This ftory is differently related by the Historians, as to the circumftances, but they all agree in the fubftance.

conduct him to a more ample harvest of glory, he determined at length for that expedition. In consequence of this resolution, he sent his faithful Cyneas before him to treat with the cities there, and give them assurances of his speedy arrival. Not long after, leaving in Tarentum, under the command of Milo, a strong garrison, sufficient to keep the much discontented inhabitants in subjection, he set sail from thence with thirty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, on board a fleet of two hundred ships. His departure proved fatal to the enemies of Rome. Fabritius fell upon the united Bruttians, Lucanians, Tarentines, and Samnites, defeated them, drove them out of the field, and laid waste their countries.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
seven.
174th
Consul-
ship.
Zonaras,
B. 8.

C H A P. XXVIII.

§. I. The state of Sicily at the time of Pyrrhus's arrival there. He makes rapid and extensive conquests in the island. §. II. The Romans suffer a shameful defeat from the Samnites. §. III. But, the next year, carrying on the war with success against the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians, these nations send to intreat Pyrrhus to return to their assistance. His fleet, in its return to Italy, is attacked by the Carthaginian fleet. After his landing he suffers a considerable loss of men. He plunders the Temple of Proserpine. §. IV. The Romans under the conduct of Curius Dentatus totally defeat the forces of Pyrrhus. §. V. Who, leaving a strong garrison in Tarentum, embarks for Epirus.

§. I. WHEN Pyrrhus arrived in Sicily, this Island was almost wholly possessed by foreigners of three different nations, Italians, Carthaginians, and Greeks, who had settled there at different times. Messina, Lilybæum, and Syracuse, were the capitals of the three dominions there established. The Mamertines, from Mamertum, in Campania, had possessed themselves of the first (much in the same manner as the perfidious Legion, who followed their example, got possession of Rhegium;) the Carthaginians were masters of the second; and the third was governed by two tyrans, whom common interest had united, after a civil war, to call in the King of Epirus to assist them against the growing power of the formidable African Republick.

Diod. Sic.
in Ecl. 21.
Polyb. B.
1. c. 7.

Pyrrhus, soon after his arrival, deprived the Carthaginians of all their conquests in Sicily, except Lilybæum. He also attacked the Mamertines, and, having defeated them in a pitched battle, reduced them to their city of Messina only; after which he counted so much on the reduction of the whole Island, that he caused one of his younger sons (whom he had by a daughter of King Agathocles) to be styled King of Sicily, purposing to make the other King of Italy, which he now also looked upon as a certain conquest.

Y. of R.
476.
Bef. J. C.
276.
175th Consul-
ship.
Justin, B.
23. c. 3.

§. II.

Year of R O M E cccclxxvi Bef. J. C. Two hundred seventy-fix.

§. II. IN the mean time the Centuries at Rome proceeded to the choice of new Consuls. Fabricius presided in the Comitia, and the respect he had acquired by his virtue was such, that it made him master of the Elections. Every body therefore was astonished to see him vote and influence the assembly in favour of Cornelius Ruffinus, a man extremely covetous and self-interested. Fabricius hated him thoroughly, yet promoted his election, because of the dangerous situation of affairs, and because he knew him to be a much abler soldier than any of his competitors. And these reasons were implied in the short answer he made to Ruffinus's compliment of thanks; I deserve no thanks, said he, for chusing rather to be plundered than sold. The Collegue given to Ruffinus * was C. Junius + Brutus, and they both turned their forces against Samnium. The Samnites, being too weak to sustain the attacks of the two Consular armies, fled to their mountains, and there intrenched themselves so strongly, that it was no easy matter to force them. The Romans nevertheless attempted it, and were punished for their rashness; many of them were killed, and a great number taken prisoners, and loaded with irons. The Consuls, at length ashamed of their enterprise, threw the blame on each other, and separated; Brutus continued in Samnium, while Ruffinus entered the territory of the Lucanians and Bruttians. These nations continued steady in their adherence to Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. Ruffinus therefore not only laid their country waste with fire and sword, but formed a design upon Crotan, a considerable city belonging to the Bruttians, and situated on the borders of the Ionian sea, at a little distance from Cape Lacinium. He found this place too well defended to be carried by force; for Milo, having notice of his design, had sent a reinforcement of Epircts to the garrison, under the command of one Nicomachus. However, the Consul took it by stratagem. Having been repulied by the besieged, who made a sally, he exaggerated the loss he had sustained in the action, and employed two pretended deserters to publish, one, that he was going to retire into the country of the Locrenses; the other, that he was actually gone, and had marched off in a precipitate manner. Nicomachus, deceived by these reports, and by the Consul's decamping, hastened with his troops to relieve Locris, which he imagined the Romans intended to besiege. Ruffinus took the advantage of his absence, returned with all expedition, and, by the help of a fog, got into the place almost before the inhabitants who were in perfect security discovered him; and not only so, but he defeated Nicomachus also in the field, who, when he found himself cheated, would have led back his detachment to Tarentum. Locris likewise soon after surrendered to the Romans, the inhabitants having first massacred the Governor and Garrison that Pyrrhus had left in it. [The Capitoline Marbles ascribe all these exploits to the Consul Brutus.]

Frontini Strat. B. 3. c. 6.
Zonaras, B. 8.

Appian. apud Val. l. 5.

• A 2d time.
Oros. B. 4.
Euseb. & Pausan. B. 4.

§. III. IN the following Consulship of *Q. Fabius * Gurges* and C. Genucius, Rome was afflicted with a strange sort of Plague, which chiefly affected women with child and breeding cattle. To put an end to this calamity, an unfortunate Vestal was buried alive; and Ruffinus was created

Dictator,

Dictator, to drive a nail into the wall of Jupiter's Temple. In the mean time the sickness did not hinder the Romans from continuing the war. Fabius by repeated victories reduced the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians so low that they could no longer keep the field without Pyrrhus, and they therefore sent Ambassadors to him to intreat him to return, and put himself again at their head.

The face of Pyrrhus's affairs in Sicily was now much changed. At his first arrival he gained the hearts of the Sicilians, by his insinuating affable behaviour; but, being afterwards elated with success, his mild government changed into an absolute tyranny. He treated cruelly those very men who had been chiefly instrumental to his good fortune. He excluded the natives from the Magistracies, bestowing them on his Guards and Courtiers, whose extortions and injustices were so grievous, that at length the cities entered into leagues, some with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines, to expel him the island. The African Republick had also sent a powerful army into Sicily to recover her former conquests. This being the situation of the King's affairs when the Ambassadors arrived, he was not a little pleased to have so honourable a pretence to leave a country, where he was no longer safe. At his departure he is reported to have turned his eyes back upon the island, and to have said to those who were near him, What a noble field are we leaving for the Carthaginians and Romans to fight in! In his passage the Carthaginian fleet attacked him, sunk seventy of his vessels, and dispersed all the rest of his two hundred sail, except twelve ships, with which he escaped to Italy. He landed near Rhegium; and when he had there collected the scattered remains of his forces, which had been driven on different parts of the coast, he marched towards Tarentum.

The Mamertines, upon the first report of his intended departure from Sicily, had detached 10,000 men to Rhegium, to molest him after his landing; and these, lying in ambush in woods and behind rocks, attacked the rear-guard of his army unexpectedly, and made great slaughter. Pyrrhus, on this occasion, signally displayed his heroic bravery and surprising strength. In the beginning of the action he received a wound in the head, which obliged him to retire out of the battle; but, returning to it again, he is said with one stroke of his sabre to have cleft a Mamertine to the waist, who defied him to single combat. This action so astonished the enemy, that they ceased the fight, and the King continued his march towards Tarentum. It was necessary for him to pass through the territory of the Locrenses, who had a little before massacred the garrison he had left in Locris. He not only exercised all sorts of cruelties on this people, but plundered the Temple of Proserpine, to supply the wants of his army. The great treasure which he found there he put on board his fleet to be carried to Tarentum by sea, but the ships were all dashed against rocks by a tempest, and the mariners lost. The historians relate, that Pyrrhus now repented of his sacrilege; and, as the sea had thrown the greatest part of the treasure upon the shore, he caused it to be gathered up and replaced in the Temple

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-five.

176th
Consul-
ship.
Justin, B.
23. c. 3.
Plut. Life
of Pyrrhuss, p.
398.
Ha in excerptis
à Valesio.
Justin. B.
23. c. 3.

Plut. Life
of Pyrrh.
p. 398.
Appian in excerptis
à Valesio.
Plut. Life
of Pyrrh.
p. 399.

Zonar.
B. 8.

Dio. apud Valesium.

Val Max.
B. 1. c. 1.

Year of Temple with great reverence; and not only so, but he put to death all R O M E those who had counselled him to rob the Temple.

ccclxxviii. His army, when he arrived at Tarentum, consisted only of about twenty Bef. J. C. thousand foot and three thousand horse.

Two §. IV. BEFORE Pyrrhus was in a condition to renew the war, hundred Rome changed her Consuls; and the famous Curius Dentatus was now seventy- raised (a second time) to that dignity, with L. Cornelius Lentulus. Their four. first business was to raise two armies, which might be sufficient to make 177th head against the King of Epirus with his numerous allies. But, when Conf- Curius would have begun to form the Legions, he found that the Roman ship. youth, from some unaccountable caprice, or perhaps because their Appian. spirits were depressed by the late contagious distemper, refused to enlist apud Va- themselves. Upon this he assembled the Tribes, and put all their names leium. into an urn. The first drawn was the Pollian Tribe; and the man of this Val. Max. Tribe, whose name came first up, being an audacious young fellow, and
B. 6. c. 3. refusing to list, Curius ordered his effects to be sold, and, upon his ap-Florus, pealing to the Tribunes, he sold the man too, saying, The Commonwealth Epit. 14. stood in no need of such members as refused obedience. The fellow's cause being too bad, the Tribunes did not think fit for their honour to assist him;
and from this time if any Roman refused to list himself in a regular muster, when commanded, it became a custom to make a slave of him.

So wholesome an instance of severity had its due effect; and two considerable armies were raised without further opposition. Lentulus led one Plut. in into Lucania, while Curius entered Samnium with the other. Pyrrhus, Pyrrh. p. to make head against both, was obliged to divide his forces, which 399. were now become very considerable; and, esteeming Curius the more formidable of the two Roman Generals, he marched himself against him with the choice of his Epirots and of his Elephants. And though the Consul had posted himself very advantageously near Beneventum, in a place full Frontin. of hollow ways, rocks, and woods, where the Græcian Phalanx could not
B. 2. c. 1. act with all its strength; yet Pyrrhus, who found it necessary by some Plut. in new exploit to confirm his allies, who were much discontented with Pyrrh. p. him, made all possible haste to attack the Romans in their camp. He 399. marched by night in hopes to surprise them; but passing through certain woods his lights failed him, and he lost his way; and at the break of day his approach was discovered by the Romans as he came down the hills that bordered the Taurasian Fields. Curius sallied out of his camp, with a detachment of his Legionaries, and fell upon the King's van-guard with such fury, that he put them to flight, killed a great number of them, and took some Elephants. This success encouraged Curius to descend into the plain, and try a pitched battle with the enemy. One of his wings had the advantage in the beginning of the battle, but the other was overborne by the Elephants, and driven back to the intrenchments; but then, the Consul sending for a body of troops which he had left to guard his camp, these so plied the huge beasts with lighted torches, Oros. B. that they ran back upon the Epirots, bearing down and breaking all 4. c. 2. their

their ranks, so that the Romans obtained a complete victory. The King is said to have lost in this action 23000 men. His army, according to Orosius, had consisted of 80000 Foot and 6000 Horse.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxviii.
Bef. J. C.

Pyrrhus's camp, being also taken, proved afterwards of great service to the Romans; for they not only admired the form of it, but made it their model for the future. Hitherto a large inclosure within a rampart and a ditch had served them for a camp, in which their tents were pitched in a disorderly manner; but now they got great light into the art of incamping, which by gradual improvements they at length carried to the highest perfection.

Two
hundred seventy-four.

177th
Consul-
ship.
Eutrop.B.

§. V. THE King of Epirus, who after his defeat had retired to Tarentum with a small body of Horse, resolved to leave Italy as soon as possible; but he concealed his design, and endeavoured to keep up the spirits of his allies by giving them hopes of succour from Greece. In reality he sent letters thither to several courts, demanding men and money; but, for want of favourable answers, forged such as might please those he would deceive. When he could no longer conceal his resolution of going, the method he took to save his honour, at least for some time, was to pretend to be on a sudden transported with anger against his friends for their dilatoriness in sending him the succours he required. Then, said he, I must go myself and fetch them. He left a strong garrison in Tarentum under the command of Milo; and, to engage him to be faithful, one author tells us, that he made him at his departure a very extraordinary present, a seat covered with the skin of the wretch Nicias, that Physician who had offered Fabricius to poison the King his master. After these disguises and precautions he returned into Epirus with only 8000 Foot and 500 Horse.

2. p. 14.
Frontin.
B. 4. c. 1.

Justin, B.
25. c. 3.
Polyænus
Stratag.
B. 8.

Zon. B. 8.

Plut in Pyrrh. p.
400.

C H A P. XXIX.

§. I. The triumph of Curius for his victory. His disinterestedness. §. II. He is continued for another year in the Consulate. He forces the Samnites and Lucanians to retire for refuge to their mountains. The next year, the Consul Claudius defeats them in a pitched battle. §. III. Ptolemy Philadelphus sends an Embassy to Rome, to ask an alliance with the Republic. The Romans send Ambassadors into Ægypt. §. IV. Certain advice comes that Pyrrhus is dead. [The manner of his death is related.] The SAMNITES, in despair, put all to the hazard of a battle, are defeated, and thereby totally subdued, after a war which had lasted 72 years. The BRUTTIANS and LUCANIANS submit soon after; and Tarentum is surrendered into the hands of the Romans; after which the Carthaginians, whose fleet lay before Tarentum, sail away from the coast. §. V. The Romans punish the perfidious Campanian Legion. §. VI. Silver Money is coined at Rome for the first time. §. VII. Picenum is intirely subdued, and the SABINES are made intirely Roman, by being admitted to the right of suffrage in the Roman Comitia. §. VIII. A war is commenced with the Sa- lentines; which nation, together with the Sarcinates in Umbria, being intirely subdued, Rome remains mistress of all the Countries in ITALY from the remotest part of Hettruria to the Ionian Sea, and from the Tyrrhenian Sea to the Adriatick. §. IX. The Republick is courted by foreign States. A law is passed to prevent insults on foreign Ambassadors. The Romans regulate their Finances.

Year of R O M E
MCCCXXVIII.
Bef. J. C.
Two hundred seventy-four.
177th Consulship.
Florus, B. 1. c. 18.
Pliny, B. 18. c. 3.
Val. Max. B. 4. c. 3.

§. I. AND now the Triumphal Procession of Curius, for his victory over Pyrrhus, drew all the attention of the People at Rome. The Romans had never before seen so much magnificence, such quantities of rich spoil; Vessels of Gold, Purple Carpets, Statues, Pictures, and, in short, all the fineries of the Greek Cities. Rome, says Florus, could hardly contain her victory. And what raised the admiration of the People more than all were the Elephants, those huge animals with Towers on their backs. The Senate, to reward the victor, impowered him to appropriate to himself fifty acres of the Conquered Lands; but he declined this favour, having firmly resolved never to possess above seven acres, an Estate which he thought sufficient for the support of any honest man.

The Triumph of Curius was followed by that of his Colleague Lentulus, who had made a successful campaign in Lucania, and taken Caudium from the Samnites.

This happy Consulship ended with a Census and Lustrum. The austere Fabricius, and his old Colleague in the Consulship, Æmilius Papus, being Censors this year, they made a new list of Senators, and excluded all those of the former list who led dissolute lives; nay, Cornelius Ruffinus, who had been Consul and Dictator, was struck out of the roll, only for having ten pounds weight of Silver Plate for his table. The number of Roman Citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be 271,224.

Y. of R. 479.
Bef. J. C. 273.

§. II. THE Romans, being under the apprehension that Pyrrhus might soon appear again in Italy, continued Curius in the Consulate for the next year, giving him for a Colleague Cornelius Merenda. In the mean time the Tarentines, who had hated Pyrrhus ever since his first coming among them, began now to despise him. Placing one Nicon at their head, they forced Milo and his Troops to retire into the Citadel, and confine themselves there. The belief that by these divisions Tarentum would ruin herself, and be forced in the end to surrender to the Romans, was what probably made Curius neglect to besiege it. He turned his forces against the Samnites and Lucanians, who, not being able to keep the field, retired to their mountains. But in the following Consulship of C. Fabius Dorsa and *C. Claudius * Camina*, being encouraged, doubtless, by the emissaries from Epirus, who promised them that Pyrrhus (after the conquest of Macedon, which he had undertaken since his return home) would hasten to their assistance, they came down again into the plains to defend their Towns, and preserve their harvests. Claudius defeated them in a pitched battle, and preserved the same ascendant over them, which his predecessors had gained.

178th Consulship.
Zonaras, B. 8.
Y. of R. 480.
Bef. J. C. 272.
179th Consulship.
* A 2d time.
Bef. Cæsar.

§. III.

§. III. THE reputation of the Romans being now spread into foreign countries by the successful war they had sustained for six years against Pyrrhus, Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Ægypt, sent an Embassy to Rome to ask the friendship of the Republick, an honour which gave the Romans no small pleasure. Not to be out-done in civility, they sent away to Ægypt four ambassadors, chosen with the utmost circumspection by a Senate studious to preserve their reputation abroad intire. Fabius Gurges was at the head of the Embassy, and with him were joined three Curule Ædiles, two of them brothers of the Fabian family, and the third Ogulnius. Their reception was magnificent, and Ptolemy at a splendid entertainment presented each of them with a Crown of Gold, which they received, because they were unwilling to disoblige him by a refusal; but they went the next morning and placed them on the heads of the King's Statues, that were erected in the publick parts of the city. The rich presents which the King offered them at their audience of leave they also accepted; but at their return to Rome, and before they went to the Senate, they deposited all these presents in the publick Treasury, desiring no reward but Glory for the services they did their country: However, the Senate and People ordered the Quæstors to restore to the Ambassadors what had been given them for their own use.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxx.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred seventy-
two.
179th
Consul-
ship.
Eutrop.
B. 2. p.
15.
Zonaras.
B. 8.
Liv. Epit.
14.
Dion. in excerpt.
Val. Max.
B. 4. c. 3.

§. IV. WHETHER the Romans believed or not, that Pyrrhus, when he had conquered Macedon, would once more return into Italy, they took care to chuse such Consuls for the next year as should be able to cope with him, if he came. Their choice fell upon L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius, who both of them had been raised to that eminent station before, and had signalised themselves in it. These Generals, with two Consular armies, were already entered into the Territory of the Samnites, when an account came that Pyrrhus was dead. This inconstant Prince, when he had almost totally subdued Macedon, left that enterprize to undertake the protection and restoration of Cleonymus King of Sparta, who had been driven from his capital by the intrigues of his wife, and the ambition of his nephew. Such was the Epirot's pretence; but his real design was to make himself master of all Peloponnesus, by taking advantage of the divisions which had sprung up there. He marched into Laconia, and invested Lacedæmon, but soon after quitted that undertaking likewise to get possession of Argos, whither he was invited by one of the two factions into which that city was split. There he fell by the hand of a woman. The faction that favoured him having in the night admitted him into the Town by one of the gates, and the other faction having opened another gate to a body of Macedonians and Spartans, a bloody battle was fought, in which Pyrrhus, receiving a slight wound from a young Argian, would have revenged it by his death: But the mother of the young man, affrighted at her son's danger, which she beheld from the top of a house, took up a great tile, and with both her hands threw it at the King; who receiving the blow in the nape of his neck, of which it bruised the Vertebrae, fell senseless to the ground; and

Y. of R.
481.
Bef. J. C.
271.
180th
Consul-
ship.
Plut. Life
of Pyrr-
hus, p.
404, 405.
Justin, B.
25. c. 4.

Year of then Zopyrus, a Macedonian, who was the only person in the throng that R O M E knew him, severed his head from his body.

ccclxxxi
 Bef. J. C.

Two
 hundred seventy-
 one.

180th
 Consul-
 ship.

Flor. B. I.
 c. 16.

Orof. B.
 4. c. 3.

Liv. Epit.
 14.

Zonaras,
 B. 9.

Frontin.
 Stratag.

B. 3. c. 3.

The news of Pyrrhus's death threw the Samnites into despair; they now looked upon their liberty as gone, and, like men in such a situation, put all to the hazard of a single battle. Firrus says, that the Samnites were so totally conquered, and the ruins of their Cities so ruined, that Samnium might in vain be sought for in Samnium. And thus ended this bloody war, which had lasted seventy-two years, and had procured the Roman Generals thirty-one Triumphs. The Bruttians and Lucanians soon after submitted to the same yoke. Tarentum remained unpunished, and thither therefore the Consuls marched and invested it. Milo still possessed the Citadel. The Tarentines (as it is reasonably thought) had implored the assistance of the Carthaginians; for these lay with a fleet before the Town, and pretended to have no design but against Milo and his Epirots. Papirius, being desirous to prevent the Carthaginians from getting any footing in Italy, signified privately to Milo, that, if he would surrender up the Citadel to him, he and his garrison should not only have their lives spared, but be transported safe with their effects to Epirus. Milo readily listened to this offer, and even did more than he was asked. He undertook to put the City likewise into the Consul's hands. Having assembled the Tarentines, he persuaded them to depute him to the Consul, promising to negotiate matters so well for them, that they should lose neither their lives nor their estates; and he made good his word. The Romans, being soon after admitted into the Town, did no violence to the inhabitants. As for the Carthaginians, when they found themselves disappointed, they retired with their fleet, leaving, the Romans in a well grounded suspicion, that they had intended to seize a place which by right of Conquest belonged to Rome; and, though their manner of proceeding did not cause an open rupture, it produced a coldness at least between the two Republicks.

Faß. Ca-
 pit.

Polyb. B.

1. c. 7.

Y. of R.

482.

Bef. J. C.

270.

181st

Consul-

ship.

Zon. B. 8.

§. V. ALL the old enemies of Rome, the Sabines, Volsci, Campanians, and Hebrurians, being subdued, and these, with the other nations newly conquered, being now become parts of one and the same State of which Rome was the capital, the Republick was at leisure to wipe off the dishonour thrown upon her by the perfidious Campanian Legion, formerly sent to Rhegium. As soon therefore as Quinctius Claudius and L. Genucius Elepsina were entered upon the Consulship, the latter was ordered to lead an army to that City and besiege it. The usurpers, to make a better defence, not only called to their assistance the Mamertines (who were themselves originally Campanians, and he had acted the same part at Messana after the death of King Agathocles, which the other had done at Rhegium) but opened an Asylum for all the Banditti of the country. Their obstinacy being increased by this additional strength, the siege proved a long one, and, provisions failing in the camp of the Romans, Genucius was obliged to have recourse to Hiero King of Syracuse, a generous Prince, whose name will be often mentioned in the course of this history

ry. Hiero furnished the Consul not only with the corn he wanted, but with a reinforcement of some Sicilian Troops; and by the help of these succours the Romans took the town. Of about 4000 men, of which the guilty Legion had at first consisted, there remained now but 300 alive. These, though Companians by birth, having the privileges of Roman Citizenship, were sent prisoners to Rome to be there tried. The Senate condemned them all to be first beaten with rods, and then beheaded; and notwithstanding that one of the Tribunes made an opposition to this sentence, pretending that it belonged to the People alone to pronounce upon Roman Citizens in capital cases, the decree was executed, and they were put to death by fifty at a time in the Forum Romanum. By this execution the Republick cleared herself from the suspicion of having had any part in the treachery of the Campanian Legion. Those of the old inhabitants, who had escaped the cruelty of the usurpers, were re-instated in the possession of their lands, liberties, and laws.

§. VI. DURING the following administration of the Consuls C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius, the former obtained a victory over the Sarcinates, a people of Umbria, who were for the most part Gauls. This year was remarkable for nothing more, except the severity of the winter. The snow lay forty days upon the ground in the Forum of Rome, and was of a prodigious depth. The succeeding Consuls, Q. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Piclor, were ordered to undertake the reduction of the Picentes and Salentines, (the only nation in the East of Italy not yet subject to the Republick) but they were of a sudden called elsewhere, to extinguish a flame which a very small spark had kindled. One Lollius, by birth a Samnite, had been delivered to the Romans by his countrymen, as a hostage for their fidelity. This man had escaped from Rome, joined a company of rebels, seized a strong place in Samnium, and was committing robberies in all the country; he had drawn also the Caricini, who were either a people of Samnium, or in alliance with them, into his measures, making their City the magazine of his booty. The Consuls were therefore dispatched to lay siege to that place; and by the help of some deserters, who introduced the Roman Troops secretly into it, they made an easy conquest. The Consuls had no Triumph for their success in this war, because it was deemed a civil war; nevertheless, they signalised their victory by more lasting monuments.

To this time the Romans had never used any money in commerce, except pieces of Brass stamped with the figure of a Bull, a Ram, and a Boar; they had been too poor to coin Silver Money. But now after the conquest of Samnium, and the surrendry of Tarentum, the riches of the State being increased, and a great quantity of bars of silver (of no use to the Republick in that form) having been found among the treasures taken from Lollius, the Consuls thought it adviseable to coin the silver, and introduce it into commerce. The place appointed for the Mint was the Temple of Juno Moneta, from whence comes the word Money. The new species, instead of being stamped with the figures of animals, was made

Year of
R O M E.
ccccxxxii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred
seventy.
181st
Consul-
ship.
Polyb. B.
1. c. 7.
Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 7.
§. 15.
Polyb. B.
1. c. 7.

Y. of R.
483.
Bef. J. C.
269.
182d Consul-
ship.
Fast. Ca-pit.
Zon. & D.
Aug.
B. 3. de
Civ. Dei.
Y. of R.
484.
Bef. J. C.
268.
183d Consul-
ship.
Eutrop.
B. 2. c. 16.
Zonaras,
B. 8.

Plin. B.
33. c. 3.
Suidas
under the word Μονήτα.

Year of R O M E 630
 ccccxxxiv.
 Bef. J. C. 183d
 Two hundred sixty-eight.
 made to represent the exploits of the Roman Heroes, by ingenious hieroglyphicks; but so ænigmatically, that the invention of our antiquaries is often put to the rack to explain them. Some of these pieces of silver money, being worth ten Asses of brass, were called Denarii, and marked with the numeral letter X; others, worth but five Asses, were called Quinarii, and were marked with the letter V. The Sestertii, which were worth but two Asses and a half, were distinguished by the letters HS or LLS *.

Consulship. Varr. de ling. Lat. B. 4. * Duo & Semis tertius. Y. of R. 485.
 Bef. J. C. 267.
 184th Consulship. Eutrop. B. 2. c. 16. Val. Max. B. 6. c. 5. Frontin. Strat. B. 1. c. 12. Flor. B. 1. c. 19. Orof. B. 4. t. 4. Pliny, B. 3. c. 13.
 §. VII. THE next year the new Consuls, P. Sempronius Sophus and Appius Claudius Crassus (son of the famous blind Appius, and the heir of his artfulness) entered Picenum jointly; but new commotions in Umbria obliged the latter soon after to march thither. He laid siege to Camerinum, a town situated near the Apennines that separated Umbria from Picenum; and, when he had taken it, treated the inhabitants barbarously: He sold them for slaves, contrary to his agreement with them; put the purchase-money into the publick treasury, and seized their lands. The Republick, however, would not authorise so wicked a fraud. The Senate ordered the unhappy wretches to be sought out, granted them the privilege of Roman Citizens, assigned them a quarter upon Mount Aventine for an habitation, and allotted each of them as much land as he had lost in Umbria.

In the mean time Sempronius Sophus pursued the war against the Picentes. Just as he was going to engage with the enemy in a pitched battle, a sudden earthquake greatly terrified his soldiers, and damped their ardour for fighting; but he telling them, That the earth shook only for fear of changing its masters, and then vowing a Temple to the Goddess Tellus, they quickly recovered their courage, and fell upon the Picentes with their usual intrepidity. The battle must have been exceedingly bloody; for, though the Consul gained the victory, he lost the greater part of his troops in the action. Asculum, the capital of Picenum, soon after surrendered, and the whole nation gave themselves to the Romans; an important increase of the dominion of the Republick, because this country alone was able to supply her armies with 360,000 soldiers.

To keep the newly-conquered nations in awe, the Romans at this time settled Colonies at Ariminum in the country of the Picentes, and at Beneventum in that of the Samnites; and at this time also the Sabines, whose right of Citizenship at Rome had hitherto extended only to the privilege of being incorporated in the Legions, instead of barely serving as auxiliaries, were admitted to the right of suffrage in the City, and thereby became intirely Roman.

Y. of R. 486.
 Bef. J. C. 266.
 185th Consulship. Flor. B. 1. c. 20.
 §. VIII. THE Salentines, whose chief Cities were Hydruntum, Aletium, and Brundisium, were now almost the only people in the eastern extremity of Italy, that remained unsubdued to the Romans. It was easy for the ambitious Republick to invent pretences to rob her neighbours of their liberty. The next year's Consuls, L. Julius Libo and M. Atilius Regulus, took Brundisium; but, as the brave Salentines disputed their country inch by inch, the two Generals were obliged to leave their conquest to be finished finished by their successors. These were Numerius Fabius and D. Junius Pera, who, having first subdued the Sarcinates in Umbria, totally reduced the Salentines (though they had brought the Messapians or Iapygians into their quarrel.) The reduction of two nations in one campaign procured each Consul two Triumphs, a thing unheard of before in the Republick.

Year of
R O M E
ccclxxxvii.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred sixty-five.

Rome was now become mistress of all the different nations of Italy, from the farthest part of Hetruria to the Ionian Sea, and from the Tuscan Sea cross the Apennines to the Adriatick. But these nations had not all the same privileges, nor were upon the same footing in point of subjection. Some were so intirely subject to Rome, as to have no laws but what they received from thence; others retained their old customs and forms of government. Some were tributary, others barely allies, who were bound to furnish the Roman army with troops, and maintain them at their own expence. Some had the privileges of Roman Citizenship, and their soldiers were incorporated in the Legions; others had likewise a right of suffrage in the elections made by the Centuries in the Campus Martius. These different degrees of honour, privileges, and liberty, were founded in the different terms granted by the conquerors in their treaties with the vanquished; and these honours and privileges were afterwards increased, according to the fidelity of the several cities and nations, and the services they did the Republick.

186th
Consul-
ship.
Fast. Ca-
pit.

§. IX. AFTER the great increase of power and dominion which the Romans acquired by their victories over Pyrrhus and his Italian allies, free Cities and whole Nations beyond the seas began to follow the example of the King of Egypt, and court the friendship of the Republick. Apollonia, situated over-against Brundisium, was the first City of Macedon that sent Ambassadors, to desire her protection. These Ambassadors were received with honour by the Senate; but afterwards, upon some occasion not known, were insulted by Fabricius and Apronius, young Romans of great distinction, and at this time Ædiles. So grievous a breach of the law of nations required satisfaction; nor did the Republick refuse it. The young men were condemned to be delivered up into the hands of the Ambassadors, in order to be transported to Apollonia, and there punished at the pleasure of the People. This was shewing the Apollonians all the Regard possible; and they, in their turn, shewed a prudent respect for the Roman Senate. Fabius and Apronius were hospitably received, and then sent back to Rome. And this memorable event gave rise to a law (which subsisted ever after) That, if any Citizen, of what quality soever, insulted an Ambassador, he should be delivered up to the injured nation.

Liv.
Epit. 15.
Val. Max.
B. 6. c. 6.

Dig. Pa-
rag. de Legat.

And now the great affair of the Republick under the administration of the Consuls Q. Fabius * Gurgus and L. Mamilius Vitulus, was to regulate her Revenues. These revenues arose from the tributes each province was to pay; from the rents of certain arable and pasture lands, which the Republick reserved as her demesnes, whenever she divided any conquered lands

* A third
time.

Year of lands among the Citizens; from the tenth of the produce of all lands
 R O M E dependent on her; and lastly from the imposts upon all merchandise imported into her dominions. It has been already observed, that four Officers, with the title of Quæstors, had the charge of receiving and disburf-ing the Publick Moneys. Valerius Publicola, soon after the birth of the Republick, desiring to ease himself of the care of the Finances, had appointed two: To these Scævola Titinius, in the year 333, being then Military Tribune with Consul Authority, had added two more, whose peculiar business was to attend the Consuls in their expeditions, keep the military chest, pay the troops, and sell the spoils and prisoners taken from the enemy. The Quæstors neither of the one nor of the other institution had any of the great badges of distinction annexed to their offices. They had neither Curule Chairs, nor Lictors, nor Apparitors; nor could they refuse to appear before the Prætor, upon a summons from even the meanest of the Citizens. The only privileges they had were those of assembling the Comitia at Rome, and speaking to them from the Rostra, and haranguing the soldiers in the field.

The four Quæstors had been found to be hardly sufficient to go through the business belonging to them even before the late conquests; but now it was absolutely necessary to augment the number of these officers; and four new ones were therefore created with the title of Provincial Quæstors, to take charge of the four^a provinces into which the Republick had divided her conquests.

The

^a The seat or chief office of the first province was at Opus, a maritime city near Rome. This Quæstorship reached, in all probability, from the head of the Tiber and the river Arno, to the mouth of the Liris; and comprehended Hærraria, Latium, Sabinia, Umbria, and, in short, all the coasts of the Tuscan sea, and all the lands between that sea and the Apennines. The seat of the second province was at Cale, in the delightful country of Campania; and it reached from the Liris to the Gulph of Tarentum.
 This province contained Campania, Samnium, Lucania, the country of the Bruttii, and Osteria; and with in it were many rich maritime cities. The third province reached from the Apennines to the shore of the Adri-atick sea, and was called the Gallick Quæstors-ship. It contained the countries formerly conquered by the Gauls, especially the Senones, from the river Rubicon to the Æsis. But, notwithstanding its name, it contained also Picenum, the country of the Frentani, and all the other countries as far as Apulia. And, lastly, the fourth Quæstorship, of which we have not so distinct an account as of the other three, could only comprehend Apulia, Calabria, and the territories of the Salentines, Messapians, and Tarentines. A fine province, if we consider the great number of its seaports, into which merchandises were imported from Greece, Asia, and Africa. For these four provinces Rome created four new Quæstors; and it was then settled, that all the eight Quæstors should for the future be chosen in Comitia by Tribes. After the elections, which were renewed every year, the eight Quæstors drew lots, in the presence of the People, to decide which should have the Roman, which the Military, and which the Provincial Quæstorships. The four Provincial ones were mostly desired by the ambitious before Rome had extended her conquests beyond Italy; but when she had brought the East and West into subjection to her, and great kingdoms were become so many provinces under her domination, the four Italian provinces were but little covered by the Quæstors, who were multiplied, in proportion as the Republick enlarged her conquests. The Proconsuls and Proprætors, that is to say, the Governors of those remote provinces,

The usual fortune of Rome, during any interval of tranquillity, did not fail to attend her at this time. A most dreadful Plague raged both in the City and in the Country. The Sybilline books, according to custom, were hereupon consulted; and it was there found, that some secret crimes had drawn down the wrath of Heaven upon the Republick. A vestal, named Caparonia, proved the unhappy victim, sacrificed to the prepossessions of the People. Being convicted of incontinency before the Tribunal of the Pontifices, they condemned her to be buried alive; and, though to avoid so cruel a death she strangled herself, the same ceremonies of interment were performed upon the dead body, as if she had been living.

Notwithstanding the havock made by the plague, the number of Citizens fit to bear arms appeared, by a Census taken this year, to be 292,224. Doubtless the Sabines, to whom the right of suffrage had been lately granted, must have been reckoned in this enumeration. C. Marcius Rutilus, one of the Censors, had on account of his extraordinary merit been elected, contrary to custom and his own earnest remonstrances, a second time to this office; and hence probably he acquired the surname of Censorinus, which was perpetuated in his family. Plutarch tells us, that, to put a stop to so dangerous a practice, Marcius got a law passed, forbidding any person to hold the Censorship a second time.

The present Consuls were still at Rome, wholly employed in civil affairs, when on a sudden a war sprung up in the very bowels of the Republick. Volturni, a considerable City of Hetruria, had been by Treaty allowed to enjoy her own laws and form of government; but the Volturnenses had since fallen into sloth and luxury, neglected their laws, despised the publick offices, and suffered their Freed-men to usurp them. These Freed-men by degrees had made themselves tyrants in the little Republick; and it was their whole business to mortify their old masters. They not only with all licentiousness invaded their wives, but passed a law, that no Virgin daughter of a man free-born should be married to a husband of the like condition, till she had submitted to the passion of a freed-man. And to all these insolences they added Banishments and Proscriptions of the most worthy Citizens. The Volturnenses, not being able to help themselves, sent Deputies privately to implore the protection of the Senate of Rome. But, though the negotiation was thought to be carried on with perfect secrecy, the Freed-men got notice of it, and put the Deputies to death at their return; and when Fabius Gurgus, who undertook with a vinces, had each his Quæstor, or Superintendant of the Finances, for his Government: and these Governments being large and rich, and far out of the Senate's sight, the Quæstors were fond of going thither, where they could raise more money, and were more honoured and respected; for here they wore the Prætecta, and were attended by Lictors, as appeared from Cic.

3d Orat. contra Verr. For all these reasons, when the Quæstors drew lots for their provinces, the man to whom any of the Italian ones fell became the jest of the people. He goes to the waters, said they; meaning, that he was going to enjoy his repose near Rome, much as those Romans did, who went to Baie or Puteoli for the waters. C. & R.

Year of
R O M E
ccccxxxiii
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred sixty-
four.
187th
Consul-
ship.
Oros. B. 4.
c. 5.
Liv. Epit.
16.
Eutrop.
B. 2. c. 18.
Val. Max.
B. 4. c. 1.
Plut. Life
of Coriolanus.
Zon. B. 8.
Flor. B. 1.
c. 21.
Author,
de Viris Illustr. c.
36.
Val. Max.
B. 9. c. 1.

Year of ROMAN
cc. clxxxv.
Bef. J. C.
Two
hundred fifty-
four.
18 th
Consul-
ship.

small army of volunteers to chastise them, came near their City, he found them upon their guard; nay, the Freed-men ventured to face him in the field, and gave him battle. The Consul put them to the rout; but, as he was entering the Town with the run-aways, he received a mortal wound from an unknown hand, and then the Romans were repulsed. After this Decius Mus, who had been Lieutenant to Fabius, besieged the place in form; and in the year following it surrendered to the Consul Iulius Placcus. The Freed-men, who had usurped the magistracies, and acted the whole scene of villainy, were all put to death; the City was razed, and the Inhabitants transplanted to another.

These last particulars are here mentioned a little before their time, that they may not hereafter interrupt the relation of more important matters; the causes and commencement of the FIRST PUNIC or CARTHAGINIAN War.

The END of the FIRST VOLUME.

THE

1801/1802.

R O M A N
H I S T O R Y,

FROM THE BUILDING OF ROME
TO THE RUIN OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

ILLUSTRATED WITH MAPS AND OTHER PLATES.

V O L. II.

By N. H O O K E, Esq;

The F I F T H E D I T I O N.

L O N D O N:

Printed for G. HAWKINS, W. STRAHAN, J. and F. RIVINGTON, R. BALDWIN, W. JOHNSTON, T. LONGMAN, and T. CADELL.

MDCCLXX.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
HUGH, Earl of MARCHMONT.

MY LORD,

PERMIT me to lay hold of this fair occasion, publickly to congratulate your Lordship, upon that true Glory, the consenting praise of the honest and the wise, which you have so early acquired. ‘When ‘ men have performed any virtuous actions, or such ‘ as sit easy upon their memories, it is a reasonable ‘ pleasure’ (says a philosophical * Writer, who speaks contemptuously enough of Renown after death) ‘to ‘ have the testimony of the world added to that of ‘ their own consciences, that they have done well.’ My Lord, you have not only this pleasure, but another, no less reasonable, and more exquisite, attending a character like yours, The being able to do much good to others. To those whom you distinguish

* Mr. Wollaston.

D E D I C A T I O N.

by particular marks of your good opinion you give reputation ; and I have happily experienced, that reputation, so derived, is not meer air and fruitless. Through that warmth of good will which your Lordship, on all occasions, expresses for me, I have profited, greatly profited, by your glory. You, my Lord, can be no stranger to this truth ; yet I trust, you will forgive me, if, to draw still more advantage from your fame, I here take the liberty to tell your Lordship, in print, for the information of others, what you knew before : As a Player, when alone on the stage, speaks aloud to himself, that he may be heard by those who fill the Theatre. I would, by this dedication of my Book to your Lordship, publish, as far as by such means I can, that you, my Lord, are my Patron and my Friend ; and that I am, with the greatest respect, esteem and gratitude,

My LORD,

Your Lordship's

Most faithful, and

Most humble Servant,

N. H O O K E.

T H E

Roman History.

FOURTH BOOK.

From the Beginning of the FIRST PUNIC WAR in the Year of Rome 489, to the End of the SECOND in 552.

INTRODUCTION.

CHAP. I.

The occasion of the First Punic War.

CERTAIN Italian soldiers, called Mamertines, who had been mercenaries in the service of Agathocles King of Sicily, and had, after his death, treacherously seized upon Messina, being reduced to extremities by the arms of Hiero King of Syracuse, one part of them puts the citadel into the hands of the Carthaginians, and the other sends Embassadors to the Romans, offering them the possession of the city, and imploring their protection. The people of Rome order the Consul Appius Claudius to go with an army to the relief of the Mamertines; who, in the mean time, rid themselves of the Carthaginians, that had been admitted into the citadel.

HIERO;
K. of Syracuse.
Y.R. 489.

CHAP. II.

First, second, and third years of the War.

The Carthaginians, in conjunction with Hiero King of Syracuse, who had entered into a league with them, besiege Messina. Appius Claudius lands in Sicily, defeats the allies, and forces them to raise the siege. The next year Hiero, for a hundred talents of silver, purchases a peace with Rome, and the year following assists the Romans in taking Agrigentum from the Carthaginians.

490.
491.

I

CHAP. III.

The fourth and fifth years of the War.

492. In the Consulship of L. Valerius and T. Otacilius, Rome fits out a fleet of a hundred Quinqueremes and twenty Triremes, in order to dispute with the Carthaginians the dominion of the sea. One of the Consuls of the next year, Cornelius Asina, falls into the enemy's hands, together with seventeen of his galleys; but the other Consul, C. Duilius, gains a memorable victory over the Carthaginian fleet, near Mylæ, chiefly by means of a new invented engine for grappling and boarding the enemy's ships.
- DUILIUS

CHAP. IV.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth years of the War.

494. Four thousand Samnites conspire with certain discontented slaves to plunder and burn Rome, but are seasonably discovered, and punished. The Romans invade Corsica and Sardinia with success. A quarrel in Sicily between the Roman army and their Sicilian auxiliaries, gives the enemy some advantages in that island. Next year several towns there surrender to one of the Consuls; and the other surprizes the enemy's fleet in a port of Sardinia, and takes many of the ships; whereupon the Carthaginian sailors mutiny, and crucify their Admiral. The Romans are again conquerors in an engagement at sea near the Tyndaris.
- 495.
- 496.

CHAP. V.

The ninth year of the War.

497. To oblige Carthage to recall her armies from Sicily, Rome undertakes to transfer the war into Africa. In this view both the Consuls are sent out with a fleet of 330 ships of war, and an army of near 140,000 men. They gain a complete victory over the enemy's fleet near Ecnomus, and afterwards land in Africa. One of the Consuls returns to Italy with the greater part of the fleet and the army, leaving his colleague Regulus to pursue the war. The Roman General, after taking several towns, routs the land-forces of the Carthaginians near Adis, and then offers peace to the Republic, but upon conditions that are rejected with indignation.
- REGULUS.

CHAP. VI.

- XANTIPPUS. The Senate of Carthage entrust Xantippus, a Lacedæmonian, with the command of their army. By his excellent conduct he totally defeats the Romans in a pitched battle, and takes Regulus prisoner.

C H A P. VII.

From the ninth to the fourteenth year of the War.

Rome dispatches her new Consuls into Africa, with a great fleet, to bring off the remains of Regulus's army, which after the late battle had taken refuge in Clypea. The Consuls gain a victory over the Carthaginian fleet, near the promontory of Mercury; they land at Clypea, and take the legionaries on board; but in their passage home meet with so terrible a storm, that, of above four hundred vessels, only fourscore escape destruction. The Romans fit out a new fleet, with which the succeeding Consuls pass into Sicily, and there reduce some towns. Next year 150 Roman ships perishing by tempest, the Republic gives over all thoughts of naval enterprizes, and resolves to depend entirely upon her land-forces; but those are so much afraid of the Carthaginian elephants, that for two years together they dare not face the enemy in battle, or even appear in the plain field. This terror among the legions, and the advantage which the enemy had of being able, at pleasure, to supply their maritime towns with recruits and provisions, make the Roman Senate resolve to try once more the fortune of Rome at sea. In the mean time, the Roman General in Sicily draws the Carthaginians into a snare, routs their whole army, and kills or takes all the elephants.

498.

499.

500.

501, 502

503.

C H A P. VIII.

Carthage disheartened by her losses sends Embassadors to Rome, and, together with them, the captive Regulus, to treat of a peace. Regulus dissuades the Senate from hearkening to the overture, and even from consenting to an exchange of prisoners. In performance of his word given he returns to Carthage, and there, soon after, dies.

C H A P. IX.

From the fourteenth to the eighteenth year of the War.

The Consuls set sail with the fleet for Sicily, and lay siege to Lilybæum. Himilco, the Carthaginian Commander in the city, makes a vigorous defence. In the mean time a Squadron of ships from Africa passes through the Roman navy, and lands 10,000 men in the town; which being afterwards straitly shut up, one Hannibal, a Rhodian, undertakes to go thither with a single galley, and bring intelligence to the Senate of Carthage of the condition of the besieged; and he succeeds. The garrison in a sally burn all the towers and engines employed against their town; after which the Romans turn the siege into a blockade. Next year the Consul Claudius Pulcher, attempting 503.

Hannibal
the Rhodian.

504.

Claudius
Pulcher.

505.

attempting to surprize Drepanum, is by the governor of the place defeated at sea, and loses the greatest part of his fleet. The rest of the Roman navy, under the other Consul and his Quæstors, is, by the Carthaginian Admiral, forced upon the south coast of Sicily, where every one of the ships perishing by storm, Rome once more renounces the empire of the seas. Her General in Sicily gets possession of the city of Eryx. The following year produces no remarkable action between the contending parties. The Carthaginian army, for want of pay, mutiny against their General. He is recalled home, and succeeded in the command by Amilcar Barcha, father of the famous Hannibal.

CHAP. X.

From the eighteenth year of the war to the end of it, in the twenty-third or twenty-fourth year after its commencement.

AMILC.
BARCHA.

506, 507

508.

509, 510

511.

LUTA-TIUS CA-TULUS.

512.

35 Tribes.

Amilcar, after quieting the discontents of the army, and making a successful expedition on the coast of Italy, encamps on a mountain between Panormus and Eryx in Sicily, and there maintains his post against all the efforts of the Romans for almost three years. At length (in 508) he finds means to seize upon the city of Eryx, situated on the side of a high mountain; and though hard pressed by a Roman garrison at the top of the mountain, and a Roman army at the foot of it, yet in two years time they are not able to dislodge him. The Senate of Rome finding it impossible to complete the conquest of Sicily without a naval strength, a considerable fleet is fitted out at the expence of private citizens, the public treasury being exhausted. This new fleet, under the conduct of Lutatius Catulus, obtaining a complete victory over that of the enemy, near the Ægates, the Carthaginians are constrained to yield to the Romans, by a treaty of peace, the whole island of Sicily; which, except the little kingdom of Syracuse, is reduced to the form of a province. At Rome the tribes are augmented to thirty-five, which number they never after exceeded.

CHAP. XI.

The Falisci, a people of Hetruria, rebel against the Romans, but in a few days are forced to submit. Carthage is reduced to great extremities in a war, which for more than three years is carried on against her, by her foreign Mercenaries in conjunction with her African subjects. The conduct of the Romans upon this occasion.

CHAP.

C H A P. XII.

For three years the Romans, having no war to maintain, employ themselves in establishing good order in Italy, and planting colonies in the neighbourhood of the Gauls and Ligurians. The Republic desires to assist Ptolemy king of Egypt against Antiochus of Syria; but the Egyptian civilly declines the offer. At length the Boian Gauls breaking the peace with Rome, and the Ligurians being in motion, the Romans take the field. The Consul Valerius is vanquished in a battle with the Boian Gauls. He afterwards defeats them, while his colleague obtains a victory over the Ligurians. Next year the Romans act entirely on the defensive against the Boians; but offensively against the Ligurians, and with success. At Rome the Secular Games are celebrated. The new Consuls march against the Boians and Ligurians, who having called in to their assistance an army of Transalpine Gauls, take umbrage at their numbers, fall upon them, and put them to flight. The conquerors weakened by their victory are obliged to make peace with the Romans. The Corsicans in the mean time rebel, with whom Claudius Cyprias, being sent against them, enters into a treaty, on terms dishonourable to the Republic. She refuses to adhere to the treaty, delivers up Claudius to the resentment of the Corsicans, and then subdues them by force of arms. The Corsicans, in conjunction with Carthage, stir up the Sardinians to revolt. Hereupon Rome threatens the African Republic with a war, but is diverted from it by an Embassy from Carthage: And Sardinia being easily reduced the next year, the temple of Janus is shut for the first time since the reign of Numa Pompilius. A few months after, the Ligurians, Corsicans, and Sardinians take arms again. The first instance of a divorce at Rome. Marriage settlements introduced. Fabius Maximus the Consul subdues the Ligurians; his colleague triumphs for his exploits against the Sardinians. At the motion of Æbutius, a Tribune of the people, the judicature of the Centumvirs is erected. The following year Flaminius, another Tribune of the people, proposes a law for dividing amongst the poor citizens of Rome some lands lately taken from the Gauls. In obedience to his father he desists from his enterprize; but one of his colleagues carries it on, and succeeds, notwithstanding the opposition of the Senate. Sardinia and Corfica, now entirely subdued, are reduced to the form of a Roman province; and the conqueror of this latter island being refused a triumph, gives the first example of assuming that honour against the will of the Senate.

512,513

514.

515.

516.

517.

518.

519.

520.

Centumvirs.

521.

522.

C H A P. XIII.

The first Illyrian War.

The Romans send ambassadors to Teuta, Queen of a part of Illyricum, to complain of the piracies of her subjects. Teuta, offended at the haughty behaviour of one of the ambassadors, causes them all to be murdered in their return.

523.

524. return home. To revenge this insult, Rome employs both her Consuls, who, assisted by Demetrius of Pharos, successfully begin the war; which is finished in the following year by a treaty of peace, dictated by the Republic. Her acquaintance with the Greeks commences at this time.
- 525.

C H A P. XIV.

526. The Gauls on both sides the Po take arms. To oppose these formidable enemies, the Romans make extraordinary preparations; and the next year obtain a complete victory over them. Yet the following Consuls make no progress in the war. Their successors, though Rome, terrified by prodigies, had ordered them to return to the city, hazard a pitched battle, and gain the victory. Claudius Marcellus conquishes in single combat the General of the Gauls, who discouraged by his death, are put to flight. Insubria and Liguria submit, and are made one province, which takes the name of Cisalpine Gaul. Istria on the Adriatick is subdued by the Republic.
- 527.
- 528.
- 529.
- 530.
- 531.
- 532.

C H A P. XV.

The second Illyrian War.

- Demetrius of Pharos, whom Rome had appointed guardian to the young Illyrian King, despises her orders, and attacks her allies. The present Consuls being obliged to abdicate their office, and the season being too far advanced for their successors to begin a new war, Æmilius Paullus, and his colleague Livius Salinator, go the next year with an army into Illyricum. Demetrius flies for protection to the Court of Philip of Macedon. Livius, on his return to Rome, is condemned by the tribes, for having applied part of the spoil to his own use. Roman colonies are planted at Placentia and Cremona, in the territories of the Gauls.*
- 533.
- 534.

C H A P. XVI.

The second Punic War, or the War of Hannibal. Its causes and commencement.

THE spirit of revenge with which Amilcar left Sicily, and which he communicated to his son Hannibal, is reckoned the First Cause of the second Punic war. The unjust seizure of Sardinia by the Romans, the Second and Principal Cause. The successive victories of Amilcar, Asdrubal, and Hannibal in Spain, the Third Cause.

- HANNIBAL. Hannibal attacks the Saguntines, a people in alliance with Rome, and the only Spaniards who, on the south of the Iberus, remain unsubdued to the Carthaginian dominion. He reduces Saguntum, after a siege of eight months.
535. The Romans order Sempronius, one of their Consuls, into Africa, and P. Cornelius.

Cornelius Scipio the other Consul into Spain, and at the same time send an embassy to Carthage, demanding that Hannibal should be delivered up to them, to be punished for his unjust infraction of the peace between the two Republics: This being refused, and war denounced on both sides, the Carthaginian General settles the Affairs of Spain, leaves his brother Asdrubal to command on the south-side of the Iberus, and crosses that river with a great army.

C H A P. XVII.

Hannibal, after subduing all the country between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, passes those mountains with his army, in his way to Italy. He proceeds to the banks of the Rhone without molestation. There the Gauls in vain oppose his passage; nor can the Consul Scipio, who, arriving at the mouth of the Rhone, gets notice of the place where Hannibal is, advance expeditiously enough to stop him. Scipio reembarks his forces, sends the major part of them forward to Spain, but returns himself to Italy, that he may meet Hannibal at his descent from the Alps. The Carthaginians with great danger and fatigue pass those mountains, lay siege to Turin and take it. The Romans, astonished at the news of Hannibal's being in Italy, whom they thought to have confined to Spain, dispatch orders to the Consul Sempronius, now at Lilybæum, to hasten to the defence of his country. Scipio, in the mean time, crosses the Po, and advances to meet the enemy.

C H A P. XVIII.

The Roman horse and light-armed infantry under Scipio are defeated at the TICIN by the Carthaginian cavalry. The Consul retires to the neighbourhood of Placentia: Hannibal follows him, and offers battle; which the Roman declines. Scipio distrusting the Gauls, some of whom had gone over to the enemy, removes to the high grounds near the Trebia, and there waits the arrival of his colleague.

Battle of the TICIN.

C H A P. XIX.

Sempronius having joined Scipio, and being encouraged by a slight advantage he had gained over a party of the enemy, ventures, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his colleague, to fight a pitched battle with them at the TREBIA. The Roman army is totally defeated, and all the nations of the Gauls declare for Hannibal. The Senate make vigorous preparations to support the war. Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius are raised to the Consulate, and the affairs of the Republic prosper in Spain, under the direction of Cn. Scipio. Hannibal to gain friends in Italy, dismisses, without ransom, all those of his prisoners who are of the Roman allies. Dreading the levity of the Gauls, he crosses the Apennines, and enters Hetruria through the marshes, where his army suffers extremely, and he himself loses one of his eyes.

The TREBIA.

536.

C H A P. XX.

The second year of the War.

The Lake
THRASY-MENUS.

Flaminius, raised to the Consulship by the favour of the people, fears lest the Augurs should declare his election invalid. Neglecting therefore the usual ceremonies of religion, he hastens to Ariminum, where he takes upon him the command of the forces, and from thence, at the head of four legions, marches to Arretium in Etruria. Hannibal lays an ambush for him on the banks of THE LAKE THRASYMENUS, and routs his whole army. The Consul himself is slain in the action; and, a few days after, a body of four thousand horse, that had been sent to his assistance, fall into the hands of the Enemy. Rome, terrified at these misfortunes, names Q. Fabius Maximus to be Pro-dictator, and appoints Minucius Rufus to be his General of the horse. Hannibal, in the mean time, ravages Italy, quite to Apulia. Thither Fabius follows him, but keeps on the hills, and declines a general engagement. The Carthaginian, to provoke him to fight, pillages the fine country of Campania. Hannibal, by a stratagem, deceives Fabius, who imagined that the Carthaginian would not be able to get out of Campania, a country surrounded partly by high mountains and partly by the sea. The cautious circumspective conduct of Fabius giving offence at Rome, the Comitia divide the command of the army between him and his General of the horse. Minucius, now at the head of half the troops, and proud of an advantage he had gained in an encounter with the enemy, descends into the plain, hazards a battle with Hannibal, and is on the point of being totally routed; but Fabius rescues him from danger. The two brothers Publius and Cneius Scipio, in the mean time, carry on the war with success in Spain, where the hostages which Carthage had obliged the Spaniards to give her, are betrayed into the hands of the Romans.

C H A P. XXI.

Third year of the War.

537.

CANNÆ.

C. Terentius Varro, by the intrigues of a Tribune of the people, is raised to the Consulship, and L. Æmilius Paullus is appointed his colleague. Rome, weary of dilatory arts, sends both her Consuls, at the head of a mighty army, to dispute once more with Hannibal the superiority in the field. The armies approach each other in a plain country near CANNÆ in Apulia. Æmilius, disliking the ground, advises his colleague not to fight; but Varro on a day when it is his turn to command, gives battle to the enemy, and is totally defeated with the slaughter of almost all his troops. Many of the allies of Rome go over to the conqueror.

C H A P. XXII.

Some young Romans of distinction resolving, in despair, to forsake Italy, Scipio (afterwards surnamed Africanus) obliges them to take an Oath never to abandon the Republic. And while the people of Rome are in the utmost consternation and despondency, the Senate preserve their courage, and make all possible preparations for the defence of their country. They even solemnly give thanks to Varro, for that he had not despaired of the Commonwealth. A D I C T A T O R is named to govern the State; levies are made with all diligence; the slaves are enlisted for the service; all ranks of men bring their gold and silver into the public treasury, and the silver coin is now first alloyed with copper. In the mean time, by the permission of Hannibal, a deputation from the Roman prisoners in his camp, arrives in Rome, and petitions the Senate to ransom the captives. The ConscripT Fathers deny the request. Capua, resolving to shake off the Roman yoke, demands of the Republic that Rome and Capua should, for the future, be upon a perfect equality; this proposal being rejected with disdain, the Capuans deliver up their city to Hannibal. The Carthaginian dispatches his brother Mago to Carthage, with an account of his success; the Senate vote him a supply of men and money, but are very dilatory in sending it. The Roman Dictator takes the field with a considerable army, and Hannibal, after making some fruitless attempts upon Naples and Nola, lays siege to Casilinum; the garrison of which place, after a stout defence, at length capitulates. Rome not being in a condition to provide for the fleets and armies in Sicily and Sardinia, her allies in those islands assist her by their contributions. The Senate having lost a great number of their members in the war, a Dictator is chosen for the sole business of filling the vacant places. He names 177 new Senators.

C H A P. XXIII.

Fourth year of the War.

Sempronius Gracchus and Posthumius Albinus are raised to the Consulship. The latter being cut off, together with all his army, by the Gauls, the Senate resolve to send no more armies into Gaul. Fabius Cunctator is chosen in the room of the late Consul. Hannibal enters into a treaty with King Philip of Macedon; whose Embassadors, in their return home, are taken at sea, and carried to Rome. The Senate resolve to keep the Macedonian out of Italy, by making war upon him in his own country. The Campaign in Italy passes in expeditions of no great importance, and the Romans, though they have many armies in the field, never hazard a general action against Hannibal. Their arms prosper in Sardinia and Spain. In Sicily, King Hiero being dead, his grandson and successor Hieronymus makes an alliance with Carthage, and is soon after assassinated by his own subjects.

538.

FABIUS.
CUNC-TATOR.PHILIP of Macedon.

C H A P. XXIV.

Fifth year of the War.

539.
MARCELLUS.

When the Comitia at Rome were going to raise T. Otacilius to the Consulate, Fabius, the president of the assembly, knowing the insufficiency of the candidate, hinders his election, and is himself chosen, together with Claudius Marcellus. The Roman citizens remarkably shew their zeal for the Republic. The soldiers serve without pay, and fleets are equipped at the expence of private men. Sempronius is said to have defeated an army of Carthaginians under Hanno, and Marcellus to have gained an advantage over Hannibal. Fabius besieges and takes Casilinum, while the Prætor Lævinus begins the war in Greece against King Philip.

C H A P. XXV.

ARCHI-MEDES.

Hippocrates and Epicydes, two of Hannibal's agents in Sicily, get themselves, by intrigue, chosen Prætors of Syracuse; yet the inhabitants of that city enter soon after into a league with Marcellus, then commander of the Roman army in the island. The Hannibalists, going to Leontini, persuade the Leontines to a rupture with the Romans; Marcellus takes the place at the first assault: Nevertheless the Hannibalists not only make their escape, but by artifice and singular boldness find means to return to Syracuse, with an army under their command. They are re-elected Prætors, and become absolute masters of the city. Marcellus lays close siege to it, but by the wonderful engines of Archimedes is constrained to turn the siege into a blockade.

C H A P. XXVI.

Sixth year of the War.

540.

The following year, the Romans take some towns from the Carthaginians in Italy. Hanno routs a Præfect of the Allies in Bruttium, and cuts off almost all his army. In Spain the two Scipios make considerable progress. They also engage Syphax, a Numidian King, to commence a war with the Carthaginians in Africa. The latter, in conjunction with Gala (another Numidian King) fall upon Syphax, and defeat him with great slaughter. Marcellus continues the blockade of Syracuse, and with part of his forces reduces several towns, while many others declare for Carthage.

C H A P.

C H A P. XXVII.

Seventh and eighth years of the War.

Hannibal, by means of intelligence with some of the inhabitants of Tarentum, gets possession of the city. The Roman garrison retires into the citadel. Hanno, whom the Carthaginian General had sent to supply Capua with corn, is defeated by the Consul Fulvius. Thurium, and the Metapontines submit to Hannibal's officers. The Consuls proposing to besiege Capua, send for Sempronius Gracchus to assist them. In his way he is betrayed into the hands of the enemy, and slain. Hannibal advances to the defence of Capua, and begins a battle with the Consuls, which an accident puts an end to. The Roman Generals decamp in the night; Hannibal follows one of them, but missing him, attacks another commander, Centenius Pænula, and destroys almost his whole army. After this he falls upon the Prætor Fulvius, cuts off 16,000 of his men, and takes his camp. In the mean time the Consuls, in conjunction with the forces of Claudius Nero, besiege Capua in form.

During these transactions, Marcellus makes himself master of a part of Syracuse, and encamps within the walls. An army of Carthaginians and Sicilians come to the relief of the Syracusians. A plague makes great havoc in both camps. Hippocrates and all the Carthaginian soldiers are carried off by it; and the Sicilians disband themselves. Epicydès deserts Syracuse, and the inhabitants begin a treaty with Marcellus; during the course of which, a Spanish officer, corrupted by the Roman General, betrays Ortygia to him; whereupon the Syracusians immediately surrender to him Achradina, and he gives both up to be plundered. Archimedes is slain.

Syracuse: taken.

In the Consulship of P. Sulpicius Galba and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, Hannibal marches to the relief of Capua, now greatly distress'd for want of provisions. After some vain efforts to draw the Romans to a battle, or break into the town, he suddenly marched away, and appears before the walls of Rome, in hopes the army before Capua, or part of it, would hasten to the defence of the Capital. The Consuls issue out of the city to oppose him, but keep to the high grounds. Hannibal marches back towards Capua; but finding that none of the besiegers had stirred, he turns upon the Consuls, who were following him, and forces their camp in the night, with great slaughter. Despairing of being able to raise the siege of Capua, he with wonderful rapidity traverses Apulia, Lucania, and Bruttium, in the view of surprizing Rhegium, and is very near succeeding in his design. Capua surrenders to the Romans, and is treated with extreme rigour. In Greece, Lævinus draws the Ætolians, and several other States, into a confederacy against Philip of Macedon.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ninth year of the War.

543. T. Lævinus and Marcellus are promoted to the consulship. The latter is accused by the Syracusians of cruelty and injustice, before the Senate, who acquit him. The Campanians in vain complain of the rigorous proceedings of Fulvius Flaccus. Salapia in Apulia is betrayed to Marcellus, who takes two more cities in Samnium. Fulvius Centumalus venturing a battle with Hannibal, is totally defeated. The Consul Lævinus, in the mean time, finishes the reduction of Sicily.

CHAP. XXIX.

Tenth year of the War.

544. Twelve Roman Colonies refusing to pay their contingents of men and money, the Republic does not think it advisable to attempt compulsion; and to supply the deficiencies, she has recourse to a treasure long boarded up in the Exchequer, and farms the lands of Campania for the benefit of the public. Marcellus is said to have fought three general battles with Hannibal, in three days time: in the first, the victory inclines to neither side, in the second the Carthaginians are conquerors, and in the third the Romans. Marcellus, nevertheless, is unable to keep the field while Hannibal ravages Italy, and takes prisoners a body of the enemy's troops that were besieging Caulonia. Tarentum is betrayed into the hands of the Consul Fabius, who massacres all the inhabitants of the town.

CHAP. XXX.

Eleventh year of the War.

545. The Consul Marcellus is slain in an ambush by the Numidians, and his colleague Crispinus mortally wounded. Hannibal miscarries in his attempt upon Salapia, but forces the enemy to raise the siege of Locri. Lævinus makes a descent on Africa with success, and defeats a Carthaginian fleet off Clypea. The Prætor Sulpicius carries on the war against Philip in Greece.

CHAP. XXXI.

- Asdrubal brother of Hannibal. The Romans are alarmed by the approach of Asdrubal (the brother of Hannibal) with an army from Spain. A summary account of the Roman affairs in that country, from the first landing of the Scipios there, to the time of Asdrubal's leaving it.

CHAP.

C H A P. XXXII.

Twelfth and Thirteenth years of the War.

The Consul Livius Salinator is sent to oppose Asdrubal, while the Consul, Claudius Nero, acts against Hannibal. Nero, understanding, by some intercepted letters, that Asdrubal is marching into Umbria, hastens with a detachment of his troops to join Livius. The Carthaginian, misled by his guides, is forced to hazard a battle at the Metaurus, where his whole army is routed, and he himself slain in the action. Hannibal finding it impossible to preserve all his conquests in Italy, retires into Bruttium with all his forces, where he still appears terrible to the Romans, and gains some advantages over the new Consuls.

545.

Battle of the Me-
taurus.

C H A P. XXXIII.

In Spain, where Scipio (afterwards Africanus) commands the Roman forces, one of his officers defeats two Carthaginian Generals, and he himself routs a great army of the enemy. He then sails to Africa, to persuade Syphax to break his treaty with Carthage. Falling sick, at his return to Spain, a report of his death encourages part of his army to mutiny, and some of the Spaniards to rebel. Scipio recovers, quiets the sedition, and punishes the rebels. Masinissa, a Numidian King, enters into a treaty with the Pro-Consul. The Carthaginians abandon Spain; and, there being now no open enemies to the Romans in that country, Scipio returns to Rome. He is no sooner gone than several of the Spanish nations take up arms again, but are quelled on the loss of a battle.

SCIPIO.

SYPHAX.

MASI-NISSA.

C H A P. XXXIV.

Fourteenth year of the War.

Scipio, now Consul, has Sicily assigned him for his province, but is extremely desirous of having a commission immediately to transport an army into Africa. Fabius Maximus strenuously opposes his request. The Conscrip Fathers, after a long debate, give him permission to carry the war into Africa, if he shall think it for the interest of the Republic. He equips a fleet with great expedition, embarks a body of Volunteers, and sets sail for Sicily. In the mean time, Mago, the brother of Hannibal, lands an army in Italy, takes Genoa, and gathers great numbers of the Gauls about him. Two Roman Generals march against him, but no action of moment happens. Nor is any thing of importance done in Bruttium, the plague raging in the Roman and Carthaginian camps. Scipio sends Lælius to make a descent upon Africa, and Pleminius to take possession of Locri, which the inhabitants had promised to betray to the Romans. Pleminius succeeds in his enterprize, but 548.

exercises

exercises unheard-of cruelties upon the Locrians. The Romans, terrified by prodigies, send in great devotion to fetch the Goddess Cybele from Phrygia, who works a miracle as soon as she lands.

C H A P. XXXV.

Fifteenth year of the War.

549. The Romans conclude a treaty of peace with Philip of Macedon, and his allies. Scipio, now continued in his former command, is accused in the Senate, by his Quæstor Cato, of profuseness and idleness; and, by the Locrians, of partiality to the cruel Pleminius. Commissioners are appointed to enquire into his conduct. These making a favourable report of the condition of his army, the Conscript Fathers pass a decree, that he shall immediately go into Africa.
- SOPHONISBA. Syphax is drawn off from the Roman interest, by means of his wife Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, the Carthaginian General, and enters into an alliance with Carthage. At length Scipio arrives with his army in Africa, where he is joined by Masinissa, who had been twice stripped of his dominions by Syphax. After some exploits of little importance, the Roman General lays siege to Utica, but upon the approach of Asdrubal and Syphax with two great armies, retires to a promontory near his fleet, and there entrenches himself. In Italy the campaign produces no remarkable exploit that is well vouched. The Censors Livius Salinator and Claudius Nero quarrel, and behave themselves extravagantly.
- MASINISSA.

C H A P. XXXVI.

Sixteenth year of the War.

550. Scipio, having under pretence of negotiating a treaty of peace, got perfect intelligence of the state and disposition of the Carthaginian and Numidian camps, sets fire to them in the night, and destroys the armies of Asdrubal and Syphax. The King and the Carthaginians again take the field with new forces, and are defeated in a pitched battle. Carthage dispatches messengers into Italy, to order Hannibal and Mago to the defence of their native country. In the mean time Masinissa and Lælius pursue Syphax into the heart of his dominions, vanquish him in battle, and take him prisoner. Cytha, the capital of his kingdom, surrenders to Masinissa, who, captivated by the charms of Sophonisba, promises her protection against the Romans; and, as the best means to perform his promise, marries her immediately. Syphax, being brought in chains to Scipio's camp, insinuates to the General, that Sophonisba's power over her new Husband would soon make him regardless of his engagements with the Republic. The Roman therefore insists upon Masinissa's delivering up his wife, as the captive of the people of Rome; and the Numidian, seeing no way to protect her, sends her a cup of poison, which she resolutely drinks off. Carthage, to gain time for Hannibal and Mago to arrive in Africa, proposes a treaty of peace with Scipio, and consents to the articles he dictates. Two Roman Generals, uniting their forces, obtain a victory over Mago in Insubria, who being wounded in the action, dies at sea, in his voyage to Africa. Hannibal, receiving a command from Carthage to return home, leaves Italy with great reluctance; and the Romans order public thanksgivings to the Gods for his departure. The Senate approves the conditions of peace proposed by Scipio. During the truce, the Carthaginians plunder some Roman ships, driven by storms of weather upon their coast; and afterwards offer violence to certain Embassadors whom Scipio had sent to demand satisfaction. In the mean time, Hannibal arrives safely in Africa.

Hannibal leaves Italy.

CHAP. XXXVII.

The seventeenth year of the War.

While Scipio, provoked at the perfidiousness of the Carthaginians, pursues the war with uncommon fury, Hannibal approaches with his army, and encamps near Zama. There having asked and obtained a conference with the Roman General, he proposes terms of peace, which Scipio rejects. Next day a decisive battle is fought, wherein victory declares for the Romans. Carthage makes humble supplications to Scipio for peace, and, by the advice of Hannibal, submits to the conditions proposed, which after several debates, are the next year agreed to by the Senate of Rome. Scipio having, in concert with ten commissioners, settled the affairs of Africa, returns home, has a magnificent triumph, and acquires the surname of Africanus.

551.

Battle of ZAMA.

552.

FIFTH BOOK.

From the End of the SECOND PUNIC WAR in the Year of Rome 552, to the End of the THIRD in 607.

First Macedonian War.

CHAP. I.

ROME, having broke the power of Carthage, begins to think of extending her domination to the East, and with this view seeks matter of quarrel against Philip of Macedon. On pretence that he had attacked her allies in Greece and Asia, and assisted her enemies in Africa, she declares war against him, and appoints the Consul Sulpicius to conduct it. King Philip, in the mean time, crosses the Hellespont, and besieges Abydos. There he has a conference with some Roman Embassadors, which ends without any prospect of an accommodation. After the reduction of Abydos, he returns to Greece, where the Romans had pillaged Chalcis. He makes a fruitless attempt upon Athens, and vainly endeavours to engage the Achæans in his interest.

553.

In Italy, the Prætor Fulvius defeats an army of Gauls, commanded by Hamilcar, a Carthaginian whom Mago had left in that country. Masinissa and Carthage make presents to Rome; and Vermina, the son of Syphax, is received into the favour of the Republic.

CHAP. II.

554. The Ætolians decline taking part in the War between Rome and Macedonia. After some skirmishes, Philip is defeated in battle near Oëtolophum, by Sulpicius, who then resigns his command to the Consul Villius. Philip gains a victory over the Ætolians, who had now declared for the Romans.
555. The King of Syria, at the request of the Senate of Rome, desists from the war he was carrying on against the King of Pergamus. Philip, after a fruitless conference with Flamininus (the successor of Villius) is driven from his camp by the Romans; who, after this victory, make themselves masters of several towns in Thessaly. The Achæans enter into an alliance with Rome, on a promise of having Corinth re-united to their State.

556.
FLAMINI-NUS.

Battle of Cynoccephalæ.

It is agreed between Philip, Flamininus, and the chiefs of the Roman allies, to refer all differences to the arbitration of the Roman Senate. The Fathers, not satisfied with Philip's Embassadors, give full powers to Flamininus to pursue the war, or make peace, as he shall think proper, and the war is continued. Philip, to secure Argos, which the year before had surrendered to Philocles, one of his Generals, gives it up to Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, upon condition of its being restored to him, in case he should be conqueror in the war. The Tyrant, to maintain himself in possession of the town, immediately enters into a treaty with Flamininus. This General, by a fraud, seizes upon Thebes, where the Boëotian Diet is assembled; upon which they are obliged to enter into an alliance with Rome. Attalus, King of Pergamus, dies. Philip being defeated at Cynoccephalæ, offers to submit to whatever conditions of peace the Roman Senate shall please to impose.

The Republic carries on a war with success in Gaul; but in Spain her army is routed, and the Prætor who commanded it killed in the action.

557. The Senate grant a peace to Philip, on conditions displeasing to the Ætolians. Liberty to Greece is soon after proclaimed, by order of Flamininus, at the Isthmian Games.

CHAP. III.

ANTIO-CHUS the Great.

Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, enters Thrace with an army, purposing to erect a kingdom there for one of his sons. The Romans take umbrage umbrage at the proceedings of the Syrian, and send some Embassadors to order him to quit Europe.

The Roman Ladies take infinite pains to get a Repeal of the Oppian Law, which limited the finery of their dress and equipage. Cato strenuously opposes them, yet they carry their point, by the assistance of two Tribunes of the people. 558.
Oppian Law repealed.

Cato embarks for Spain, and conducts the war with success in that country. CATO, the Elder.

Hannibal having disobliged some of the Carthaginian Nobles, by certain new regulations beneficial to the state, is, by those Nobles, accused at Rome, of holding correspondence with Antiochus. The Romans send Embassadors to Carthage, to procure the death of the accused; but he escapes the danger by flying his country, and taking refuge in the Syrian court. Hannibal escapes from Carthage to K. Antiochus.

Preparations are begun at Rome for a war against Antiochus; and, lest Nabis of Lacedæmon should join him, Flaminius has permission to turn the Roman arms against Nabis. All the Greek States, except the Ætolians, agree to assist Flaminius in this war; the chief pretence for which is, to restore freedom to Argos. Flaminius marches to Lacedæmon, and besieges it. Nabis at length submits to the conditions of peace dictated by the Roman General; and, to the dissatisfaction of the Ætolians and Achæans, is suffered to continue master of Lacedæmon. (Argos had recovered its liberty, by an insurrection of its inhabitants.) Flaminius leaves Greece and returns to Rome, where he is honoured with a triumph. Embassadors from the King of Syria arrive at Rome, to ask an alliance with the Republic. Their negotiation does not succeed; the Senate dispatches to Antiochus the same Embassadors who had been with him in Thrace. Hannibal advises him to attack the Romans in Italy, and endeavours to draw the Carthaginians into the war. The latter complain at Rome of the encroachments of Masinissa. The injustice of the Romans with regard to Carthage. 559.
560.

C H A P. IV.

The Ætolians and Nabis raise commotions in Greece. Antiochus, after some fruitless conferences with the Roman Embassadors, calls a council, in order to deliberate about a war with Rome. Hannibal, on account of his familiar intercourse with the Roman Embassadors, being suspected of favouring their cause, is not consulted. He endeavours to clear himself in a speech to the King. The Council determine for war. In Greece, Philopœmen, at the head of the Achæans, makes war with success against the Tyrant Nabis. The Ætolians pass a decree, inviting Antiochus to come into Europe. They seize upon Demetrias, and assassinate Nabis. Antiochus lands in Greece with a small army; and endeavours, without success, to bring over Chalcis and the Achæans to his party. He reduces Eubœa; and the Boeotians submit to him. Hannibal's advice with regard to the method of carrying on the war. Philip of Macedon declares for the Romans. Antiochus marries the daughter of his host, and passes the winter at Chalcis in feasting and diversions. 561.
Philopœmen.

C H A P.

C H A P. V.

War with Antiochus the Great.

562. Rome declares war against Antiochus. The Consul Acilius routs the Syrians at Thermopylae, drives their King into Asia, and reduces the Ætolians to great extremities. Flamininus takes the island Zacynthus from the Achæans. Philip recovers many places he had lost in his war with the Romans. The Ætolians obtain leave of the Consul to send deputies to Rome, to treat of peace. Livius, the Roman Admiral, obtains a victory over the Syrian fleet. The Ætolians refuse to submit to the conditions proposed by the Conscrip Fathers. Lucius Scipio the Consul, assisted by his brother Africanus, is appointed to act against Antiochus in Asia.

C H A P. VI.

Antiochus invades Pergamus, but on the news of Scipio's approach, asks a peace of the Roman Admiral. His petition is rejected. Hannibal, with a squadron of ships under his command, is blocked up in a port of Pamphylia by the Rhodians. Antiochus, after a vain attempt to engage Prusias King of Bithynia in his quarrel, orders Polyxenidas, the Syrian Admiral, to attack the Roman fleet. The Syrians are totally defeated; and the King, in a fright, withdraws his garrisons from Lysimachia in Thrace, and from Abydos, which commanded the Hellespont. The Consular army having passed into Asia without opposition, Antiochus immediately sends to Scipio proposals of peace. Not succeeding in this negotiation, he ventures a battle with the enemy, is vanquished, and submits to the conditions imposed by the Consul.

C H A P. VII.

564. The Ætolians raise new troubles in Greece. Eumenes of Pergamus asks of the Conscrip Fathers, all the countries they had taken from Antiochus. The Rhodians oppose his request. It is resolved that the conquered countries shall be divided between him and them. A peace is at length granted to the Ætolians. The Consul Manlius reduces the Gallo-Greeks in Asia. Philopœmen forces the Lacedæmonians to renounce the laws of Lycurgus, and subject themselves to those of Achaia. Ten Commissioners from Rome, in conjunction with the Proconsul Manlius, finish the treaty with Antiochus, and settle affairs in Asia. Manlius, in his return home, is attacked by a body of Thracians, and loses great part of the booty he had taken from the Gallo-Greeks.

C H A P. VIII.

566. Scipio Africanus, and his brother Lucius, are successively accused, before the Roman people, of taking bribes from Antiochus, and embezzling the public public money. Africanus refuses to answer, and at length retires to Liternum, where he dies. Lucius is condemned; and, on his refusing to pay the fine imposed, all his effects are confiscated. A society of debauchees formed at Rome, and calling themselves Bacchanalians, is suppressed and punished.

Scipio retires from Rome in disgust.
567.

C H A P. IX.

The Romans, jealous of the growing power of Philip of Macedon, send Emissaries into Greece, to take cognizance of his proceedings. They strip him of all the towns he had recovered from the Greeks, in the war with Antiochus, and order him to evacuate Ænus and Maronæa, which Eumenes claimed as appendages of Chersonesus and Lysimachia, granted to him by the Senate. Philip, to revenge himself on the people of Maronæa, who had complained of his tyranny, contrives to have a body of Thracians admitted into the town, where they exercise all the cruelties of war. The Romans expressing much dissatisfaction with the King's conduct, he resolves to employ his son Demetrius, to sooth the Conscript Fathers, with whom the young prince had acquired much favour when a hostage at Rome. Appius Claudius, the Roman Ambassador, treats the Achæans with great haughtiness, in relation to some complaints made against them by the Lacedæmonians.

568.

569.

C H A P. X.

Cato, after great opposition by the Nobles, is chosen Censor. His conduct in that office.

Cato chosen Censor.

C H A P. XI.

Many complaints are brought to Rome against Philip of Macedon. His son Demetrius pleads for him in the Senate; and, out of regard to the young Prince, the Fathers send an Ambassador into Macedon, to settle affairs with the King in an amicable manner. The Messenians break off from the Achæan association, and take up arms. Philopœmen, in a skirmish with them, is made prisoner, and afterwards put to death. Flamininus, the Roman Ambassador to Prusias of Bithynia, demands of the King to give up Hannibal, who had taken refuge in his court. The Carthaginian, to avoid falling into the hands of the Romans, puts an end to his own life, by poison.

570.

Hannibal kills himself.

C H A P. XII.

The Achæan Ambassadors having demanded of the Roman Senate assistance against the Messenians, receive a rough answer; but are civilly treated, on the news that Lycortas, the successor of Philopœmen, has reduced the Messenians to surrender at discretion. While Philip of Macedon is busy in forming projects for strengthening his kingdom; there breaks out, between his two sons Perles and Demetrius, a quarrel, which at length proves fatal to the latter.

571.

C H A P.

C H A P. XIII.

Transactions of the Romans, from the year 572 to 578.

C H A P. XIV.

PERSES
K. of Macedon.

- After the death of Philip, his son Perles succeeds him in the throne. He renews the treaty with Rome, is recognized King by the Roman Senate, and applies himself to gain the good will of the Greeks. The Bastarnæ, a nation on the Danube, who had been invited into Macedon by Philip, enter Dardania. The Romans, on this occasion, discover their jealousy of Perles. He makes a journey into Greece, and endeavours to renew the ancient friendship between the Macedonians and Achæans.*
578.
579.

C H A P. XV.

580.
581.
EUMENE-NES K. of Perga-mus.

- The Consul Popilius vanquishes the Statelliates, a people of Liguria, and treats them with great cruelty. Eumenes, King of Pergamus, accuses Perles, in the Senate of Rome, of designs against the Republic. Assassins, hired by Perles, attempt to murder the Pergamenian in his return home. Perles is accused of plotting to take off by poison certain Roman Generals and Embassadors. The Carthaginians make new complaints at Rome of Masinissa's usurpations. Some Roman Embassadors report to the Senate the ill reception they had met with at the court of Macedon.*

C H A P. XVI.

Second Macedonian War.

- Rome declares war against Perles. The dispositions of the Greek and Asiatick States at this time. At the election of Centurions for the army designed against Macedon, twenty-three of them refuse to serve, and appeal to the Tribunes of the people; but afterwards one of the appellants drops his appeal, and persuades the rest to follow his example. Embassadors from Perles sue in vain to the Conscrip Fathers for peace. The Macedonian asks a conference with Marcius the Roman Embassador in Greece, who artfully grants the King a truce, in order to gain time till the Consul should arrive with his army. It is agreed, that Perles should send Embassadors to Rome, to negotiate a peace. Marcius contrives to dissolve the Boeotian league. The Rhodians declare for the Romans. The Senate will hearken to no overtures from Perles's Embassadors.*
- 582.

C H A P. XVII.

Perles draws together his forces, enters Theffaly, takes some towns, and secures the pass of Tempe; while the Consul Licinius advances thro' Atha-mania

mania to oppose him. The King having gained a victory over the Roman cavalry and auxiliaries, Licinius, through fear, decamps in the night, and posts himself behind the river Peneus; yet he refuses a peace to the Macedonian, on any terms but his surrendering himself and his kingdom at discretion. M. Lucretius robs Gentius (an Illyrian king) of his fleet. The Roman Admiral makes himself master of Haliartus in Bœotia. Cassius the Consul, attempting to make his way from Gaul into Macedon, is recalled by the Senate. During the winter, Perſes defeats the Thracians. Epirus, or great part of it, revolts to him. The new Consul Hostilius makes two unsuccessful attempts to penetrate into Macedon. Appius Claudius is twice defeated in Illyricum. The people of Alabanda deify the city of Rome.

583.

ROME
made a Goddess.

C H A P. XVIII.

Q. Marcius, the Roman Consul, having penetrated into Macedon, Perſes in a fright abandons Dium, withdraws his garrisons from Tempe, and his guards from the passes into Macedon, orders his treasures at Pella to be thrown into the sea, and his naval stores at Theſſalonica to be burnt. The Roman General, for want of provisions, leaves his new conquest, but possesses himself of the fortresses of Tempe. Hereupon Perſes returns to Dium, repairs its fortifications, and strongly entrenches himself on the banks of the Enipeus. Polybius, at the desire of Marcius, binds the Achæans from sending a supply of soldiers to Appius Claudius in Illyricum.

584.

POLYB.

C H A P. XIX.

L. Æmilius Paullus is chosen Consul at Rome, and has the conduct of the war in Macedon assigned to him. Eumenes being dissatisfied with the Romans, Perſes endeavours to draw him from their alliance. The Pergamenian proposes, for a certain sum of money, to stand neuter; and, for a greater sum, to procure the Macedonian a peace. But, the two Kings suspecting each other of dishonesty, the negotiation breaks off. Perſes engages King Gentius of Illyricum to begin a war with Rome, and then defrauds him of a sum of money he had promised him. The Macedonian refusing to fulfil his engagements with the Bastarnæ, whom he had invited to his aid, they return into their own country.

585.

C H A P. XX.

In thirty days time, the Prætor Anicius finishes the war in Illyricum, Gentius surrenders himself and his dominions at discretion. Æmilius Paulus forces Perſes to abandon the Enipeus, and soon after defeats him in battle at Pydna. The King, deserted by his subjects, takes refuge in the Isle of Samothrace; and the whole kingdom of Macedon submits to the conqueror. Perſes, after an attempt to escape from Samothrace, surrenders himself to the Prætor Octavius, who sends him prisoner to the Consul.

ÆMILI-US PAUL-LUS.

Battle of PYDNA.

C H A P. XXI.

Antiochus Epiphan.

586.

Certain Embassadors, whom the Rhodians, in the view of mediating a peace between Perles and the Romans, had sent to Rome, are admitted to audience after the news of the victory at P. Ina, and roughly treated by the Senate. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the command of the Senate, intimated to him by their Embassador Popilius, retires from Egypt, when just upon the point of finishing the conquest of it. The Kings of Syria, Egypt, and Numidia, congratulate the Romans on their victory over Perles. Anicius reduces Epirus, and, in conjunction with five Commissioners from Rome, settles the government of Illyricum. The Proconsul Æmilius, assisted by ten Commissioners, divides the kingdom of Macedon into four cantons, independent of each other, and makes them tributary to Rome. Five hundred and fifty Ætolians being inhumanly massacred by some of their countrymen, the murderers are acquitted by Æmilius and his colleagues. Many of the Ætolians, Acarnanians, Epirots, and Bœotians, and above a thousand of the principal men of Achaia, being suspected of disaffection to the Romans, are summoned to take their trial at Rome. Æmilius dispatches his son Fabius, and Scipio Nasica, to ravage the country of the Illyrians; and in one day, by treachery, plunders seventy towns of the Epirots, and reduces 150,000 of the inhabitants to slavery. At his return to Rome, his own soldiers oppose his having a triumph; which, however, is at length granted him. Perles is sent prisoner to Alba (in the country of the Marfi) where he dies. The Senate of Rome restore to Cotys, King of the Odrysians in Thrace, his son, who had been a hostage in Macedon, and taken prisoner by Æmilius.

C H A P. XXII.

Attalus, Embassador at Rome from his brother Eumenes, is incited by some of the Fathers to ask of the Senate a part of his brother's kingdom, but is diverted from this project by one of his attendants, and thereby incurs the anger of the Senate. Though the Rhodians had condemned to death all of their countrymen who had been convicted of having done or said any thing in favour of Perles, yet the Senate of Rome refuse to give audience to their Embassadors; and the Prætor makes a motion to the people to have war declared against Rhodes. Peace, however, is granted her; but the Senate take from her Lycia and Caria, Caunus and Stratonicea. Some years after, she is admitted into an alliance with the Romans, a favour which, till the overthrow of the kingdom of Macedon, she had neither asked nor coveted. Prusias servilely flatters the Senate, who are the more gracious to him on that account. The Fathers, to avoid receiving the compliments of Eumenes, who is on his way to pay them in person, pass a decree forbidding all Kings to come to Rome.

C H A P.

C H A P. XXIII.

The Consuls obtain some advantage in the war against the Gauls and Ligurians. On complaints from Prusias and the Galatians against Eumenes, a Roman Ambassador is sent to Pergamus, wh. invites all the King's subjects to bring what accusations they please against their sovereign. Antiochus Eupator, a child of nine years old, succeeds his father Epiphanes in the throne of Syria. Demetrius (the son of Seleucus, the late King's elder brother) now a hostage at Rome, asks leave of the Senate to return home, and take possession of the kingdom of Syria. His request is refused. The Fathers send Cn. Octavius to assume the administration of the government there; and order him to burn the Syrian ships and disable the elephants. While he is executing his commission, he is assassinated at Laodicea. Demetrius, after being a second time refused leave to return home, makes his escape from Rome, arrives in Syria, and, being declared King, puts to death Eupator, and his tutor Lysias. A treaty is concluded between the Romans and the Jews, in the time of Judas Maccabæus. Demetrius having expelled Ariarathes from his kingdom of Cappadocia, and set up, in his room, Holophernes, a supposititious son of the late King of that country, Ariarathes flies to Rome for protection. The Conscrip Fathers divide Cappadocia between him and his competitor.

C H A P. XXIV.

Cato, on his return from an embassy into Africa, whither he had been sent to terminate some disputes between the Carthaginians and Masinissa, reports to the Senate, that Carthage is in a very flourishing condition, and exhorts them to destroy it. Scipio Nasica opposes him. The Consul Marcius Figulus begins a war with the Dalmatians, which is finished to the advantage of the Romans by his successor Scipio Nasica. Three eminent Orators being sent by the Athenians on an embassy to Rome, and the Roman youth flocking to hear their discourses, Cato prevails with the Senate to give the Embassadors a speedy answer, and dismiss them. Prusias having, on the death of Eumenes, invaded Pergamus, the Senate of Rome obliged him to make good the damage he had done, and to pay a fine.

The Roman armies pass the Alps for the first time, and subdue the Oxybii and the Deciatae. The long quarrels between the two Ptolemies of Egypt are terminated by the victories and the clemency of the elder. On occasion of some commotions in Spain, the Consuls at Rome enter upon their office on the first of January. Alexander Balas, an impostor, pretending to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, sets himself up against Demetrius King of Syria, and is countenanced by the Romans. Demetrius is slain in battle, and the impostor is recognized king.

C H A P. XXV.

602. The Carthaginians are reduced very low by the arms of Mafiniffa ; Utica withdraws herself from their obedience ; and Rome lays hold of the opportunity
 603. of their distresses to declare war against them.

C H A P. XXVI.

Third Punic War.

First and Second Years of the War.

604. The Carthaginians, by their Embassadors, surrender themselves to the Roman Senate at discretion, and are promised to be continued in possession of their liberty, laws, territories and effects ; on condition of their giving 300 hostages, and obeying the orders of the Consuls, then in Sicily in their way to Africa. These Consuls having, in Sicily, received the hostages, pass into Africa. They require of the Carthaginians to deliver up all their arms ; and when this demand is complied with, signify to them, that they must abandon the city of Carthage, which Rome is determined to demolish. Upon notice of this cruel injunction, the inhabitants shut their gates, and resolve to sustain a siege. By indefatigable diligence they furnish themselves with new arms ; and, when attacked, repulse the Romans.
605. Mafiniffa dying, leaves his kingdom to be divided among his sons at the pleasure of Scipio Æmilianus.
The Romans make no progress in the siege of Carthage.
One Andriscus appears in Macedon, calls himself the son of Perfes, takes the name of Philip, and is acknowledged King by the Macedonians. He defeats the Roman Prætor Juventius Thalna, but is himself defeated by Metellus, and forced to fly into Thrace, where one of the petty Kings delivers him up to the enemy. A second Impostor, pretending also to be a son of Perfes, is driven by Metellus into Dardania.
- Philip the Impostor.

C H A P. XXVII.

Third and Fourth Years of the War.

606. Scipio Æmilianus is sent Consul into Africa. He restores discipline among the soldiers. The greater part of Africa submits to him, and Carthage is straitned for want of provisions. Asdrubal, who commands in the town, proposes conditions of peace, which are rejected. Carthage is taken, the people sold for slaves, and the town demolished. Scipio, in conjunction with ten Commissioners from Rome, orders all the towns which had taken part with the enemy to be razed, and reduces the dominions of the African Republic into the form of a Prætorian province.
- SCIPIO ÆMI-BIANUS.
607.
CAR-THAGE taken and destroyed.

SIXTH BOOK.

From the end of the THIRD PUNIC WAR, in the year of Rome 607, when Carthage was destroyed, and the ROMAN POWER became irresistible, to the death of the younger GRACCHUS, in 632, the true date of the destruction of ROMAN LIBERTY.

CHAP. I.

THE imprudent behaviour of the Achæans draws upon them a war with Rome. They are defeated in battle by Metellus, and afterwards by Mummius, who demolishes Corinth, Chalcis, and Thebes. Greece is reduced into the form of a Roman province.

CHAP. II.

A summary account of the actions of the Romans in Spain, from the year 558 to the year 600. The Roman Senate forbid the Segedensis, a people of Celtiberia, to enlarge their town, and, they not obeying, a Consular army under Fulvius Nobilior is sent against them; whereupon they take refuge among the Arvaci, another people of Celtiberia, whose capital was Numantia. The two nations jointly carry on the war with advantage. The Consul Marcellus [in 601.] permits the Arvaci to send deputies to Rome to ask a peace; and, though their petition is rejected by the Senate, yet he concludes a treaty with them. His successor Lucullus, without any provocation, invades the country of the Vaccæi, and there behaves himself cruelly and perfidiously. In FURTHER SPAIN the Lusitanians [in 602.] rout the forces of the Roman Prætor Galba. He afterwards treacherously massacres many thousands of them, who had submitted to him on conditions. Vetilius, the successor of Galba, [in 604.] having gained some advantage over the Lusitanians, and forced them into a place whence they could not easily retreat, Viriatus, then a private soldier, saves them by a stratagem, and is declared their General. He soon after defeats Vetilius, who is taken prisoner and slain. Viriatus is victorious over the Roman Generals, in every action, for three years successively.

VIRIAT-TUS.

CHAP. III.

The Consul Fabius (Brother to Scipio Æmilianus) being sent into Further Spain, leaves his Quæstor to discipline the army, and makes a journey of devotion to Gades. In the mean time, Viriatus vanquishes the Romans in battle.

608.

A regulation is made at Rome, that the six Prætors shall continue in the city during the year of their office; two of them to take cognizance of civil causes, as formerly; and the other four, to try criminal causes: and that after the expiration of their year they shall repair to their respective provinces abroad.

609.

Fabius obtains a victory over Viriatus; who afterwards defeats Quinctius the successor of Fabius.

610.

The Consul Appius Claudius contrives to kindle a war with the Salassi, and gains a victory; but having lost a battle before, the Senate refuse him a triumph. He nevertheless triumphs, and during the procession his daughter, a Vestal, protects him from being insulted by a Tribune.

His

- His colleague Metellus renews the war in Celtiberia. Next year, by a remarkable act of humanity, he engages several towns to join it to the Romans. The Consul Servilianus loses a battle against Viriatus in Further Spain. A third Macedonian impetor prevails with the people of that country to take arms in his cause. Tremellius a Roman Quæstor by one victory finishes the war.

CHAP. IV.

612. The Consul Pompeius in Hither Spain, successively besieges Numantia and Numantia Termantia, but quits both enterprizes with loss and discomfiture. In the Further Province, Servilianus, now Proconsul, concludes a treaty of peace with Viriatus, which is confirmed at Rome. Servilius Scæpio, one of the Consuls of the next year, obtains leave of the Senate to break this peace, and afterwards hires assassins to murder Viriatus. They dispatch him in his sleep. The Lusitanians chase another general, but he is soon obliged to yield up himself and his army to the Consul.

CHAP. V.

- Pompeius having again laid siege to Numantia with no better success than before, concludes a peace with the Numantines, but afterwards denies the fact. The matter being brought before the Senate of Rome, they resolve to continue the war. 614. Gabinius, a Tribune of the people, gets a law passed for balloting in the election of magistrates; a method of voting, that was afterwards introduced in civil and criminal causes, and in making and repealing laws. 615. The Romans, under the Pro-consul Popilius, are routed by the Numantines. 616. These, the next year, gain a signal victory over the Consul Mancinus, who, to save the remains of his army, enters into a treaty with the enemy. The Conscrip Fathers refuse to adhere to the treaty, and order Mancinus to be delivered up to the Numantines, by way of satisfaction. Brutus, who had come into Further Spain in 615, reduces several nations of the Lusitanians, and afterwards the Gallæci. He joins his forces to those of Æmilius, the successor of Mancinus. Both armies are defeated by the Palantines. 618. The Consuls Furius and Calpurnius, who are successively sent against the Numantines, perform nothing memorable. Fulvius subdues the Ardæans, a maritime people of Illyricum.

CHAP. VI.

619. Scipio Æmilianus (a second time Consul) commands the army in Spain, and brings it under good discipline. The next year he invests Numantia. The 620. besieged, reduced to the utmost extremities by famine, set fire to their town, and destroy their wives, their children, and themselves.

CHAP. VII.

- The Agrarian law of Licinius Stolo, forbidding any Roman to possess more than five hundred acres of the public lands, being fallen into neglect, to the great detriment of the Commonwealth, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, a Tribune of the Commons, undertakes to cure the evil by a new law. His design, tho' approved by some of the most virtuous men in Rome, is much disliked by the generality of the great and the rich, who prevail upon M. Octavius, one of the the Tribunes, to oppose the proceeding of his colleague. The people, at the instigation of Tiberius, depose Octavius from his office, and then pass the new law. Triumvirs are appointed to make the distribution of the lands in question. The Romans, in consequence of the last will of Attalus Philometor, King of Pergamus, having laid claim to his dominions, Tiberius proposes, that the King's treasures be divided amongst the poorer citizens of Rome, and declares, that his towns and territories shall be disposed of by the Comitia. In a speech to the people, he vindicates his proceedings against Octavius. He stands candidate for a second Tribuneship. On the day of election Scipio Nasica and the Senate, in a body, followed by a multitude of clients and slaves, armed with clubs, fall furiously upon the Tribune and his adherents. He is slain in the tumult, together with above three hundred of his followers. Their dead bodies are thrown into the Tiber; many of the friends of Tiberius are banished, and many put to death without a trial. The Senate, to pacify the people, permit Caius Gracchus's father-in-law to be chosen one of the triumvirs for dividing the lands, in the room of Tiberius. To screen Nasica from a trial before the people, they send him into Asia, where he dies. Some reflections on the conduct of Tiberius Gracchus.

C H A P. VIII.

The slaves in Sicily, having broke out into rebellion, vanquish several Roman Prætors, but are routed by the Consul Calpurnius Piso, whose successor, Rupilius, finishes the war with the destruction of the rebels. P. Licinius Crassus Consul and Pontifex Maximus is sent into Asia, against Aristonicus (a bastard brother of Attalus the late King) who had taken possession of the throne of Pergamus. Two plebeians are chosen Censors for the first time. Crassus is defeated, falls alive into the hands of the enemy, and is killed by a Thracian soldier. Next year, the Consul Perperna vanquishes Aristonicus, takes him prisoner, and sends him to Rome. Atinius Labeo, a Tribune of the people, makes an outrageous attempt upon the person of the Censor, Metellus Macedonicus. The same Atinius procures a law ordaining, that the Tribunes of the people shall be Senators. M. Aquilius, by the basest methods, finishes the conquest of Pergamus, after which, in conjunction with ten commissioners, he reduces it into the form of a province.

Servile War in Sicily.
621.
622.

623.

624.

C H A P. IX.

The Roman Senate, at the motion of Scipio Æmilianus, takes from the Triumvirs the right of judging in causes, relating to the resumption of the public lands, and transfers it to the Consul Sempronius; who soon after leaves the city on pretence of a rebellion in Iapidia a canton of Illyricum. Scipio dies suddenly, which occasions surmises about the cause of his death. The Consul is vanquished in battle by the Iapidians, but afterwards obtains a victory over them, for which he triumphs. Nothing very remarkable happens at Rome in the two succeeding years.

Scipio Æmil. dies.

625.

626.

627..

In 627 Caius Gracchus goes Quæstor into Sardinia with the Consul Aurelius, who is sent thither to quell a revolt. Caius persuades the allied cities in that island to furnish clothes for the Roman army, though the Senate, at their request, bad.

628. had freed them from that burden. Fulvius Flaccus, a friend of Caius, being raised to the Consulship, proposes a law for granting the rights of Roman citizenship to the Italian allies, but drops his enterprize to undertake an expedition against the Saluvii, a nation of Transalpine Gaul, who had made incursions into the territory of Marseilles. The Prætor L. Opimius raises the town of Fragellæ, to punish the inhabitants for a plot they had formed to shake off the Roman yoke.
629. Caius Gracchus returns to Rome from Sardinia, is accused before the Censors
630. of a misdemeanor, in leaving his General, and is acquitted. Being chosen Tribune, he, to the great mortification of the nobility, obtains several laws advantageous to the Commons. In the mean time the Consul Metellus subdues the inhabitants of the Balleares. Sextius Calvinus, one of the Consuls for the last year, having reduced the Saluvii, builds Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix in Provence) and there establishes a Roman colony.
- CAIUS
GRAC-CHUS.

C H A P. X.

631. Caius Gracchus is chosen Tribune a second time, and by his credit with the people, obtains the Consulship for C. Fannius Strabo, in opposition to L. Opimius. The Tribune transfers the right of judicature, from the Senators to the Roman knights; ordains that the Senate shall, before every election of chief magistrates, determine what provinces shall be Consular and what Prætorian; plants new colonies; and gives the freedom of Rome to the Italian allies. Drusus, one of his Colleagues, being gained over to the party of the Senate, endeavours by unworthy methods to make them gracious among the people, and to supplant Caius in their esteem. The latter goes into Africa, at the head of a colony, in order to rebuild Carthage. On his return to Rome he proposes several new laws. Many of the Italians flocking to the city to give their votes, the Consul Fannius publishes an edict, forbidding any of the allies to appear within five miles of Rome, till the Comitia shall have determined concerning the laws in question. Caius stands candidate for the Tribuneship a third time, and loses his election. L. Opimius being raised to the Consulship, purposes to get several of Caius's laws repealed. Antyllus, one of the Consul's Lictors, is
632. slain, by some of the followers of Fulvius Flaccus, one of the Triumvirs, a warm opposer of the measures of Opimius. The Senate, as if the commonwealth were in the utmost danger, vest Opimius with a dictatorial power. He commands the Senators and Knights to take arms. Next morning Fulvius and his party possess themselves of the Aventine hill. Caius persuades them to send to the Consul, and propose an accommodation. Opimius disdains to treat, and advancing with his troops, disperses the followers of Caius and Fulvius. These two Romans, with many others, are slain, and their dead bodies thrown into the Tiber. Opimius builds a temple to Concord: the people raise statues to the Gracchi, and worship before them. The Agrarian law is repealed; and the rich get possession of the public lands.

A
D I S S E R T A T I O N
O N T H E
C R E D I B I L I T Y of the H I S T O R Y of the first 500 Y E A R S of R O M E.

THE famous Turenne, (as we learn from the history of his life) when he was about 12 years old, sent a challenge to an officer, who had affronted him, by saying, that Quintus Curtius's history of Alexander the Great was a mere romance. I do not wish, that our young gentlemen, who have begun to delight themselves in the Roman History, should carry their resentments so far against M. de Beaufort, author of a work, intitled, Dissertation sur l'Incertitude des cinq premiers siècles de l'Histoire Romaine^a: yet I think they may reasonably look upon him as an enemy, who seeks to deprive them of a considerable part of their pleasures; and that they ought to be upon their guard against him. And, for my own part, I cannot readily consent to have my grave remarks upon certain passages of the history reduced to the importance of those, by which some industrious chronologer should fix the precise year when Noah's grand-daughter Cesara fled into Ireland to escape the deluge. For the sake therefore of us Romanists, I once purposed to have gone through the whole of M. de B.'s Dissertation, and to have attempted to shew the insufficiency of his citations and his reasonings for discrediting the Roman History of the first 500 years, as to the main and fundamentals of it: For much of the embroidery and flourishing may be given up without parting with the ground-work^b. But the execution of that design would stretch this Discourse to too great a length;

Ramsay's life of the Viscount de Tourenne.

Topog.
Hibern. p.
135, 136.
apud M. de Poullis.

^a A Dissertation on the uncertainty of the history of the first five ages of Rome.

^b That the Romans had, with the neighbouring states, the successive wars which Livy has recorded; that these wars followed one another in the order given them by Livy, and had the final events which he has mentioned, may surely be admitted by a reader, not over credulous, and who at the same time will, in his own mind, naturally abate somewhat of the complete victories and numerous triumphs, with which Livy has adorned his history, in compliance with the vanity of his countrymen. For, that the Roman vanity has now and then prevailed to the misrepresentation of facts, is too manifest, from several passages in the Latin Historian; some regarding the earlier, some the later ages of Rome. The fortunate effect of the unsuccessful enterprize of Mucius against Porfenna's life, and the marvellous exploit of Camillus against the Gauls, when, at the foot of the Capitol, they were selling a peace to the Romans, are remarkable instances of the power of this vanity. And that it had its influence in Livy's relations of the war of Hannibal, and the Spanish war, is shewn in Book IV. Chap. XVI. and other parts of this Volume.

and I conceive, that to those who have perused M. L' Abbé Sallier's^a Defence of the history against the attacks of M. de Pouilli, any further defence is unnecessary. However, as the discourses of that able champion of our cause have, I think, neither been printed apart from the other pieces in the Memoires de Litterature, nor translated into English, and therefore may not have fallen into the hands of many persons, who may have met with M. de B.'s Dissertation, which is translated, I shall just mention some particulars, in which I apprehend the chief strength of M. L' Abbé Sallier's arguments to be couched; and then make some brief remarks on M. de B.'s principal positions in his attempt to refute those arguments.

M. L'Abbé
Sallier 18
and 30 Dico.

1. It is beyond all belief, that Varro^c, the most learned Roman of the most learned age of Rome, should employ his studies and his labours upon the antiquities of his country, in order to dispel the obscurity cast upon the history of the earliest ages, unless there were means of attaining to certainty, or a high degree of probability, with regard to many things that passed in those ages.

2. It is no less incredible, that Cicero should ^c design, and Livy undertake

See Me-moires de Litterature,
&c. Tom. 3.
edit. Am-sterd.

Pref. p. vii.

^a It was the controversy [in 1722, 23, 24, 25] between these two very learned and very eloquent gentlemen, members of the Royal French Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, which gave occasion to M. de Beaufort's Dissertation sur l'Incertitude des cinq premiers siècles de l'histoire Romaine. Not content with the efforts made by M. de Pouilli, who, he thinks, has treated a little too superficially a matter which deserved to be examined to the bottom, he, without neglecting M. de Pouilli's arguments, endeavours to supply his deficiencies, and to prove, even to Demonstration, the Uncertainty, &c. [Je crois avoir démontré, d'une manière très claire, l'incertitude qui regne sur le sens lequel a précédé la prise de Rome par les Gaulois, et la destruction de ses murumens, qui en fut une suite naturelle. Il est vrai, que cela ne prouve rien à l'égard du siècle juivars, sur lequel j'ai cru pouvoir prendre cette incertitude, à cause de la confusion, qui regne encore par rapport à divers evenemens.] In 1738 Mr. de Beaufort gave the first edition of his Dissertation; an English translation of which was published in 1740. His second edition of it, revised, corrected, and considerably augmented, bears date 1750. 'Tis to the pages of the latter the references are made.

N. B. M. de Beaufort gives up one argument, in which M. de Pouilli expatiates, drawn from the work called, The Parallel of Plutarch, a work of which M. l'Abbé Sallier has totally destroyed the credit.

^b Of Varro, Cicero thus writes.

Nos in nostra urbe peregrinantes errantesque tanquam hospites, tui libri quasi domum deduxerunt, ut possemus aliquando qui, et ubi effemus agnoscere; tu civitatem patriæ, tu descriptiones temporum, sedem locorum, tu sacrorum jura, tu domesticam, tu bellicam disciplinam, tu omnium divinarum humanarumque rerum nomina, genera, officia, causas aperuisti. Acad. 1. c. 3.

^c Cicero, says Dr. Middleton, was meditating a general history of Rome, to which he was frequently urged by his friends, as the only man capable of adding that glory to his country, of excelling the Greeks in a species of writing, which, of all others, was at that time the least cultivated by the Romans. But he never found leisure to execute so great a task; yet has sketched out a plan of it, which, short as it is, seems to be the best that can be formed for the design of a perfect history.

He declares it to be the first and fundamental law of history, that it should neither dare to say any thing that was false, nor fear to say any thing that was true, nor give any just suspicion either of favour or disaffection: that in the relation of things, the writer should observe the order of time, and add also the description of places: that in all great and memorable transactions, he should first explain take a history of the earliest ages of Rome, if they had no authentic records, no solid materials for their ground work; and this in an age, of which Cicero says^b, that it was too knowing, too much enlightened to be imposed upon by fictions and persuaded to believe absurdities.

3. Cicero in six books which he wrote concerning the commonwealth, gave a particular and circumstantial account of the customs and maxims of ancient Rome, à primo urbis ortu, its domestic and military discipline.

4. We have the express testimony of Cicero for the existence, in his time, of the PONTIFICAL ANNALS^d, which were begun almost as early as the birth of the state, and continued to the time of P. Mucius, the High Priest, who lived in the 7th century of Rome. Varro, in his books concerning the Latin tongue, gives us many fragments of these annals.

5. Since it was the custom in the latter times of the republic to record the acts of the senate and of the magistrates; it is probable that the same custom was observed in the former. And it seems unquestionable from a

L. 12. Ep.
25. ad Cor-
nif. L. 11.
Ep. 25. ad
Brut.

plain the councils, then the acts, lastly the events: that in the councils he should interpose his own judgment on the merit of them: in the acts, should relate not only what was done, but how it was done: in the events, should shew, what share chance, or rashness, or prudence, had in them: that in regard to persons, he should describe, not only their particular actions, but the lives and characters of all those who bear an eminent part in the story: that he should illustrate the whole in a clear, easy, natural stile; flowing with a perpetual smoothness and equability; free from the affectation of points and sentences, or the roughness of judicial pleadings. De Orator. 2. 15. Middleton's Life of Cicero, Vol. 2. p. 528.

^a Res immensi operis, ut quæ supra septingentesimum annum repetatur, &c. Liv. Pref.

^b Ut jam doctis hominibus, ac temporibus ipsis eruditis fingendum vix quicquam esset loci. Antiquitas enim recipit fabulas, fidas etiam nonnunquam incondite: hæc ætas autem jam exulta præsertim et eradita omne quod fieri non potest respuit. Frag. Lib. 3. de Repub.

^c Nec enim hic locus est ut de moribus, institutisque majorum, et disciplina ac temperatione civitatis loquamur: aliis hæc locis accuratè satis dicta sunt, maximèque in his sex libris quos de republica scripsimus. Lib. 4. Tusc. c. 1.

^d Erat enim historia nihil aliud nisi annuum consuetudo. Cujus rei memoriæque publicæ retinendæ causa, ab initio rerum Romanarum usque ad Publium Mucium Pontificem Maximum res omnes singulorum annorum litteris mandabat P. Maximus, referebatque in album, et proponebat tabulam domi ut esset potestas populo cognoscendi, ii que etiam nunc annales maximi nominantur. Hanc similitudinem scribendi multi secuti sunt qui sine ullis ornamentis monumenta solum temporum hominum locorum, gestarumque rerum reliquerunt. Itaque qualis apud Græcos, Phercydes, Hællanicus, Acusilaus fuit, alique permulti; talis noster Cato, et Pictor, et Piso, qui neque tenent, quibus rebus ornatur oratio (modo enim huc ista sunt importata) et dum intelligatur, quid dicant, unam dicendi laudem putant esse, breviter.

Abest enim historia litteris nostris, ut et ipse intelligo, et ex te persæpe audio. Potes autem tu profecto satisfacere in ea, quippe cum sit opus, ut tibi quidem videri solet, unum hoc oratorium maximè. Quamobrem aggredere, quæsumus, et sume ad hanc rem tempus, quæ est a nostris hominibus adhuc aut ignorata, aut relicta. Nam post annales pontificum maximorum, quibus nihil potest esse * jucundius: sit aut ad Fabiam, aut ad eum, qui tibi semper in ore est, Catonem, aut ad Pisonem, aut ad Fannium, aut ad Vennonium venias: quamquam ex his alius alio plus habet virium, tamen quid tam exile, quam isti omnes.

Unde autem facilius quam ex annalium monumentis aut res bellica, aut omnes republicæ disciplina cognoscitur? Unde ad agendum aut dicendum copia depromi major gravissimorum exemplorum, quasi incorruptorum testimoniorum potest? Frag. Cic. in Hortens.

De leg.
Lib. 1. c. 2.

* Doubtless
jejunius.
See Taylor's Elements of Civ. Law.
p. 79.

* Lib. 2. de Orat. 12.

yet there remained good memorials and original pieces sufficient for composing a credible history ^a of the earliest ages of Rome.

14. Tradition alone was sufficient whereon to found a reasonable and full belief of many facts in the Roman story; such, for example, as the shameful defeat of the Romans near the Caudine Forks; and the seditions and secessions of the Plebeians on occasion of the cruelties exercised by the rich towards the poor. [This is a concession made by M. de Pouilli.]

15. The fables which are found interspersed in the writings of the Roman historians ought not to ruin the credit of the history of the first ages of Rome, as to the essentials of it; though the historians should seem to have adopted those fables or facts. Livy^b warns us not to be over credulous with regard to several old stories of the marvellous kind, and Cicero ridicules them.

L. 2. de Divin. &
L. 1. de leg.

16. And Atticus^c had successfully laboured to rectify the mistakes in some family-memoirs, concerning the succession of the magistrates, and the origins of families, mistakes, occasioned by ignorance or vanity; and he could have had no success in such an attempt, had he been destitute of all sure guides to the truth.

If any reader desires to see these, and several other particulars, relating to the same subject, learnedly and ingeniously discussed, I shall refer him to the discourses at large of M. L' Abbé Sallier in the Memoires de Litterature.

BEFORE I take notice of M. de Beaufort's positions, I must frankly confess that I am not well qualified to dispute against his opinion, concerning the Roman History; because I cannot, by his Dissertation, discover with certainly what his opinion is.

I know not whether, in his judgment, we may reasonably reject the WHOLE^d history of the first 500 years of Rome as groundless and fabulous.

Or

^a Quæ ab conditâ urbe ad captam eandem urbem Romani sub regibus primùm, consulibus deinde ac dictatoribus, decemvirisque ac tribunis consularibus gessere foris bella, domi seditiones, quinque libris exposui. L. 6. c. 1.

^b — Omnis expers curæ, quæ scribentis animum, etsi non flectere à vero, sollicitum tamen efficere possit. Quæ ante conditam, condendamve urbem, poeticis magis decora fabulis, quam incorruptis rerum gestarum monumentis traduntur, ea nec affirmare nec refellere in animo est. Liv. in Præf.

Speaking of the Curtian Lake, and how it came to be so called. Cura non deesset, si qua ad verum via inquirentem ferret; nunc fama rerum standum est, ubi certam derogat vetustas fidem. Liv. Lib. 7. c. 6.

^c Laborem nobis Attici nostri levavit labor; sic familiarum originem subtexuit, ut ex eo clarorum virorum propagines possimus cognoscere. Cic. in Orat. et Corn. Nep. in Attic.

^d Attendu le peu de soin qu'on a eu de transmettre à la posterité la mémoire des evenemens, dans le tems, qu'ils arrivoient, nous sommes fondés, en voiant une histoire suivie de quatre siècles, de rejeter LE TOUT, ou du moins la plus grande partie comme forgée à plaisir.

Ce n'est pas que je veuille revoquer en doute généralement tous les evenemens de ce siècle [le cinquième,] pour quelques traits fabuleux dont ils se trouvent accompagnés, ou parce qu'il y en a plusieurs qui sont manifestement faux. Mon intention est seulement de faire voir, que divers faits des plus marqués, et des plus importans, se trouvant faux, et le fruit de la vaine gloire des Romains, les autres doivent nous être suspects. J'en tire encore de nouveaux motifs de douter de l'Histoire des siècles précédens, laquelle, à plus forte raison, doit paroître fabuleuse et forgée après coup. P. 359.

Ces.

Or should reject only almost all.

Or may stop when we have rejected the greater part.

Or, rejecting some passages of the history as utterly false, should call in question, doubt of, suspect all the rest: [le revoquer en question, en douter, le tenir pour suspect.]

This last, from a great number of passages^a in his Dissertation, one would imagine to be his real opinion. And yet now and then he seems to slide into belief, and even into certainty, without being aware of it. He has great faith in what Polybius relates of the Romans in the early times of the Republic; and admits, as indubitable, several facts, for which the other historians are his only vouchers. Thus, for example, Dissert. p.

209.

"It is certain^b that Servius [Tullius] augmented the number of the Tribes."

P. 329.

"Certain it is, that from this time Porfenna did not treat the Romans as enemies, but as old allies or as good subjects."

See p. 33.

And M. de B.'s arguments for disbelieving some facts in the Roman story, or doubting of them, are frequently drawn from the certainty of others, particularly of the Treaties.

Dissert. part.
2. ch. 10.

I cannot but take notice, that, with regard to the story of King Brennus the Gaul, M. de B. seems not to doubt of these facts. 1. That the Gauls totally routed the Roman army in the field. 2. That they presently after possessed themselves of Rome. 3. That they burnt the city. 4. That the old historical records and monuments were most of them consumed in the flames. 5. That the capitol was saved. 6. That several antient monuments, being there deposited, were preserved with it. 7. That the Gauls sold a peace to the Romans, and departed without loss. Here are then, in the history of this one affair, seven important facts which M. de B. seems fully to believe. And what is it he objects to? Why, to Livy's

Ces caracteres de fausseté suffiroient à bien des gens pour leur faire rejeter cette Histoire, sans plus d'examen; mais je ne veux pas me prevaloir de cet avantage. Ce n'est que sur l'autorité des écrivains les plus célèbres, et les plus accrédités que je veux m'appuyer pour en douter. Et, afin qu'on ne m'accuse pas d'en douter trop légèrement, je me retranche à ne trouver cette histoire obscure et incertaine, que parce qu'ils la trouvent telle eux-mêmes. p. 10.

^a De-là je conclus—que nous sommes fondés à tenir pour fort suspect TOUT ce qu'en nous raconte des quatre ou cinq premiers siècles de Rome.

La seconde partie sera destinée à l'examen de certain faits des plus marqués, et qui figurent le plus dans l'Histoire Romaine: l'incertitude ou la fausseté desquels, étant bien prouvée, donnera une nouvelle force aux raisons que l'on a de revoquer en doute

TOUTE cette Histoire,—je me flatte, que ceux qui se dépouilleront de leurs préjugés conviendront qu'il n'y a rien de plus incertain que TOUT ce corps d'Histoire des premiers siècles de Rome. p. 11, 12.

Il faut absolument, qu'on en vienne à dire, que ces traités sont supposés, ce qu'on ne peut faire sans de fortes raisons (et je ne vois pas qu'on ait aucune pour douter de leur authenticité) ou que l'on convienne de bonne foi, que TOUT ce qu'on nous debite dans l'Histoire Romaine n'est qu'incertitude, et qu'on n'y peut compter sur rien. p. 43.

^b Il est sur que Servius en augmenta le nombre [des tribus.]

Ce qu'il y a de sur, c'est que, dès lors, Porfenna n'en usa plus avec les Romains, comme avec des ennemis, et qu'au contraire il les traita en anciens alliés, ou en bons sujets.

relation

relation of Camillus's wonderful arrival in the critical moment to save the Romans from the disgrace of living on the foot of a ransomed people; and his destroying the whole army of the Gauls. But this relation, romantic in the air of it, and discovered by Polybius's account to be a mere fiction of Roman vanity, can never be thought a good reason for questioning the truth of every thing that Livy has related of the earliest ages of Rome; and much less for regarding the whole Roman History of the first 500 years, as fabulous or uncertain. For when M. de B. speaks of the uncertainty of the Roman History, I suppose he means, or ought to mean, the uncertainty of the best and least exceptionable accounts of the Roman affairs, that can be collected from the several antient writers who have treated the subject.

We shall presently see, that one of M. de B.'s reasons for his incredulity is, that the Roman Historians (the earliest of whom lived in the sixth century from the building of Rome) wanted means to know the truth. Yet he gives credit to Polybius's relation of the wars between the Romans and Gauls, from the time of Brennus, to that of Pyrrhus; and if he thinks it reasonable to believe Polybius on this part of the Roman History, he must allow that there were means of coming at the truth of it, whether Livy, and the prior historians whom he followed, made use of them or not.

BUT whatever be the real opinion of M. de B. concerning the Roman History of the first 500 years, he has advanced (if I mistake him not) the following propositions.

I. "THE ROMANS were an obscure people, confined, during four centuries, to a little corner of Italy; and the continual exercise of arms, and husbandry (the only sciences they professed) hindered them from having the^a Thought of transmitting the memory of events to posterity." Dissert. p. 6.

II. "AND, if they had thought of perpetuating the memory of what passed among them, they were universally so illiterate, that nobody was capable of writing history, or transmitting the events to posterity by sure and exact memorials^b." P. 15. Personne n'étoit capable, &c.

III. "THE

^a — l'empêcha de songer à transmettre à la postérité des evenemens, qui dans le fond, ne sont devenus interessans, que par le haut degré de gloire, auquel ses descendans se sont élevés par leurs conquêtes.

^b M. de B. cites a passage from Livy, (B. vii. c. 3.) to prove that even in the end of the 4th century, WRITING was very little in use. "Raræ per ea tempora litteræ, on faisoit peu d'usage de l'écriture dit Tite Live en parlant de la fin du quatrième siècle." M. de B. adds, "Indeed they must have been very little solicitous in those times to preserve the memory of events, since, instead of all other Annals, they were content with driving a nail every year in-

"to the wall of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus; and this was the sole expedient they could have for fixing the chronology, [c'étoit là toute la ressource qu'on pouvoit avoir pour fixer la chronologie] as the same historian informs us in the same place." He proceeds; "Had this been practised from the foundation of Rome, it might have been of great use for settling the true Æra of the city. But the practice could not commence before the temple was dedicated, which was not till after the expulsion of Tarquin; and it had suffered a long interruption. It was renewed in the end of the fourth century of Rome, not because they found
" it

P. 12, 55.

III. "THE PONTIFICAL ANNALS, or historical part of the pontifical books, and the other monuments public and private, which could have given some
" cer-

" it mentioned in any record or ritual, (for
" they made so little use of letters, that " they had neither books nor records) but
" on account of a tradition almost for" gotten, ex seniorum memoriâ repetitum."
[it was recalled to mind by some old men, &c.]

As great use is made of the passage in Livy, referred to by M. de B. for proving the extremely illiterate state of the Romans, during many years after the commencement of the Republic, I shall here transcribe the passage at length. The historian is speaking of the year 392 (or, according to the Capitoline Marbles, 390) when Rome was grievously afflicted with the plague.

Cn. Genucio, L. Æmilio Mamercino secundum consulibus, quem piaculorum magis conquisitio animos quam corpora morbi afficerent, repetitum ex seniorum memoria dicitur, pestilentiam quondam clavo ab dictatore fixo sedatam. Ea religione adductus Senatus, dictatorem clavi figendi causa dici jussit. Dictus L. Manlius imperiosus, L. Pinarium Magistratum Equitum dixit. Lex vetusta est prisca litteris, verbisque scripta, ut qui Prætor Maximus sit. Idibus Septembribus clavum pangat. Fixus [most of the manuscripts have fixa *] fuit dextro lateri ædis Jovis optimi maximi, ea ex parte qua Minervæ templum est. Eum clavum, quia rare per ea tempora litteræ erant, notam numeri annorum fuisse ferunt: eoque Minervæ Templo dicatam legem, quia Numerus Minervæ inventum sit. Volsinii quoque clavos indices numeri annorum, fixos in templo Nortie Etruscæ Deæ, comparere, diligens talium monumentorum auctor Cincius affirmat. M. Horatius consul, ex lege Templum Jovis optimi maximi dedicavit, anno post reges exactos: à consulibus postea ad dictatores, quia majus imperium erat, solenne clavi figendi translatum est. Intermissa deinde more, digna etiam per se visa est res, propter quam dictator crearetur. Liv. B. vii. c. 3.

NOW I conceive that M. de B. has, through inattention, made no less than four mistakes in his comment upon this passage.

FOR I. First of all, Livy does not speak of THE END OF THE FOURTH CENTURY, when he says, some report, that the Nail was to mark the number of years, because Letters were rare in THOSE DAYS, per ea tempore; but of the time, when the Practice of driving a nail in the Wall of the Temple of Jupiter, COMMENCED, in pursuance of a LAW directing that it should be done annually, on THE IDES OF SEPTEMBER, by the Chief Prætor, [i. e. by the Chief Magistrate. The CONSULS were, at first, stiled PRÆTORS.] That this Practice commenced long before the end of the fourth century is evident, from the instance then called to mind by the old men, of a Dictator's doing it, and from the words intermisso deinde more. And it seems highly probable from Livy's words, that the LAW was made, and the PRACTICE commenced in the first year of the Republic, and that HORATIUS, when he dedicated the Temple, struck the first nail into the wall; and that it was a part of the Ceremony, at the Dedication, and performed in conformity to the Law above-mentioned. "There is an old Law (says Livy) written in antique characters, and antique words, importing, that the Chief Prætor should, on the Ides of September, drive the Nail, clavum pangat. The Nail [or the Law] was fixed on the right side of the Temple of Jupiter, in that part where the Fane of Minerva is." What follows is all Parenthesis, till he thus goes on: "The CONSUL Marcus Horatius, ACCORDING TO THE LAW, dedicated the Temple of Jupiter, the year after the expulsion of the kings: AFTERWARDS, the fixing the Nail was transferred from the CONSULS to the DICTATORS, because these were Magistrates of greater power and dignity;" [agreeably to the spirit of the Law, expressed in these words, Qui Prætor Maximus sit.] Whoever attends to Livy's words must surely see, that, when he says, the CONSUL Horatius dedicated the Temple EX LEGE, he refers to the Law, where it was enjoined, that the Chief Magistrate should drive a Nail annually on the Ides of September; and means to tell us, that this CONSUL drove the first Nail, pursuant to that Law, when he dedicated the Temple; (which DEDICATION was on the Ides of September, as Plutarch informs us.) If Livy did not mean to say that HORATIUS drove the Nail, when he dedicated the Temple, what connexion between the former and latter part of this period? "The CONSUL Horatius dedicated the Temple the year after the Regifuge. AFTERWARDS, the fixing the Nail was transferred from the CONSULS to the DICTATORS."

II. THERE

* Crevier.

" certainty to history, were ALL ^a destroy'd by the flames which consumed the city, after the Gauls had taken it [in 363.]

How to reconcile this ^{third} assertion with the ^{second}, or with the latter part of the first, seems somewhat difficult; nor seems it very easy to reconcile it with the following enumeration of the ancient monuments which M. de B. supposes to have escaped the flames:

" SOME LAWS of the KINGS.

P. 13.

" ALL the LAWS of the Twelve Tables, by which might be known the constitution of the ancient government.

P. 32.

" SOME of the PONTIFFS BOOKS, which discovered the origin of several religious customs or ceremonies. (Under the name of the Pontiffs books, 46, 47.

" M. de B. comprehends all the books in general, which treated of the religious ceremonies and traditions of the Romans, as the books of the Augurs and Haruspices, the verses or hymns of the Salii, the Saturnian verses, and a great number of books of that kind.)

" SOME of the books ^b which contained the musters and polls taken of the Roman citizens, which books might be of use to history.

103.

" A

II. THERE is not one word in the passage referred to, importing that the Romans had no annals except nails. And the written law itself is a proof, that the nails were not used because nobody could write, or because these nails were the only expedient they could have to fix the chronology. And, for the same reason, they, of whom Livy says serunt, cannot be supposed to have meant, that the nails were used, because nobody could mark the years by words or figures, but because the generality of people could not read what some could write; as was the case in these countries not many hundred years ago. And the interruption of the practice of driving nails [intermisso deinde more] if it proves any thing, proves only, that the common people were become less illiterate, and that the nails were not wanted to instruct them in chronology.

III. It appears from the passage referred to, that, in the end of the fourth Century, the Romans had a monument or record mentioning the custom of driving a nail, &c. They had a written law enjoining it; lex vetusta est prisca litteris verbisque scripta, ut qui Prætor Maximus sit, Idibus Septembribus clavum pangat: In conformity to which Law the Act of fixing the nail had been transferred from the Consuls to the Dictators. And this shews that both the Law and the Practice were anterior to the Institution of Dictators.

IV. THE thing said to be remembered by the old men, was not the custom of driving a nail into the wall of the Temple, but a particular instance of the plague's being stop'd by a Dictator's driving a nail, &c. repetitum ex seniorum memoria dicitur pestilentiam quondam clavo ab dictatore fixo sedatam.

VOL. II.

^a C'est de ces écrivains, que j'apprens, que tous les monumens publics, qui auroient pu donner quelque certitude à l'Histoire, périrent par le feu, lorsque les Gaulois eurent pris Rome. p. 10.

Il est sur que la partie historique des livres des Pontifes, ou leurs Annales périrent dans la destruction de Rome par les Gaulois. Tite Live est si exprès là dessus, qu'il nous ote tout sujet d'en douter, — lorsque se plaignant de la peine qu'il a eu parceque tous les memoires, conservez dans les Archives, qui étoient entre les mains des particuliers, ou qui faisoient partie des livres des Pontifes, avoient été enveloppés dans la ruine de la ville. Et quod etiam si quæ in commentariis Pontificum, aliisque publicis privatisque erant monumentis, incensâ urbe Pleraque interire. p. 36.

N. B. In this place, Pleraque, with M. de B. imports Tous; in p. 5. 18. Presque tout; in p. 20. 27. La plus part; in p. 19. Grande partie.

^b Quoique les anciens Historiens omettent quelques lustres, et quelque fois les noms des censures, ainsi que le nombre des citoyens, qui s'étoit trouvé dans chaque

b denom-

42. "A considerable number of the Treaties which Rome had made with "the neighbouring states. Il est a presumer qu'ils sauroient un assez
 "bon nombre de ces derniers [les traités] parce qu'ils étoient gardez
 "dans le temple de Jupiter au capitol, qui demeura a l'abri de la fu-
 "reur des Gaulois. And treaties of peace are the most authentic ma-
 35. terials for history. Les traités de paix sont les materiaux les plus au"thentiques pour l'histoire, et on ne peut former aucun doute raisonnable
 "sur des faits appuyés de pareilles preuves."

145. IV. "THERE WAS, at Rome, no book, no writing prior to Pyrrhus's com-72. "ing into Italy; no ^a piece that could be of use to history, anterior to the "end of the fifth century."

How to make this agree with the foregoing enumeration of pieces pre- ferred from the flames, I do not readily perceive.

- 6, 7. V. "THE LATER historians of Rome did but copy ^b the earlier with re"gard, to the times preceding the earlier."

This seems to be a hasty assertion; since both Livy and Dionysius speak so frequently of the disagreeing accounts given by the authors they cite, with regard to the times anterior to the first historians. And Livy, in his preface, says, that each new writer thinks either to produce something more cer- tain with regard to facts than his predecessors have done, or to excel them in language and style. Novi semper scriptores, aut in rebus certius aliquid allaturos se, aut scribendi arte rudem vetustatem superaturos credunt.

- p. 11. VI. "THOSE records or monuments which escaped the flames (when "Rome was burnt by the Gauls) were of little use for composing a his-denombrement, je serois assez porté à croire, sur ce qui nous reste de ces reumes generales des citoyens de Rome, que c'étoit un des monumens le mieux conservé, et que les historiens avoient le moins négligé de consulter. Ce que Denis d'Halicarnasse en cite remonte jusqu'au premier cens sous Servius Tullius. On seroit un peu mieux fondé, si on nous alléguoit de pareilles pieces en faveur de l'histoire Romaine. Car, si ce que les historiens nous disent des differens cens, où denombrement, qui se font fait à Rome, est fondé sur le temoignage de ces monumens, qui se gardoient dans les Archives, on ne peut disconvenir, qu'ils n'aient échappé aux flammes, du moins en partie, et qu'ils n'aient été de quelque usage pour l'histoire. p. 102, 103.

^a J'ai déjà prouvé que ces Annales des Pontifes n'existoient point: et je prouverai bientôt, qu'il n'y avoit aucune piece qui pût servir à l'histoire laquelle faut antérieure à la fin du cinquieme siecle de Rome. p. 70.

^b On reconnoitra facilement que ceux

qui ont écrit l'Histoire Romaine n'ont fait que se copier les uns les autres pour ce qui regardoit les tems antérieurs. p. 7.

Fabius Pictor et ceux qui le suivirent de près avoient ignoré, &c. On n'avoit fait depuis que les copier sans autre examen. p. 45.

Ils ont été plus de cinq siècles sans avoir d'historiens—les premiers qu'ils ont eus ont fort mal réussi destinés comme ils l'étoient de monumens anciens et de memoires sur lesquels leur pussent servir de guides—les Historiens, qui depuis ont entrepris de fournir la même carrière, se sont contentés de s'appuyer de l'autorité de leurs Predecesseurs et de les donner pour garans des faits qu'ils rapportent—ils se sont peu mis en peine d'examiner à la rigueur la verité des faits. p. 6.

N. B. Unless with regard to absurd fictions, it is hard to guess by what test the later historians, if there were no ancient monuments, no authentic memorials, could examine the truth of the facts related by the earlier historians.

"tory.

“ tory. And the first historians did not rest upon such monuments, but “ founded themselves wholly upon traditions and vulgar stories, as the most “ celebrated and most esteemed writers inform us, * who nevertheless “ took all their accounts from those first historians.

“ What we have of the Roman history [of the first 500 years] was “ taken out of family-memoirs. Destitute of all other monuments, it “ was to these pieces, that the historians, towards the middle of the sixth “ century [i. e. the first historians] were obliged to have recourse, and “ from no other sources could they have drawn what they related of those “ times which, as they themselves confess, were cover'd with thick dark-“ nefs, and of which there was no speaking with any certainty.”^c

To explain, and, as much as possible, reconcile these two paragraphs, we shall have recourse to another passage in the Dissertation.

“ The most antient piece known at Rome in Cicero's time^d, was the speech “ of Appius Claudius, the blind, pronounced in the senate to dissuade “ them from accepting the terms of peace proposed by Pyrrhus in 474.
 “ Indeed there were, beside that, some funeral orations; but tradition must “ have supplied the rest: so that the truth of the history of the first five “ centuries had no other support but these two witnesses, funeral orations
 “ and tradition.”

“ Perhaps to these we may add, some songs or hymns, composed in “ honour of the heroes and illustrious men,—pieces not proper to in“ struct us in the truth of facts.”

THE CASE then was this; there were no written family-traditions nor any

* Je recherche ce qui a pu échaper à cet incendie—je trouve que ce qui en échapa fut de peu d'utilité pour la composition de l'Histoire. Ce sont eux memes [les ecrivains les plus celebres et les plus accredités] qui m'apprennent, que ce n'est point sur de pareils monumens, que les premiers Historiens se sont appuyés, et que ceux qui les ont suivis (en avouant, que ceux qui les avoient precedés dans cette carriere, ne s'étoient fondés que sur des traditions, et sur des bruits populaires, que d'ailleurs ils n'avoient apporté ni jugement, ni exactitude, dans la composition de leurs histoires, et dans ce qu'ils disoient des premiers siècles de Rome) n'ont pas laissé de reconnaître que c'étoit d'eux qu'ils tiroient tout ce qu'ils en rapportoient [i. e. tout ce qu'ils rapportoient des premiers siècles de Rome.] p. 10, 11. Les historiens, qui ont vécu dans des siècles plus polis, et où l'on n'ignoroit aucune des loix de l'Histoire, n'ayant point eu d'autres sources où puiser que ces memes histoires, qui n'étoient fondées que sur la tradition, ils n'ont pu donner plus de certitude à ce qu'ils rapportoient des premiers siècles de Rome. p. 204.

^b By they themselves, I presume M. de B. means the later historians; for they are the only writers he cites as complaining of darkness.

^c C'est des Memoires des Familles, qu'est tiré ce que nous avons de l'Histoire Romaine. p. 142.

Destitués de tous autres monumens, ce fut à ces pieces [Memoires des Familles] que les historiens, vers le milieu du sixieme siècle, furent obligés d'avoir recours. p. 435.

Dans quelle source ont-ils puisé ce qu'ils ont dit sur des tems, que selon eux-memes couvroient d'épaisses tenebres, et dont on ne pouvoient parler avec aucune certitude? Ce n'a pu être que dans ces Traditions des Familles puisqu'il n'y avoit point d'autre monument auquel ils pussent avoir recours. p. 152.

^d I am not aware that M. de B. has any support for this, but a mistake of his own (through inattention) in interpreting a b 2 passage

p. 142.
 143. &
 435.

151.
 152.

150.

any other [historical] writings, aucun livre, aucun écrit, before the year 474. Between this time and the year 550 (when Fabius Pictor became an historian) funeral orations were written. And from these written orations and from oral tradition, the first historians compiled their works.

p. 152. But then we are aground again, by reason of an unlucky passage, cited by M. de B. from Dionysius, who tells us, that Fabius [whom all the following historians are said to have copied] compiled his history of the first 500 years from tradition, from hear-say, wholly from hear-say; on
p. 164. voit que ce qu'il en disoit n'étoit appuyé que sur ce qu'il en avoit oui dire: ἐξ ἧς ἡμέρας, D. H. Lib. 7. p. 475. Fabius then did not make use of the funeral orations, nor of any written family-traditions, (family-memoirs :) Neither were these, according to M. de B. form'd upon hear-say. The matter of them was invented by the vanity of private men. And not only the matter of them was invented, but the greater number of the
p. 164. pieces themselves were forgeries; * i. e. they were not contemporary with the authors to whom they were ascribed, but forged after their time. And if Fabius took his historical accounts from forged funeral orations, these forgeries must have been almost all made in his own time, and all in the space of 76 years; supposing it true, that there were no writings of earlier date than the year 474. And then we shall be at a loss to guess how it was possible to impose these forgeries upon Fabius for genuine pieces.

But is it not strange that M. de B., who, by admitting that the public monuments and private memorials of the Romans were burnt by the Gauls, admits that the Romans had both ability and disposition to write before passage of Cicero's Brutus [c. 16.] Nec verò habeo quonquam antiquiorem cujus quidem scripta proferenda putem, nisi Appii Cæci oratio hæc ipsa de Pyrrho, et nonnullæ mortuorum laudationes, fortè delectant: et Hercule, hæc quidem extant. Cicero is discoursing, not of authors in general, nor of historians, but of Orators, and the last he mentions is Cato the Censor: and he adds, "that he is acquainted with none more antient, whose writings he thinks worth speaking of; unless the oration of Appius Claudius concerning Pyrrhus, and some funeral orations, may happen to please. Of these there are indeed enough." Had Cicero been speaking of Roman historians, or authors in general, he certainly would not have said, that he knew none more antient than Cato, that were worth mentioning; because Fabius and Cincius, and several other historians, much esteemed, were prior to Cato. Yet on the authority of this passage M. de B. (p. 145.) writes thus, "On ne pourra pas douter de la vérité de ce que j'avance, dès que j'aurai fait voir, qu'on n'avoit à Rome

" aucun livre, aucun écrit, qui fût antérieur
" à la venue de Pyrrhus en Italie, événement,
" qui ne se place que vers la fin du " cinquième siècle de Rome. Pour des
" HISTORIENS, on sait qu'ils ne parurent
" que dans le siècle suivant. Cicéron, parlant
" de ce qu'on avoit de plus ancien de son
" temps, dit que Caton, qui étoit mort il
" n'y avoit pas plus d'un siècle, étoit con-
" sidéré comme un Auteur fort ancien eum
" nos perveterem habemus. Certes ajoute
" t-il, je n'en connois point de plus ancien
" dont je puisse vous citer les écrits, à moins
" que l'on ne trouve du goût à la harangue
" d'Appius Claudius sur Pyrrhus, et à quel-
" ques oraisons funebres."

* L'on peut assurer sans temerité que l'Histoire Romaine, pour la plus grande partie, a été forgée sur ces Tradition des Familles, et sur des oraisons funebres, qui pour la plupart n'étoient que des pièces supposées, que des faussaires avoient forgées pour favoriser les prétensions, que quelques familles formoient à une genealogie illustre.

that

that time, should yet suppose, that they had neither the one nor the other, for above 100 years after that time?

And there is another difficulty arising from another passage cited by M. de B. from Dionysius [Lib. 1. p. 59.] who there says, that the earliest Roman historians took all their accounts of the birth of Romulus and the building of Rome, from the antique narratives in the SACRED BOOKS, ἐν ἱερᾷς δέλτοις.

p. 162.

And what makes these difficulties the greater is, that M. de B. is of opinion, we ought to give full credit to Dionysius in what he says concerning the works and merit of the historians who preceded him.

BUT, not to dwell any longer on the seeming repugnancies in the argumentation of our ingenious Critic against the credibility of the history of the five first centuries, let us now consider what Livy says concerning his own history of the times anterior to the burning of Rome by the Gauls.

“ I have, in five books, set forth what, from the building of the city
“ to its being taken, was done by the Romans, first under the Kings, then “ under the Consuls, Dictators, Decemvirs, and Military Tribunes with “ consular power; the foreign wars and domestic seditions; matters very “ obscure, by reason of their antiquity, (like objects, that at a great distance, “ are hardly discerned.) For it is only by writings, that the transactions “ and events of remote times can be clearly and faithfully transmitted;
“ and in those days there were few writers; and the greater part of the “ commentaries of the High Priests, and of the other records, publick
“ and private, perished in the burning of Rome^b. Henceforward, mat“ ters more clear and certain will be related; the civil affairs and military “ acts of the Romans, after the rebuilding of their city^c.”

Now what is the obvious sense of this passage?

“ The foregoing part of my history, (says Livy) is full of obscurity “ and uncertainty; because the matters, there treated of, are of too anti-“ ent date to have been transmitted with faithfulness and exactness by oral “ tradition, and because the contemporary writers were few, and the “ greater part of their writings perished in the fire that consumed the city.
“ But the transactions and events after that time, are things more clear
“ and

^a Denis d'Halicarnasse, aiant entrepris l'Histoire des cinq premiers siècles de Rome, doit être considéré comme juge compétent de ceux qui l'ont précédé dans la même carrière. p. 168. L'on ne risque rien en s'en rapportant à ce qu'il en dit. p. 163.

I cannot possibly be of M. de B.'s opinion in this particular. Dionysius seems, of all writers; to be the man who deserves the least credit when he speaks of the merit of other writers. For (Lib. 1. p. 5.) he says of Polybius, “ that he wrote little concern“ ing the Romans, and that the little he “ did write was without any care or accu“ racy, and wholly founded upon idle reports.” Nor could even Thucydides please Dionysius: but, as to what he says by way of censure on Thucydides, Mr. Hobbes remarks, “ that there was never written so much ab“ surdity in so few lines.”

^b It seems pretty plain from what Livy here says of the destruction of public and private Monuments or Records, that he knew nothing of the peu d'usage de l'écriture, for which M. de B. contends.

^c Quæ ab condita urbe Roma ad captam eandem

L. 6. Cap. 1.

“ and certain, clariora & certiora:” How so? “ Because with respect to these, there are not the same causes of obscurity and uncertainty. The times not being so remote, the traditions concerning them are more to be depended on; contemporary writers were less rare; and there has not been a like destruction of their writings.”

This is surely the plain meaning of his words. and it ought to be observed to his credit, that his history of the earliest times, is proportioned, for length, to the scarcity of materials he complains of; for notwithstanding his circumstantial, and, perhaps in his own opinion, fabulous account of the rape of the Sabine women, with the consequences of it; and notwithstanding the frequent display of his skill in adorning a story, as in his description of the combat between the Horatii and Curatii, and in several other instances, his whole history of the seven kings, who are supposed to have reigned 244 years, hardly fills seventy pages in Le Clerc’s small edition; and, of these, twenty are taken up with the reigns of Servius Tullius, and his successor Tarquin the Proud. Now, the institutions of Servius, which were his most important acts, and were the plan, whereon, after the expulsion of Tarquin, the new government was established and maintained, cannot easily be called in question; nor, I believe, will any body question the truth of the most material things, related of Tarquin’s tyranny, which gave occasion to the revolt from him, and the abolition of kingly government. The obscurity and uncertainty therefore, of which Livy speaks, must chiefly regard the circumstances with which some facts are accompanied in his relations, and not the principal facts and events contained in the history of the early times.

p. 6. Certainly M. de B. had not duly attended to the accounts given by the antients, of the regal state of Rome, when he ventured to say, “ It is surprising to find a continued history of five centuries, in which there is scarce any void, any year, that is not distinguished by some considerable event.” For very few of the 244 years of the kings are distinguished by any event whatsoever.

It may be further remarked, that Livy’s history of the 119 years, from the expulsion of Tarquin to the burning of Rome by the Gauls, is above four times as long as his history of the 244 years of the kings; and his history of those 119 years is no longer than his history of the 95 years that follow the rebuilding of Rome, and reach to the year 460, with which his tenth book ends. And the next ten books (which are lost) contained but the history of 73 years. Now the reason of these differences in the length of his accounts of the different periods is very obvious, and is contained in the passage above cited.

eandem urbem Romani sub regibus primum, consulibus deinde ac dictatoribus decemvirisque ac tribunis consularibus gessere, foris bella, domi seditiones, quinque libris exposui; res quæ vetustate nimia obscuras, veluti quæ magno ex intervallo loci vix cernuntur: tum quod et raræ per eadem tempora litteræ fuere, una custodia fidelis memoræ rerum gestarum: et, quod etiam si quæ in commentariis pontificum, aliisque publicis privatisque erant monumentis, incensa urbe pleræque interiere. Clariora deinceps certioraque ab secunda origine, velut ab stirpibus lætius, feraciusque renatae urbis, gesta domi militiæque, exponuntur.

I pro-

I proceed now to say something of the value of those materials, which the first Roman historians may reasonably be supposed to have had for composing their histories. Without entering into any discussion of the antiquity or contents of the linnen books, the books of the magistrates, the tables and memorials of the censors, the books of the Decemvirs and Duumvirs, or the inscriptions on pillars, statues or shields, (from all which, it cannot be questioned but many things, useful to history, might be drawn) I shall confine myself to speak of the other sources of historical matter, that were open to the first historians.

1. THE ANNALS or Commentaries of the High Priests, called the Great Annals.

That it was the constant custom from the earliest times, for the High Priests to record in writing the events of each year, and that antient Annals, composed by the High Priests^a, existed either entire or in part in Cicero's time, is unquestionable from his express testimony.

And from the complaint which Livy makes of the loss of the greater part of the Pontifical Annals, anterior to the burning of Rome [incensa urbe Pleræque^b interiøre] it is evident that some pieces of those ANNALS were preserved from that fire. His words import this: and his chief ground for saying that the greater part perished, was doubtless the preservation of the smaller. L. 6. c. 2.

Rome was burnt by the Gauls about the year 363, i. e. about 119 years after the commencement of the republic. The Romans, we are told, were very industrious in collecting what monuments or records had escaped the fire: and it is natural to suppose that endeavours were used to supply by memory (as far as memory could supply) the defects of what remained of the Pontifical Annals. "Before the use of letters (says Sir Isaac Newton) the names and actions of men could scarce be remembered above 80 or 100 years after their deaths: and therefore I admit of no chronology of things done in Europe above 80 years before Cadmus brought letters into Europe." It seems here to be admitted by this great man, that the names and actions of men, and even the chronology of things done 80 years back, might be preserved by memory, and without written records. The defects of the Great Annals might therefore, with certainty enough, be supplied, by the help of memory alone, as to the principal events during the far greater part of the time, between the beginning of the Republic and the burning of Rome. And with regard not only to that time but to the earlier times, is it to be supposed, that those persons, who had read the Annals before they were in part destroyed, remembered nothing of what they had read?

These Annals, thus repaired, would doubtless be very brief and very

^a — Ab initio rerum—Res omnes singulorum annorum mandabat litteris pontifex maximus—ii qui etiam nunc Annales maximi vocantur, De orat. Lib. 2. c. 12. Servius ad Virg. Æneid. Lib. 1. v. 377. and Vopiscus in Tacito cap. 1. speak to the same effect, as M. de B. observes.

^b M. L'Abbé Sallier considers Livy's Pleræque as a word of exaggeration, to magnify his own labour in compiling a general history of his country.

Short Chron. p. 7.

imperfect,

imperfect, but not useless to history. The great events and the order of them would there be found. And as to the Annals, written after the burning of Rome (for the practice was continued) we read of no destruction happening to these either in whole or in part. It must be granted however, that even these, through some accident or neglect, were not entire and perfect in the days of Livy or of the prior historians. If there had been no chasms, no interruptions in them, how could the historians have been so much at a loss, as we find they sometimes were, concerning the succession of the magistrates?

But granting the Pontifical Annals, mentioned by Cicero, to have been very imperfect, and even supposing, that his words, ab initio rerum, regard the time when the practice of writing Annals began, and not the Epoch whence the relations, contained in those which he had read, commenced; yet (as I said before) certain it is from his testimony, that antient Records, called the Annals of the High Priests, or the Great Annals, did exist in his time; and therefore the silence of Livy and Dionysius, if they are silent, (as M. de B. imagines) concerning these Annals, will not prove what M. de B. would infer from it, the non-existence of them in their time. If they did not then exist, they must have been lost in the few years between the time when Cicero wrote, and the time when Livy and Dionysius composed their histories; and of this there is no where any hint. Livy would doubtless have complained of such a loss, had it really happened, since he complains of the earlier loss suffered by the burning of Rome. And for these several considerations it is reasonable to believe, that the old Annals, of which Livy frequently speaks, and the ἱερὰ Δέλται, mentioned by Dionysius as historical monuments, were the Great Annals described by Cicero: And I think it may be reasonably asked, How could Cicero well know (and he speaks with confidence) that the custom of writing Annals commenced ab initio rerum, but from the actual existence, in his time, of fragments of Annals, written in the earliest times; or from their being cited by the first historians as existing in their time?

To PROVE the non-existence of any Annals, or parts of Annals, written before the burning of Rome, M. de B. makes great use of the authority of one Clodius cited by Plutarch, and represents this Clodius as speaking thus: "ALL the ANTIENT MONUMENTS were burnt when the Gauls sacked Rome, and those which the Romans now have are forgeries."

In Noma.
Dissert. p.
20.

• De Fortuna Romanorum.
p. 21.

M. de B. goes on: "And Plutarch himself, or whoever was the author of the treatise OF THE FORTUNE OF THE ROMANS*, after speaking of some marvellous events of those early times,—adds, To what purpose should we dwell upon times which have nothing clear, nothing certain, since, as Livy assures us, the Roman History was corrupted, and its monuments destroyed?"

Then immediately (taking for granted, that Plutarch was the author of that treatise) he adds, "What Plutarch says, upon the testimonies of Clodius and Livy, of the destruction of those monuments, gets an additional

“ tional force in the mouth of so grave an author as he. For since he “ does not contradict them, he supports what they say by his suffrage.
“ The testimony of these authors is very express, &c.”

Again, ‘ Livy, Clodius and Plutarch depose, that the monuments, by “ which the truth of the Roman History might have been ascertained, “ and which alone could give it the requisite certainty, were destroyed “ in the sacking of Rome.”

p. 26.

And again, “ It is certain, that the historical part of the books of the “ Pontiffs or their ANNALS, if ^a they ever existed, perished in the destruc“ tion of Rome by the Gauls. Livy is so express upon this, that he “ leaves us no room to doubt of it.”——For he says, “ that ALL the “ memorials (kept in the Archives) that were in private hands, or that made “ part of the books of the Pontiffs, were involved in the ruin of the city.” But where does Livy say this? Why, [in B. 6. c. 1.] where he tells us, that a great part or the greater part of what was contained in the High Priests commentaries, and in other public and private monuments, perished in the burning of Rome: Et quod etiam si quæ in commentariis Pontificum, aliisque publicis privatisque erant monumentis incensæ urbe pleræque interiere.

p. 56.

NOW as to CLODIUS, Plutarch writes thus: “ Though the pedigrees of “ Numa’s family, from its beginning to this day, be set forth in very nice “ order, there is much dispute concerning the time when he lived. One Clo- “ dus, in a work entitled ἐλεγχος χρόνων, asserts that the antient writings of “ that sort [τὰς ἀρχαίας ΕΚΕΙΝΑΣ ἀναγραφὰς] were lost, when the Gauls de“ stroyed Rome, and that those which now appear were framed by flat“ terers to please the vanity of some private families, who would needs be “ thought descended from the most illustrious origins, to which they had “ in truth no relation.” We see, that Clodius speaks only of genealogical tables, and not of any other historical monuments. Had he asserted, that ALL the antient monuments or records were lost, he would have asserted what was not true, by the concession of M. de B., who allows, that many treaties of peace, the laws of the twelve tables, and several other pieces of antiquity, escaped the flames.

M. L’Abbé Sallier thinks, that Plutarch was not the author of the trea-

^a If they ever existed. Had Livy used these words in this place, he would have spoken like a certain gentleman, who, in giving a bad character of a person deceased, after many severe accusations went on thus, And he was a very cruel father to most of his children——if he had any.

That Livy did not intend to express a doubt whether any Pontifical Annals existed before the burning of Rome, is pretty evident from a passage (in his 4th book c. 3.) cited by M. de B.

The historian is writing of the year 310, and he puts these words into the mouth of a Tribune, “ If we are not admitted to the “ Fasti, nor to the COMMENTARIES of the “ High Priests, are we therefore ignorant of “ those things which are known even by all “ strangers? That the Consuls succeeded in “ the place of the kings, and have no rights or “ prerogatives which the kings had not le- “ fore?” Si non ad Fastos, non ad COM- MENTARIOS PONTIFICUM admittimur: ne ea quidem scimus, quæ omnes peregrini etiam sciunt: Consules in locum Regum successisse: nec aut juris, aut majestatis quicquam habere, quod non in Regibus ante fuerit?

tise de Fortuna Romanorum; and indeed, if he were, he must, how grave soever, have been a very idle man, and condemned by himself in the above-cited passage from that treatise, to spend his time in writing the lives of Romulus, Numa, Poplicola and Camillus, without any materials, but what he believed to be forgeries and romance.

But can it be imagined, that either he or Livy or Dionysius believed nothing of what they have written of the first ages of Rome, or that they looked upon all as uncertain? Though Livy, in some instances, doubts, yet he often says, it is evident, it is certain, constat, certum est; and, in his preface, he warns us, with regard to what he is going to write, to distinguish between the stories adorned with fiction, and the traditions supported by authentic monuments.

And it was very singular, and not a little marvellous, if, when Rome was burnt by the Gauls, the fire did so piously distinguish between sacred writings and prophane. It spared that part of the Pontiffs Books which regarded public worship, and likewise the treaties of peace, and the laws of the twelve tables, treaties and laws being religiones *, religious matters, deemed so on account of the religious ceremonies performed at their making; but it destroyed entirely the historical part of the Pontifical Books, their Annals: it spared no writing that was wholly prophane, nothing historical, if not somehow under the protection of religion.

* Livy, L. 6.
c. 1.

II. THE First Roman Historians had, among the materials for their works, not only some parts of the High Priests Annals, written before the burning of Rome, but some parts of OTHER public historical monuments or memorials, preserved from that fire. Quæ in Commentariis Pontificum aliisque publicis monumentis erant pleræque interiere: the greater part, not all, perished.

What those OTHER public monuments were, I will not pretend to say. Perhaps they were the linen books, the books of the magistrates, the memorials or tables of the Censors, and some other antient pieces referred to by the historians.

p. 92.

M. de B. observes, that Livy, who cites the linen books pretty often, from Licinius Macer, during the space of about ten years, does not cite them for any thing after that time, or before it. Now supposing this to be a proof that the linen books, which Licinius had consulted, contained nothing but what related to those ten years; yet, as those years were prior to the burning of Rome, we may reasonably believe, that the books in question were part of an old public record, a fragment preserved from that fire. And we may reasonably think the same of those parts of the books of the magistrates, and of the Censors books, which are cited in attestation of matters anterior to the destruction of Rome by the Gauls. The very imperfection of these pieces carries with it some proof of their antiquity, and of the mischief they had suffered.

III. ORIGINAL Records of many treaties which the Romans had made with the neighbouring nations, before the burning of the city. And these must must have been of excellent use to the first historians, both for facts and dates in their accounts of the early times. And as to the treaties, after the rebuilding of Rome, there is no question of their preservation.

IV. THE ACTS of the Senate and of the Comitia, and the LAWS of the Twelve Tables, which fully laying open the constitution of the state, the customs and manners of the Romans, the rights of the people, and the powers of the magistrates, were a sure guide to the historians in many particulars of their accounts.

V. WHATEVER could be ascertained by antient annals or records, preserved in the other cities of Italy, that were fallen under the power of the Romans, when Fabius and his successors undertook to write history. Why should we suppose, that these were totally neglected by the first historians? That the neighbouring nations had books and records, is evident from Liv. L. 10. c. 38. where we find, that, in the year 459 of Rome, the Samnites had^a recourse to their linen books for direction in forming that legion which they called legio linteaia.

That treaty with Porfenna, (mentioned by Pliny) of which M. de B. takes advantage to discredit the Roman History, was doubtless found at Clusium, or some other city of Hebruria, not at Rome.

Livy, in citing the prior historians, does not always tell us from whence they took their matter, yet often enough to make us know, that they cited authorities for what they delivered. And it is evident, that they had recourse to the archives of the conquered cities. From the passage in Livy, (L. 7. c. 3.) before referred to, we learn, that Cincius having examined into the antiquities of Volsinii, a town in Hebruria, had found it to have been formerly a custom there to mark the number of the years by nails fixed in a temple dedicated to Nortia, an Hebruscan Goddess; and that Cincius was a diligent enquirer into such antiquities, diligens talium monumentorum auctor Cincius.

VI. FAMILY-MEMORIALS, and FUNERAL-ORATIONS.

M. de B. cites^b the authorities of Cicero and Pliny to prove, that it was the general custom at Rome for each noble family to preserve memorials recording the services which the members of it had done the state in the discharge of those offices with which they had been intrusted. “ If these “ memorials, says M. de B., had been faithfully written, they would have “ been of infinite use to history. Should we admit that all the other mo“ numents were lost, we must likewise admit, that the loss might have “ been supplied by these memorials. They were so many histories of the

p. 104. &
seq.

^a M. L' Abbé Sallier, in his first discourse, makes this observation; and he adds, Les nations Voisines pouvoient donc offrir des monumens aux recherches des historiens. On pourroit rapporter bien d'autres preuves, que les peuples Voisins des Romains n'étoient pas sans monuments & sans histoires. Varron, cité par Censorin et Festus, en plusieurs endroits, fourniroit de bons témoignage pour ce que je dis icy.

^b Cic. in Brut. c. 16. Plin. L. 35. c. 2.

“ lives of particular men, and contained the principal affairs of the state, “ in the conduct of which those men had had a share. But unhappily, “ in the composition of those histories, much less regard was had to truth
 “ than to heightening the lustre of families. There were so many falsifi“ cations, the truth of facts was so frequently corrupted in these memo“ rials, that no use could be made of them without great precaution.”

To PROVE the unfaithfulness of the Family-memorials, M. de B. insists chiefly on a passage in Cicero, and another in Livy, charging some *Funeral-oration*s with containing false facts, invented to gratify the vanity of private families. From which it would seem that he considers the Family-memorials as consisting wholly of *Funeral-oration*s. Yet, as he ranges certain records of the Censors, (called by Dionysius τιμητικὰ ὑπομνήματα) among the Family-memorials, and is inclined to think that the linen books ought to be placed there too, he manifestly admits, that *Funeral-oration*s were not the whole of the Family-memorials.

NOW if the practice of writing Family-memorials began early, and these pieces were preserved, and transmitted from generation to generation, they must have been of excellent use to the first Roman historians: For how much soever those pieces might abound in panegyrical exaggeration, and false colourings, they would furnish good evidences of the truth of those facts, in which they agreed, and with which the several writers of those pieces were contemporary.

But as it does not appear at what time the custom of writing Family-memorials began, I shall here leave this matter, and consider what is said of *Funeral-oration*s.

DIONYSIUS, speaking of the Funeral-oration which Poplicola pronounced on his deceased colleague Brutus, tells us, it is uncertain whether Poplicola introduced this custom among the Romans, or found it already established by the kings. Be that as it will, there is no doubt of its being the constant practice from the beginning of the Republic, to honour the memory of great men by Funeral-panegyrics. And, as these were premeditated speeches, and as the glory of the orator was no less concerned in the composition, than the glory of the deceased, it is highly reasonable to believe that the orator wrote down what he purposed to say, and by revising and correcting his speech, put it into the best form he could, before he delivered it. I say, it is natural to suppose, that this method was for the most part, if not universally, observed by the speakers of *Funeral-oration*s. Nor can any thing be more probable, than that the families, concerned in these orations, would be very desirous to preserve them.

And indeed there seems to be sufficient ground to conjecture, that from these *Funeral Oration*s were taken, into the History of the earliest times of the Republic, many particulars, not to be learnt from Tradition, or the High Priests Annals, or any other public Memorials. But then, for an authentic account of what passed among the Romans, I would ask, What better materials could an Historian have to work upon, than a series of such Orations? For though in a Funeral Panegyric, the Orator may well enough be supposed to over-rate the private virtues of the deceased, disguise or refine the motives of his actions, ascribe to his remote ancestors exploits which they had not performed, nay, give him noble ancestors from whom he was not really descended; yet, as to the high offices which the person himself had filled, and the public acts he had done in those offices, whether civil or military, we can hardly imagine the Orator would attempt to impose upon an audience, who, having been eye-witnesses of the truth, were not capable of being deceived: For the sphere of action, in which the Romans moved during more than 200 years after the erection of the Commonwealth, was so very narrow, that nothing considerable, of a public concern, could pass either in peace or in war, but what must be known to almost every individual of the State. The Roman citizens were all soldiers, all went to the war in their turns, and they could not, therefore, be imposed upon with regard to the success of the enterprizes formed by their Generals. And the same soldier-citizens were parties in all the civil commotions and struggles, and had a share in establishing those useful laws and regulations, which their magistrates had the merit of contriving and proposing. So that a series of Funeral Orations on the great men of Rome would contain most authentic Memorials of all the principal transactions and events both at home and abroad. It was the business of the Historian, who employed these materials for his work, to separate the solid from the light and unsure; and certainly no task could be more easy.

It does not seem probable, that, during the Regal State, Funeral Panegyrics were in use, unless we may suppose that this honour was done to the Kings upon their demise, who, while Rome was governed by Kings, had the glory of all victories in war, and all prudent institutions in peace. But certain it is, that the practice prevailed from the very commencement of the Republic. And though much the greater number of these Funeral Orations were unquestionably lost, when Fabius, about 300 years after the expulsion of Tarquin, undertook a general history of Rome, yet, that many of them were preserved, and especially of those posterior to the rebuilding of the City, there seems no reason to doubt. What could Livy mean by the Privata Monumenta, of which, he says, the greater part was destroyed by the Gauls, but these Funeral Orations and other Family Memorials? For he speaks of them as Pieces that would have been useful towards a general and clear History of those times. And indeed we cannot imagine, that private families, in the earliest times of the Republic, were chargeable with that vanity, which * Cicero and Livy complain complain of, as the source of many inventions in Funeral Panegyrics of the later ages. Till some families could with Truth boast of their antiquity, and the long glories of a line of ancestors from whom they were descended, there was no temptation, no opportunity for vain men fallaciously to claim that kind of nobility, and invent pedigrees to do themselves honour. And should we suppose, that at the renovation of the State, upon the departure of the Gauls, (i. e. about 119 years after the birth of the Commonwealth, the loss of many monuments public and private, might give both temptation and opportunity for fiction in some degree, yet this could reach to nothing very considerable; and it is hardly credible, that the Orator at a Funeral would, to raise the glory of the deceased and his family, hazard invented facts, which derogated from the glory of other families, and could be contradicted by the memory of persons living. And when in later times (the brevity and imperfection of the Pontifical Annals and the other public monuments, and the loss of many private ones, through the extinction or decay of families, giving large scope to inventive vanity) Consulships and Triumphs were falsely ascribed, in Funeral Orations, to the remote ancestors of those whose obsequies were then solemnized; still the accounts, given in those Orations, of what they themselves had performed in the high offices they had filled, would be materials which an Historian might confidently and safely employ.

* Nec verò habeo quemquam antiquiorem [Catone Censore] cujus quidem scripta proferenda putem, nisi quem Appii Cæci Oratio hæc ipsa de Pyrrho, et nonnullæ

Mortuorum Laudationes fortè delectant: et Hercules, hæc quidem extant. Ipsæ enim familiæ suæ quali ornamenta, et monumenta servabant, et ad usum, siquis ejusdem generis occidisset,

Livy's complaint sufficiently proves, that he thought the first Historians had made use of Funeral Orations in compiling their Histories, and that some of those writers had very injudiciously adopted what they found delivered in such Orations, concerning the remote ancestors of the persons, in whose honour they were spoken. But neither he nor Cicero charges those Orations, with containing false accounts of facts contemporary with the Orators, nor do they speak of those pieces as forgeries. I am not aware of any the least ground M. de B. has for thinking, that the Funeral Orations of which Livy and Cicero complain, were pieces supposées que des faussaires avoient forgées.

It is in writing of the year 432 of the City (i. e. the 188th of the Republic) that Livy is at a loss to know, whether the Dictator Cornelius, or the Consuls of the year, conducted the war against the Samnites, and had a Triumph for the success. The Authors, he consulted, differed on this point, all agreeing however in Cornelius being then Dictator: they had therefore some unquestionable authority for this particular. Their differences, in relation to the persons who obtained the Victory and Triumph, he imputes to the differing accounts in Funeral Orations and Inoccidisset, et ad memoriam laudum domesticarum, et ad illustrandam nobilitatem suam. Quamquam his laudationibus Historiarum nostrarum est facta mendosior. Multa enim scripta sunt in eis, quæ facta non sunt, falsi triumphi, plures Consulatus, genera etiam falsa, et ad Plebem Transitiones, cum homines humiliores in alienum ejusdem nominis infunderentur genus: ut si ego me à M. Tullio esse dicerem, qui patricius cum Servio Sulpicio Consule, anno decimo post Reges exactos fuit. Cic. in Brut. c. 16.

scriptions

scriptions on Images, made long after the time, and by which he supposes the disagreeing Historians to have been respectively guided. "It is my opinion, says he, that the truth of history has been corrupted by Funeral Orations, and lying Inscriptions on Images, each family, by plausible fictions, assuming to itself the honour of great exploits. Hence, (that is, from this arrogant vanity) it has doubtless happened, that the actions of particular men are confounded (those of one man ascribed to another) and the Public monuments are likewise in confusion (disagree, contradict one another.) Nor is there any contemporary writer (contemporary with the Dictator and Consuls of the year 432) extant, by whose authority the truth of the matter in question can be sufficiently ascertained."

What Livy means by Public Monuments in this place, I will not pretend to say; probably they were the Inscriptions on Statues, erected in the later times, in temples and other public places, which Inscriptions, contradicting one another, had occasioned a disagreement among the Historians, who employed them in their own compositions. That he does not speak of the High Priests Annals, as confounded or made inconsistent, is evident from Cicero's account of those Pieces. The High Priest's business was not to record the transactions that passed two or three hundred years before, but the transactions of the present, or immediately preceding year. No Funeral Orations nor Inscriptions on Images, made in after times, could confound those Annals. Contradict them they might, but not make them inconsistent with themselves.

The same may be said of any other monuments, contemporary with the facts recorded in them; no posterior Orations nor Inscriptions could throw them into confusion.

It must indeed be admitted, upon the Credit of ^a Livy's words, that, in his time, no authentic record of any sort, contemporary with the Magistrates he is writing of, was extant, by which the particular point in question could be cleared up: For otherwise the differences among the prior Historians would not have perplexed him. But he does not say, that Rome had no writers so early as the year 432, or that no writing of so early date was extant in his time. His words rather import the contrary, That there were Writers in those days, and that some of their writings were extant, but none whereby the matter in doubt could with sufficient certainty be determined. Nec quisquam æqualis temporibus illis scriptor exstat, quo satis certo auctore stetur.

DEMONSTRATION, or satisfactory proof is not aimed at, by any thing or by all that is said above, in favour of the Roman History of the five first centuries; but only probability. The sum is this. It seems from many passages in Cicero, Livy, and other antient writers, that the first

^a Vitiatam memoriam funebribus laudibus reor, falsisque imaginum titulis, dum familia ad se quæque famam rerum gestarum, honorumque fallente mendacio trahunt.

Inde certè et singulorum gesta, et publica monimenta rerum confusa. Nec quisquam æqualis temporibus illis scriptor exstat, quo satis certo auctore stetur. Lib. 8. c. 40.

Roman Historians had a great variety of antient and genuine pieces for the foundation of their Histories; The High Priests Annals; The Acts of the Senate, and of the Comitia; Records of the succession of the Magistrates; The Censors Books; Treaties of Peace and Alliance; Family Memorials and Funeral Orations.

Of no one sort of these pieces was there an uninterrupted series, but only parts and fragments. The whole stock of materials was insufficient for a continued thread of History; and accordingly, the History is broken and imperfect; there are many chasms in it; some things are delivered as uncertain, some as fabulous; and many things in it are fabulous or uncertain, which are not delivered as such. Fabius Pictor and his nearest followers adopted traditional stories which pleased the national vanity, and of which those Historians had no desire to destroy the belief, even when they could have done it by the means of authentic Monuments; and in many instances they were destitute of those means. The Circumstantial Accounts of the exploits of particular men, I conjecture to have been taken from Family Memorials and Funeral Orations; because I cannot conceive from what other source the Historians could have them. For the Great Annals, according to the description of them by Cicero, must have been too brief, to descend often to Circumstances of Actions; and Tradition (as M. de Pouilly observes) never informs us of Circumstances any more than of Dates. When fiction or uncertainty is apparent in the accounts given us of the heroic deeds of this or that great man, I apprehend, that those accounts were taken from Family Memorials and Funeral Orations, of low date, when the power of the Romans growing considerable, and their vanity keeping pace with it, Genealogies became a matter of great moment to private Families.

BUT as to the most memorable of the National Affairs, the civil contests, and the important changes produced by those contests in the constitution of the government, the foreign wars in which the Romans engaged, and the final success of their struggles with each of the neighbouring states, the truth of these events might be assured by Tradition alone; and the very dates of most of them would be ascertained by the LAWS and the TREATIES, that were carefully preserved; the laws consequent to the commotions and the treaties consequent to the wars. And we may well presume that the memory of much more than these principal events was transmitted by the High Priests Annals and the other public Monuments, contemporary with the facts they recorded. Family Memorials and Funeral Orations, composed in the earliest times of the Republic, would be excellent materials for an Historian; and even those of later date, where truth was mingled with fiction, would be good authority with regard not only to contemporary facts, but to facts much earlier than those Pieces, if many of those Pieces agreed in the same accounts.

M. de B. begins the second part of his Dissertation with these words.
 “ I have given the reasons which make me call in question the History “ of the first five centuries of Rome. They are founded on the want
 “ of

“ of contemporary Monuments and Historians. So that the first Historians which Rome produced, could have nothing whereon to ground their relations but Tradition, which is apt to corrupt very much the truth of facts ^a.”

Now, granting that the very short account of the 244 years of the Kings, contained in Livy's first book, was chiefly taken from Tradition, yet surely it is quite incredible, that such a variety of matter, so many particulars (with that degree of order which they have) as fill the five preserved Books of Livy that follow the first, and filled seven ^b Books more that are lost, could all be collected from Tradition alone. Tradition is not so copious and methodical. The earlier Historians, therefore, from whom Livy drew the matter of his History of Rome, from the Expulsion of Tarquin to the end of the 5th Century, must have had written Records and Memorials of some sort to work upon; and from these they must have taken the greater part of what they related; unless we will suppose that their Histories were romances of their own invention, which is not very probable; there being no indication whatsoever of those writers being great wits. It is probable, that, after Fabius Pictor and some others had composed General Histories of their Country, most of the private Memorials, which had served them, in many particulars, for guides and vouchers, were neglected and lost; as was the fate of Livy, and all the Historians prior to Livy, after he had published a better written and more entertaining History, comprehending the substance of all that they had collected.

M. de B., in the second part of his Dissertation, produces from the Roman story, several facts, which he calls Principal Events, and which, from the disagreement among the Antients, in their accounts of them, he considers as wholly uncertain; and from the uncertainty of these Principal Events he infers the uncertainty of all the rest. I shall not enter into a particular consideration of the facts referred to; Because, first of all, some of them are spoken of by the Antients as uncertain; and nobody pretends to certainty where they disclaim it. In the next place, because I conceive that very few of the facts mentioned have a title to be called Principal Events; and lastly because, if disagreement in some things, among Historians who write of the same people and times, be a sufficient ground for refusing credit to every thing they relate, there is no History which may not with good reason be utterly rejected; and I am not concerned in the defence of History in general.

BUT, in the first part of the Dissertation, there is one particular, which being strenuously insisted upon by the ingenious author, and seeming very much to his purpose of discrediting the accounts, given us by Livy

^a J'ai rapporté les raisons qui me font revoquer en doute l'Histoire des cinq premiers Siecles de Rome. Elles sont fondées sur la disette de Monumens, et d'Historiens contemporains; de sorte que les premiers Historians ne purent fonder leurs relations, que sur la Tradition, sujette à alterer beaucoup la verité des faits. p. 205.

^b Livy's 17th Book ended with the year 495.

and Dionysius, of the early times of the Republic, ought not to be passed over unconsidered: I mean THE TREATY which Polybius says, was concluded between the Romans and Cartbaginians in the first year after the expulsion of Tarquin; Lucius Junius Brutus, and Marcus Horatius being Consuls. The Reader may find this piece in the 7th Chap. of B. 3. of this History. If the treaty be genuine, and there be no mistake in the date which Polybius assigns to it, it stands in opposition to many things related by the two other Historians.

Dissert. p.
35.

I. IT APPEARS by this treaty (says M. de B.) "That Brutus and Horatius were colleagues in the consulship; which, according to Livy and Dionysius, and all the Roman Fasti, they were not:" and he adds, "that every thing the historians tell us of the events of this year, being partly founded on the names of the Consuls, nothing of the whole is, in his opinion, much worthy of credit."

+ Dissert.
vol. N. 3.

He observes, "that Mr. Dodwell, (de cyclis Rom. Diss. x. p. 104.) and Rycquius (de capit. Rom. c. 11.) chuse rather to accuse Polybius of falsifying this treaty, than admit the uncertainty which it throws upon antient history: and that Perizonius + has endeavoured to reconcile Polybius with the Roman Fasti, by conjecturing, That Polybius found only the name of Horatius in the original of the treaty, and added, of his own head, the name of Brutus, the better to denote the true date of this piece; and, as the name of Horatius alone had been put on the temple of the capitol, so that name alone had been put to this treaty. This conjecture [says M. de B.] I would let pass, if it removed the other difficulties raised by the piece in question, and reconciled it with the accounts given by the other Historians: yet I think Polybius too well versed in the Roman History, to have given Horatius a colleague, who never was his colleague; and too exact and scrupulous to have added any thing of his own to an original piece."

THAT it is not probable, Polybius would falsify a Treaty, add any thing of his own to an Original Piece, I readily grant; and that Perizonius's conjecture, if admitted, would leave the main difficulties in their full force. But I should be curious to know, what Roman History that was, which M. de B. supposes Polybius so well versed in, and in which he supposes him to have found, that Brutus and Horatius were colleagues in the consulship. If, in the days of Polybius, there were authentic annals existing, which recorded the transactions of the earliest times of the Republic, M. de B.'s main position in his Dissertation is overthrown. If he supposes that Polybius's sole authority for joining Brutus and Horatius in the consulship (contrary to report of the older historians and annalists, whom Livy and Dionysius are said to have copied) was the piece in question, I would ask, how it appears that

* Je crois qu'il faut avouer de bonne foi, dé sur les noms de consuls, est peu digne de que tout ce que les Historiens nous disent des créance.
événemens de cette année, étant en partie sen-

the names of Brutus and Horatius were certainly at the head or tail of that ancient monument? It is plain they were not in the body of it. When Livy and Dionysius contradict Polybius upon any particular historical fact, I believe there are very few readers who will not be inclined to side with the last, provided there be no reason not to do so, but barely his being contradicted upon that fact, by those two historians. But this is not the present case. The fact reported by him is highly improbable; and it is inconsistent with a series of not improbable facts, reported by them; facts, in regard to which we cannot conceive any temptation they had to invent, conceal, or disguise: and, in what Polybius himself says, there seems to be good ground for suspecting that he was deceived in relation to the piece in question. He introduces his translation of it with these words: “The first treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians was made in the consulship of Lucius Junius Brutus and Marcus Horatius, the first Consuls after the Regifuge, by whom also was consecrated the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, 28 years before the passing of Xerxes into Greece. Below, you will find the words of the treaty, interpreted in the best manner I was able to do it. For the antient Latin is so different from that now in use, that the most skilful are frequently at a loss, even after close application, to explain it.”—And (in c. 26.) after giving us two subsequent treaties, he says, “It is no wonder that Philius knew nothing of these [all the 3] treaties, (though engraven on brass, and preserved in the temple of Jupiter, under the custody of the Ædiles) for even in my time, the oldest men, both Romans and Carthaginians, those who were thought the best acquainted with public affairs, were ignorant of these treaties.”

NOW, granting that some Consuls names were really found at the beginning or end of the old record in question, yet nobody will suppose, that the Consuls were there described in the manner Polybius describes them. The description is all his own. And (by the way) when he says, that the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was consecrated by Brutus and Horatius; Who can prefer his authority, in this particular, to that of Livy, or of the most antient Latin historians whom doubtless Livy followed herein; and to the very inscription itself on the temple, where Horatius was named as the only consecrator? What motive can we imagine the Roman Historians to have had for denying Brutus a share in that honour, if he had any title to it? Besides, it seems pretty evident from many passages in Livy, that it was not the custom, in the dedication of any temple, for more than one person to perform that ceremony.

FURTHER; not only the description of the Consuls, but their very NAMES, as Polybius gives them, cannot well be supposed to have been annexed to this record, Lucius Junius with his surname Brutus, and Marcus Horatius without his surname Pulvillus. If the names were entire and legible, we must believe that the historian has either omitted or added something. And supposing, that to this record were found both entire and legible, the names of some Consuls; yet why is it so difficult to believe, that Polybius may have been deceived, concerning those names, by persons to whom he applied himself, for assistance in his attempt to explain a record in old Latin? For it is not to be supposed that he, a stranger, would undertake without assistance to translate a piece so difficult to be translated, even by the most skilful of the natives. He may have given us a false account of the date of this treaty without being guilty of forgery.

AND why may we not suppose, that time had effaced some parts of the Consuls names, and that the defects were supplied by conjecture? The Roman vanity might have a share too in the conjecture: it might prompt the assistants of our historian to fill up the chasms in such a manner as to form an evidence, that the Roman state was considerable enough, in the first year of the Republic, to have a treaty with the Carthaginians.

BUT perhaps there is some reason to doubt, whether any date, or Consuls names were really found at the beginning or end of this old record. For it is remarkable, that Polybius, who gives us, at large, two subsequent treaties engraven, like the first, on brass, and kept with it under the custody of the Ædiles, neither mentions the names of the Consuls under whose administration they were made, nor assigns any certain date to either of them. Of the former of the two he says only, that it was made after the first; and of the latter he says only, that it was made about the time of Pyrrhus's coming into Italy: and for this it does not appear, that he had any voucher, but the matter of the treaty itself, where Pyrrhus is mentioned. If he had found dates and Consuls names to these brazen records, it is wonderful that so exact an historian should omit them; and especially when he is employing these records as evidence against Philinus's accounts, and the evidence has no real weight for want of those dates. Seeing then there is so much reason to believe that the records of the two later treaties wanted dates, we may well suspect that the oldest had the like defect; and that the date given to it was by mere conjecture.

Dissert. p.
27.

II. M. DE B.'s second discovery, in this important piece of antiquity, is, "That so early as the first year of the Republic, the Romans practised navigation and piracy; of which things (he adds) there is little said in their history, which represents their marine, till the first Punic war, as consisting only of some merchant ships, and as not brought to any perfection but on account of that war, as Polybius himself remarks."

L. 2. c. 20.

I MUST here confess, that I cannot discern, in the treaty, one word importing, that the Romans at the time of its being concluded, practised

* Suppose the treaty in question to have been made so late as 304. the first year after the Decemvirs, when Lucius Valerius Potitus and Marcus Horatius Barbatus were Consuls. The matter of the treaty will, in this case, suit better with the times, according to the accounts of them by Livy, and Dionysius. (For A-dia was then in alliance with Rome, and Astium was a Roman colony.) Imagine the names of the Consuls to have been partly effaced, and that there remained of them, (supposing the cognomens to have been originally inserted) only Lucius —ius —us, Marcus Horatius. Who will not see, that the Roman vanity of those, whom Polybius employed for his decyphers, might tempt them to supply the chasms with Jan — Bru —? But I am inclined to think that the piece in question was of much later date than the year 304.

piracy, or had any ships of war. Perhaps M. de B. collects this piracy from Polybius's comment on the treaty, who says, "That the Carthaginians would not suffer the Romans to sail to the south of the Fair Promontory with long ships, μακρὰς ναυσὶ;" which are commonly understood to be ships of war. But his comment here does not well accord with what he himself asserts, when he writes of the first Punic war: For he there tells us, "That the Romans, to that time, had never thought of the sea—and were so far from having decked ships, that they had not so much as one long ship, or even a Lembus." In this particular the historian is undoubtedly mistaken; and I mention it, not only to shew its repugnance to his comment on the treaty in question, but to shew likewise that Polybius is not always to be followed with a blind deference; and that we ought, in reading him, to observe the rule which he recommends to those who read the historian Fabius, "not to regard so much the great name of the person who writes, as the matter he delivers," and to consider whether this be probable, have the appearance of truth, and be consistent with what is unquestionably true^a.

BUT further, this treaty, according to M. de B., informs us,

^a Polybius (L. 3. c. 26.) quarrels with Philinus, not for being ignorant of the three treaties before mentioned, as he supposes he was, but for asserting things contrary to the tenor of them. Now it does not appear, from any proof Polybius gives, either that Philinus was ignorant of these treaties, or that he asserted any thing contrary to them. Philinus affirmed (in speaking of the grounds of the first Punic war) that in some treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians, it had been covenanted, that the former should not invade any part of Sicily, nor the latter any part of Italy. But this assertion does not contradict what is contained in the other treaties. To shew a contradiction Polybius should have given us the dates of all the three treaties he has mentioned, and likewise the date, which Philinus assigned to the treaty mentioned by him; and this Polybius has not done. The treaty, to which Philinus refer'd, might have been made after the time of Pyrrhus's coming into Italy: And Philinus might know there was such a treaty, though Polybius could find no record of it: which is the second bad reason he gives for denying the fact. What Philinus reported is so far from being manifestly false, that it is highly probable. For if the Romans before they had subdued all Latium, or had even alliances with all the Latine states, thought it necessary to bind the Carthaginians by treaty not to attempt conquests in any part of Latium, it was natural, that when they came to have the same sort of interest in protecting all Italy from the Carthaginians which they had before in protecting Latium only, they should exclude the Carthaginians from every part of Italy; and doubtless in that case the Carthaginians would exclude the Romans for the like reasons, from every part of Sicily.

[N. B. In p. 18. of this second Volume of this History, where the question Whether the first war, undertaken by the Romans against the Carthaginians was justifiable, is discussed, the reasoning is partly founded on the supposition, that the report of Polybius is true; and that no treaty had been concluded between the two states, whereby the Romans were barred from meddling in the affairs of Sicily.]

It is sometimes urged against the authority of Livy and Dionysius, with regard to certain important facts related by them, that Polybius is silent concerning those facts, tho' he wrote of the same times and on the same subject which they treat. But I shall here observe once for all, That this his silence will never alone be a sufficient reason for rejecting the accounts of the other historians. For Polybius, though he speaks three times of the taking of Rome by the Gauls, does not once mention their burning it; and yet this is an important fact, of which I believe nobody questions the truth.

Duffen. p.
37.

• Lib. 2.
in fine.

+ Lib. ix.

p. 615.

§ D. Hal.

Lib. 4.

p. 277.

Lib. Lib. 1.

c. 57.

III. THAT so early as the first year of the Republic, “The Romans were masters of all the sea-coast as far as to Tarracina, and even of the cities of Antium and Ardea; a point wherein it manifestly stands in opposition to *Livy and Dionysius†. For these authors tell us, that Antium was the capital of the Volsci, and that the Romans did not take it till 40 years after, in the consulship of T. Quinctius and Q. Servilius. The city of Ardea §, according to the same historians, was besieged by Tarquin the Proud at the time when the Roman people shook off the yoke of his domination. The Ardeates, after that, having the same interests with the Romans, made a fifteen years truce with them. After which time Ardea continued in alliance with Rome to the year 310, when, on account of some particular discontents, they confederated with the Volsci; but in the following year the old alliance was renewed.

“This city therefore (adds M. de B.) was, according to those historians, independent, and only in alliance with the Romans; whereas the treaty, given at large by Polybius, imports, that this city, and likewise Antium, Laurentum, Circeii, Tarracina were SUBJECT to them; and expressly distinguished these cities from the cities IN ALLIANCE with Rome. Hence it appears that the two historians give us a false notion of the Roman state in the beginning of the republic; for they represent its domination as extending little further than the proper territory of Rome; whereas by this treaty we see, that it extended over several cities, and over all the sea-coast as far as Tarracina.”

WHENEVER THIS treaty was made (supposing it genuine) it is evident, that the main purpose of the Romans in it, was to exclude the Carthaginians from all Latium, not only those parts of it that were subject to the Romans, or in alliance with them, but those likewise with which they had neither of those connexions. And it is not, I think, clear from the words of the treaty, that all the towns therein mentioned were in absolute subjection to the Romans. It speaks to this effect, “Let the Carthaginians do no hurt to the Ardeates, Antiates, Laurentini, Circeienses, Tarracineses, or any other of the Latines, if they be ὑπηκοί, nay if any of them be not ὑπηκοί, let not the Carthaginians meddle with their towns. If they take any town of the Latines [whether they be ὑπηκοί or not ὑπηκοί] let them restore it unhurt to the Romans.” Here is no distinction made of towns subject and towns in alliance, but of the Latines who were ὑπηκοί, and the Latines who were not ὑπηκοί. What the force of the word ὑπηκοί is, does not fully appear; whether it mean subject in the strict sense, or only dependent allies. I say dependent allies; for these towns might be in alliance with the Romans and yet not independent on them; such being the

* ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ ΔΕ ΜΗ ΑΔΙΚΕΙΤΩ-ΣΑΝ ΔΗΜΟΝ ΑΡΔΕΑΤΩΝ, ΑΝΤΙΑΤΩΝ, ΔΙΤΡΕΝΤΙΝΩΝ, ΚΙΡΚΑΙΑΤΩΝ, ΤΑΡΡΑ-ΚΗΝΙΤΩΝ, ΜΗΔ' ΑΛΛΟΝ ΜΗΔΕΝΑ ΛΑ-
ΤΙΝΩΝ, ΟΣΟΙ ΑΝ ΥΠΗΚΟΟΙ. ΕΑΝ ΔΕ

ΤΙΝΕΣ ΜΗ ΩΣΙΝ ΥΠΗΚΟΟΙ, ΤΩΝ ΠΟ-ΛΩΝ ΑΠΕΧΕΤΩΣΑΝ. ΑΝ ΔΕ ΛΑΒΩΣΙ, ΡΩΜΑΙΟΙΣ ΑΠΟΔΙΔΟΤΩΣΑΝ ΑΚΕΡΑΙΟΝ.
Polyb. Lib. 3. c. 22.

case of almost all the states of Italy at the commencement of the first Punic war. And what the true import was of the old obsolete Latin word, which Polybius has rendered ὑπηκούοι, who can tell? One would suspect that neither Polybius nor his assistants did very well understand the piece they undertook to explain. For it is a very strange covenant, That in case the Carthaginians seized any town of the Latines, not subject to the Romans, they should restore it to the Romans.

Further; If this Brazen Monument had, for its date, the names of Brutus and Horatius (Consuls in the first year of the Republic) and if the words of the treaty import, that the Ardeates were SUBJECT TO Rome, and distinguish them from ALLIES, it is contradicted by an Original Authentic Record, which Livy mentions of a Treaty of Alliance and Friendship, made with the Ardeates in the Consulships of L. Sempronius Atratinus, and L. Papirius Mugilanus (year of Rome 309 or 311:) which treaty was a Renewal of an Alliance that had long subsisted between the two States ^a. Lib. 4. c. 7.

Again; it is hardly to be imagined that the Romans had subdued the maritime towns of old Latium, as far as to Tarracina, in the remotest extremity of it, without having reduced the intermediate inland towns, and in short, the whole or almost the whole country: Yet this subjection of the Latine Nation to Rome in the first year of the Republic, is incompatible with an Original Brazen Monument existing in Livy's time, and recording the Treaty of Alliance made with the Latines in the second Consulship of Cassius, (year of R. 260 or 261.) L. 2. c. 33.

And, as to Antium, the Capital of the Volsci, though Livy reports, that it was taken (in 284) forty years after the commencement of the Republic, yet, by the sequel ^b of his story, it would seem, that the Antiates L. 2. c. 65.

^a The Ardeates, on occasion of a dispute between them and their neighbours the Aricini, about a tract of land, were insulted by a decree of the Roman people, to whom the cause had been referred; who, instead of adjudging the land to either of the claimants, took it to themselves. Hereupon the Ardeates broke alliance with the Romans, and soon after, by Ambassadors, complained at Rome of the injury which had been done them; but complained in such terms, as shewed, they were willing to renew alliance and friendship with the Roman state, provided restitution were made of the land in question. The Senate gave them a soft answer; and the next year the alliance was renewed by treaty; the record of which treaty Licinius Macer had read. T. Quinctius Barbatus interrex consules creat, L. Papirius Mugilanus, L. Sempronius Atratinus. His consulibus cum Ardeatibus fœdus renovatum est. Idque Monumenti est, Consules eos illo anno fuisse qui neque in Anna- libus Priscis, neque in Libris Magistratum inveniuntur, Credo, quod Tribuni Militum initio anni fuerent, eo perinde ac si totum annum in imperio fuerunt, suffectis his Consulibus, prætermisita nomina Consulium horum. Licinius Macer auctor est, et in Fœdere Ardeatino et in Linteis Libris ad Monetæ inventa.

^b The Latine Historian relates, that when after the taking of Antium in 285. by T. Quinctius, the Senate had decreed to place a Colony there, the persons appointed to settle the Colony could prevail with but few of the Roman Citizens to go thither, so that they were forced to admit of Volsci to compleat the necessary number; and he further tells us, that a multitude of the old inhabitants returning soon after to the City, these alienated the minds of the Colony from the Romans, and its fidelity could no longer be depended upon. Livy seems not to have known the exact time, when the Antiates shook off all dependance upon the Re- L. 3. c. 1. c. 4. c. 23.

seems not to have duly reflected, when he says^a, “ It is sufficiently apparent that Livy and Dionysius knew nothing of the treaty mentioned “ by Polybius.” They could not but meet with this piece in Polybius’s work, which they appear to be very well acquainted with, and of which Livy makes great use in compiling his own. And is it not evident therefore, from their shewing no regard to what Polybius says of his old brazen monument, either that they looked upon it as not authentic, or knew that he had been deceived concerning the date of it? It is remarkable, that Livy, who informs us, that some authors differing from the rest, make Horatius the immediate successor of Brutus, has not thought it worth while to observe, that Polybius makes them colleagues in the consulship. L. 2. c. 8.

Add to this the great improbability, that, during the unsettled and precarious state of things at Rome, in the first year after the expulsion of Tarquinius, the Carthaginians should enter into any treaty with the Romans; and the yet greater improbability, that they should conclude a treaty with them in terms, which suppose them in a settled state, and in a condition to maintain the stipulations therein expressed.

Perhaps we should have found the matter cleared up, and Polybius’s mistake animadverted upon by Livy or Dionysius, if those parts of their histories, which treated of the first war with the Carthaginians, had been preserved.

I SHALL close these Observations with the words of M. de Pouilly, in the beginning of his Nouveaux Essais de Critique sur la fidelité de l’Histoire.

“ It very seldom happens that we avoid one faulty extreme without “ running into another, its contrary: This maxim, true in morality, is “ true in criticism. Are men afraid of giving credit to fables? They “ sometimes refuse it to the most certain facts; they look upon History “ as a compound of Truths and Fictions, so intimately united, that it is “ impossible to separate them.—Had the Historian no part in the trans- “ actions he relates? They suspect him of being ill informed.—Had he a “ part in those transactions? They accuse him of prejudice and pre- “ possession.—On the other hand there are those, who, fearing lest they “ should happen to reject true History, give credit to all the Fables “ which have borrowed its Name.—Let us avoid these opposite ex- “ travagances: Let us confess, that, in History, falsehood is mingled with “ truth; but that there are marks by which they may be distinguished. “ Love of the Marvellous, Interest, Vanity, Spirit of Party, are so many “ fountains ever open, from whence fiction spreads itself in ample waves “ over the Annals of all nations.—When we are reduced to seek the truth “ of a fact in historians biassed by passions, if they are of different parties “ and interests, let us bring their narrations together; and from this “ collation, we shall strike out the truth, if I may so speak, in spite of “ them: I say farther, that those who are of one and the same party, “ will commonly deserve some credit in facts of such public notoriety, “ that they durst not disguise them; or in which they were too little in- “ terested to have sufficient temptation to undertake it.”

^a Il paroît même assez, qu’ils n’en ont eu aucune connoissance, Dissert. p. 34. Si Tite Live avoit eu connoissance de cette piece, &c. S’il avoit consulté ce monument, &c. p. 39.

T H E

Roman History.

FOURTH BOOK.

From the Beginning of the FIRST PUNIC WAR in the Year of Rome 489, to the End of the SECOND in 552.

INTRODUCTION.

IN the close of the preceding volume of this History, we left the Romans complete conquerors and quiet possessors of all ancient Italy, that is, of all the country between the Adriatic and the Mediterranean from the remotest border of Hebruria to the Ionian sea. The far greater part of this Dominion, though their state [by the usual reckonings] was now 488 years old, had been of late acquisition: For whatever advantage they might have over their neighbours, in the admirable construction of their ^a legion, the discipline of war, or any other respects, they could make but little progress in conquest, during the space of above four centuries from the building of their city. Rome, while under the government of Kings, was in the weakness of infancy; and if, with Florus, we consider her as advanced to sprightly youth, (the second stage of life,) when she became a Republic, yet her natural strength was impaired, and her growth long checked, by the disease of civil discord, a mischief wholly proceeding from the want of that essential of a free state, a just equality among its members.

By the revolution which expelled Tarquin the Proud, the Commons of Rome were delivered from a Tyrant, but not from Tyranny. A short suspension there was indeed of the weight of oppression: This was owing

^a Vegetius thinks that the form of the legion was not the product of meer human reason, but that the Romans were led to it by a kind of instinct from Heaven: Non tantum humano consilio, sed etiam divinitatis instinctu, legiones a Romanis arbitror constitutas. De re milit. l. 2. c. 21.

Livy, B. 2.
ch. 9.

• Patricians the Y. of
R. 242.

Y. of R.
242.

Y. of R.
242.

Y. of R.
242.

See Vol. I.
B. 7. ch.
4. §. 1.

to the honest zeal of that excellent Patriot, Valerius Poplicola, and to the temporising lenity and moderation of the Senate, while their fears of Tarquin's return were alive and strong. In so perilous a season the indulgent Fathers had the goodness to decree, That the poorer sort, by only educating their children, paid sufficient tribute to the State, and ought not to be loaded with any other tax. But it was not long before the Plebeians felt themselves in the chains of servitude; Livy makes the death of Tarquin, which happened in the fourteenth year after his banishment, to be the precise period when they began ^b to be oppressed by the Nobles. The Commons then became sensible, that, by dethroning their King, they had only cast off the domination of one Tyrant to become slaves to many, in a Assembly of Tyrants, whose yoke was no less heavy and insupportable. The Valerian * law, to permit appeals from the sentence of the Magistrates to the People assembled, was not sufficient to protect the Plebeians from injustice and cruelty. They found it necessary to provide themselves living Protectors against the Tyranny of the Great, and therefore extorted from the Senate a consent to the establishment of the Tribunitian Power. Another rampart against the overflowings of ambition they raised to themselves by instituting the Comitia Tributa, and by the practice of bringing into judgment, before those assemblies, the most exalted of the Nobles, upon accusations of treason against the People. By the publication of the laws of the Twelve Tables some check was given to the abuse of that prerogative, which the Patricians tenaciously kept, of being the sole judges in civil causes; and we find, that on several other occasions, the Commons, urged by oppression to fury, exerted their natural strength in such a manner, as seemed to proclaim them the sovereign masters in Rome. But those acts of power were only transient flashes, the lightnings of a civil tempest: and, notwithstanding all the advances hitherto made towards liberty and equality, the Patricians were the permanent, established Lords of the Commonwealth: all the great Offices, Civil, Military, and Sacerdotal, were confined to their body; the public treasure at their disposal: They heaped up riches to themselves; and, while the People, through extreme indigence, fell under a necessity of contracting debts to the Patrician usurers, the laws gave the creditors power to be cruel to their insolvent debtors: And the consequence of all this was, that multitudes of the Plebeians, slavishly dependent by reason of their poverty, durst not concur with the more free, in using even the undisputed rights of the commons. Hence the few instances of Plebeians chosen to the Military Tribuneship, even after they were legally qualified for that station.

^b Insignis hic annus est nuncio Tarquinii latitia: plebi, cui ad eam diem summa ope mortis.—Eo nuncio erecti patres, erecta inservitum erat, injuriæ à primoribus fieri plebes. Sed patribus nimis luxuriosa ea facta cœpere. B. 2. ch. 21.

The commonwealth of Rome was never truly a free state, till after the publication of the Licinian Laws, those laws which, in their consequences, made Merit alone the ordinary scale whereby to ascend to the highest offices, and which by admitting the Plebeians to a reasonable share of what was purchased with their blood, delivered them from that servile subjection to the wealthy nobles in which their indigence had so long detained them.

Y. of R.
386.

From this period, the Roman people, when they made laws, or elected Magistrates for the execution of them, were, generally speaking, free from all undue influence; not overawed, as before, by the rich and the great, nor constrained by any force, but that of reason and natural justice, in the most absolute subjection to which is the most perfect freedom. No citizen, who had shewed superior talents and virtue, stood excluded, on account of the low degree of his birth, from the dignities of the state: The emulation among the individuals was to surpass each other in deserving honours.

Indeed the haughty Patricians, as, when vanquished by the Plebeians, they had given ground with an angry reluctance, and retired fighting, so they afterwards, from time to time, shewed a strong disposition to renew the war, in order to regain their unrighteous sovereignty: but their efforts were faint and ineffectual; and at length acquiescing in what they could not undo, there ensued domestic peace and union, and an established liberty.

Union at home gave new strength to the state; and liberty seems to have inspired the people with a more elevated courage, a more unwearied fortitude, than they had hitherto shewn, in their wars abroad. By a series of victories, they, in the space of about 70 years (reckoning from the battle against the Latines in 413) enlarged their narrow dominion, of a few leagues about the city, to the utmost extent of Italy. And, though destitute of naval strength and naval skill, their next enterprize, as we shall presently find, will be against a rival republic, beyond the continent; a republic that with greater riches, and more ample territories than theirs, had possession of the absolute dominion of the sea. The boldness of the undertaking, and the amazing constancy with which they supported it, in spite of the most terrible adversities, are not to be paralleled in the history of any other nation: But the Roman legions were, at this time, legions of free citizens, whose predominant passion was glory, and who placed the highest glory in facing every danger, and surmounting every difficulty, to preserve their Liberty, and extend their Empire.

C H A P. I.

The occasion and commencement of the first Punic or Carthaginian war.

THE prophetic * exclamation of King Pyrrhus, as he sailed from Sicily, is now going to be accomplished, and that island to be the theatre of a bloody war between Rome and Carthage. The

* See Vol.
I. B. 3. ch.
28. §. 3.

Epirot, when he beheld these powerful and ambitious Republics making swift advances in conquest, and by every step approaching nearer to each other, could have no difficulty to foresee that they would soon become enemies; and, as he might with reason believe that the Romans would finish the reduction of Italy, before the Carthaginians could totally subdue Sicily, the conjecture was natural, that this country would be the seat of the war between them. He himself had gone thither, on the invitation of the people of Syracuse, to guard them against the Carthaginian encroachments; and he was, doubtless, persuaded, that, in a short time, they would find themselves under a necessity of suing to the Romans for the like succour. The occasion however of the first rupture, between Rome and Carthage, was not any distress of the Syracusans; it was an event singular and unexpected; and as it has left ground for a dispute, whether the First Punic or Carthaginian War was justly undertaken by the Romans, it may be proper, for the reader's satisfaction, to state the case as fully as possible; and, in order thereto, we must recall some passages of the former * part of this History.

• See Vol.
I. B. 3. ch.
25. §. 1. &
ch. 29. §. 5.
Strabo. l. 6.
p. 268.
Polyb. l. 2.
c. 7.
D. N. Scit.
in E. 1. 3.
p. 365.

A considerable body of soldiers, Campanians by birth, and called Mamertines, had been mercenaries to Agathocles King of Syracuse; upon whose death, finding themselves no longer welcome there, they marched away with all their effects to Messina. Admitted here, and kindly entertained as friends, they treacherously massacred one part of the citizens, expelled the rest, and seized, for their own use, upon the lands, houses, and even wives of those unfortunate men.

Some time after this, when Pyrrhus was just landed in Italy, the inhabitants of Rhegium, that their city might neither fall into the hands of the Epirot, nor become a prey to the Carthaginians, who were masters of the sea, and whose fleets appeared frequently off the coast, requested of the Roman Senate, to furnish them with a garrison. A Legion of 4000 Romans, raised in Campania, was, under the command of Decius Junellius, appointed to that service. At first, they demeaned themselves suitably to the intention of those who employed them: but, at length tempted by the wealth of the place, emboldened by the example of the Mamertines, and strengthened by their aid, they acted the same perfidious and cruel part towards the Rhegians, which the other had acted towards the people at Messina.

As these cities are parted only by that narrow sea (now called the Faro) which separates Italy from Sicily, it was easy for the two bands of robbers mutually to assist each other in the defence of their usurpations; for which purpose they entered into a strict confederacy.

The Romans, though they found their honour greatly stained by the outrageous wickedness of the garrison, with which they had furnished their good allies, were then too much engaged in affairs more urgent, to take immediate revenge on the offenders: Nor in truth did they turn their thoughts that way till four years after Pyrrhus had left Italy, and the old enemies of Rome were all subdued. Then they marched an army to Rhegium, and besieged it; in which enterprize Hiero of Syracuse cuse lent his aid. The traitors, hopeless of pardon, defended themselves with an obstinate resolution, yet the town was at length carried by assault: All those who escaped the sword of the assailants, being led in chains to Rome, were, by a decree of the senate, first beaten with rods, and then beheaded: And the Rbegians were restored to their former liberty and estates.

About six years after this execution of justice, the fame of which had sounded honourably through all quarters of Italy, came messengers to Rome from the Mamertines in Sicily, imploring help against the Syracusians, under whose power they were ready to fall, and who they feared, would inflict on them the like punishment for the like crimes: A most impudent request from the thieves of Messina, to ask protection of the very judges who had condemned to death their fellow-thieves of Rbegium! Nevertheless, from a view of their present situation, we shall perhaps be induced to conclude, that the Mamertines took this step in consequence of sober reflection, and were not without a reasonable hope of assistance from Rome.

These usurpers of Messina, so long as they could get succours from their friends at Rbegium, had not only lived fearless of any danger, but had often been aggressors on their neighbours the Carthaginians and Syracusians, putting many towns and villages under contribution. The posture of their affairs received a mighty change by the destruction of their Italian allies: Of whose wonted aid being deprived, they were overthrown in battle by the Syracusians under the conduct of Hiero^d, Prætor of that state, and their army almost totally cut off. Humbled
and Polyb. I.

1. c. 8.
and 9.

^d Hiero, on his return to Syracuse, was elected King. He was the son of Hierocles, and by him descended from Gelo, who had formerly reigned in Syracuse; but his mother was a slave. He distinguished himself early from those of his own years by his expertness in military exercises, and his courage in battle. He gained the esteem of Pyrrhus, and was honoured with several rewards from his hand. Extremely handsome, of great bodily strength, smooth and engaging in his address, equitable in business, and gentle in command, he seem'd to want nothing kingly but a kingdom. Pulchritudo ei corporis insignis, vires quoque in homine admirabiles fuere; in alloquio blandus, in negotio justus, in imperio moderatus; prorsus ut nihil ei regium deesse, præter regnum videretur. Justin, B. 23. chap. 4.

He was chosen Prætor by the soldiers on occasion of a quarrel between them and the citizens: Nevertheless, the latter, on account of the great gentleness and humanity with which he proceeded on his first accession to power, confirmed him in that office. He aspired however to something yet higher, as was easily discerned by the quick-sighted from the very beginning of his administration. For Hiero knowing that the citizens, whenever the troops with their leaders went into the field, were apt to fall into factions and seditions, and that Leptines, a man in high repute for his probity, had the greatest sway with the people, he made an alliance with him, by taking his daughter to wife, proposing by this means to secure to himself the fidelity of the Syracusians at home, during his expeditions with the army abroad. As to the soldiery, the veteran mercenaries having lost their discipline, and being on all occasions prompt to mutiny, and to raise new commotions, he took the following method to get rid of them. Under colour of a design to extirpate the usur-

Polyb. I.
1. c. 8.

ca, and some part of Spain, but were masters of Sardinia, and the adjacent isles on the coast of Italy, and had even extended their dominion far in Sicily,

Solinus reckons 737 years from the first year of Carthage to its total destruction, which if placed in the 607th of Rome, Carthage, according to him, was built before Rome 130 years.

According to Sir Isaac Newton, Carthage was founded by Dido 883 years before the beginning of the Christian Era. This Computation will fall in with that of Solinus, as to the age of Carthage, but not as to the juniority of Rome; which Sir Isaac supposes to be younger than her rival by 256 years.]

The new City grew in a short time into a flourishing condition; Iarbas, a neighbouring Prince, demanded Dido in marriage, threatening the Carthaginians with war in case of refusal. Dido, to avoid this marriage, without drawing a calamity upon her people, put an end to her own life with a poniard. She was afterwards worshipped as a Goddess so long as Carthage subsisted.

THE FIRST WAR^a waged by the Carthaginians in Africa seems to have been on account of the annual tribute they had bound themselves to pay to the Africans for the ground on which their city stood. In this war their arms prospered under the conduct of one Malchus.

But Mago who succeeded Malchus, is consider'd, by Justin, as the first builder of the Carthaginian empire, because it was he that introduc'd an exact discipline among the troops. After his death his two sons Hafdrubal and Hamilcar had the command of the army. These brothers left each three sons, who shared among them the chief authority in Carthage. They made war against the Moors and Numidians with success, and obliged the Africans to relinquish all claim to the tribute; which they had demanded sword in hand.

[Six commanders out of one and the same family, and who governed all affairs both at home and abroad, seemed dangerous to a free State. It was a jealousy of the exorbitant power of this family of Mago, which induced the Carthaginians to elect an hundred judges out of the Senators, to whom the Generals were to give an account of their conduct after their return from the war.]

When the Carthaginians had made considerable conquests in Africa, there arose a^b war between them and the people of Cyrene (a powerful city, standing to the East of the greater Syrtis) concerning the limits of their respective jurisdictions. After many bloody conflicts by land and sea, it was agreed (as the story is told) that two men should set out from each of the two cities at the same instant, and that the place of their meeting should be the boundary to the two States. The men from Carthage (who were brothers of the name of Philanus) either made more expedition than those from Cyrene, or, as Valerius Maximus relates, began their course before the appointed time. Be that as it will, the Cyrenians complained of deceit, and refused to stand to the agreement, unless the two brothers (in proof of their innocence) would consent to be buried alive in the place of meeting. The Philani, readily acquiescing in the proposal, were buried quick in that spot; and the Carthaginians erected there two altars to their memory. The place from that time was called The Altars of the Philani [Aræ Philenorum] and was ever after the eastern boundary of the Carthaginian Empire, which in time comprehended the whole extent of the northern coast of Africa, from those Altars to the Pillars of Hercules.

History does not inform us at what times the Carthaginians first carried their arms into SICILY, SARDINIA, or SPAIN.

SPAIN had sufficient allurements to draw the Carthaginians thither. It abounded with mines of gold and silver, enchanting baits to their avarice, and it was peopled by a martial race of men, who (if once reduced to be subjects of Carthage) would furnish her with brave troops for the conquest of other nations, and free her, in part, from the necessity of employing foreign mercenaries in her wars. For the genius of the Carthaginians being more turned to commerce than war, they had constantly recourse (at least in the latter ages of their state) to that dangerous expedient of hiring strangers to fight their battles.

The

^a Justin, B. 18. ch. 7. B. 19. c. 1.

^b Sallust, de Bell. Jugurth. Val. Maxim. B. 5. c. 6.

Sicily, these things gave them very uneasy apprehensions. For they plainly foresaw, that unless they interposed to prevent it, Messina would soon fall into the hands of those formidable neighbours; who would then be able speedily to invade Syracuse, and all the other parts of the island, not yet in their obedience. They considered likewise, that the Carthaginians, when once in possession of Messina, might make use of it almost as a bridge to pass into

* The occasion of the first descent made by the Carthaginians on Spain, was, to defend the inhabitants of Gades, (a colony from Tyre, and more ancient than those of Carthage and Utica) against the Spaniards.

Encouraged by success in this enterprize, they became aggressors, and made conquests in Spain. It is plain however, by what Polihus and Livy tell us of the wars of Amilcar Barca, Asdrubal, and Hannibal, that, till the times of these generals, (that is, till after the end of the first Punic War) the Carthaginians did not penetrate far into that country.

[Some account of Spain will be given in a more proper place, when the Romans carry their arms thither.]

Diod. Sic.
L. 5.

Sicily, the largest island in the Mediterranean, was anciently called Trinacria and Tripuscula, on account of its triangular form.

b Pz. Taro.
c Cape di Faro.

The eastern side, which faces the Ionian or Græcian sea, extends from Cape ^a Pachynum to ^b Pelerus. The chief cities on this coast were Syracuse, Taurinæm, and Messina.

On the northern coast, looking towards Italy, and reaching from Cape Pelerus to Cape Lilybaeum, the most noted cities were Mile, Hymera, Panormus, Eryx, Drepanum, Lilybaeum.

The south-west side, opposite to Africa, extends from Cape Lilybaeum to Pachynum. Its principal cities were Selinus, Agrigentum, Gela and Camarina. The passage from Lilybaeum to the promontory of Mercury in Africa is about 137 miles.

Diod. Sic.
B. 11. p.
1. 2.

ABOUT the year Ant. Chr. 480. the Carthaginians, in consequence of a league made with Xerxes King of Persia, raised an army of more than 300,000 men, and equipped a fleet of 200 ships of war, and 3000 transports, in order to attack and expel all the Greeks who were settled in Sicily and Italy, while Xerxes himself was to invade Greece.

This mighty army, which landed at Panormus, and under the command of a general named Hamilcar, laid siege to Hymera, was, before that place, totally routed and destroyed by Gelo governor of Syracuse; and this on the very day of the famous action of Thermopylae, when Leonidas fell with his 300 Spartans in defending that pass against the numberless forces of Xerxes.

* AFTER the memorable defeat of the Athenians under Nicias at Syracuse, the people of Segesta (a city not far from Eryx) who had declared in favour of the Athenians against the Syracusians, fearing the resentment of the latter, and being attacked by the inhabitants of Selinus, implored the aid of the Carthaginian Republic, under whose protection they put themselves and their city. The Carthaginians, allured by the prospect of possessing a place, very convenient for them, promised succour to the people of Segesta.

* B. J. C. 413.
Diod. Sic. B.
13. p. 169.

The conduct of this war was given to Hannibal, grandson to Hamilcar, who had been killed before Hymera. At the head of a great army, he besieged Selinus, and took it by assault. He treated cruelly all whom he found in the place, but suffered those, who had fled, to return and possess the city, paying a tribute to the Carthaginians. He afterwards took Hymera by assault, and, to revenge the death of his grandfather, not only razed the city, but caused 3000 prisoners to be murdered on the very spot where Hamilcar had been slain.

Hannibal, after these expeditions, returned to Carthage; but his successes having rekindled the ambition of the Carthaginians to get possession of all Sicily, they, with this view, 3 years after his return, appointed him a second time to be their General, and allotted him an army of 120,000 (some say 300,000) men. On his pleading his into Italy, the conquest of which had been long their ambition. All this was well weighed by the Romans; and yet, as Polybius reports, the great age, to excuse himself from commanding in this enterprize, they gave him for his Lieutenant Imilco, son of Ilanno, of the same family.

great

Conscript

The Syracusians and their allies prepared themselves to give the enemy a warm reception.

Hannibal opened the campaign with the siege of Agrigentum. Imagining that it was impregnable except on one side, he employed his whole force on that one side. He threw up banks and terraces as high as the walls, and made use of the rubbish and ruins of the tombs, which he had found standing round the city, and which he had demolished for that purpose. The plague soon after infecting the army, swept away a great number of the soldiers, and the General himself. The Carthaginians interpreted this disaster as a punishment inflicted by the Gods for the injuries done to the dead, whose ghosts they fancied they saw stalking before them in the night. They forbore therefore to demolish any more tombs, and endeavoured to appease the Gods: a child was sacrificed to Saturn, and many victims thrown into the sea in honour of Neptune.

The besieged after eight months were so pressed by famine, that they resolved to abandon the place in the night. Men, women, and children, all but the aged and sick, retired to Gela, the nearest city to them.

Imilco entered Agrigentum, and massacred all who were found in it. The plunder of the place was immensely rich. It had contained 200,000 inhabitants, and had never before been besieged, nor consequently plundered. An infinite number of pictures, vases, and statues of an exquisite taste were found in it, and among other curiosities the famous Bull of Phalaris, which was sent to Carthage.

Imilco having quartered his troops during the winter in Agrigentum, and totally ruined it, laid siege to Gela in the beginning of the spring. He took this place notwithstanding the succours brought to it by Dionysius the Tyrant, who had seized the government of Syracuse. A treaty, which the Carthaginians afterwards made with Dionysius, put an end to the war. The conditions of this treaty were, that Carthage should remain mistress of her ancient colonies, and of the territories of the Sicanians; that the people of Selinus, Agrigentum, and Hymera should be subject to her; that those of Gela and Comarina should inhabit their own dismantled cities, but be tributary to Carthage; that the Leontines, Messenians, and all the other Sicilians should enjoy their own laws and liberties, except the Syracusians, who were to continue subject to Dionysius.

VOL. II.

These articles being ratified, the Carthaginians returned home, having lost one half of their army by the plague, which raging afterwards in Africa, multitudes perished both of the people of Carthage, and of their confederates.

Dionysius had concluded the late peace with the Carthaginians in no other view, but to get time to establish his new authority, and make the necessary preparations for a vigorous war against them. These things being accomplish'd, he called the Syracusians together, and represented to them the dangerous ambition of Carthage, which, he said, aimed at nothing less than the subduing of all Sicily, an enterprize which only the havoc made in Africa by the plague did at present suspend; and he exhorted them to seize the favourable opportunity they had of being the aggressors.

The tyrant was no less odious than his tyranny to the people of Syracuse; nevertheless, the implacable hatred they bore to the Carthaginians made them receive his harangue with applause. Dionysius hereupon, without any previous complaint of treaties violated, or so much as a declaration of war, gave up to the fury of the populace the persons and possessions of the Carthaginian merchants, who in great numbers were then residing in Syracuse, and were there trading securely on the faith of treaties. These unhappy men were not only plundered of all their effects, but made to undergo the utmost ignominy and cruelties that could be devised, under pretence of retaliation for what the Carthaginians had formerly done to the people of Sicily: and this example of perfidy and inhumanity was followed in many parts of the island. The Tyrant, after this strange beginning of hostilities, sent deputies to Carthage, to demand the restoration of all the

C

Sicilian

would not be greater than the reproach they should suffer for so inconsistent a conduct. But the people having been greatly impoverished by the

he was in a condition to take the field, and give the enemy battle. He gained a victory over the Syracusians, so considerable, as to produce an honourable peace for the Carthaginians. By the conditions of the treaty, they not only kept all their possessions, but acquired some additional places, and had also a thousand talents from Dionysius.

After the death of this Dionysius, and in the time of the younger (his son and successor) Carthage took part in the troubles wherein Syracuse was involved, endeavouring to make advantage of them for establishing there her own domination. Timoleon from about the Y. Corinth rescued the Syracusians from this danger, and reduced the Carthaginians to sue for peace, which was settled on the following terms: The river Halycus (or Lycus) near Agrigentum was to be the boundary of the Carthaginian territory in Sicily; all natives of the cities subject to the Carthaginians were to be allowed to withdraw, if they pleased, to Syracuse with their effects; and lastly, the Carthaginians were not to assist, or to have any correspondence with the several tyrants who at this time pretended to the lordship of that city.

It was probably about the same time that Hanno, one of the most considerable citizens of Carthage, formed the design (but without success) of making himself Tyrant of his country, by poisoning the whole Senate at a banquet. His stratagem being discovered, he was put to death by torture; and his children, and all his relations, were at the same time cut off without mercy, tho' they had no share in his guilt.

Some years after this, the Carthaginians were terribly alarmed for their possessions in Sicily, by the growing power of the formidable Agathocles. This man, who is said to have been the son of a potter, owed the wonderful rise of his fortune in a great measure to the beauty of his person, his distinguished courage, and his enterprising genius; but chiefly to his consummate wickedness, the arts of treachery, and the practice of the most unbounded cruelties. He was now absolute lord of Syracuse. Not content with this elevation, he aspired to be King of all Sicily, and had made so swift a progress in subduing the island, that Carthage was obliged, in self-defence, to dispatch a very numerous army thither, to put a stop to his conquests. Hamilcar commanded it; he gave the Tyrant a total overthrow near the Hymera, pursued him even to Syracuse, and closely besieged him in that capital of his dominion.

The cruelties of Agathocles had made him universally detested by the Sicilians; he was now therefore deserted by all his allies, and he knew at the same time that his own forces were too weak to preserve the place. In these distressful circumstances he formed an enterprize worthy of the most accomplished Hero; To make a descent upon Africa, invade the dominion of his victorious enemies, and transfer the seat of the war to the very seat of their empire. His great foresight and judgment to discern that this design was practicable, and also the courage and prudence he displayed in the execution of it, are much admired by the historians, but cannot be enlarged upon here. Let it suffice to mention, that leaving under the command of his brother Anander a sufficient number of his troops to defend the city for some time, he put to sea with the remainder, without letting any body know his design, or what course he intended to steer: But, before his departure, to encourage the Syracusians to behave themselves with constancy during his absence, he assured them, that the siege would be but of short duration, and that he had found an infallible way to victory.

The forces which Agathocles took with him in this expedition amounted to about 14,000 men. Having landed these troops safely in Africa, he immediately called them together, opened to them his design, with the motives of it, and made them understand, that the only way to deliver their own country from its present distress was to carry the war into that of their enemies. He represented to them, that the citizens of Carthage were a luxurious and effeminate people, the late wars, and it being represented to them by those who were to command the army, in case of an expedition into Sicily, how profitable it would utterly unable to cope with the Syracusans, incured to the toils of war; that the unexampled boldness of his enterprize would alone disconcert and terrify them; that they were wholly unprepared to repel an enemy at their gates; that the Africans, always hating the Carthaginians, would infallibly join him upon the first notice of his landing; and, in a word, he promised them the whole wealth of Carthage as the certain reward of their courage in the present expedition. The soldiers received his harangue with applause and acclamations, and fancied themselves already in possession of that rich city. Taking advantage of their present sanguine temper, and the high hopes he had inspired them with, he then persuaded them to burn all their ships in honour to Ceres and Proserpine, pretending, that in the passage to Africa he had secretly made a vow so to do, if those deities would grant him a prosperous voyage. When by thus destroying his fleet he had brought his soldiers under a necessity of placing all their confidence in their courage, he led them on to action.

Two considerable cities he successively attacked, and carried by assault in a short time; the latter was Tunes, not many miles from Carthage. The Carthaginians, terribly alarmed at the swift progress of this unexpected invader, hastily armed their citizens, to the number of above 40,000, and sent them out under the command of Hanno and Bomilcar, men who had been long at variance about family-interests. A pitched battle quickly ensued; Hanno was slain in it, the Carthaginians routed, and their camp taken. It is said, that Bomilcar might have restored the battle after the death of Hanno, if for private reasons of self-interest he had not chose rather to quit the field to Agathocles. After this victory many fortified places surrendered to the conqueror; and great numbers of the Africans revolted to him.

D. S. E. It was at this time that an embassy came 17 Q. Car. to Carthage from the Tyrans, to implore
B 4 succour against Alexander the Great, who besieged their city; a request which the Carthaginians, now willing soever, could by no means comply with in the present melancholy situation of their affairs.

The unhappy condition, to which the Carthaginians Diod. Siculus, were reduced, they ascribed B. 20. to the anger of the Gods, provoked at some neglect of duty. It had been a custom from the very infancy of Carthage, and was become a part of their religion, to send annually to Tyre (the mother-city) the tenth, or what was so called, of the public revenue, as an offering to Hercules, the patron and protector of both Tyre and Carthage. But from the time that this revenue grew considerable, the whole tenth was not fairly remitted: Remorse seized the Carthaginians; and, to expiate their guilt, they now sent to Tyre, presents of a prodigious value.

Another custom had prevailed at Carthage of a most barbarous and bloody superstition, that of sacrificing great numbers of children to Saturn. Anciently those children were chosen out of the best families; of late the children of slaves and beggars had been substituted in the room of the nobly born; a fraudulent impiety, for the expiation of which, two hundred children of the first rank were now thrown into the fire, an offering to the God: And, as Diodorus Siculus reports, three hundred of the citizens voluntarily sacrificed themselves on this occasion to pacify the same Deity.

After these expiations expresses were dispatched to Hamilcar in Sicily, with the news of what misfortunes had befallen the Republic in Africa, and to urge him to send speedy succours to Carthage. Hamilcar commanded the deputies not once to mention the victory of Agathocles, but on the contrary to report, that his forces had been all cut off, and his whole fleet taken by the Carthaginians. The Senate of Carthage had sent to Hamilcar by the messengers all the beaks of Agathocles's ships which had been burnt, that by shewing them he might the more easily gain credit to this report. The stratagem had like to have proved successful. Hamilcar summoned the besieged to surrender, and shewed the beaks. The ruin of Agathocles being generally believed in Syracuse, the majority of the citizens, and Antander himself, were disposed to capitulate.

But

would be, not only to the public in general, but to each man in particular, they passed a decree in favour of the enterprize; and Appius Claudius,

But Eurymnon, an Ætolian, whom Agathocles had left behind him to counsel his brother, by much persuasion prevailed with them to hold out till they had certain intelligence of the truth. A galley of thirty oars arrived soon after in the port, and brought the news of Agathocles's victory, which at once restored life and resolution to the inhabitants. Hamilcar made a last effort to carry the city by assault, but without success. He then raised the siege, and sent 5000 men to the relief of his distressed country. Returning afterwards in hopes to surprize the city in the night, his design was discovered, his army defeated, and he himself taken prisoner. The Syracusians cut off his head, and sent it into Africa, a welcome present to Agathocles.

The confusion, into which all these disasters threw the Carthaginians, encouraged Bomilcar their General to attempt the execution of a design he had long harboured in his breast; it was to make himself monarch of the Carthaginian state. He had gained over some of the citizens to his interest, and had secured a body of the foreign mercenaries to assist him. The conspiracy nevertheless proved abortive; he was overpowered, and being made prisoner, was crucified for his rebellion.

While Bomilcar was pursuing his wicked design against the liberties of his country, Agathocles was busy in a treachery of another kind. He had won over to his cause Ophellas, King of Cyrene, by pretending that he would leave him the empire of Africa, and that he had no view in his present expedition, but to draw the Carthaginians out of Sicily. Ophellas brought a considerable army to the assistance of the Syracusians. Agathocles, to get the absolute command of these troops, slew their leader by surprize, after which by fair words and large promises he engaged the Cyrenians to follow him.

His affairs being now in a flourishing condition, he thought it proper to leave them a while under the conduct of his son Archagathus, and return into Sicily, to take some care of his interests at home. His renown and the report of his victories flew before him. On the news of his arrival in Sicily many towns revolted to him; but it was not long before ill news recalled him into Africa. His absence had entirely changed the face of things in that country, and all his arts and endeavours proved ineffectual to restore them to their former condition. His army had been defeated, his strong holds had surrendered to the enemy, and his troops were mutinous for want of pay. He attacked the Carthaginians after his landing, but was repulsed and routed: he lost 3000 men in the action. After this defeat, and another disaster, by which he lost 4000 of his men, the Africans of his army all deserted him. Not thinking himself therefore in a condition to maintain the war any longer, he resolved to leave Africa; and not having ships sufficient to transport his troops into Sicily, he would have stole away with only a few of his friends, and his younger son Heraclides; for he fear'd lest his elder son Archagathus, being a daring man, and having been too familiar with his step-mother, would attempt something against his life. Archagathus discovered his design, caused him to be arrested and put in chains. A sudden panic soon after seized the army, believing that the enemy was just ready to fall upon them. The guard, who had the King in custody, being in the same consternation with the rest, and in their fright coming out with their prisoner bound, the soldiers were so moved at this sight, that they all cried out, Unloose him, let him go. Agathocles was no sooner freed from his chains, but, consulting only his own safety, he got on board a small vessel, and set sail for Sicily, leaving his two sons to the fury of the enraged soldiers, who slew them both upon the first discovery of his departure. The Syracusan troops, tho' thus forsaken by their leader, made an honourable treaty for themselves with the Carthaginians, with whom also Agathocles, after his return into Sicily, concluded a peace upon equal terms, notwithstanding his late disasters and disgrace.

After the death of Agathocles, and when Syracuse was again involved in civil war, the Carthaginians renew'd their attempt once more to subdue the whole island of Sicily. They possessed themselves of many cities belonging to the Syracusians, and invested Syracuse itself. This common danger obliged the

Y. R.
S. B.
C. C.
H. C.
F. C.
C. C.

drus, one of the Consuls, was ordered to conduct an army into Sicily to the relief of Messina.

the contending parties in the city to unite, and call in King Pyrrhus to their aid. Pyrrhus (as was mentioned in the former volume of this history) by repeated victories over the Carthaginians, deprived them in a short time of all their possessions in Sicily, except the city of Lilyæum only. By his own conduct he afterwards lost all the fruit of his successes, being abandon'd by his Sicilian allies, and obliged to quit the island to preserve himself and his Epirians from total destruction. The Carthaginians, who before his departure had brought a mighty army into Sicily, not only recovered all their ancient possessions, but endeavoured to enlarge their dominion by new conquests. Hiero being chosen to the government of Syracuse, opposed the progress of their arms, till the affair of Messina united the two powers in one enterprise, drew the Romans into Sicily, and gave commencement to the first Punic War.

The form of the CARTHAGINIAN GOVERNMENT.

The government of Carthage, like that of Rome, was composed of three different authorities, which balanced each other; the authority of the two supreme magistrates, called Suffetes (from the Persian word Sagarta, which signifies Judge), that of the Senate, and that of the Assembly of the People. To this was afterwards added the Council of the Hundred.

THE SUFFETES.

The Suffetes were annual magistrates, and their authority much the same with that of the Consuls of Rome. By the same name they are frequently called Kings, Dictators, Consuls. History does not inform us of the manner of their election. It is more was to be chosen, and to preside in the proceedings of the Senate, and to be the chief judges in public and private causes. By their authority the laws were executed, and they functioned as the executive power.

THE SENATE.

The number of senators of Carthage was not fixed, but was certainly not less than one hundred, for an hundred persons were selected from it to form a separate council. In the Senate all public affairs were debated, the letters from Generals read, the complaints from the Provinces heard, Ambassadors admitted to audience, Peace and War determined. When the Senators were unanimous, there lay no appeal from their decision; but whenever they were divided in opinion, the affair devolved to the People; a regulation which seems well contrived to prevent divisions, and a factious opposition to reasonable councils; for it was not to be supposed, that any member of an assembly, which had the prerogative of judging decisively in affairs, would willingly suffer them to be carried before another tribunal.

THE PEOPLE.

It appears from Aristotle's Elogium on the Government of Carthage, that, so low as Aristotle B. 2. de Rep. ch. 11. to his time, the People spontaneously left the chief administration of public affairs to the Senate. And Polybius remarks, that, while the Senate governed, the Carthaginians were successful in all their enterprises. But at length riches and extensive conquests made the people insolent; and then forgetting that they owed their prosperity to the wise conduct of that venerable body, they not only interfered in the government of the State, but arrogated to themselves almost the whole power. From that period the public affairs were transacted wholly by cabals and factions; and Polybius assigns this as one of the chief causes of their ruin.

THE TRIBUNAL of the HUNDRED.

This council was composed of 104 persons, tho' 100 of Carthage for gravity sake they are 487. called the Hundred, and was intended to be a check upon the Carthaginian Generals, who had used before to exercise an absolute and uncontrollable power when at the head of armies in the field; they now became accountable to these judges for their actions on their return from the campaign.

Of these 104 Judges, five had a particular jurisdiction superior to that of the rest, and were the Council of Ten in the Venetian Senate. A vacancy in their body could be filled by none but themselves. They had also the power of choosing those who composed the Council of the Hundred.

Appian,

Appius, to learn the posture of the enemy and the true state of things in that place, is reported ^a to have ventured over thither in a fisher-boat, and to have so happily conducted himself there, as by some means to make

^a Primò ad explorandos hostes fretum piscatoria navi trajecit Appius Claudius Caudex] et cum duce Cl. Laginientium egit, ut præsidium ar. dederet. Rhegium regressus, &c. Zonar. l. i. c. 37.

That the Consul in person went over privately to Messina, seems to be supported by the word of Polibius, who speaks of the Mamertines sending for Appius, and surrendering their city to him, as of a transaction previous to the passage of the Roman army to Messina. But, according to this author, they had either by art or force rid themselves of the Carthaginian officers, before they called over Appius. Pol. b. l. i. c. 11.

If we may believe Zonaras, the person who went over privately to Messina to learn the state of affairs in that city was not Appius Claudius the Consul, but only Claudius a Legionary Tribune, whom the Consul dispatched on that commission.

Zonaras differs in some particulars from Polibius concerning the origin of the first Punic War, and has many circumstances which are not mentioned by any writer but himself. He tells us, that the two Republics were mutually jealous of each other; each thought its own safety depended on subduing its rival. This was the true cause of the war. Thus far he agrees with other writers. But he adds, that the Romans assigned, for their motive to the war, some assistance which the Carthaginians had formerly given the Tarantines against Rome. The Carthaginians on the other hand alledged as their ground of quarrel, that the Romans had made a friendship with Hiero when he was at war with Carthage.

As to the affair of Messina, his relation is, in substance, as follows. The Mamertines, being besieged by King Hiero, ask succour from the Romans. The Romans knowing that, if this request should be refused, they would give themselves to the Carthaginians, who might then be able to pass into Italy, readily promise to send the succour desired. This promise however not being speedily performed, and the Mamertines being still oppressed by the enemy, they apply for aid to the Car- thaginians, who thereupon make peace with Hiero, both for themselves and for the Mamertines, as the most effectual means to hinder the Romans from coming into Sicily; and under a leader named Hanno they take upon them the guard of the city and of the straits. In the mean while Claudius, a Legionary Tribune, whom the Consul had sent before him with a few ships, comes to Rhegium, but finding that the enemy had a much stronger fleet at sea, and therefore not daring to attempt the passage with his ships, he sails over privately in a small boat to Messina, and has a conference with the Mamertines; but through the opposition of the Carthaginians is obliged to return without effecting any thing. Afterwards, when he hears that the Mamertines are in some commotion (for tho' they would not consent to be subject to Rome, they were weary of the Carthaginians) he goes over again, and promises that the Romans, if admitted into the place, shall return home as soon as they have restored Messina to a state of security. He then bids the Carthaginians quit the place, or give a good reason for staying. The Mamertines are silent through fear; the Carthaginians make him no answer, because they hold the city by force, and despise him. The silence of both, cries Claudius, shews that the Carthaginians act unjustly, and that the Mamertines desire liberty; for if they cared for the Carthaginians, they would promise to stand by them. The Mamertines applaud his words. He then returns to Rhegium, and endeavours to pass from thence to Messina with his fleet. In this attempt he loses some of his ships by stormy weather, others are taken by the Carthaginians, so that he is forced to return once more to Rhegium. The Carthaginian Admiral coming on the coast of Italy offers to restore the ships he had taken, but at the same time declares, that the Straits belong to the Carthaginians, and that he will not suffer the Romans even to wash their hands in them. Claudius hearing this, rejects the offer with indignation, repairs his fleet, and seizing a favourable opportunity, passes safely with his troops to Messina. Hanno was now retired into the straits, and had quieted the city thro' a distrust of the inhabitants.

Claudius

make the Carthaginian officer and his soldiers evacuate the citadel; after which the Consul returned to Italy to prepare for the embarkation of his troops.

Claudius persuades the Mamertines to invite Hanno to an amicable conference. The Carthaginian, tho' with great reluctance, comes to the assembly, lest the Mamertines, who already complained of his injustice, should begin hostilities against him. After much altercation between him and Claudius, he is seized by a Roman officer, and carried to prison, the Mamertines approving of the action. Thus Hanno is reduced to the necessity of entirely abandoning Messina. The Carthaginians punish him for his ill conduct, and send a herald to signify to the Romans to quit Messina and all Sicily by a certain day; which demand not being complied with, they in the first fury of their resentment murder all the Italian mercenaries in their service; and then, assisted by King Hiero, lay siege to Messina.

Such is the account given us by Zonaras, of what passed in relation to Messina before the Consul went thither. But I do not find the least mention of the voyages or management of the Tribune Claudius in any other author. Only that the Romans sent some troops to Messina, as Zonaras relates, before Appius went thither with the main army, is supported by a fragment of Diodorus Siculus, who speaks of an agreement between Hiero and the Carthaginians to make war upon the Romans, unless they would immediately withdraw all their forces out of Sicily; and this is previous to the arrival of the Consul with the Legions.

C H A P. II.

First, second, and third Years of the War.

The Consul Appius Claudius Caudex transports an army into Sicily to the relief of Messina, besieged by the Carthaginians and Syracusians. He forces them to raise the siege. His successors make peace and an alliance with Hiero, King of Syracuse. The next year's Consuls, assisted by Hiero, take Agrigentum from the Carthaginians.

235. B.
236. B.

THE people of Carthage, upon the news of their officer's having quitted the citadel of Messina, were so highly offended, that they condemned him to be crucified, as both a traitor and a coward. They ordered at the same time a fleet and a land-army to besiege the place. Hiero, the new King of Syracuse, having now a fair prospect of exterminating the usurpers of Messina, entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and joined his forces to theirs: so that the Mamertines were intirely closed up within their city, the Carthaginians lying with a navy at sea, and with an army on one side of the place, while the Syracusians lay before it on the other.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul to Regium with an army appointed for their relief: but how to pass from thence to Messina was a difficulty that seemed insurmountable. Not that he wanted transports; for he had borrowed from the Tarentines, Neapolitans, and other neighbours, a sufficient number of triremes and boats of fifty oars, wherein to waft over his men: but the Carthaginian fleet was in the way, and was by much superior in strength to that of the Consul.

He

He was obliged therefore to have recourse to stratagem. He pretended to give the enterprize entirely over as a thing impracticable, and, the better to deceive the enemy, steered his course towards Rome. This motion made the Carthaginians watch the Streits less narrowly; and then the Consul tacking about on a sudden, and being favoured by a dark night, passed to Messina without opposition ^a.

Frontin. de
Strat. l. 1.
ch. 4.

His

^a Pelybius (from whom this account of the origin of the first Punic War is chiefly taken) tho' he does not directly charge the Romans with injustice in their beginning this war, yet declares (L. 1. c. 10.) that it would be difficult to justify them. Sir Walter Raleigh is clearly of opinion, that the Romans in this enterprize were unjust. His words are these.

“ Now in this place I hold
B. 5. ch. 1. “ it seasonable to consider of § 3. “ those grounds whereupon

“ the Romans entered into “ this [the first Punic] war; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to “ rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprize was much to their benefit, tho' as much to their shame) but how allowable in “ strict terms of lawfulness, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot find; neither can I find how the messengers of these folk, who of one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the public name of all.

“ If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawful surrendry of themselves and their possessions, were become subject to Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt is lost in all histories, doubtless it is, that no company of pirates, thieves, cut-throats, murderers, or such other malefactors, can by any good success of their villainy, obtain the privilege of civil societies, to make league or truce, yea to require fair war, but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine,
VOL. II.

“ to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a position of ill consequence. Thus I hold, that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessory to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteem this action of the Romans so far from being justifiable by any pretence of confederacy, made with them, as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of murderers and thieves into their protection, they justly deserved to be waited upon themselves by the people of Sicily, yea altho Messina had been taken, and the Mamertines all slain, ere any news of the confederacy had been brought unto the besiegers.”

To this reasoning of our learned countryman I take leave to answer:

Whether the messengers, who went to Rome from Messina from one part only of the Mamertines, could be enabled to treat in the name of all, or whether the Mamertines made such an absolute surrendry of their possessions to the Romans, as the people of Capua had formerly done, seems not material to the present purpose. Neither the Romans nor the Carthaginians could acquire any right to Messina in virtue of any such surrendry, whether made by a part or by the whole body of the Mamertines, these having themselves no right to the town, if they are to be considered as a nest of pirates, murderers, and outlaws, which is the light in which Sir Walter considers them.

In the next place, tho' it be granted, that no one Prince or State can give protection to pirates, thieves, and murderers, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessory to their crimes; I say, tho' this be granted, it will not affect the present question. For that the Romans did not grant their protection to the

D

Mamertines,

P. 1. B. 1.
17. 17.

His arrival, however, did not discourage the besiegers; for they far exceeded him in number of men, and the whole island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at sea to hinder any supplies from getting into the town. All this Appius well understood; and therefore apprehending both danger and dishonour in the enterprize, he dispatched ambassadors to the Carthaginians and Hiero, to treat of an accommodation, and obtain peace for the Mamertines.

Mamertines, in the circumstance above described, is evident from what our author himself relates. He tells us, that the Carthaginians (and they were the principals in the present war, Hiero was only an auxiliary) upon the news of their officer's being driven out of the citadel of Messina, sent a fleet and an army to besiege the place, as a town that had rebelled, having once been theirs. These preparations were to punish rebellious subjects, not to punish the Mamertines as pirates and murderers, not for the injuries they had done to the lawful proprietors of Messina. It would indeed have been shameful in the Carthaginians to pretend the latter after they had made a league with the usurpers, treated them as a civil society, and consented to protect them against King Hiero.

From the whole then it would seem, that our author has not assigned sufficient reasons for passing so rigorous a sentence of condemnation against the Romans.

B. 1. ch. 1.
§ 3.

CHEVALIER FOLARD, who in his Comment upon Polybius entirely differs in opinion from Sir Walter, makes very short work with the present question.

A necessary war (says he) is always just. A war, without which the rights and liberties of a people must be greatly endangered, is a necessary war: This was the case of the Romans at the present juncture; and he cannot therefore believe, that the Senate of Rome were really so scrupulous as Polybius represents them to be, about accepting the offer made them by the Mamertines.

Nay the Chevalier declares, that not only the consideration of a present danger to our liberties, but even the prospect of a distant one, an allowable motive to begin a precautionary war; and that the too great power of any Prince will justify the neighbouring powers in making war upon him; because Liberty is a thing, which by both divine and human laws we are allowed to have so tender a concern for, that the apprehension of being deprived of it justifies whatever we do for its preservation.

As I shall not contend with the force of this argument, so neither can I think it necessary to have recourse to it to justify the Romans in the present war.

If the Mamertines are to be considered as a civil society, the Romans acted nothing contrary to justice in making an alliance with them, or in succouring them when in that alliance. Rome (if we may believe Polybius) had made no treaty with the Carthaginians, or with Hiero, whereby she was bound not to concern herself in the affairs of Sicily. Polyb. B. 3. c. 26.

If the Mamertines are not to be considered as a civil society, but as a gang of robbers and pirates, Messina would then belong to the first civil society that should get possession of it; and the Romans having acquired the right of first possession, the Carthaginians must be considered as the aggressors; for I presume, that the latter cannot be deemed to have acquired the right of first possession even of the citadel, by the bare admission of their officer with a few men into it, since they did not enter the citadel as taking possession of it for themselves, but to guard it for the usurpers against King Hiero.

As to the conduct of the Romans in protecting the Mamertines, who had been guilty of the same crimes for which the Senate had punished the Campanian Legion, it must undoubtedly at first, as Polybius observes, have a strange appearance; but certainly, when by sparing the most notorious offenders a national good is to be obtained, much greater than could accrue from punishing such offenders, there is no doubt but the arm of vengeance may wisely and lawfully be stayed. And this appears plainly to have been the motive on which the Romans acted in the case now before us, even according to Polybius's relation of the matter.

The

The answer ^b from King Hiero was, that the Mamertines for their cruelty and wickedness in getting the possession of Messina, and for diverse other barbarities committed in Sicily, were most justly besieged; and that it did not become the Romans, so famed for their justice and faithfulness, to protect such bloody villains, who had contemptuously broken all the ties of faith and truth among men: That if the Romans began a war in defence of such wicked invaders, it would be evident to all the world, that succour to the distressed was but a pretence to cloke their covetousness, when in truth their aim was to gain Sicily.

Diod. Sic.
in Polyb.
l. 274.

The Consul finding his negotiation fruitless, and that he was under a necessity of fighting, took at length the bold resolution to sally out into the field, and make the enemies know, that his coming to Messina was to drive them from the town, and not to be by them besieged within it.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 11.

In executing this determination it was very advantageous for him, that the confederate armies lay incamped in such a manner, as not to be well able to assist one another in distress. Appius sallied out first against Hiero, and drawing up the Legions in order, presented him battle. This brave Prince (says a learned writer, well skilled in military affairs) must certainly have wanted good advice on the present occasion; otherwise he would not have hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had made no trial, when it had been easy for him, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own camp. With great readiness and gallantry he accepted the challenge, and met the enemy; but after a long and bloody conflict, the Syracusians were defeated, and driven to save themselves within their intrenchments. The Romans returned triumphantly with the spoils of the dead into Messina.

Sir W. Raleigh.

The King, by this disaster, learnt a point of wisdom very useful both to him and his kingdom during the remainder of his life. Had Messina been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse itself must have sought help from Rome against those friends whom it now so diligently assisted. Hiero had (in respect of those two mighty States) but a small stock, which it behoved him to manage frugally; such another loss would have almost ruined him. He therefore quietly broke up his camp in the night, and retired home; intending to leave those to try the fortune of the war, who had hopes to be gainers by the event of it ^c.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 11.

Appius receiving intelligence of the King's retreat, and finding the courage of his men greatly raised by their success in the late action, resolved to attack the Carthaginians without loss of time. Having caused

c. 12.

^b According to Diodorus Siculus, the Consul's embassy was sent from Rhegium before he passed the Straits.

^c Diod. Siculus writes, that when the Consul landed at Messina, Hiero, suspecting that the Carthaginians had made way for him, fled himself to Syracuse.

Florus says, that Hiero confessed he was conquered before he saw the enemy.

Zonaras, B. 8. makes Appius to land with his forces, not at Messina, but some place near it, and to attack the Syracusians before he entered that town.

the soldiers to take their repast at a very early hour, he sallied out by break of day, surprized the enemy, and routed them with great slaughter; those who escaped flying for refuge to the neighbouring towns. The Romans after this action made inroads upon the country as far as to the territory of the Syracusians, and at length set down before Syracuse. It does not appear, however, that the Consul made any progress in the siege: remitting the conduct of this enterprize to his successors, he returned to Rome^c.

Polib. B. 2.
Eutrop. B. 6.
Silius Ital. B. 6.
Appian B. 2.
Dionys. B. 10.
Livy B. 27.
Cicero B. 2.
Cassiodor. B. 2.
Cassiodor. B. 2.
Cassiodor. B. 2.
Cassiodor. B. 2.
Cassiodor. B. 2.

§. II. THE Romans being animated by the victories of Appius to pursue the war with more than ordinary vigour, it was decreed, that the Consuls for the new year, Manius Valerius and Manius Otacilius, should both go into Sicily, and should take with them four Legions, each consisting of 4000 foot and 300 horse. Upon the arrival of these forces in Sicily, most of the towns and castles, that had submitted to the Carthaginians and Syracusians, gave themselves up to the Romans; insomuch that the King of Syracuse found it high time for him to endeavour after a

^c According to Eutropius, B. 2. and Silius Italicus, B. 6. Appius Claudius had a triumph for his victories; but the Copetiline Marbles say nothing of it.

He acquired his surname of Caudex, if we may believe Seneca. (de Brev. Vit.) from his having transported the Roman army from Italy to Sicily in small boats, which the ancients called Caulices.

Mr. Verrius, perhaps on no other authority, says, that this General was the first who by the means of some Rafts transported troops into Sicily, which got him the surname of Caudex, as having found the art of fastening planks together, so as to make transports of them.

Chevalier Foixard rallies the Abbot on this passage of his history, and wants to know his voucher. Doubtless the Chevalier has good reason to dispute the fact. It would have been madness for the Consul to have attempted to waft an army cross those straits on such transports; neither had he any occasion to have recourse to that dangerous expedient, all the ships in the ports of Italy being at his disposal; and Polibius expressly tells us, that Appius embarked his men on vessels of fifty oars, and on triremes borrowed of the Tarentines, Locrians, &c. This relation of Polibius is decisive also against Seneca.

The Chevalier will have it, that Appius's surname of Caudex was on account of a dull, stupid air, the word Cedex signifying a block-head.

Father Catreu, in the large Roman History, speaking of Appius's surname, keeps clear of Mr. Verrius's Rafts and Seneca's Little Boats; but then he wants a reason for Claudius's surname of Caudex. He says, that when Appius undertook to cross the Straits with his fleet, he went himself on board a sorry galley, hastily and clumsily built (une mauvaïse galere tumultuairement construite & sans art.) This enterprize happily executed, the Romans thought it so fine an exploit, that they gave the Consul the surname of Caudex, which word, adds the Father, signified then un mauvais batteau fait de planches mal arrangées & précipitemment réunies.

But what reason in the world can be imagined why Appius should make choice of such a transport, wherein to convey his own person to Sicily, when he might have chosen the best Triremis in the fleet? I cannot find, that the Reverend Father has any authority for this fact.

If Appius did really acquire the surname in question, from the bad built and fashion of any vessel in which he crossed the Straits, I should conjecture it was from that fisher-boat (which might be a Caudex) wherein, as Aurelius Victor reports, he courageously ventured over to Messina, to learn the state of things there before he transported his army thither.

peace

peace with an enemy so formidable, and that came now to besiege him in his capital. He perceived, says Polybius, that the designs and hopes of the Romans were better founded than those of the Carthaginians, and in conclusion therefore sent ambassadors to the Consuls to treat of peace and an alliance with Rome. Valerius and Otacilius readily embraced the overture, and the more readily, on account of the difficulties they were under with regard to their convoys. The Roman troops had the last year been driven to great straits, and there was good reason to apprehend lest the Carthaginians, who were masters of the sea, should be able totally to debar them of all supplies of provision. The Consuls nevertheless made the King purchase the alliance which he sought, with an hundred talents of silver.

Diodorus Siculus reports, that Hannibal the Carthaginian General was by this time come with a fleet to Xiphonia (not far from Syracuse) to the assistance of the King, but that hearing of what was done, he instantly retired^a.

In Belg.
p. 875.

Hiero after this treaty continued ever a firm and useful friend to the Romans; and being a Prince who not only made the prosperity of his subjects his chief aim, but always pursued that aim by measures honest and noble, he enjoyed a long and happy reign, dear to his people, beloved of his allies, and universally esteemed by all the Greek nations.

§. III. THE treaty with the Syracusan King being ratified by an ordinance of the Roman People, it was now thought adviseable to abate of the number of troops in the service, and to send into Sicily under the command of the new Consuls (L. Posthumius Megellus and Q. Mamilius Vitulus) only two Legions; which, through Hiero's friendship, they trusted, would live in plenty of all things necessary.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 17.
Y. of R.
491. Bef.
J. C. 261.
100 Com.
ful-p.

As for the people of Carthage, when they learnt that Hiero, of a friend was become an enemy, and when they considered that the Romans were now superior to them in strength, they turned their thoughts to provide

^a We find by the Capitoline Marbles, that a Dictator was created this year at Rome to drive the Nail, probably on account of some prodigies, or to stop the plague; from the same Marbles we learn also, that Valerius at his return to Rome was decreed a triumph, and that he acquired the surname of Messala; which || Seneca and || De Brev. Vit. || Macrobius tell us was given || Saturn. B. 1. him for the conquest of Messina, (then called Messana.) It is hard to reconcile this with Polybius's account, unless we suppose that the enemy got possession of that place after the return of Appius Claudius into Italy. The Jesuits believe rather, that Valerius performed some notable exploit in the defence of Messina, while Otacilius was other ways employed, and that this occasioned the distinction with which he was afterwards honoured above his colleague. Pliny authorizes this conjecture, when he tells us, (B. 35. ch. 4.) that Valerius brought with him from Sicily a picture representing the battle wherein he had vanquished Hiero and the Carthaginians before Messina. He fixed it up in the old place of King Tullius Hostilius, where the Senate used to assemble. The same author reports also, (B. 7. ch. ult.) that Valerius brought with him from Sicily another novelty, an horizontal sundial, and that he placed it on a pedestal in the Comitium near the Rostra.

Year of R.
509. B.C.
1. C. 201.
The Cons.
1000.
1. Called M.
to Agrigens,
now Ger-gani.

a force that might be sufficient to preserve those acquisitions which they still possessed in the island. To this end they hired a great number of troops in Gaul and in Liguria, but principally in Spain; and having resolved to make Agrigentum † (a strong place, distant about eighteen furlongs from the sea, on the south coast of Sicily;) the rendezvous of their armies, and their chief magazine, they transported the mercenaries to that city.

The Consuls Pestumius and Mamilius were now arrived in Sicily with the Legions, and having got intelligence of the designs of the Carthaginians, and of the preparations they were making in Agrigentum, came to a resolution to march directly with their forces towards that place, and invest it. They pitched their camp about a mile from the town, and totally blocked it up.

It happening to be the time of harvest, the Roman soldiers, who foresaw that the siege would be a long one, dispersed themselves abroad to forage; and this they did in so unguarded a manner, that it tempted the besieged one day to sally out upon them. The Carthaginians not only fell upon the reapers in the fields, but made a furious attack upon the Roman advanced guards, not without hopes to force the very camp. And here (says Polybius) the Romans, as on many other occasions, owed their preservation to that discipline in which they excelled all nations; for being accustomed to see those punished with death who deserted their post, or fled in battle, they diligently rallied, and bravely sustained the shock of the enemy, tho' superior in number. And though many of the Romans fell, the loss was much greater on the enemies side, who being at length surrounded when they had almost forced the Roman entrenchment, were with great slaughter driven back to their works. After this action the Romans became more wary in their foraging, and the Carthaginians less forward to make sallies. The Consuls however, the better to secure themselves, cut a deep trench between the walls of the city and their camp, and another on the side towards the country, to prevent any surprize that way; which double fortification also hindered the besieged from receiving any supplies whatsoever. At the same time provisions and all necessaries were brought to the besiegers by their Sicilian allies to Erbessus; and from that town, which lay not far from their camp, their convoys passed without impediment.

Third Sicilian
E. 1. 1. 1.
S. 1. 1. 1.
E. 1. 1. 1.

Affairs continued five months in this posture, neither party gaining upon the other any considerable advantage, their engagements being for the most part only in slight skirmishes. The besiegers received daily reinforcements from the Sicilians, and, in all, amounted to above 100,000 men. In the mean time the city being stuffed with a garrison of 50,000 soldiers began to be much straitned for provisions, Hannibal, who commanded there in chief, dispatched frequent advices to Carthage, representing the extremities to which they were reduced, and demanding speedy succour. The Carthaginians therefore embarking on board their their fleet what soldiers and elephants they could readily muster, sent them into Sicily to Hanno, their other General in that country. Hanno having assembled all his forces at Heraclea, a maritime town a little to the west of Agrigentum, marched directly to Erbesus, where he had a secret correspondence, and which was put into his hands by treachery. By this loss the Romans not only were deprived of their wonted supplies, but became themselves almost as closely besieged by Hanno, as Agrigentum was by their troops; and they must unavoidably have quitted their enterprise, if King Hiero had not relieved them in their distress. He found means to convey provisions to their camp, tho' not in great quantity, nor sufficient to prevent those distempers among the soldiers, which are the usual consequences of scarcity.

Y. of R.
491. B. f.
J. C. 261.
100 Com-
sul-p.

Hanno having intelligence of the bad condition of the Roman army, that the soldiers were enfeebled by want, and their number diminished by diseases, believed he might now be able to cope with them. He marched with fifty elephants, and all the rest of his forces from Ileracea (whither he had returned after the affair of Erbesus) sending his Numidian horse before, with orders to approach to the enemies camp, and endeavour to draw the Roman cavalry to a battle, in which they were to retreat till they joined the main body. The Numidians punctually performed their instructions. They marched up to the entrenchment of the enemy, and being attacked by the Roman horse, retired before them till they joined Hanno with the army, which almost encompassing the Romans, slew many of them, and drove the rest back to their camp. After this exploit, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly encamped on an eminence about ten furlongs from the Romans, waiting for some opportunity to fight with advantage.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 19.

In the mean time Agrigentum was reduced to the utmost extremity by famine. Hannibal gave notice to Hanno, as well by signals from the town, as by frequent expresses, that the garrison were no longer able to sustain the wants they laboured under, and that many of the soldiers were compelled by hunger to desert. This brought Hanno to resolve upon a decisive action, to which the Romans were no less disposed, on account of their inconvenient situation. The two armies therefore drawing out, came to an engagement on the ground between their camps. The success was long doubtful; but Hanno's elephants being at length disordered by his own van-guard, which the Romans had broke and put to flight, those unruly beasts threw his whole army into confusion. The Carthaginians suffered a great slaughter; some few got into Heraclea, but the Romans took most of the elephants, and all the enemies baggage.

And now Hannibal turned all his thoughts to make his escape from Agrigentum, which he despaired of holding any longer; and perceiving that the Romans after their victory, wearied with labour, and grown secure by their good fortune, kept negligent watch, he rushed out of the place at midnight with all his foreign troops, and filling the Roman trenches

17. 17. 7.
18. 18. 8.
19. 19. 9.
20. 20. 10.
21. 21. 11.

trenches with faggots, passed over their works unhurt and unperceived. The Romans saw not their error till the morning, when they contented themselves with a short pursuit, and presently returned to take possession of the town; which they entered without resistance, unmercifully despoiling the inhabitants both of their riches and of their liberty.

C H A P. III.

The fourth and fifth Years of the War.

The Romans, to accomplish their designs upon Sicily, find it necessary to provide themselves with a naval force. They build a considerable fleet, and by the help of a new-invented engine for grappling and boarding the enemies ships, gain a memorable victory over the Carthaginians at sea near Milæ, now Milazzo.)

17. 17. 7.
18. 18. 8.

Y. 17. R.
21. 21. 11.
22. 22. 12.
23. 23. 13.
24. 24. 14.

GREAT joy there was at Rome on the news of the taking of Agri- gentum, and every body's courage and hopes were raised. They now thought it not enough to have rescued Messina, and enriched themselves by the war; they proposed nothing less than the entire expulsion of the Carthaginians out of Sicily; nay, and this was to be done the very next year by L. Valerius and T. Otacilius, their newly elected Consuls. However, they soon became sensible, that the task was too difficult to be accomplished in so short a time. For tho' a great number of the inland towns of Sicily had, after the reduction of Agri- gentum, readily submitted to the Romans, who were evidently superior to their enemies by land; yet many places situate on the coast had revolted from them through fear of the Carthaginian strength by sea. And indeed this advantage on the side of Carthage made the success of the war still doubtful; which being well considered by the Romans, as also that the coast of Italy lay exposed to the depredations of the Carthaginians, who made frequent descents upon it whilst Africa felt none of the calamities of war, they at length resolved to apply themselves diligently to maritime affairs, and even, at their first essay, to make provision of such a fleet, as should be able to contend with the naval power of Carthage.

Polybius, in speaking on this subject, cannot forbear to express his admiration of the magnanimity of the Romans, so void of fear in enterprizes of the greatest hazard and moment; and it is in truth an astonishing instance of the resolute bravery of this people, that being hitherto extremely ignorant in all the arts relating to navigation, they should now at once determine upon a naval battle with the Carthaginians, who had held uncontested, from time immemorial, the dominion of the sea.

The

The same author tells us, that the Romans were not at this time masters ^f of one single galley, no not even of a bark, and were so little skilled in ship-building, that if fortune had not favoured them, it would have been almost impossible for them to put their design in execution. A Carthaginian galley cruizing on the coast of Italy, and venturing too near the shore, happened to be stranded; the Romans seized her before the crew could get her off, and, by the model of this galley, their first fleet, which consisted of 100 ^g quinqueremes and 20 triremes, was built.

While these vessels were upon the stocks, the men appointed to be the rowers were taught the use of the oar in the following manner. Seats were raised on the sea-shore in the same fashion and order as they were to be in the galleys, and the mariners being placed thereon, an officer who stood in the midst of them, instructed them, by signs with his hand, how at once and all together to dip their oars, and in like manner to recover them out of the water. They afterwards spent some time in practising upon the water what they had been learning at land, adventuring first along the coast of Italy.

Before the finishing ^h of this naval armament, the Consul Fasces were transferred to Cn. Cornelius Asina and C. Duilius. It fell to Cornelius to be the Roman Admiral. Leaving orders with the pilots to make the best of their way to the Straits so soon as all the new vessels should be equipped, he with only 17 of them repaired to Messina to give directions for the reception and security of the main fleet. He had not been long there, when, deceived by some false intelligence, he thought he had a fair

c. 21.

Y. R. 493.
E. f. Chi.
249.
192d Conf.

^f Doubtless Polybius goes too far, when he affirms that the Romans had no ships before the first Punic war; the antient treaties between Rome and Carthage, which he himself presents us with, evince the contrary; nay, it appears by the former part of this history, that they had ten ships of war at the time of the rupture with the Tarentines. And as to what he says of the loss the Romans would have been at to build a fleet, if they had not seized a Carthaginian vessel, which chanced to be stranded, his meaning, to be consistent with himself, must be, either that without this accident they would have had no good model whereby to build any ship of war, or would have had no model at all of a quinqueremis. For he tells us in the very same part of his history, that some of the vessels in which they transported their troops the first time to Messina were triremes (and these were ships of war) borrowed from their neighbours the Tarentines, &c.

^g Of the antient ships of war the most considerable were the naves longæ (long ships, or gallies) so named from their form, which was the most convenient to wield round or cut their way; whereas the ships of burden were generally built rounder and more hollow, that they might be more easy to load, and might hold the more goods. The most remarkable of the naves longæ were the triremis, the quadriremis, and the quinquiremis, exceeding one another by one bank of oars, which banks were raised sloping one above another. Some indeed fancy a different original of these names, as that in the triremes, for example, either there were three banks one after the other on a level, or that three rowers tugged all together at one oar; but this is contrary not only to the authority of the classics, but to the figures of the triremes still appearing in antient monuments. Kennet's Antiq. part 2. b. 4. ch. 20.

^h According to Florus, B. 2. and Orosius, B. 4. ch. 7. the Romans were but sixty days in building and equipping their fleet, reckoning from the time that the necessary timber was prepared.

Y. R. 473.
E. C. C.
189.
1890 C. C. C.

P. B. B. 1.
C. C. C.

occasion of surprizing *Lipara*¹. Thither he went with his squadron, and drew up under the walls of the town. Hannibal, who commanded at sea for the Carthaginians, and was now at Penormus, having notice of this design, immediately dispatched away 20 galleys under the command of one Boodes a Senator, who arriving in the night, blocked up Cornelius in the harbour. As soon as day appeared, the Roman mariners, in their first fright, to save themselves, got with all diligence ashore. The Consul in this distress seeing no remedy, yielded himself prisoner; and the Carthaginians possessing themselves of the 17 vessels, and the principal Roman officers, made the best of their way back to Hannibal.

Such is Polybius's account of this affair: But according to Livy's Epitome, B. 17. Cornelius was made prisoner by treachery, being decoyed from his ship by the pretence of a parley, to which the Carthaginian commander invited him in order to a peace.

Not long after this adventure of Cornelius, Hannibal himself was very near falling into a like disaster by an equal indiscretion. For having received advice that the Roman fleet was at sea, and coasting along Italy, he would needs be himself a witness of the number and posture of the enemy; and to that end went in search of them with only fifty of his galleys. The Romans happened to be nearer than he was aware of, and just as he doubled a promontory on the Italian coast, surprized him with their whole fleet in order of battle. In this encounter he lost the greater part of his squadron, and escaped narrowly himself, when every body despaired of his safety.

The Romans continued their course towards Messina, pursuant to the instructions they had formerly received from Cornelius, of whose defeat and captivity having got advice, they immediately sent the news of it to Dulius (who then had the command of the land-forces in the island) and while they waited the coming of the Consul, they prepared for a new engagement with the enemy, whose fleet they heard was not far off. And considering that their own ships were heavy and slow, not having been built with great art, they turned their thoughts to contrive some new invention which might compensate for this disadvantage; and then was devised that famous machine which they afterwards called the Corvus.

[The C. w.]

The learned cannot agree concerning the exact form of this engine. Polybius's description of it has not been found sufficient to make it clearly understood. It appears to have been a kind of draw-bridge, so framed on the prow of the vessels, that being let fall upon an enemy's ship, it served both to grapple her and to render the boarding her more easy.

Dulius, upon the first notice of what had happened to his colleague, remitting the conduct of the land-army to his Tribunes, hastened to the fleet; where hearing, on his arrival, that the enemy were cruising on the coast near Myse, which was not far from Messina, he made the best of his way

c. 23.

¹ A town in a small island of the same name, not far from Syracuse, to the north.

with

with all his galleys to encounter them. Their fleet consisted of 130 ships, and was commanded by the same Hannibal who had escaped with his army by night from Agrigentum. His own vessel was a septiremis, or galley of seven banks of oars, belonging formerly to Pyrrhus King of Epirus.

Y. R. 493.
Bel. Chr.
2 co.
192d Class.

The Carthaginians greatly rejoiced when they descryed the Romans, whom they held in such extreme contempt, that they advanced with their prows directly upon them, careless of any order of battle, and dreaming of nothing but certain victory. But when they drew near, they became much astonished at the sight of the engines before mentioned, having never seen the like before, and not being able to conjecture the design of them. However, they staid not long in suspense, nor did the novelty of what they beheld lessen their presumption. The headmost of their vessels made a furious attack upon the Romans, who grappling with them by means of their engines, entered them at once, fighting upon deck hand to hand with their enemies, as upon firm ground. And now neither the lightness of the Carthaginian galleys, nor the skill of their mariners, availed any thing; all was carried by the advantage of weapon and superiority of valour, and both these were on the side of the Romans. The Carthaginians lost in this first encounter thirty of their vessels, of which Hannibal's galley was one, he himself escaping in a small boat, when he was by all given for lost. At length the rest of the fleet came up; but having perceived the terrible effect of the new engines in the defeat of their first squadron, they used all their endeavours to avoid them, nimbly rowing round the Roman galleys, to find an opportunity of attacking them with safety; but when they observed, that which way soever they approached, those machines were traversed and opposed to them, they were at length compelled to yield the honour of the day to the Romans, retiring with the loss of fifty more of their ships.

Hannibal with the remainder of his fleet stood away for Africk, but fearing lest crucifixion should be his fate, he sent before him one of his friends, a man well chosen for the commission, who being introduced into the Senate, Your Admiral, said he, desires to know your opinion, whether, in case the Romans appear at sea with a numerous fleet, he should give them battle? Doubtless he ought to fight, they all cried out unanimously. The messenger then added, He has fought, and is vanquished. And thus Hannibal escaped the danger that hung over him; for they were no longer free to condemn an action which they had already approved.

Val. Max.
B. 7. ch. 3.
in Extern.

As for Duilius, the courage of whose men was greatly raised by their late surprising victory, he landed his forces on the island, and marched to the relief of Segesta, which the enemy at that time closely besieged. He not only forced them to raise the siege of this place, but took from them Macella by assault. After these exploits leaving the land-army behind him, he returned to Rome, to receive the recompence due to his valour and conduct. A victory at sea so unexpected, so complete, and so important, made all former victories at land to be in a manner forgot.

Polyb. B. 1.
ch. 24.

Y. R. 433.
Bef. Cons.
250.
1923 Cons.

Cin. in Cons.
251.
F. 1923, B. 2.
4. C. 1923.
Ref. 1923.

The conqueror, beside the usual honour of the Triumph, which was decreed him, was suffered to assume a new one of his own invention. During the rest of his life, whenever he had supped abroad in the city, he caused himself to be attended home with flambeaux and music. Medals were struck by the Romans to perpetuate the memory of his exploit; and to the same end they erected in the Forum a \dagger Rostral Pillar of white marble. This pillar was in the last century accidentally dug up out of the ground, in that part of Rome which was formerly the Roman Forum. There are yet the figures of six Reques, or Prows of Roman galleys sticking to it, and a long, but imperfect inscription on the pedestal.

CHAP. IV.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth Years of the War.

The Romans invade Corsica and Sardinia with success, reduce some places in Sicily, and come to an engagement at sea with the Carthaginians near Tyndaris.

Y. R. 434.
Bef. Cons.
251.
1923 Cons.
On. 1923, B. 4.
251.
Zim. B. 8.

THE Consuls for the following year were L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Aquilius Flarus. While the former employed himself on the coast in getting the fleet ready for new enterprizes, the latter was detained at Rome on occasion of a conspiracy then on foot to plunder and burn the city. Four thousand Sammites being appointed, contrary to their inclination, to serve as rowers in the galleys, had united with three thousand discontented slaves in this design; but a certain commander of auxiliaries, whom they had chosen to be their leader, and who seemed at first to go heartily into their measures, had no sooner learnt their whole secret, than he discovered it to the Senate, who took effectual care to avert the mischief and punish the offenders.

Before this domestick disturbance was quite over, Cornelius weighed anchor and put to sea. Ambitious of signaling himself by some exploit yet unattempted, he made a descent first upon Corsica, and then upon Sardinia, and in a short time made considerable progress in the conquest of those islands, the possession of which was of great importance to the Romans, who now aspired to the empire of the seas.

P. 1923, B. 1.
251.

Aquilius went late into Sicily. The affairs of the Romans had suffered much in that island since the departure of Duilius. For a dispute had arisen between the Roman and Sicilian troops about the post of honour; which dispute was carried so far as to produce a separation. Hamilcar (the Carthaginian General by land, who was then at Panormus, having intelligence of this division, surprized the Sicilians as they were about to encamp between Perseus and Thermas, and slew four thousand of them. He had also taken Enna and Camarina, and had fortified Drepanum.

Aquilius staid in the island all the winter in quality of Pro-Consul, and by his able conduct brought affairs into a better posture.

In

In the mean time his colleague held the Comitia for the new elections, where A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Sulpicius Paternulus were chosen Consuls. The command of the land-army fell to the former, the fleet to the latter. Soon after the arrival of Calatinus in Sicily, Misistratum, which the Proconsul Aquilus had reduced to the last extremity, surrendered to him. From thence he marched towards Camarina; but in his way, not taking sufficient precaution, he brought his army into a valley, where he was shut in, and surrounded by the Carthaginians under the command of Hamilcar. In this desperate situation Calpurnius ^b Flamma, a legionary Tribune, undertook, with the Consul's consent, an action of bravery much extolled by the historians. With three hundred chosen men, he, to make a diversion, seized an eminence, where he knew the Carthaginians would soon attack him, and from whence he could have little hope to escape. He promised himself, that by this motion he should give the enemy so much employment, that they would not be able to obstruct the Consul's march. The stratagem succeeded. The Carthaginians, in their attempt to dislodge him, met with so obstinate a resistance, that they were forced to bring almost the whole body of their army to the charge; and in the mean time the Consul with his legions got safely through the pass with little opposition. Of the three hundred Romans Calpurnius was the only person that escaped: He was found miserably wounded, but still breathing, under a heap of dead bodies; and his wounds being carefully dressed, he recovered. A Crown of Gramen was the reward of his exploit.

Calatinus after this escape continued his march towards Camarina, and by the help of engines, sent him by King Hiero, made himself master of it. Enna betrayed her garrison, and opened her gates to him. He took Sittanum by assault; and then many other towns surrendered without standing a siege, and, among the rest, Erbesus in the country of the Agri- gentines. Flushed with this success he undertook the siege of Lipara, expecting for the future to meet with no resistance wherever he appeared: But Hamilcar having got notice of his design, had stolen with some troops into the place; and when the Romans, who saw none but citizens upon the ramparts, confidently began to scale the walls, they were on a sudden surprized by a sally of the Carthaginians, and shamefully repulsed with considerable loss. And thus Calatinus finished his campaign, which by the mixture of good and bad success, gained him but little honour.

As for the other Consul, Sulpicius; he had conducted the fleet like an able commander. He had not only assisted his colleague in the reduction of the maritime towns of Sicily, but had much advanced the conquest of Sardinia and Corfica. However, this did not satisfy his passion for glory; he burnt with a desire of distinguishing himself by a naval victory: And because no Carthaginian fleet appeared at sea, he spread a report, that he

Y. R. 495.
Def. Chr.
257.
194 Conf.

Zon. P. 8.
Orosius,
Florus, Aurel.
Victor, c. 39.
Liv., epit.
B. 17.
Liv., B. 22.
c. 60.

Pliny, B. 22.
c. 6. and
Died. in
Ecl. g. p.
876.

Zon. B. 8.

^b He is called by some writers Cæditius, by others Laberius.

intended

Y. R. 495.
Bel. Car.
257.
194 Cons.

Polys. B. 1.
c. 24.

Y. R. 496.
Bel. Car.
256.
195 Cons.

c. 25.

intended to go and burn the ships of the African Republic in their harbours. This news alarmed the Carthaginians, and they trusted Hannibal once more with the command of a considerable fleet. He found Sulpicius with his not far from the coast of Africa. But when both sides were preparing for an engagement, a storm separated them, and drove the ships of both fleets into the ports of Sardinia. After this, Sulpicius surprized the Carthaginian admiral in a harbour of that island, and took many of his gallies; which misfortune begetting a mutiny in the remainder of his fleet, the mariners seized on his person, and crucified him.

The year following, when C. Attilius Regulus and Cn. Cornelius Blasio were Consuls, the former being with the fleet at Tyndaris, descried the Carthaginian fleet standing along the coast in a confused and careless manner; whereupon he hastened with a squadron of ten gallies to give them chase, directing at the same time the rest of his ships to follow him. The Carthaginians observing that the detached squadron was advanced a good distance from the enemies main fleet, tacked about on a sudden, and surrounding the ten ships, quickly sunk them all, except the admiral galley, which escaped only by her lightness, and the force of her oars. But the rest of the Roman fleet coming up soon after in order of battle, amply revenged this disgrace; for the Carthaginians were forced to fly to the island of Lipara with the loss of eighteen of their vessels, of which eight were sunk, and the other ten taken.

Little was performed this year by land, the armies engaging in no action of importance, and the contending powers being chiefly solicitous about the increase of their naval strength, which for good reason, as we shall presently see, was by each side deemed to be more than ever its principal affair.

C H A P. V.

The ninth Year of the War.

The Romans, under the conduct of Marcus Attilius Regulus and L. Manlius, defeat the Carthaginians in the memorable sea-fight of Ecnomus; after which they make a descent upon Africa. Carthage, though reduced to great extremity, rejects the hard conditions of peace proposed by Regulus.

Polys. B. 1.
c. 26.

THE struggle between the rival Republics for the dominion of Sicily had now lasted eight years, and Carthage had already lost the greater part of her acquisitions in that island, when the Romans, to make her relinquish the rest, undertook to transfer the war into Africa. They imagined, that they should hereby reduce the Carthaginians to the necessity of calling home all their forces for the defence of their own country. The naval preparations of the Romans the last year had been wholly in view to the execution of this design; and the fleet which they now put to sea under under the command of their new Consuls, Marcus Attilius || Regulus and L. Manlius, was suitable to the importance of the enterprize; for it consisted of no less than 330 ships of war.

Y. R. 497.
Esf. Chr.
255.
196 Conf.

On the other hand the Carthaginians, who well knew how easy it was for an enemy, who had once got footing in their country, to subdue the inhabitants on the coast, and to march even to the walls of Carthage, had determined to exert their utmost strength in opposing the intended descent. Fully bent upon a sea-engagement, they had equipped a fleet that was still more numerous than that of the Romans. They arrived at Lilybæum with 350 galleys. From this place they went afterwards to Heraclea Minoa, where they staid at anchor, waiting the motions of the enemy.

|| 2d time.

The Roman fleet had touched at Messina, and had thence steered its course along the coast of Sicily that lay to the right, and having doubled the promontory of Pachinum, was come to Ecnomus, where their land-forces then were. From these the Consuls selected the ablest of the soldiers for the present service, providing all things necessary either for a battle with the enemy by sea, if it should be offered, or to make an irruption into Africa, if their voyage thither should not be obstructed. Each galley in the Roman fleet had 300 rowers and 120 soldiers, so that the whole army amounted to near 140,000 men. As the Carthaginians exceeded their enemies in number of ships, so was their army proportionably greater, consisting of above 150,000 mariners and soldiers. And now, says Polybius, who could behold or but barely hear of such fleets and armies, and of the hazard to which these contending States were exposed, without being astonished at the mightiness of their power, and without taking part in the danger with which they threatened each other?

Ecnomus was not far from Heraclea; the two parties were obstinately determined, the one to invade, the other to defend; it was easy therefore to foresee they would soon come to a battle.

The Romans considering the advantage which the Carthaginians had over them in the lightness and ready working of their galleys, took especial care to draw up their fleet, that it should be difficult to break its order. They divided their ships into four squadrons, to three of which they gave the names of the first, the second, and the third fleet; and these, in three lines, composed the form of a wedge or triangle, pointing towards the enemy.

The first fleet to the right, and the second to the left (keeping the prows of their vessels turned outwards) made the sides of the triangle; and at the head of these two lines, that is, at the point where they met, were the Consuls Regulus and Manlius, in two galleys abreast of each other. The third fleet made the base of the triangle, and towed the vessels of burden, which carried the horses and baggage.

In the rear of all was the fourth division, which they called the Triarii, a term taken from the land-forces. This squadron was drawn up
in

Y. R. 497.
 Bef. Car.
 255.
 156 Cons.

in a line parallel to the base of the triangle, but was stretched so far in length, that its two extremities extended a good way beyond those of the base.

The several divisions of the Roman fleet being thus disposed, the whole, says Polybius, was fit for action, and very difficult to be broken.

P. H. B. 1.
 257.

The Carthaginian fleet was commanded by Hanno, who had succeeded so ill during the siege of Agrigentum, and by Hamilcar, who had fought near Tyndoris. These admirals observing how the Roman galleys were drawn up, and rightly conjecturing the intention of such a disposition, turned their thoughts to disappoint it, by the order in which they should dispose their own vessels, and by stratagem. Having divided their whole fleet into four squadrons, they drew three of them up in one long line frontways, their prows pointing directly on the enemy. Hanno was with the squadron which formed the right of this line, and which stretched a great way out into the sea. He had with him all the best rowing galleys, such as were proper to attack and retreat, and could row round the Romans at pleasure. Hamilcar was with the squadron in the left of the line. The third squadron, which made the center, was designedly drawn up very thin, that the Romans might be tempted to begin the attack there, in which case this squadron had orders to retreat, thereby to engage the Roman galleys, which made the two sides of their triangle, in a pursuit, which would separate them from the base.

The fourth division of the Carthaginian fleet, in form of a Tenail, kept close under the shore which lay to the left of their long line of battle.

The stratagem above mentioned, and which Polybius imputes to Hamilcar, succeeded. The Romans began their attack on the Carthaginians in the middle of their line. The galleys that were attacked pretended to fly through fear, and the assailants, that is to say, the first and second fleets of the Romans, pursuing them warmly, disjoined themselves from their third fleet (which towed the baggage) and from the Triarians in the rear of all.

When the Carthaginians judged that the first and second fleets of the Romans were sufficiently distanced from the rest, the signal was given from Hamilcar's galley; whereupon those that were chased by the Romans immediately tacked, and made head against the pursuers, Hamilcar with his squadron charging them at the same time. And now the battle grew warm; for though the Carthaginians had the advantage in the lightness and ready working of their vessels, yet the Romans lost not their assurance of success in the end; they found themselves better men when they came to the sword's point, and they had great trust in their engines, with which they grappled and boarded the enemy; besides, the soldiers were animated by the presence of their Generals, in whose eye they fought, and who themselves engaged in equal hazard with the rest.

a. 28.

During this conflict, Hanno, who commanded the squadron which had formed the right of the Carthaginian line, bearing down upon the Roman Triarians, Triarians attacked them vigorously, and succeeded so well, as to reduce them to very great extremities.

Y. R. 497.
Bef. Chr.

255.
196 Conf.

At the same time the fourth squadron of the Carthaginians, which in form of a Tenaïl had been posted close under the shore, ranged themselves into a front, and advanced against that squadron of the Romans which they called their third fleet, and which had made the base of their triangle. This fleet was therefore obliged to cast off the vessels they had in tow, which having done, they received the Carthaginians, and fought them with great bravery. So that now might be seen three naval battles at one and the same instant.

The fortune of the day was for some time doubtful, and would at length have infallibly declared for the Carthaginians, if Hamilcar's courage had been equal to his skill in stratagem, and if, with his two squadrons of the left and the center, he had only maintained the fight against the first and second fleets of the Romans, so as to hinder them from going to the assistance of their other fleets; but he, after some loss, shamefully fled out of the battle. And now while Manlius employed himself in towing away such ships as had been taken, Regulus, who perceived the great danger the Triarians were in from Hanno's attack, advanced with all diligence to their relief, taking with him those ships of his colleague's squadron which had not suffered any thing in the engagement with Hamilcar. The Triarians hereupon, though now almost quite vanquished, recovered heart, and renewed the battle with alacrity. Hanno seeing himself thus assaulted, contrary to all expectation, both in front and rear, betook himself to his oars, and made off to sea, yielding the day to the Romans.

About the same time Manlius coming up, and joining Regulus, they both hastened to the succour of their third fleet, which had been forced under the shore by the fourth squadron of the enemy, and was in a manner besieged there. This third fleet would have been in great danger of destruction, before the Consuls could have come to its rescue, if the Carthaginians had had the courage to push their advantage; but their dread of being grappled by the Corvi, and of coming to a close fight with the Romans, was so great, that they contented themselves with driving their enemies against the shore, and there keeping them beset. And now they were themselves entirely surrounded by the Romans, who took fifty of their ships with all their equipage. Such was the event of this last combat in particular. The Romans, every where victors, took in all sixty-four of the Carthaginian galleys, and sunk thirty. Of their own fleet they lost but twenty-four galleys, and these perished against the shore, not one was taken.

The Consuls, after this victory, returned into the ports of Sicily to take in provisions and fresh troops, and prepare anew for a descent upon Africa.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 29.

Whilst they were thus employed, Hanno made no scruple to go in person to amuse them by conferences about peace, which Hamilcar had refused

VOL. II.

F

V. R. 497.
Bef. Chr.
355.
196 Cons.

fused to do, for fear he should be treated as the Carthaginians had treated Cornelius Afina five years before. Hanno's confidence was founded upon a different judgment of the temper of the Romans; and experience on the present occasion shewed that he judged rightly. For when a certain legionary Tribune cried out, That he ought to be detained prisoner by way of reprimand for the treachery practised towards Cornelius, both the Consuls immediately ordered him silence; and then turning to Hanno, The faith of Rome secures thee from that fear. The Carthaginian was dismissed in safety, but his proposals were rejected, and the Consuls pursued their enterprize.

Pol. B. 1.
c. 29.

The Romans had a fortunate voyage, and landed in the neighbourhood of Chyrea, near the promontory of Mercury. Having made themselves masters of that town, they would not advance any further till they had received fresh instructions from Rome: For such was the dependance of the Consuls upon the Senate at this time, that they did little more than execute the orders of the Fathers; most of whom being experienced soldiers, and having commanded armies, were very capable of directing the conduct of their Generals. The Consuls however did not continue in a perfect inaction; they fortified Chyrea after the Roman manner, and detached parties to ravage the rich territory all around, and plunder the fine houses of the Carthaginian nobles. These detachments, meeting no opposition, brought away an immense booty, besides 20,000 prisoners, who were made slaves.

V. R. MAX.
B. 6. c. 6.

When the Consuls messenger came back from Rome, he brought orders for Manlius to return to Italy with the fleet, and for Regulus to continue in Africa with a sufficient number of troops to carry on the war. The people of Rome depended greatly on the courage and abilities of Regulus, and the city was in universal joy upon the publishing of this regulation. But when the news of it came to Regulus, he was much afflicted. His pretext was, the bad condition of his little farm of seven acres of land. He represented to the Senate, that upon the death of the husbandman, to whom he had committed the care of his farm, the management of it had fallen to a day-labourer, who had since stolen his instruments of husbandry, and carried off all his stock; so that his presence was necessary at home to provide for the subsistence of his wife and children. Upon this the Senate gave orders that his losses should be repaired, his farm taken care of, and his family maintained at the public expence; but he himself was directed to stay in Africa. Manlius leaving behind him forty ships, 15,000 foot, and 500 horse, returned to Italy with the rest of the army, and with all the prisoners which had been taken upon the continent of Africa.

Pol. B. 1.
c. 29.

Regulus made incursions into the country, and pushed on his conquests with prodigious rapidity. All the towns in his way, that were unfortified, Flor. B. 2.

Zon. B. 8.

* Regulus, in the progress of his conquests, river that discharged itself into the sea not encamping on the banks of the Boğradia, a far from Carthage, is said by many authors tified, he took by assault, and those that were fortified, by siege; and now at length he sat down before Adis, a city of great importance, and pressed the siege of it with vigour.

V. R. 497.
Bef. Chr.
255.
196 Cont.

Hitherto the Carthaginians had brought no army into the field to oppose his progress. Upon the first notice of their terrible defeat at sea, apprehending a sudden invasion from the Romans, they had dispatched away some troops to keep guard upon the coast; but this care was over, so soon as they learnt that the Romans were landed. They proceeded therefore with all possible application to reinforce their army with new levies, and make due provision both for strengthening the city, and securing the country. They named two Generals to command their forces, Bostar, and Asdrubal the son of Hanno; they afterwards sent orders to Hamilcar, who was then at Heraclea, to return home with all expedition. Hamilcar brought with him to Carthage 5000 foot and 500 horse, and being there named third General of the Republic, and having consulted with Asdrubal, it was determined no longer to endure that the Romans should make such spoil upon the country, and to hasten to the relief of Adis. They advanced with their army, and encamped upon an eminence, which, tho' it overlooked the Roman camp, was a very incommodious situation; for, as their greatest strength lay in their horse and elephants, to abandon the plain country, and post themselves in high and steep places, where neither elephants nor horse could be of any use to them, was in effect to point out to their enemies the method to destroy them. Regulus, who saw their mistake, gave them no time to rectify it. At break of day he marched against the enemy, his troops ascending the hill on both sides. The mercenaries of the Carthaginians behaved themselves gallantly on this occasion, and repulsed the first legion of the Romans which charged them in front; but being presently after attacked in the rear by the soldiers who had got up the hill on the other side, they could no longer maintain the fight. The whole army disbanded itself, and in the utmost confusion fled out of the camp. The elephants and the horse, which had been wholly useless during the action, gained the champaign country and escaped. The Romans having pursued the foot for some space, returned and pillaged the camp; after which they proceeded to make incursions as before, spoiling the country, and taking towns without opposition. Among others, they seized upon Tunes, and there

c. 30.

Val. Max. B. 1. thors to have met there
A. Gell. B. 6. with a monstrous serpent of Plin. B. 8. 120 feet long, which much infested his army, seizing his men, and swallowing them whole when they went to draw water. The skin of this animal was so tough, and its scales so thick, as to be impenetrable by the Roman weapons, inasmuch that they were forced to employ their battering-engines, called Bal- istæ, to destroy it. And even when they had killed it, the stench of its carcase infected the air and the water to such a degree, that the Romans were forced to decamp. Many other extraordinary things are related by the historians of this serpent, which was probably nothing more than an overgrown crocodile, a creature common in Africa, but to which the Romans were at this time strangers.

Catrou.

Y. R. 49.
Bef. Chr.
= 55.
126 Conf.

Pol. h. B. 1.
- 51.

they pitched their camp within the walls of it; this being of all places the most commodious for distressing Carthage itself, and the country about it.

The Carthaginians, who had so unfortunately managed their affairs both by sea and land, not so much through the cowardice of their armies, as the insufficiency of their chiefs, began now to despair. For over and above the calamities that have been related, the Numidians, their implacable enemies, taking advantage of the present troubles, had entered their provinces with fire and sword, and compelled the inhabitants to fly for refuge to the capital, whither they brought both fear and famine, a mighty multitude of all sorts flocking at once thither.

It is not surprizing therefore, if in such extremity the Carthaginians were overjoyed to receive a message from the Roman General, exhorting them to think of an accommodation. What moved Regulus to make this step was the apprehension lest a successor, who was expected from Rome, should deprive him of the glory of putting an end to the war. The Senate of Carthage with great readiness dispatched away some of their principal citizens to confer with him; but these were so far from yielding to his proposals, that they could not with patience even hear them mentioned. For Regulus would have had them esteem it as a singular grace and benefit, that he granted them peace upon any terms whatsoever; and those he demanded were so infamous for the Carthaginians, that in their imagination nothing worse could befall them, should they be entirely conquered. The deputies therefore returned to Carthage, not only without having consented to any thing, but full of indignation at the intolerable insolence of the Romans. The Senate likewise, when the report was made to them of what had passed at the conference, shewed so much courage and greatness of mind, that tho' they were almost at the brink of despair, they determined rather to abide any adversity which their worst fortune could bring upon them, than stain the nobility of their name and actions by so shameful a treaty.

C H A P. VI.

Xantippus, a Commander of Greek mercenaries in the service of Carthage, by his excellent advice and conduct gives a wonderful turn to affairs in Africa. The Roman army is totally defeated, and Regulus taken prisoner.

- 52-

IN the height of this distress, to which the victories and obdurate pride of Regulus had reduced the Carthaginians, there fortunately arrived at Carthage a body of recruits which they had hired in Greece. Among these was a certain Lacedæmonian named Xantippus, an officer well skilled in military affairs according to the Spartan discipline. This man having informed himself of the circumstances of the late overthrow, and of the number of horse and elephants which yet remained, concluded within himself, and freely said it among his friends, that the Carthaginians had not not been vanquished by the enemy, but by the ignorance of their own leaders. This discourse, being spread among the people, came at length to the ears of the magistrates, who thereupon commanded him to be brought before the great council. Xantippus offered such strong reasons in support of what he had advanced, that it was impossible to resist the force of them. He shewed plainly, that if instead of encamping upon the high grounds, they would keep in the open champaign country, they might not only banish all fear of the enemy, but even be assured of victory. The whole assembly, the Generals not excepted, applauded what he said, and it was unanimously agreed to place him at the head of their troops; the only example of the kind in all history, and a sure proof that the Carthaginians were in the utmost perplexity and consternation.

Y. R. 497.
Bef. Chr.
255.
196 Conf.

The soldiers had already begun to conceive a favourable opinion of this stranger, and to hope for some advantage from him: but when, after he had led them without the walls of the city, they saw in what manner he drew them up, and the new exercise he taught them according to his rules, displaying such a skill in the art of war, as they had never seen in any of their former Generals, they were quite transported with joy: they pressed earnestly to be led against the enemy, being assured that they could not fail of success under the conduct of Xantippus. The army in a few days began to march. It consisted of 12,000 foot, 4000 horse, and about 100 elephants.

The Romans were at first a little struck with the novelty, to see their enemies boldly marching in the open flat country, but having no doubt as to the event, they advanced with all expedition to meet them, and incamped within about 1200 paces of them. Next day, the Carthaginians held a council of war, to determine how they should proceed, while the soldiers assembling in great numbers, and proclaiming every where the name of Xantippus, demanded with much earnestness to be led against the enemy. The officers observing this forwardness of the army to fight; and being urged by the pressing instances of Xantippus not to let the ardour of the soldiers cool without action, directions were presently given to prepare for battle, and the whole conduct of it was committed to the Spartan, who disposed his troops in the following manner.

c. 33.

He drew up all his elephants in one rank, and behind these, at a reasonable distance, he placed the Carthaginian infantry in one phalanx. The foreign troops were posted one part of them in the same line with the phalanx, to the right of it; the other part, composed of light-armed soldiers, was placed in the intervals of the squadrons of horse, which made the two wings of the army.

On the part of the Romans, as the chief care of Regulus was to guard against the elephants, he to this end placed in front his Velites, or light-armed soldiers, that these with their darts or other missive weapons might drive back those huge beasts upon the enemy, or at least hinder them from rushing with their usual violence upon the legions. It was also out
of

Y. R. 497.
B. C. 217.
195 Cons.

of fear of the same animals, that he made his battalions deeper in file than he had been accustomed to do; an excellent precaution, says Polybius, against the shock of the elephants; but then, by narrowing his front, he left himself more exposed to be attacked in flank by the enemies cavalry, which greatly outnumbered him.

It does not appear of what number of men Regulus's army consisted; but supposing him to have lost none of those which his colleague left him, they amounted but to 15,000 foot and 500 horse.

P. A. B. I.
1154

The two armies being thus drawn up, and the signal being given by Xanthippus, the first onset was made by the elephants, which met with so little resistance from the Velites, that they presently broke into the Roman main body, making great destruction amongst the foremost ranks of it. However the rest of that body stood firm for some time, by reason of its depth. But the Carthaginian horse, having quickly driven those of Regulus out of the field, began now to charge his battalions both in flank and rear, which put them into great distress, for they were forced to face every way, and could neither pass forward, nor yet retire, and had much to do, to make good the ground on which they stood. In the mean while such of the Romans, as with great difficulty had made their way through the elephants, and had left them at their backs, met with the Carthaginian phalanx, which not having yet engaged, and being therefore quite fresh and in good array, obtained an easy victory over a body of men already in disorder, and wearied with wounds and labour. These being entirely cut off, and the phalanx advancing, there was no longer any resource for the Romans. Surrounded on all sides, the greater part of them were crushed to death by the enormous weight of the elephants, or slain in their ranks by the arrows of the horse. Some attempted to escape by flight, but being in an open country, they were easily overtaken by the cavalry, and either cut off, or made prisoners. Five hundred who followed Regulus fell alive with him into the enemies hands^b.

Of the whole Roman army there escaped only 2000 men, who had been posted in the left point of their main body, and who in the beginning of the action, to avoid the shock of the elephants, had wheeled round them, and charged the mercenaries that were to the right of the enemies phalanx, putting them to flight, and pursuing them even to their intrenchments. These 2000, as it were by miracle, got safely to Clypea, when the rest were all slain or taken.

On the enemies side were killed but 800 men, of whom the greater part were of those mercenaries that had been attacked by the 2000 Romans.

^b Chevalier Fabert is of opinion, that the loss of this battle was wholly owing to the mistake of Regulus, in not leaving (as Scipio did afterwards at the battle of Zama) sufficient spaces between the columns of his main body, for the elephants to pass freely through them. That if, by this precaution, the Roman infantry had shunned the mischiefs, which for want of it they suffered from the elephants, they would have had nothing to fear from the Carthaginian horse, which could have made no impression on them, (formed as they were) even after the Roman cavalry were driven out of the field.

The

The Carthaginians, having spoiled the dead, marched back to their city, leading in triumph the Roman General and the 500 other prisoners.

Y. R. 497.
Bef. Chr.
255.
196 Conf.

Whoever, says Polybius, reflects seriously on this adventure, will gather from it excellent instruction for the conduct of human life. The misfortune of Regulus affords us an admirable lesson of moderation, and teaches us to be always on our guard against the inconstancy of fortune. We see him who but a few days before was so elated by success, so haughty and inexorable, reduced at once to be the scorn of a people whom he had despised and insulted, and to stand in need of that clemency from his enemies, which he had with pitiless pride refused them in their misery. We learn wisdom, says our author, two ways; by our own experience, and by the experience of others. The first is the more convincing, but the other is the easier and safer. And this is the great benefit we reap from the study of History. Without any peril to ourselves, we gather rules of conduct from a view of the miscarriages and misfortunes of other men.

c. 35.

Polybius also observes, that the event which has been just related, confirms that saying of Euripides, That one wise Head is of more value than a great many Hands. For it is manifest in the case now before us, that the counsel and abilities of one single person subdued the Roman legions that were esteemed invincible, restored a sinking and despairing Commonwealth, and revived the courage of a spiritless army, grown stupid by their defeats.

The Carthaginians, whose affairs had prospered to their wish, expressed their joy by solemn thanksgivings to the Gods, and by congratulations and mutual good offices to one another. As for Xantippus, who had had so great share in restoring the Commonwealth, he shortly after (an admirable example of judgment and wisdom) took his leave and departed from Carthage, well foreseeing that his services, too great for a reward, would draw upon him both envy and calumny, against which a native perhaps might have been able to guard himself by the means of relations and friends, but which would in all probability bring ruin upon a stranger, who had nothing to support him but his merit.

ch. 36.

Polybius tells us, that some authors give a different account of Xantippus's departure, and promises to take notice of it in another place: but that part of his history has not been transmitted to us. According to Appian, the Carthaginians, fearing lest the honour of the victory should be ascribed to the Lacedæmonians, feigned a gratification of their General, made him magnificent presents, and appointed a convoy of their own ships to conduct him to Sparta, but with secret instructions to the commanders of the galleys to throw him and his Lacedæmonians over-board, so soon as they could come into the open sea. Such, says our author, was the end of Xantippus, and such the recompence he received for so noble an exploit. But surely this is a very senseless account, or the Carthaginians must have been a very senseless as well as ungrateful people, first to do publick honour to the Spartan, as the known and un-

*Appian. De Bell. Pun.
c. 3.*

doubted

Y. R. 497.
 Bef. Chr.
 255.
 196 Conf.

doubted author of the victory, and then to imagine they could rob him of that glory, and conceal their obligation to him, by treacherously throwing him into the sea.

C H A P. VII.

From the 9th to the 14th Year of the War.

The Romans, after the misfortune of Regulus, vanquish the Carthaginians in a sea-engagement on the coast of Africa; but withdraw their forces from that country. In their return home they lose their own fleet by tempest. They build a new one, and this is also destroyed by the like misfortune. Hereupon they resolve to think no more of naval enterprizes; but after two years, in which their land-forces perform nothing of moment, they change that resolution, and, while a third fleet is building, they gain a signal victory at land over the Carthaginians, near Panormus.

Polyb. B. 1.
 c. 36.

THE Romans, having received an account of the miserable condition of their affairs in Africa, applied themselves with all diligence to repair and equip their fleet in order to rescue out of danger the 2000 soldiers, who after the late battle had escaped to Chyrea. In the mean time the Carthaginians, to reduce those remains of Regulus's army, laid siege to that place, and used their utmost efforts to carry it; but so brave and so obstinate was the resistance they met with, that they were forced at length to abandon the enterprize and retire. And now hearing of the naval preparations of the Romans, for a new expedition to Africa, they fitted out in a short time about 200 galleys, and put to sea to watch the arrival of the enemy.

Y. R. 498.
 Bef. Chr.
 254.
 197 Conf.

Early in the summer, the new Consuls Fulvius and Æmilius, with a fleet of 350 sail appeared off the promontory of Mercury, and there came to an engagement with the Carthaginians, who, not being able to sustain the very first shock, were entirely defeated, and lost 114 of their vessels. The Romans pursued their course, arrived at Chyrea, took the garrison on board, and then steered back towards Sicily ^a.

They

^a There are two parts of the Roman conduct in this war, which Mr. Rollin and Chevalier Folard think very hard to be accounted for.

1. Why did the Romans, after their victory at sea near Ecnomus, and the fortunate descent made in Africa in consequence of that victory, leave so small a number of troops under Regulus to carry on the war in that country?

Mr. Rollin says, it was a manifest renouncing of the advantages gained by sea;

and the Chevalier declares, that it is enough to distract a commentator, and wonders that Polybius makes no remark on this strange proceeding.

Again, 2. Why did the Romans, just after this new victory at sea, near the coast of Africa, entirely abandon that country, instead of attempting to complete the conquest of it? Polybius relates this fact also without any remark upon it, to the great amazement of Chevalier Folard.

But as to both these difficulties, may it not

They had a prosperous voyage till they came near the Sicilian coast, in the territory of Camarina; but then so terrible a tempest overtook them, as no words are able to describe. Of above 400 vessels, only four-score escaped destruction; the rest either foundered at sea, or were dashed to pieces against the rocks; so that the whole coast from Camarina to cape Pachynum was covered with dead bodies and fragments of ships. History affords no example of a more deplorable shipwreck. And this calamity was owing, not to fortune, but to the obstinacy of the Consuls. For the pilots had often represented to them, that the season was come when it was no longer safe to navigate on that coast of Sicily which looks towards Africa: but they being full of expectation, that the towns situate thereon, terrified by the late victory, would readily submit to them on their first appearance, despised the admonition, to pursue an interest that was by no means worthy of the hazard. But such, as Polybius tells us, was the character of the Romans; impetuous, presumptuous, and obsti-

Y. P. 468.
B. C. Chr.
254.
197 C. Chr.

c. 37.

not be answered, that the only object of the Romans in this war, was the conquest of Sicily? To alarm Carthage, and induce her to withdraw her forces out of that island, are the reasons assigned by Polybius for the descent made by the Romans on Africa. But they were disappointed as to the effect of this measure; for the Carthaginians judging by the small army left with Regulus, that the enemy, in making their descent, had no farther view, than to cause a diversion, did not recal their troops out of Sicily; but seeing, as Polybius says, that the war would go on slowly, named two Generals, Bostar and Ajdrubal, to command the forces they had at home; and when afterwards Hamilcar was sent for from Sicily to join those Generals, he brought with him but 5500 men.

It is plain therefore from the conduct of both the contending powers, that neither the Romans intended, nor the Carthaginians feared, any serious attempt upon Carthage by Regulus, when he began the war in Africa.

But why did not the Romans resolve to attempt Carthage after the victory at Ecnomus? I answer: Because from their knowledge of its great strength, and of the many resources its prodigious wealth furnished, they judged the conquest of it impracticable at this time, and before Sicily was subdued. And that they judged right, one may fairly conclude from Polybius's not reproofing their policy, and from the difficulties they afterwards met with in that enterprize, even when masters of Sicily, and of all the islands between Italy and Africa.

But after the total defeat of Regulus's army by means of the elephants, the difficulty of succeeding in an African war was become infinitely great. We find, that the legions were possessed with such a dread of those animals, that for some years they durst not come to a pitched battle with the Carthaginians even in Sicily, where the Romans had many advantages which they must have wanted in Africa.

In a word, Sicily was the present object of the Roman ambition, and the only reasonable object it could now have; and we shall see by what follows, that they had need of all their forces for the reduction of this island: so that their leaving Africa after the victory at sea by Fulvius and Æmilius, ought not perhaps to have so greatly astonished the Chevalier Folard.

If we may credit some authors, we have a shorter way of getting rid of the Chevalier's difficulties, which is, to deny the facts that give occasion to them. According to these writers, Regulus's army was not so inconsiderable, as from Polybius's account it seems to have been. Appian and Orosius make it 30,000 strong; and Eutropius reckons 47,000 men, of whom 30,000 were slain, and 15,000 taken prisoners, in the battle with Xantippus.

And as to the Romans quitting Africa after the victory at sea by Fulvius and Æmilius, the last named author [Eutropius] represents them, not as making this retreat by choice, but as being constrained to it by famine.

Y. R. 493.
Bel. Car.
254
197 Cons.

nate, they would carry every thing by mere violence; they would force all nature to their will: to them nothing was impossible which they could desire; nay, it must of necessity come to pass, if they had once decreed that it should be done. And indeed, adds our author, in their enterprizes by land, and where they had to do only with men and the works of men, this inflexible audaciousness of spirit for the most part (not always) carried them through every obstacle to the end proposed; but in their naval expeditions, when they foolishly imagined that the winds and the seas must be complaisant to their wishes and projects, they were sure to be chastised for their overweening presumption; and of this they had frequent experience.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 35.

The Romans, though extremely afflicted, were not discouraged by the ruin of their fleet; they ordered a new one of 220 sail to be speedily built: and, which is almost incredible, this powerful armament was completely equipped in three months time.

Y. R. 499.
Bel. Car.
259.
198 Cons.

The Consular Fajces had been transferred to A. Attilius and Cn. Cornelius Asina (the same Cornelius who was formerly made prisoner at Lipara, and had lived some time in captivity.) These commanders having passed the Straits with the new fleet, and touched at Messina to take with them the eighty vessels which had escaped the late storm, shaped their course for Cephalidium, which was delivered to them by treachery; thence they sailed to Drepanum, and began to besiege it; but upon succours being brought thither by Carthalo the Carthaginian General (who had retaken Agrirentum, and demolished the walls of it) they drew off and sailed to || Panormus, which, according to Polybius, was then the capital city of the Carthaginians in Sicily. The Consuls besieged this place, and having carried the out-works by assault, the besieged capitulated, and surrendered the town. The inhabitants of Selinus, Tyndaris, and other places, did the like, having first driven out the Carthaginian garrisons. After these conquests, the Romans leaving a strong body of troops in Panormus, returned to Rome.

Diod. Sic.
in Eclog.
p. 877.

|| Palermo.

Y. R. 500.
Bel. Car.
260.
199 Cons.

Early the next summer the succeeding Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius, sailed over to Sicily with all their naval force, and from thence soon after stood for the coast of Africa, where they made several descents, and brought away some booty, but performed nothing of moment. Coming at length near the island of the Lotophagi, (which was called Melinix) not far from the lesser Syrtis; and, being unacquainted with the coast, they ran upon some banks of sand, and there stuck fast: the sea ebbing left them dry, and they were utterly at a loss what to do, apprehending the destruction of the whole fleet. But the flood returning some hours after, and they lighting the vessels by throwing their booty overboard, made a shift to get off. Immediately they stood away for Sicily, as if they were flying before an enemy, and, having doubled the cape of Libyæum, arrived safely in the port of Panormus. But from thence steering their course homewards at a time unskilfully chosen, they lost 150 of their vessels by a storm that overtook them in the passage.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 39.

So.

So terrible a destruction of two fleets by tempest totally discouraged the Romans from all naval enterprizes. No more than sixty vessels were to be equipped for the future, and these were to be employed only to transport the troops with the baggage and ammunition into Sicily. Their thirst of glory and empire was not abated, but they determined to rely wholly on their land-forces for the achievement of the conquest they had in view. This conquest however could not be effected by land-armies alone, while the maritime towns in the possession of the Carthaginians were open to receive provisions and recruits by sea, as occasion should require. Nay, ever since the defeat of Regulus by means of the elephants, the Roman soldiers were afraid of coming to any engagement by land, where they should have to do with those huge and furious animals.

The Carthaginians had dispatched Asdrubal with 140 elephants to Lilybæum, and had strengthened the army which was there with troops drawn from other places; and they had sent after him 200 ships of war. Asdrubal, after his arrival, having first applied himself diligently to discipline his soldiers and elephants, had boldly taken the field with a resolution to offer the enemy battle. But though the armies were on several occasions encamped within five or six furlongs of each other, sometimes in the territory of Selinus, sometimes about Lilybæum, the Romans for the space of two years together had not once the resolution to come to an engagement with the enemy; nor durst they descend into the open champaign country. So that during the Consulship of C. Aurelius^b and P. Servilius, and that of L. Cecilius Metellus and C. Furius, no progress was made in their affairs, except the taking of two towns, which they could besiege, still keeping themselves posted in high and inaccessible places. This terror among the legions made the Senate of Rome at length change their measures, and resolve to try their fortune once more at sea. And accordingly, after the election of C. || Atilius and L. † Manlius to the Consulate, they ordered the building fifty new vessels, and that suitable levies should be made of men fit for that service.

In the mean time Asdrubal having observed the dread that possessed the Roman army, whenever he presented them battle; and having intelligence that Furius was returned to Rome with one half of the army, and that Cecilius with the other was at Panormus to protect his allies while they gathered in their harvest, he marched from Lilybæum, and came with all his forces to the borders of the territory of Panormus, hoping to provoke Cecilius to fight. But the Roman, who well understood his own business, kept close within the town, and pretending fear, suffered the Carthaginians to advance, and pillage the country without opposition, till with all their elephants they had passed a river which ran within a mile of the place. He then sent out some light armed troops, to skirmish and ^b In this Consulate Tib. Coruncanius was chosen Pontifex Maximus, the first instance of a Plebeian raised to that high station.

Y. R. 500.
Bet. Chr.
252.
199 Conf.

Y. R. 501.

Y. R. 502.

Y. R. 503.[†]
|| A 2d time.
† A 2d time.
c. 49.

Y. R. 503
 Bef. Chr.
 249
 2023 Conf.

draw the enemy farther on, supporting his first detachment by others as occasion required, till by this management he had brought the whole Carthaginian army as near the town as he wished them to be. At a proper distance from the walls he had caused a trench to be cut, which the elephants could by no means pass; and he had given his dartmen orders, in case those animals advanced against them, to retire by slow degrees till they came to that trench, into which they were then to leap down, and from thence to gaul the elephants with their darts as much as possibly they could. He ordered the town's people at the same time to furnish themselves with great quantities of darts, and post themselves at the foot of the walls. Cæcilius himself, with the main body of his forces, remained in readiness at a certain gate of the town, which was opposite to the left wing of the enemy. When the battle grew warm, the leaders of the elephants, being desirous to have the chief honour of the victory, advanced in order upon the Romans, whom, retiring before them, they pursued to the very brink of the trench above mentioned. There they were at a stand, and the elephants being terribly gauled with the darts both of those who leaped into the trench, and of those who were on the other side of it, began presently to grow unruly, and turning back furiously upon their own infantry, utterly disordered them. And now Cæcilius, who saw his advantage, sallied out with all his troops, fresh and in good order, and charging the enemy in flank, easily put them to the rout. The Carthaginians suffered a great slaughter; some of their elephants^c were killed, and the rest were all taken.

Polyb. B. 1.
 41.

The news of Cæcilius's exploit caused great rejoicings at Rome, not so much on account of the taking the elephants, tho' that was a very terrible blow to the enemy, as because by the victory obtained against those formidable animals, the courage of the Roman soldiers was entirely restored, and they no longer feared to keep in the open country. It was resolved therefore diligently to pursue the design of sending the new Consuls into Sicily with a naval force, and by vigorous efforts both by land and sea, to put an end, if possible, to this destructive war.

^c Cæcilius, according to Pliny, B. 8. ch. 6. caused the elephants to be transported to Italy, where they were baited to death in the Circus at Rome.

C H A P. VIII.

Regulus is sent to Rome with some Ambassadors from Carthage to negotiate a peace. His behaviour on this occasion, and the consequences of it.

THE defeat of Asdrubal's before Panormus threw the people of Carthage into discouragement; they began now to think seriously of peace;

^d This General, according to Zonaras, was crucified for his misconduct.

and

and believing that if Regulus, a man so much esteemed by his countrymen, engaged in the affair, an accommodation might be easily effected, they sent him to Rome with the ambassadors appointed for this negotiation; having first taken an oath of him to return to Carthage, in case there should neither be peace nor an exchange of prisoners. When after his landing in Italy he came to the gates of Rome, he would by no means enter the city, alledging, that he was no longer a Roman citizen, but a slave of a foreign power, and that he did not come to infringe the laws and custom of his native country, which forbade the Senate to give audience to strangers within the walls; nor, when his wife Marcia with her children ran to meet him, did he shew any signs of joy, but fixed his eyes upon the ground, as one ashamed of his servile condition, and unworthy of their caresses. So extraordinary a behaviour raised the admiration both of the Romans and Carthaginians, and all were impatiently curious to know how he would conduct himself in the Senate. The Fathers being at length assembled without the walls, the ambassadors were admitted to an audience, and made their proposals; and then Regulus, whose turn it was to speak next, only added, Conscript Fathers, being a slave to the Carthaginians, I come on the part of my masters to treat with you concerning a peace and an exchange of prisoners. He said no more; and when he had uttered these few words, sought to withdraw and follow the ambassadors, who could not be present at the deliberations. In vain the Consuls pressed him to stay, and give his opinion as a Senator and Consular Person; he absolutely refused to take his place among the Conscript Fathers. However, he obeyed his African masters who directed him to continue in the assembly. There he remained in a modest silence till the oldest Senators had declared their opinions, and then he expressed himself to the following effect: "Romans,
 " I am sensible, that the fatigues and expence of so difficult a war put " your virtue to a severe trial; but what great enterprize can ever be at" chieved without a steady fortitude? I am an eye witness of the distress " of Carthage. 'Tis nothing but the impossibility of maintaining the " war that makes the Carthaginians solicit for a peace. You have " lost one battle, (it was when I commanded) a misfortune which " Metellus has repaired by a notable victory. Except two cities, Sicily is " entirely yours; and your new fleet spreads a terror throughout " the seas. You govern your allies in tranquillity, and they serve " you with zeal. Carthage, drained of her wealth, can depend but " little on the provinces of her dominion. With how much ease did I " bring them into a revolt! Your armies are composed of soldiers of " one and the same nation, united by mutual esteem and affection: the " troops of Carthage are chiefly made up of strangers who have no tie
 " to her but their pay, and whom the example of Xantippus will deter
 " from engaging in her service. My opinion therefore is absolutely against " a peace with our Enemies; nor do I think it for your interest to make " an exchange of prisoners. Among the Carthaginian captives you have " thirteen

Y. R. 503.
 Bef. Chr.
 249.
 202d Conf.

Appian. in Punic.
 Bell. c. 3.
 Livy Epi-
 tom. B. 18.
 Eutrop.
 P. 2.
 Cic. de Of-
 fic. P. 3.
 Sol. J. L.
 P. 6.
 Val. Max.
 T. 1. c. 1.
 & P. c. 2.
 A. Gell. B.
 6. c. 4.
 Avel.
 Vit. c. 40.
 Zon. B. 8.

Y. R. 505.
Bell. Car.
249.
2nd ed. Corz.

“ thirteen considerable officers, young, and capable of commanding one “ day the armies of the enemy. As for me, I grow old, and my mis“ fortunes have made me useless; add to this that the number of Car- “ thaginian captives of an inferior rank infinitely exceeds that of the Ro- “ man prisoners, so that the exchange must be to your disadvantage.
 “ And after all, what can you expect from soldiers who have been van“ quished and reduced to slavery? Will they serve the Republic with the “ courage of men whose reputation is entire and untouched? No, they “ will rather be like timorous deer, that have escaped out of the toils of
 “ the hunter, ever ready to fly at the approach of danger.”

This discourse filled the Senators with admiration and compassion, and tho’ they approved his advice concerning the proposals made by the Carthaginians, yet they knew not how to consent to the ruin of a man whose contempt of life made him the more worthy to be preserved. The Pontifex Maximus being consulted, declared, that his oath having been extorted from him, he might without perjury continue at Rome. They pressed him therefore not to return to Africk; but Regulus was offended with these solicitations. “ What! have you then resolved to dishonour me? I am too well acquainted with the inconstancy of the people’s favour, to trust them with the care of my reputation. At my first return they are full of good will, touched with a fresh remembrance of my misfortunes: this fit of joy once over, and I am no longer thought of. Nay, I doubt not but my stay here would be reproached me by those who have seemed the most afflicted for my absence. How often shall I be called Slave! May not Rome herself disdain to own me for one of her Citizens? I am not ignorant, that death and the extremest tortures are preparing for me; but what are these to the shame of an infamous action, and the wounds of a guilty mind? Slave as I am to Carthage, I have still the spirit of a Roman; I have sworn to return, it is my duty to go; let the Gods take care of the rest.”

The Senate, by the same decree which refused the Carthaginian ambassadors both peace and an exchange of prisoners, left Regulus at liberty to continue at Rome, or return to Carthage, as he should think fit. This was all that Marcia could obtain from the Fathers by her tears and solicitations. Regulus, to free himself from all farther importunity of his friends, assured them, that before his departure from Africk the Carthaginians had given him a slow poison, and that he could not long survive the negotiation. As soon as it was ended, he quitted his native country, to go and resume his chains at Carthage, with the same serenity as if he had been going to a country seat for his recreation.

Those authors who have celebrated the heroism of Regulus on this occasion, tho’ they all concur in reporting that he suffered at his return into Africa some cruel death from the revenge of the Carthaginians, yet are by no means agreed concerning the particular kind of torment he was made to undergo.

The

The most current opinion is, that they cut off or sewed back his eyelids, and then bringing him out of a dark dungeon, exposed him to the sun at mid-day : That after this, they shut him up in a kind of chest or press stuck full, on the inside, with iron spikes, and there left him to die in torment *.

Y. R. 503.
Bet. Chr.
249.
202d Conf.

The

* Although this story of the cruel revenge which the Carthaginians took of Regulus after his return to Carthage be found in many of the best Roman authors, and although it be not expressly contradicted by any antient writer; yet the reasons that are offered by some moderns against the truth of it may perhaps excuse our incredulity, should we look upon it as a mere fiction.

Palmerius, in a note upon Appian, offers two very weighty arguments for rejecting the account as fabulous.

1. The total silence of Polybius concerning every thing that happened to Regulus after his defeat and captivity.

How can we account for that author's silence upon matters of so interesting a nature, in his History of the First Punic War; a History, which in many parts of it is written rather with prolixity than brevity; I say, how can we account for this, but by supposing, that Polybius for good reasons disbelieved the tradition which had been greedily embraced by the Romans concerning Regulus's death, and therefore disdained to record it; and that nevertheless he was unwilling to offend them by contradicting such a favourite story? It was hence, doubtless, that he avoided saying any thing of Regulus's voyage to Rome, his behaviour there, and his return to Carthage; because had he mentioned these, without speaking of his death, (the supposed immediate consequence of them) an affected silence in this particular only, would have amounted to a direct condemnation of the prevailing opinion.

2. A fragment preserved by Valesius, of the 24th book of Diodorus Siculus.

This fragment (speaking of Regulus's wife and sons, into whose custody Bostar and Hamilcar, two captive Carthaginian Generals, had been given) begins thus:

“ — But the mother of the young men
“ [the Attilii] grievously laid to heart the “ death of her husband, and thinking [or “ imagining] that he had lost his life “ [ἢ ἀμείλιαν] for want of good looking after,

“ stirred up her sons to use the captives
“ cruelly.”

Then it relates, that the captives being thrust together into a close place, where they could hardly stir, and being kept from food, Bostar, after five days of extreme misery, expired: That Hamilcar, who yet held out, telling the wife of Regulus how careful he had been of her husband, with tears implored her compassion; but that she, far from being touched with the least sense of humanity, kept him five days after this in the same hole, shut up with the carcass of his companion, giving him only so much sustenance as would serve to prolong his life in misery: That by means of some servants in the house, a report of this horrible cruelty came to the ears of the Tribunes of the people: That the magistrates having well assured themselves of the fact, summoned the Attilii, and threatened them with the severest punishments, if for the time to come they did not take all due care of the prisoners; nay, that they were very near pronouncing sentence of death upon the young men, for having brought a dishonour upon the Roman name: That the Attilii, to excuse themselves, laid the blame upon their mother. That they burnt the body of Bostar, and sent the ashes to his relations, and for the future cherished Hamilcar, whom they had so barbarously treated.

Palmerius's conjecture from the whole is this:

That Bostar and Hamilcar being taken prisoners, [probably in that sea-fight on the coast of Africa, where the Carthaginians lost 114 ships, because no mention is made of them in the war after that time,] the Senate, to console the wife and sons of Regulus, put those captive Generals into their hands, that they might have the price of his ransom in their possession.

That Regulus died of some distemper in captivity, whereat the wife being extremely vexed, as having lost the pleasing hope of recovering her husband by exchange, treated the captives cruelly; that the magistrates being

V. R. 503.
E. S. Chr.
222.
2nd Cens.

The news of this barbarity no sooner reached Rome, but the Senate, by way of retaliation, gave up the chief of the Carthaginian captives to be treated at the discretion of Marcia, the widow of Regulus who condemned them to the same kind of death her husband had suffered.

C H A P.

being angry at this conduct, she, to give a colour of justice to her cruelty, told this fable of her husband's perishing by hunger, want of sleep, and other torments, to her neighbours and gossips; that hence the story by degrees spread far, gathering strength as it went, and easily obtained credit through the hatred borne to the Carthaginians.

Palmerus might have added, That as some women have imaginations very creative, and as, especially where their passions are concerned, they easily believe the real existence of what mere imagination exhibits, the wife of Regulus might possibly have persuaded herself without any ground, that her husband had lost his life through the hardships of his imprisonment. And this is conformable to the fragment of Diodorus, which says, that she ~~thinking~~ that he had lost his life through neglect, stirred up her sons, &c.

3. A third argument against the story of Regulus's death by torture may be drawn from the disagreement among those who report it, concerning the kind of torture he was made to undergo. Did he perish by being kept from sleep? Was he starved to death? Was he crucified? Or did he end his life in a chest or barrel stuck with spikes? All these are reported by different authors. If it were certain that the Carthaginians put him to death by torture, is it not strange that the kind of torture should not be more certainly known? Florus doubts whether he died by the hardships of his imprisonment, or upon a cross.

4. Where there is any good reason to suspect the evidence to a fact, the improbability arising from the situation of things, makes strongly against the belief of such fact. Now it seems highly improbable, that the Carthaginians should treat Regulus in the manner pretended, at the very time when two of their Generals, and many of their inferior Officers, as well as multitudes of their common Soldiers, were in the hands of the Romans.

5. We may observe, that the Senate's giving up the Carthaginian prisoners to be treated at the discretion of Regulus's sons, upon the news of the cruel death he had suffered, a fact reported by A. Gellius, and which, if true, would be the strongest argument in favour of the common opinion, is absolutely inconsistent with what Diodorus relates of the anger of the Roman magistrates at the conduct of the Attila with regard to the captives.

Thus much concerning the credibility of the story of Regulus's sufferings. Before we take leave of him, let us see Sir Walter Raleigh's judgment of that part of his behaviour, which is supposed to have drawn upon him the Carthaginian resentment, and brought him to so miserable an end. Sir Walter's words are these :

" The death of Attilius Regulus the Consul
" was very memorable. He was sent from " Carthage to Rome about the exchange and " ransom of prisoners on both sides, giving " his faith to return if the business were not " effected. When he came to Rome, and " plainly saw that his country should lose
" by the bargain, so far was he from urg" ing the Senate unto compassion of his own " misery, that he earnestly persuaded to " have the prisoners in Africa left to their " ill destinies. This done, he returned to " Carthage, where for his pains taken he was " rewarded with an horrible death. For this " his constancy and faith all writers highly " extol him. But the Carthaginians seem " to have judged him an obstinate and ma" licious enemy, that neither in his prosper" ity would hearken to reason, nor yet in " his calamity would have the natural care
" to preserve himself and others, by yield" ing to such an office of humanity as is " common in all wars (not grounded upon " deadly hatred) only in regard of some " small advantage. Whatsoever the Car- " thaginians thought of him, sure it is, that " his faithful observance of his word given " cannot be too much commended. But " that grave speech which he made in the " Senate against the exchange of prisoners,
" appears, in all reason, to have proceeded
" from

C H A P. IX.

From the 14th to the 18th year of the war.

The Romans, flushed with their late victory at land, imagine, that, with the assistance of their new fleet, they shall now be able to take Lilybæum, and thereby put an end to the war in Sicily. After considerable progress made in the siege, they are forced to turn it into a blockade: And, not long after, their whole navy is utterly destroyed. More fortunate by land, they take Eryx from the enemy. Amilcar Barcha is sent from Carthage to command the forces of that republic in Sicily.

WHEN the Consuls Attilius and Manlius had got all things ready for their expedition into Sicily, they put to sea with a fleet of 200 sail, and arrived on the coast of Lilybæum, in the neighbourhood of which place their land forces were already assembled.

Y. R. 503.
Bef. Chr.
249.
202d Conf.

It was the strongest, and except Drepanum (about 15 miles from it northward) the only city of importance, which the Carthaginians possessed in the island; and the Romans had therefore resolved to besiege it, as knowing that, could they make this conquest, it would be easy for them afterwards to transport the war into Africa.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 41.

Lilybæum stood almost at the extremity of the cape of the same name, and was surrounded by a strong wall, and a deep ditch, filled with water from the sea. The Romans sat down before it, and having fortified themselves by an entrenchment which ran from sea to sea, made their first approaches against some towers of defence. These they soon beat to the ground; after which they filled up the town ditch, and by their battering engines, and by mining, so weakened the wall in many parts of it, that the besieged began to be extremely terrified; although the garrison, without reckoning the inhabitants, consisted of more than 10,000 men. Himilco, who commanded in the place, performed the part of a gallant and able officer. He repaired the breaches, made countermines, and was in a manner every where present, watching an opportunity to set fire to the enemies wooden towers, and engines of battery; and, in this view, making frequent sallies by night and by day with a boldness little short of temerity; on which occasions the slaughter was sometimes not less than what commonly happens in ranged battles, in the field.

c. 42.
Diod. Sic. in Eclog. p.
879.
Zon. B. 8.

In the mean while, though they were ignorant at Carthage of what passed at Lilybæum, yet concluding that the garrison must be sorely distressed,

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 44.

“ from a vain-glorious Forwardness, rather “ than from any necessity of State. For the “ exchange was made soon after his death;
“ wherein the Romans had the worse bar“ gain, by so much as Regulus himself was “ worth. As for the authority of all His“ torians, that magnify him in this point;

“ we are to consider that they lived under “ the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Cartha- “ ginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise.”

Y. R. 503.
Bell. Cn.
240.
2022 Cn.

they dispatched an officer, named Hannibal, with 10,000 men on board a fleet of 50 gallies to their relief. Hannibal being arrived at the island of Egusa, lying a little off of Lilybaeum, waited there for a favourable and brisk gale, which no sooner presented, but crowding all his sails he came to the entrance of the port, having ranged his soldiers in a fighting posture on the decks of the vessels. The Romans, (whose ships were stationed on each side of the mouth of the haven) partly through surprize, and partly through fear of being forced by the wind into the port with the enemy, made no motion to attack them, but contented themselves to look on and wonder at their harry attempt. Thus Hannibal without any opposition made his way into the haven, where he landed his men, to the great joy of the besieged, who were yet more pleased with the consternation, in which they beheld their enemies, than with the succour they themselves received.

Publ. B. 1.
c. 45.

Himilco observing the alacrity and good dispositions, both of the inhabitants, whose courage was raised by the reinforcement, and of the new comers, who had yet suffered nothing of the hardships incident to a town besieged, resolved now to make a general sally and attempt what he had long meditated, the burning of the enemies towers and engines. The conflict on this occasion was extremely bloody, all the forces on both sides being engaged in it, and fighting with the utmost obstinacy and emulation. In conclusion the Romans happily preserved their works; for at the very instant when they were beginning to despair of it, Himilco, seeing great numbers of his men slain, and his purpose not effected, founded a retreat, and put an end to the fight.

c. 46.

After this action, Hannibal sailing away in the night, went with his fleet to Drepanum, there to consult with Ascherbel, who was his intimate friend, and who commanded in that place for the Carthaginians.

But now the Romans kept Lilybaeum so straitly shut up, and watched the entrance of the haven so narrowly, that nobody durst make an attempt to come out of it. In the mean while they were very impatient at Carthage to have some account of the condition of the besieged; and at length a certain Rhodian, named Hannibal, a man of distinction, undertook to satisfy their desire. Having prepared a light galley expressly for this enterprize, he put to sea from Carthage, (or perhaps from Drepanum) and got under covert of one of those islands lying off of Lilybaeum. Early the next morning, with a fair and fresh gale, passing in view of the enemy, who could not thrust from the shores on either side time enough to stop him, he got by ten o'clock into the Port. The Romans doubted not, but this bold adventurer would soon attempt to return. The Consul therefore, to keep a better guard, posted at the entrance of the Port ten of his nimblest vessels (on each side five) which with their oars displayed like wings kept themselves ready to fly upon the expected prey. The Rhodian nevertheless in broad day light made his passage safely through these guards, and not only so, but, when he was got out to sea, turned about, and, lying upon his oars, with an insulting mockery, challenged any one of them to come and fight him. In this manner he passed and repassed several times, bringing orders and carrying intelligence, to the great encouragement of the besieged, and the amazement of the Romans at so successful a temerity. But the boldness of the Rhodian was founded on his perfect knowledge of the channel, and how to keep clear of the rocks and sand-banks on each side. His success so often repeated, encouraged others, who had the same skill, to follow his example: which the Romans finding to be of very ill consequence, they undertook to choak up intirely the mouth of the haven. For this purpose they filled a great number of round ships (or ships of burden) with huge stones, and sunk them in the channel; but the force of the stream carried the most of these away. However they grounded so many of them in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap, like a ragged island, in the passage. A certain Carthaginian galley coming out of the port in the night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran herself aground upon it, and so fell into the enemies hands. The Romans immediately manned her with chosen soldiers and their best rowers, and then placed her on the watch to catch the Rhodian. He had happily got into the port by night, and was returning in open day, when he found himself chased by a galley that gathered upon him. He soon perceived what she was by her form and her swiftness, and as he was not able to run from her, had no way left but to turn about and fight with her. This he resolutely did, but she being too well manned for him, he was presently taken; after which no more attempts were made to go in or out of the port of Lilybæum.

Y. R. 603.
Bef. Chr.
249.
202d Cons.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 47.

The besieged however were not so disheartened by this disadvantage, as to remit any thing of their attention to a vigorous defence; and though they had lost all hope of destroying the works erected against their fortification, they continued indefatigable in repairing the breaches made in it. And now a favourable accident, when they least expected such good fortune, delivered them at once from the fear of those wooden towers which overtopped their walls, and of all the battering engines of the besiegers. So violent a tempest arose on a sudden, as made the galleries of the Romans totter, and threw some of their towers to the ground. This was thought by some Greek soldiers, in the service of Carthage, an opportunity which ought not to be neglected, to attempt once more the burning of the enemy's works of battery. Having communicated the project to their commanding officer (who both approved it, and prepared every thing necessary for its execution) out they rushed and set fire to the works in three places. The flames spread themselves with great swiftness, by reason of the violence of the wind and the dryness of the timber, the works having been long erected. The Romans, all in confusion and surprize, knew not which way to turn themselves; for they were blinded by the smoke and the sparks of fire which the wind drove in their faces,

c. 48.

Y. R. 503.
 Bef. Chr.
 246.
 2033 Conf.

so that many of them were slain before they could approach the places where help was wanted. On the other hand, the wind favouring the Carthaginians, not only they could see clearly, and so take their aim, but whatever they threw either against the enemy, or against their batteries, was carried with the greater violence to the mark, while the darts of the Romans could take no effect. In a word, the fire became irresistible, and spreading every way, it consumed to ashes all the Roman works, and even melted the brazen heads of their battering rams.

The besiegers by this blow were totally discouraged from the thoughts of renewing their attacks. They turned therefore the siege into a blockade, encompassing the place with a rampart and a ditch, and patiently hoping to obtain by some happy turn of fortune, or by starving the enemy, what they now despaired of carrying by assault.

Polyb. B. 1.
 c. 49.

But when the news came to Rome that great numbers both of the sea and land forces had been lost in fighting to defend the works, and in the other service of the siege, the people were only the more animated by it to pursue the enterprize with vigour, insomuch that 10,000 of them voluntarily offered themselves to go and serve before Lilybæum. Upon the arrival of these troops at the camp, Claudius Pulcher, who was then in the Consulate, (with L. Junius Pulus) and had the command of the forces in Sicily, having called his officers together, proposed to them instantly to embark and sail with all the fleet to Drepanum. To engage their approbation of this project, he represented to them, that Adherbal the Governor of that place had not a sufficient strength to resist them; that he knew nothing of the reinforcement they had received, and would never imagine they could be masters of a naval army, after the losses they had sustained in the siege. The design being generally approved, the seamen, both old and new comers, were ordered forthwith to embark, together with the bravest soldiers of the legions, who readily offered themselves for this expedition, not doubting but they should enrich themselves with the plunder of Drepanum.

Y. R. 504.
 Bef. Chr.
 248.
 2033 Conf.

For this place then the fleet, consisting of 124 gallies, set sail about midnight; and at break of day the headmost of the vessels were descried from the town. Adherbal was at first struck with the unexpected appearance of the enemy, but soon recovering himself, he determined to run any hazard, rather than endure a siege, with which he plainly saw that he was threatened. Instantly he called together, upon the sea shore, all his seamen and soldiers, both those that were on board his gallies and those that were in the town, and set before them in few words how easily they might be victors in a naval battle, if they would but resolve to behave themselves with courage; and, on the other hand, what dreadful calamities (the consequences of a siege) they must unavoidably undergo, if on the present occasion they let themselves be intimidated by the apprehension of danger. The army unanimously declared their readiness to follow him, whithersoever he should please to conduct them.

Hereupon

Hereupon he instantly ordered them all on board, and embarking himself, directed them to keep their eyes on his galley (which should lead the van) and to do as she did. Then putting to sea he brought his fleet out of the port, and hid them behind some rocks which lay on the side of the haven opposite to that by which the Romans were going to enter.

The headmost of the Roman vessels were already entering into the port, other gallies were entering, and others were not far off, when Adherbal, quitting his concealment, appeared on a sudden with his fleet out at sea, and in a posture to give battle. At this sight Claudius, extremely surprized and disappointed, made a sign to his foremost gallies to tack and stand back again; but when those that had entered the port, or were in the haven's mouth, began to hasten back, they encountered with others that were yet standing in, so that falling foul of one another, many of the ships received great damage, and were in danger of perishing. At length, in such manner as they could, they drew out; and as fast as they got clear and obtained room, put themselves in order of battle along the shore, with their prows pointing towards the enemy. Claudius, who had been in the rear of his fleet, now placed himself in the left of his line. He had it once in his power (as some report) to sheer off, but was obstinately bent to try an engagement; insomuch that when the sacred chickens were consulted and refused their meat, he threw them cage and all into the sea; If they wont eat, said he, let them drink, not reflecting that such a contempt of religion might discourage those who were witnesses of it.

In the mean while Adherbal, having with five great vessels passed the left wing of the Romans, turned the prow of his own galley upon the enemy, making a signal for the rest of his fleet, which followed, on the same line, to do the like. And now the whole Carthaginian fleet being drawn up in front, advanced against the Romans, who, as was before said, were drawn up along the shore, a situation than which none could be more dangerous. As soon as the two fleets were near each other, the flags of defiance were hoisted by the two admirals, and the battle began. At first the conflict was equal on both sides, each fleet having on board the hardiest men they could pick out of their land forces. But victory by degrees began to declare for the Carthaginians, who indeed had many advantages above the Romans, by the lightness of their vessels, the expertness of their rowers, and especially by the wise precaution they had taken to have sea room, wherein to work their vessels as occasion required; for at any time when they were pressed by the enemy, they could at pleasure retire, spread themselves, or draw close together, in which movements the lightness of their gallies greatly availed. Moreover when any of the Roman gallies (heavily built and unskilfully managed) chased any of theirs, and thereby separated themselves from their own fleet, those who were chased could tack upon the pursuers, and

Y. R. 504.
Esf. Chr.
248.
203¹ Conf.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 50.

Cic. B. 2.
de Nat.
Deor. Val.
Max. B. 1.

c. 4.
Polyb. B. 1.
c. 50.

c. 51.

Y. R. 574.
 B. 4. C. 10.
 228.
 229. C. 10.

and intercept them, or rowing round them, come upon their flank with their prows and sink them. All these benefits were wanting to the Romans; but their greatest evil was their situation; because when any of their vessels were hard pressed, they could by no means retire for the shore; they must either run aground upon the flats, or bulge against the rocks.

C. 10. 11.
 B. 4. C. 10.

The Consul at length, observing the distress of his fleet, that some were split upon the rocks and others stranded, stood away to the left, and with only thirty vessels that were the nearest to him, escaped out of the battle. The rest, to the number of ninety three, fell into the enemies hands, together with all the men, except a few soldiers who had got ashore, after their vessels were run aground or broken to pieces. Eight thousand of the Romans are said to have been slain, and 20,000 taken prisoners.

F. 1. B. 1.
 C. 10.

This was a glorious action for Alberbal, to whom the Cartaginians did very great honour, ascribing the success to his sole virtue and bravery; while on the other hand, Claudius was recalled to Rome, where he was reproached with his shameful defeat, and with the loss his country had sustained, as entirely owing to his folly and temerity. Nevertheless when he was ordered to name a Dictator, he, to insult the senate, nominated to that supreme dignity one Claudius Glycia, a mean fellow who had been his viator or tipstaff: but this mock dictator^c did not hold the place: M. Atilius Calatinus was substituted in his room. After which the Consul now deposed was brought to a formal trial for his misconduct, and was loaded with a rigorous sentence.

S. 1. 1. 1.
 C. 10. 11.
 228. C. 10.

F. 1. B. 1.
 C. 10.

As for the other Consul, Junius Pullus, he had been dispatched over to Sicily with order to supply the camp before Lilybæum with provisions and all necessary stores; for the safe convoy of which, he had a squadron of 60 gallies. Being arrived at Messina, he there augmented his fleet with what ships had been sent thither from Lilybæum, and from other places in the island, and then set sail for Syracuse; his whole fleet now consisting of 120 ships of war and 800 storeships. From Syracuse he dispatched his Quæstors with one half of his vessels of burthen, and some of his gallies, that they might without delay furnish the camp with necessaries, while he himself staid at this port, waiting the arrival of that part of his fleet which had not been able to keep him company, and was not yet come up, as also to receive the corn which the Islanders, in the alliance of Rome, had provided for him.

C. 10. 11.

About this time Alberbal, studious to make the best advantage of his victory, and having sent away to Carthage, the ships and the prisoners taken in the battle, delivered 30 of his gallies to Carthalo, who had already under his own command 70, with which he was lately arrived, and sent him to try what mischief might be done to the Roman fleet in the harbour of Lilybæum. Carthalo suddenly entered the mouth of the haven, and finding the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged,

^c According to Liv. Epit. he was suffered afterwards to wear the prætexta at the publick shows.

than

than to the defence of their fleet, without difficulty seized and towed away some of the galleys and set fire to others. The Roman camp took the alarm, and the soldiers hastened to the rescue: but Himilco governor of the town sallying out at the same time, and putting the Romans in great distress, gave Corbalo leisure to go through with his enterprize. After this exploit the Carthaginian ran all along the south coast of Sicily, with a view to obstruct, what in him lay, the succours that were coming to the Roman army. And receiving advice by his scouts, that a great fleet of all sorts of vessels was approaching, and was not far off, he advanced with much joy to encounter them; for both he and his men were full of courage by reason of their late victories. The fleet which had been descried was that under the conduct of the Roman Quæstors; who when they got notice that the Carthaginians were at hand, not conceiving themselves of sufficient strength to hazard an engagement, presently made for the coast, and drew up their vessels under covert of a poor town belonging to their party. Here was indeed no safe harbour, yet they found some sort of shelter in certain coves, and small retreats among the rocks; and the town having furnished them with engines for casting stones and shooting arrows, they waited here, in a posture of defence, the attack of the enemy. But Corbalo knowing that they could not long ride under those rocks, but would be forced by any great change of wind either to put out into the deep, or to abandon their ships in order to save the men, he, after he had taken some few of their vessels, would not pursue the assault any further, but retired into the mouth of a neighbouring river, and there lay waiting for an opportunity to seize the rest, without hazard to himself.

Y. R. 5. 4.
Euf. C. 1. r.
2. 8.
20 3d Conf.

In the mean while the Consul Junius, having dispatched those affairs which had detained him at Syracuse, departed thence, and doubling the cape of Pachynus, shaped his course for Lilybæum, totally ignorant of what had happened to his Quæstors. The Carthaginians perceived his approach, and quitting their station sailed away to attack him before he could join the other part of his fleet. Junius was yet a great way off when he first descried the enemy; yet finding himself too near to fly, and too weak to fight, he also, like his Quæstors, ran in close on a part of the coast that was quite harbourless and full of rocks, imagining no danger so great as that of the enemy. Corbalo did not care to attack him in a place where it was difficult to work a ship with safety; he betook himself therefore to a station between the two fleets, and there watched to see which of them would first stir, resolving to assault that which should first dare to put out to sea. Thus all the three fleets were on the south coast of Sicily, between the cape of Pachynus and Lilybæum, a tract exceedingly dangerous when the wind stormed at south. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest and their signs, and who now perhaps observed some swelling billow, or some other such like indication of an approaching storm, immediately weighed anchor, and made all haste to double the cape of Pachynus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage they

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 54.

Y. R. 504.
E. C. 23.
2 S.
203 Conf.

they feared. This, though with great difficulty, they effected, and secured their ships. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to navigate, remaining exposed on that rocky coast, were so terribly assaulted by a boisterous south-wind, that not a single ship of either fleet escaped being dashed to pieces.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 55.

In this manner was Rome once more deprived of all her naval force; and, thus deprived, she renounced once more the empire of the seas.

Notwithstanding all these disasters the Romans were still superior to their enemies by land, and though driven to hard shifts for provisions, they continued the blockade of Lilybæum, firmly fixed to abide the utmost extremity rather than abandon their enterprize. As for the Consul Junius, who had not lost his men when his ships were destroyed, he repaired with all expedition to the camp, full of anxious thoughts, how to retrieve his honour, by some remarkable service. Between Panormus and Drepanum, on the side of a mountain, the highest in all Sicily, except Ætna, stood the city of Eryx; and on the top of the mountain was the temple of *Venus Erycina, the fairest and richest temple in the whole island. Junius formed a design upon these, and, being assisted by the treason of some of those who had been appointed to defend them, got possession of them by surprize. The city was difficult of access, the only way to it being steep and narrow; and the Consul, the better to secure his conquest, built a fort at the entrance of the passage to it, where he placed a garrison of 800 men. He also posted another body of men on the top of the mountain, not doubting but by these precautions he should keep quiet possession both of the city, and of the whole mountain.

Zon. B. 8.

Zonaras reports, that Junius, after this, was taken prisoner by Carthago; but Cicero and Val. Maximus tell us that he killed himself to avoid an ignominious sentence at Rome, for his losing the fleet.

Upon the death or disgrace of the two Consuls, the Dictator Calatinus passed into Sicily to command the army, the first instance of a Roman Dictator appearing out of Italy. He performed no exploit.

Y. R. 505.

In the following year^a nothing very memorable was done by either party. Zonaras relates, that Carthago, to draw one of the Consuls out of the island, made a descent on the Italian coast, but without success: for hearing that the Prætor of Rome at the head of an army was advancing against him, he presently reembarked and returned to Sicily. Here his troops (whom he had not been able to satisfy with the plunder of the Roman territories) began to murmur for want of their pay. To put a stop to the mutiny he punished the most clamorous with rigour; but this exasperating even those who were more peaceably inclined, a general sedition would probably have ensued, to the ruin of the Carthaginian cause,

* It does not appear at what time the Carthaginians made themselves masters of these places; it was probably after the defeat of Claudius Pulcher; for according to Polybius they had nothing in the island but Drepanum and Lilybæum at the time when the latter was first besieged by the Romans.

^b C. Aurelius Cotta,
P. Servilius Geminus, } Consuls.

if he had not been seasonably recalled, and a captain of much greater credit and abilities appointed to succeed him. This was Amilcar Barcha, the father of the famous Hannibal.

Y. R. 505.
Bef. Chr.
247.
204 Cont.

C H A P. X.

From the 18th year of the war to the end of it, in the 23d or 24th year after its commencement.

Amilcar Barcha, by his masterly conduct, hinders the Romans, during five years, from making any progress in the conquest of Sicily. They at length provide themselves, once more, with a naval force as the only means to accomplish their enterprize; and this new fleet, under the conduct of Lutatius Catulus, obtaining a complete victory over the fleet of Carthage, (commanded by Hanno) the Carthaginians are constrained to yield to their enemies the whole island, by a treaty of peace.

IT was in the eighteenth year of the war, that Amilcar Barcha became commander in chief of the Carthaginian forces by sea and land. Having quieted the discontents of the army, he began his expeditions by sailing with the fleet to the coast of Italy; where making a descent he pillaged and laid waste the territories of the Locrians and Bruttians. After this he landed his troops in Sicily; and, because the Carthaginians were not masters there of any walled town so situated, as he could from thence infest the Romans, he took possession of a commodious piece of ground near the sea coast, between Panormus and Eryx. It was a mountain invironed on all sides with rocks and precipices, and on the top of it was a plain of at least twelve miles in compass, the ground yielding both good pasture and good corn. To this mountain the avenues were only three, one from the sea, and two from the land; and being by nature strait and difficult, it required but little fortification to secure them.

Plin., B.
l. c. 56.
Y. R. 505.

Here^b then the brave Amilcar encamped his forces to confront as well those of the enemy, who were in Panormus, as those who were posted about Eryx, putting himself between the two armies with admirable resolution. And though he was thus in the midst of his enemies, and had no ally from whom he could hope for succour, he nevertheless gave the Romans great and frequent alarms, obliging them to a constant exercise of all their courage, vigilance and severest discipline. For, as the place he was in had the command of a port^c, he made use of the opportunity, with which ^b Chevr. Falar understands the words of Polybius to mean that Amilcar posted himself in the avenue from the sea to the mountain.

VOL. II.

^c Frontinus (in lib. 3. Strat.) reports, that Amilcar, in order to supply Lilybæum with provisions, made use of a stratagem to draw the

Y. R. 506.
P. C. 1.
P. C. 1.
P. C. 1.

P. C. 1.
P. C. 1.

which this furnished him, to scour all the coast of Italy with his fleet, as far as to the territory of Cambræ: and, when afterwards in Sicily, the Romans had brought their camp within five furlongs of his army, on the side towards Pactolus, he gave them battle so often, and had such variety of encounters with them, that as Taliesin tells us it would be scarce possible to relate all the particular actions. We must judge, says he, of this war, as we do of a combat between two strong and vigorous gladiators, who in close conflict have been incessantly giving and receiving wounds. Neither the spectators nor the combatants themselves would be able to recount every point and every stroke, and to say how and why they were made: but we judge of the skill, strength, and resolution of the parties, by their perseverance in maintaining the fight, and by the event. So with regard to the war in question, a minute detail of the various stratagems, surprizes, advances, attacks, which were daily practised on both sides, would be very difficult to an historian, and not very useful to the reader. A general relation of what was performed, with the success of the whole, will suffice to make us know the worth and abilities of the commanders.

In a word then, no stratagem which could be learnt from history, no new one which present circumstances and opportunity could suggest, none that required even the utmost hardiness and impetuosity to execute it, was neglected: and yet, all this while, nothing decisive was done. The strength on both sides being equal, the camps impregnable, and the space between them very small, it hence came to pass that there were every day skirmishes and encounters between parties, but a general action never. For in all the engagements, so soon as one party found themselves hard pressed by the other, the weaker instantly threw themselves behind their entrenchments, where they knew they had a secure shelter; and from whence they presently returned to the charge.

c. 33.

In this manner was the war carried on for almost three years^d; till at length (as our author speaks) Fortune, who presided as an impartial umpire at this contention, transported the combatants to another theatre, where the Roman fleet out of the harbour. But according to Polybius, the Romans had no fleet at this time, or if any, none that was able to contend with Amilcar, and oblige him to have recourse to stratagem.

† A. Gell.
B. 10. ch.
6. Val.
Max. B. 5.
ch. 1.
Suet. in. Life
of Tib.
Liv. Epit.
B. 19.

Polybius tells us, that the Romans abstained from all naval preparations for five years. And therefore when Florus speaks of a battle gained at sea by the Romans during this time, it seems to be a tale without foundation.

† Y. of R. 506. { L. Cæcilius Metellus,
2d time.
N. Fabius Butco.

Y. of R. 507. { M. Otacilius Crassus,
2d time.
M. Fabius Licinius.
Y. of R. 508. { N. Fabius Butco.
C. Atilius Balbus.

|| In the year 507 there happened at Rome an accident, which serves to shew how much it behoved even persons of the highest rank to avoid all petulance of speech, and not by any indecent words to violate the dignity of Rome disgrace. Claudia, the daughter of the famous Claudius the Blind; and sister to that Claudius Pulcher, who lost the battle of Drepanum, wherein many thousand where shutting them up in yet closer lists they were engaged in a more perilous conflict.

The Romans (as has been before observed) had placed garrisons on the top and at the bottom of mount Eryx. Amilcar nevertheless found a way, lying towards the sea, by which he conveyed his men (before the enemy had the least notice of it) into the city of Eryx, that was about the middle of the ascent. By this means the Romans, who held the top of the mountain, were in a manner besieged, and it is wonderful with what resolution and constancy they sustained all the hardships to which their situation exposed them: but it is yet more wonderful, that the Carthaginians should be able to defend themselves, when hard pressed by the enemy both from above and from below, and when deprived of all means of subsistence, except by one avenue from the sea. And here again on this new stage of action were exerted, on both sides, all the art and vigour that can possibly be conceived, in an infinite variety of stratagems and assaults. Nor was an end put to this fierce struggle (as the historian Fabius falsely reported) by the failure of strength in the contending parties, exhausted by the sufferings they underwent; for they sustained famine, fatigue, and all the hardships incident to sieges, with so unwearied a fortitude, that they scarcely seemed to feel them: but a conclusion was given to the war after a different manner, and before either party in Sicily had gained any superiority over the other. Polybius compares the rival powers to two valiant birds, that, weakened by a long combat, and unable any more to make use of their wings in the fight, yet support themselves by their sole courage, and with joint consent coming close together, peck and maul each other with their bills, thus mutually striving by these last efforts to obtain the victory.

Two whole years were wasted by the Romans, in fruitless attempts to dislodge the invincible Amilcar from Eryx. And now the Senate of Rome, who had hoped every thing from the bravery of their land forces, became perfectly convinced that they should never atchieve the conquest of Sicily without the help of a naval strength. If, by means of a fleet, they could once get the mastery of the sea, it would then be impossible for the Carthaginian General to hold out much longer, because his supplies of provision would be totally obstructed. But where to find money at this time for a naval armament of sufficient strength, was a difficulty

*Polyb. B. 1.
c. 59.*

thousand Romans perished, returning in her chariot from the public show, happened to be stopped in her way by the multitude that thronged the street. The Lady proud and impatient, cried out, Gods, how this city is over-crowded! I wish my brother Claudius would arise again, and had the command of another Fleet! These words, even from a woman, were thought unpardonable. She was brought into judgment for them by the Ædiles, before the Tribes, and was there fined 25,000 asses of brass, [80*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* Arbutnact.]

‘ Y. of R. 509. { A. Manlius Torquatus.
 C. Sempronius Blæsus,
 2d time.
Y. of R. 510. { C. Fundanius.
 C. Sulpicius.

I 2

that

that seemed not easy to be surmounted; for the expence would be great, and the public treasury was exhausted. On this pressing occasion the richest of the citizens shewed a laudable zeal for their country's service. They built each of them a Quinqueremis at his own cost; and this example had so good an effect, that those, who were not able singly to do the like, yet concurring, two or three of them fitted out a galley at their joint expence. In short, a fleet of 200ⁱ Quinqueremes was thus put to sea by private citizens, who required no other condition, but to be reimbursed when the state of the public affairs would allow of it. And this armament was vastly better than any of the former, in as much as all the new galleys were built upon the model of that light vessel, which had been taken from Hannibal the Rhesian.

Y. R. 512.
B. 2. C. 2.
221.
210 C. 25.

Liv. Ep. 2.
B. 12.

The Consuls chosen for the new year were C. Lutatius Catulus, and A. Posthumius. The latter being at the same time High-Priest of Mars, the Pontifex Maximus declared it unlawful for him to abandon his priestly functions; nay, he absolutely forbade it, accompanying his prohibition with threats, and Posthumius was obliged to submit. But this religious scruple occasioned the creation of a new magistracy in the republic. The senate and people, not thinking it advisable to trust the command of their army to one general alone, nor yet to expose themselves to the inconveniences which might arise from the too long absence of the Prætor of Rome, to whom it naturally fell to supply the place of Posthumius in the field, they created a second Prætor for that purpose. This officer they stiled Prætor Peregrinus; and he was not only to assist the general abroad, but to judge or appoint judges in all civil causes between Roman citizens and strangers. The former Prætor took the title of Prætor Urbanus; and it was now regulated, that his residence should be at Rome, and his jurisdiction confined to the cognizance of causes between Roman citizens only. It was also decreed, that the persons who were to fill these offices should be chosen annually in the comitia by centuries, but their different provinces be determined by lot.

Or. 6 B. 4.
C. 10.

Polih. B.
1. c. 59.

Valerius Falto, the first Prætor Peregrinus, embarked with the Consul Lutatius, on board the new fleet for Sicily. They began the campaign with the siege of Drepanum, and they very soon made a breach in the wall; nevertheless they did not carry the place; for as the Consul at the head of his men was mounting to the assault, he received a dangerous wound in his thigh; whereupon the soldiers quitted the enterprize, to take care of their general, whom they carried back to the camp. After this the siege was discontinued; for Lutatius being persuaded, that the Cartaginians would soon appear with a fleet upon the coast, and that a victory over them at sea, would contribute much more than any other exploit towards the entire conquest of Sicily, turned all his thoughts to discipline his men, and prepare them for a naval engagement.

ⁱ Three hundred, according to Lactantius, B. 2. c. 27.

The Carthaginians greatly surprized at the news of a Roman navy at sea, had dispatched away a ^b fleet, with all expedition, under the conduct of an eminent commander named Hanno; of whose character, because of the share he will have in several important events of this history, it may not be improper to give some features: An able pen, on the present occasion, has thus described him.

Y. R. 511.
Bef. Chr.
241.
210 Conf.

Polyb. B. 1.
c. 60.

“ —A man wise in picture, exceedingly formal, and skilful in the art “ of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I do not find,
“ but it was upheld by a factious contradiction of things undertaken by “ men more worthy than himself. This quality procured to him (as it “ has done to many others) not only approbation among the antient sort, “ whose cold temper is averse from new enterprizes, but an opinion of “ great foresight, opinion confirmed by every loss received. More par“ ticularly he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the “ most grievous oppressors of their subject provinces; whereby he procu“ red unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithal such hatred,
“ as turned it all to their great loss. He had before this been employed “ against the Numidians, and wild Africans, who, in making war, were “ more like rovers than soldiers. Of those fugitive nations he learned to “ neglect more manly enemies, to his own great dishonour, and to the “ great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct than
“ by his malicious counsel, when having shewed himself an unworthy cap“ tain, he betook himself to the long robe. Yet is he much commended “ in Roman histories as a temperate man, and one that studied how to “ preserve the league between Rome and Carthage: In which regard how “ well he deserved of his own country, it will appear hereafter; how be“ neficial he was to Rome, it will appear hereafter, and in his present “ voyage, wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of “ accepting, upon hard conditions, that P E A C E, which he thenceforth “ commended ^c.”

Sir W. R.

Hanno had well furnished his navy with all necessary provisions for the soldiers at Eryx (for dexterity in making such preparations, was the best

^b Of 400 sail, according to Eutropius.

^c It is proper to inform the reader, that though Sir W. R. is here followed, in supposing that the Hanno, who now commanded the Carthaginian fleet, was the same with that Hanno, who afterwards headed the faction against Amilcar Barca and his son Hannibal, there is some reason to doubt it. Polybius, indeed, says nothing from which we can infer, that they were different persons; and the importance of the present expedition makes it probable, that the Carthaginians would not commit the charge of it, but to a man in the highest reputation and esteem, as he, whom Sir W. R. charac-

terises, was at this time. Yet by some words which Livy (as we shall see hereafter) puts into the mouth of that Hanno, who signalized himself by his opposition to Hannibal's measures, one would think that the speaker could not be the person who lost the battle at sea against Lutatius. For the historian makes the enemy of Hannibal, on two several occasions, remind the Carthaginians of that shameful and fatal overthrow, as an event which they ought never to forget.

And if we may believe Zonaras, the Hanno who suffered the defeat at the Ægates, was crucified at his return home for his misconduct.

Y. B. 111.
L. 111.
111.
111.
111.
111.
111.
111.
111.
111.

of his qualities) but he had neglected to man his galleys with able mariners, trained to the practice of sea fights; he had taken the first that presented themselves; and his soldiers were raw men that knew nothing of service. He had been careless in these matters, through a foolish contempt of his enemies; not remembering that it was the resistless force of tempests, rather than any other strength of opposition, which had made them forsake the seas. Yet in one thing he judged right, or at least had been well instructed; for his intention was, first of all to sail to Egæ, and there to discharge his ships of their loading, and when he had thus lightened them, to take on board the choice of the land-forces together with Amilcar himself; and then to offer the enemy battle. This was an excellent course if it could have been performed. But the Consul Lutatius, who, on the first notice of Hanno's being at sea, had sailed from Drepanum to the island of Ægæa, (one of the *Ægates) used all possible diligence to prevent the execution of the enemies design; not that he was informed of their design, but that he knew it was, for them, the best which they could have, and because he feared no danger so greatly as an encounter with Amilcar. For these reasons, though he was not yet cured of his wound, and though the weather was very rough, and the seas went high, when, the next morning he descried the Carthaginian fleet, coming with a flown sheet from the island of Hiera†, (where they had put in, he chose rather to fight with the enemy, who had the wind of him, than upon unlikely hope of better opportunity, to suffer their convoy to pass to Egæ.

§ 61.

All that Hanno should have done, Lutatius had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in rowing; he had lightened his galleys of all unnecessary burthens, and he had taken on board the best men of his land-forces. The Carthaginians therefore, at the very first encounter, were utterly broken and defeated: Fifty of their galleys were sunk and seventy taken, the rest by a sudden change of wind escaping to the island of Hiera. The Consul after the battle stood away with the fleet for Lilybæum, there to dispose of his prizes and prisoners; of which latter the number amounted to near ten thousand.

When, at Carthage, they received the news of Hanno's defeat, so contrary to all expectation, they were greatly at a loss what measures to take. If, to have their revenge, nothing had been necessary but courage and emulation, they were never better provided than at this juncture, to prosecute the war. But what could they do? Amilcar, on whose valour and judgment the honour and safety of the commonwealth depended, was surrounded by his enemies, and could not be relieved. For as the Romans were now masters of the sea, it was not possible for the Carthaginians to send either provisions or reinforcements to their armies in Sicily. In this extremity they could fix upon nothing better than to send by an express fell powers to the General himself, to take what course he should think most proper; and this they did, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsel.

* Islands lying off of Lilybæum and Drepanum.

† Another of the Ægates.

Y. R. 511.
L. A. Chr.
271.
210 C. 56.

Amilcar, who had done every thing that could be expected from the most intrepid courage, and the most consummate wisdom, and whom no adversity, accompanied with the least hope or possibility of recovery, had ever vanquished, but who yet knew when to yield as well as when to resist, began now to turn his thoughts wholly to the preservation of the army under his conduct; for he plainly saw, that Sicily was lost. He dispatched therefore an Ambassador to the Consul, with an overture of peace. Lutatius, having well considered it, gathered so many arguments from the present poverty of the Roman state, exhausted beyond expectation by the war, that he readily listened to the proposal. At first he demanded, that Amilcar and his soldiers should deliver up their arms; but this the Carthaginian absolutely refused, declaring that he would rather perish than undergo so great an infamy; and the Consul acquiesced. In short, a treaty was concluded on terms to this effect.

Corn. Nep.
in Amilc.
c. 1.

“ There shall be peace between Rome and Carthage (provided the Roman people approve of it) on the following conditions.

Polyb. B.
1. c. 62.

“ The Carthaginians shall evacuate all Sicily.

“ They shall deliver up all the Roman prisoners ransom free.

“ They shall pay to the Romans, within the space of twenty years next following, 2200^b talents of silver, whereof one thousand shall be paid immediately.

“ They shall not make war upon King Hiero, nor upon any of the allies of Rome; nor shall the Romans molest any of the allies of Carthage.

“ Neither of the contracting powers shall raise any fortrefs, or levy any soldiers in the dominions of the other.

“ Nor shall either of them enter into confederacy with the allies of the other.”

These articles being brought to Rome, and not being entirely approved there, ten commissioners were sent into Sicily to terminate the affair. These added 1000 talents to the former sum, and shortened the time for payment to ten years; and they also required, that the Carthaginians should not only leave Sicily, but withdraw their troops from all the Islands between Sicily and Italy. Amilcar not thinking it advisable to break off the negotiation for the sake of these new demands, the treaty was ratified in form: but (probably) not in the Consulate of Caius Lutatius, but of his successors Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius in the year of Rome 512.

c. 63.

Livy, B.
30. c. 41.
Y. R. 512.

Such was the end of the First Punic War, after it had lasted 23^c or 24

^b 437250*l.* Arbutnot.

^c Polybius makes this war to have lasted

24 years, and so do others: But Eutropius puts a conclusion to it in the 23d year; which

Y. R. 512.
B. 1. C. 6.
240.
211 Consul

P. 1. C. B.
1. C. 64

24 years: A war (says Polybius) the longest, the least interrupted, and the greatest (that is, the most abounding with great actions and events) of any to be met with in history. The Romans in the course of it lost 700 ships of war, and the Carthaginians about 500^b; the greatness of which losses sufficiently prove the greatness of the two states, and of the war itself, wherein (according to the same author) the Romans in general shewed themselves the braver nation, and Amilcar the ablest Captain.

S. 1. C. 11.

AND now the great affair at Rome was to determine the fate of Sicily, the manner in which it should be governed, and the emoluments which the republic should draw from so fine a conquest. The whole island, excepting the little kingdom of Syracuse, was declared a Roman Province, that is to say, a province that should be ruled by Roman laws and Roman magistrates. A Prætor was to be annually sent thither to be its Governor; and a Quæstor to take charge of the revenues. These revenues were either fixed or casual. The fixed were called tributes, and were a certain sum, which the province was obliged every year to pay into the publick treasury. The casual were the tenths of the product of the lands, and the duties upon merchandize exported and imported. And these tenths and customs were generally farmed by the publicans^c.

Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 8.

Caius Lutatius the Consul, and Q. Valerius the Prætor, had both of them the honour of the triumph at their return to Rome. The Consul indeed disputed the pretensions of the latter to it, because Valerius had not acted in a post of equal authority with him; and upon a reference to which reckoning agrees with the Capitoline Marbles, since, according to them, Appius Claudius Caudex, who began the war, was Consul in the year 489, and C. Lutatius Catulus, who made the treaty with Amilcar, was Consul in 511.

Livy, towards the close of his 30th book, says, the First Punic War ended when Q. Lutatius and A. Manius were Consuls. These were the successors of C. Lutatius; and perhaps their Consulate was begun when the ten commissioners came into Sicily and the peace was ratified.

^b How came it to pass, that in Polybius's time, when the Romans were arrived at almost universal empire, they could not build such fleets, and make such naval preparations, as in the time of the first Punic War? This question is on the present occasion started by Polybius himself; who adds, that a plain and satisfactory reason may be assigned for the change, but defers giving it, till he shall come to speak of the form of the Roman commonwealth. His discourse on this latter subject not being transmitted to us, we are at a loss to know how the difficulty may be resolved.

^c Among the advantages which Rome gained from her wars in Sicily, may be reckoned an improvement of her taste for letters, and juster notions of poetry. Sicily abounded with excellent poets. In the first year after her peaceable possession of this island, when C. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls, appeared L. Livius Andronicus, the reformer of the Latin theatre. He introduced upon the stage connected fables after the Greek manner, instead of the buffooneries, and rambling discourses, with which the people were before entertained.

About this time was born at Rades, a city of Calabria, Ennius, the famous poet and historian. He was the inventor of Hexameter verses among the Latins; but his Life of Scipio Africanus, which was his master-piece, he wrote in Choraicks. He is thought to have eclipsed the poet Nævius, his contemporary.

the

the arbitration of Atilius Calatinus, the point was decided against the Prætor; nevertheless, as his conduct in the war had been uncommonly meritorious, he obtained his suit by a decree of the people.

Y. R. 512.
Bef. Chr.
240.
211 Conf.

But the public joy at Rome, for the late important conquest, was greatly damped by two misfortunes, which about this time followed close upon one another. The Tiber on a sudden overflowed with such violence, as to overturn a great number of houses in the lower grounds; where the water continuing a considerable time, it much damaged also the foundations of many others.

After this there happened a greater calamity by fire, which breaking out in the night destroyed not only numberless houses, but an incredible multitude of people. It consumed all the buildings within the circumference of the forum. Cæcilius Metellus the Pontifex Maximus signalized his pious zeal on this occasion: For when the fire had seized the temple of Vesta, and when the Virgins in a fright had all deserted it, he ventured his life to save the Palladium: Making his way through the flames, he brought it safely out of the sanctuary. One of his arms was much hurt in the attempt, and he entirely lost his sight. To reward so heroic an action of piety, it was decreed by the people, that he should have the privilege of being carried to the senate house in a chariot, as often as he went thither; a distinction which had never been granted to any man before.

Val. Max.
B. 1. c. 4.

It is probable that the Roman tribes (by the addition of those called Velina and Quirina) were about this time augmented to 35, which number was never after increased.

Liv. Epit.
B. 19.

C H A P. XI.

The Falisci in Hetruria rebel against the Romans, but are quelled in a few days. Carthage is reduced to great extremities in a war, which for more than three years is carried on against her by her foreign mercenaries, in conjunction with her African subjects. The conduct of the Romans on this occasion.

THE peace between Rome and Carthage was hardly ratified, when both these states found themselves on a sudden engaged in new and unexpected wars at home, by the rebellion of their own subjects.

Polyb. B.
1. c. 65.

The Falisci in Hetruria, through some unaccountable levity or madness, rose up in arms, and declared war against the Roman power. This intestine commotion caused a great alarm and terror throughout all Italy; and it occasioned no less wonder, by the speedy issue to which it was brought. The Consuls Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius, at the head of the legions, are said to have quelled the rebels in six days. Two battles were fought. In the first, the success was doubtful; but in the second, the Romans obtained a complete victory. The Falisci having lost 15,000 men in the action, humbly submitted themselves, and sued for peace. They were despoiled of their arms, horses, household-goods, slaves, and

Y. R. 512.
Eutrop. B.
2. Liv. Ep.
B. 19. Zonaras.

Y. R. 512.
Bef. Chr.
240.
211 Conf.

half their territory. Their city, strongly situated in a steep craggy place, was ordered to be demolished; and the inhabitants to build a new one for themselves in the flat open country. Nay, the people of Rome were meditating a more severe revenge against a nation that had so often rebelled; but they restrained their wrath by the advice of a venerable Roman named Papirius, whom the Consuls had employed to draw up in writing the form of the rebels surrendry. He represented to the multitude, that the Falisci had yielded themselves, not to the power but the faith or honour, of the Romans^b; and this sacred name of public faith had such a prevalency on the minds of the people, that they readily acquiesced in what had been agreed upon.

CARTHAGE, not so fortunate as Rome, had a much longer and more dangerous conflict to sustain at the very gates of the capital.

The avarice of a republic of merchants, who better understood the value of money, than the merit of brave soldiers, was the source of this intestine mischief. They would needs persuade those foreign troops, who had fought so gallantly under Amilcar in Sicily, and had endured so steadily all the hardships of war, in the defence of a state, to which they had no tie but their wages; they would needs, I say, persuade these strangers to remit, out of affection to that state, some part of what was due to them from it, by compact, for their services: whereas in truth they ought rather to have rewarded them with rich gratuities beyond their stipulated pay. In the pursuit of this penurious project they fell into strange imprudences. It could not be well imagined, that a proposal to foreign mercenaries, to contribute out of their pay to the expences of the war, would be very cheerfully received or easily digested. Nevertheless, that they might hear the grave oratory of Hanno on this head, the Carthaginians suffered these strangers, amounting to 20,000 men, to assemble all in one place, in the neighbourhood of the capital; and this at a time, when Carthage had not, on foot, a sufficient body of her own people to resist such an army in case of a mutiny. And they committed a yet greater mistake, as Polybius observes, in constraining the soldiers to take with them from the city, to the place of rendezvous, their wives and children; because these, had they remained in Carthage, would have served as hostages for the good behaviour of the fathers and husbands.

In a word, the rhetoric of Hanno had no effect but to kindle the highest resentment. The mercenaries turned their arms with fury against their late masters; the African subjects of Carthage, easily drawn into rebellion, because greatly oppressed, took this opportunity to attempt the recovery of their freedom; and the Numidians, the old enemies of the republic, and greedy of her destruction, joined their forces to the rebels.

^b Faliscos non potestati, sed fidei se Romanorum commisisse. Val. Max. B. 6. ch. 5.

In this war†, which lasted three years and almost four months, it was not with the Carthaginians, as in former times, when they fought for glory, or to give a wider extent to their empire; it was no sportive enterprize of ambition; all was at stake; the very being of their government, their estates, their lives, were all in the utmost peril, from the desperate fury and close attacks of the most cruel and implacable enemies they had ever contended with. Amilcar saved his country. Superior by his skill and courage, not only to the impetuous force of multitudes, but to the cautious bravery of an army, which he himself had trained, and disciplined, it was through his abilities, that his republic remained victorious in the conclusion of this inexpiable war; a war that was never to be ended but by the total destruction of one of the contending parties.

Y. R. 512.
Bef. Chr.
240.
211 Conf.

The African War, or War of the Carthaginians with their Mercenaries.

† This war being a very curious part of history, and serving greatly to give us a more perfect knowledge of the character of that Rival State, whose destruction alone could establish the Roman greatness, it may neither be unseasonable, nor disagreeable to the reader, if the substance of Polybius's account of it be here inserted.

‘ WHEN Amilcar had finished the treaty, which put an end to the ‘ First Punic War, he led his troops from Eryx to Lilybaeum, and ‘ there committed to Gisco (Governor of the place) the care of transport‘ ing them into Africa. Gisco, as foreseeing what might happen, acted in ‘ this affair with great caution. For, instead of embarking the forces all ‘ at once, he shipped them off successively, and in small parties, allotting ‘ so much time between the embarkations, as might suffice for his pru‘ dent purpose; which was, that those who were first sent might be paid ‘ off and dismissed to their own countries, before the others should arrive.
‘ The Carthaginians, however, whose treasury was much exhausted, did ‘ not correspond to the intention of Gisco, but hoping they should be ‘ able to obtain from the whole army, when assembled, a remission of ‘ some part of what was due to them, detained at Carthage the several di‘ visions as they came.’

Polyb. B.
1. c. 66, &
seq. and Sir
W. R. B. 5.
ch. 2.

Polybius does not assign any reason, nor does any reason readily occur, why it should have seemed more easy to obtain this remission from the whole army together, than from the parts when disjoined. “ One would “ think, (as a judicious historian * observes) that to persuade any small “ number of men, lodged in so great a city as Carthage, to have some “ consideration of the distress and poverty of the state, would have been “ no hard matter; and if the first comers had been thus persuaded, and “ had been friendly discharged, it would have left a good precedent to

* Sir W. R.

“ the second and third, whilst their disjunction had made them unable “ to recover their whole due by force.” Perhaps the best conjecture towards accounting for the conduct of the Carthaginians in this particular, is, That they had really no intention to disband these troops, and yet were unwilling, for good reasons, to let their design of keeping them on foot be known, before they were all safely arrived in Africa. And though avarice had determined the senate to try whether the soldiers could be persuaded to remit some part of what was due to them, there was no design to refuse them their full payment in case they insisted upon it. They never dreamt that the bare proposal of such a remission as they desired would have the sudden and fatal consequences, which it had.

Prob. L. 3.
 9.

Com. Nep.
 Amilc. c. 1.

That the leading men at Carthage had resolved to continue these troops in the service, may, I think, be fairly collected from Polybius, who assures us that Amilcar left Sicily with firm resolution to renew the war against Rome without delay; and that he would have executed his purpose, if it had not been hindered by the revolt of the mercenaries. Now is it in the least probable, that the Carthaginian General, with this project of speedy revenge at his heart, would consent to break a veteran army, which he himself had disciplined, legions animated with the same spirit as himself?

‘ Be this as it will, the Carthaginians did not follow the scheme of Gisco.
 ‘ They detained the first and second comers, telling them, that they ‘ would make a fair reckoning with all together. Thus every day the ‘ number increased, and many disorders (incident among soldiers) were ‘ committed, which much disquieted the city, not accustomed to the like.
 ‘ It was thought fit therefore to remove them all to some other place, ‘ where they might be less troublesome; and Sicca, a little town at no ‘ great distance, being pitched upon for this rendezvous, the officers ‘ were civilly requested to conduct all their men thither, who, while they ‘ there waited the coming of their fellow soldiers from Sicily, should re‘ ceive, each of them, a piece of gold to bear his charges.

‘ This motion was accepted, and the soldiers began to dislodge; leav‘ ing behind them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as ‘ intending very soon to fetch all away when they came back for their ‘ pay. But the Carthaginians, who wanted to rid the city entirely of ‘ these ungovernable guests, and who feared, that if the women and ‘ children remained there, it would be difficult to hinder some of the sol‘ diers from staying behind, and others from returning, which would ‘ frustrate the intention of the measure now taken, they prevailed with ‘ them to march away with all that belonged to them, wives and chil‘ dren, bag and baggage.

‘ To Sicca then they all removed, and there lay waiting for news of ‘ their fellows arrival, and their own pay. Business they had none to do, ‘ and therefore might easily be drawn to mutiny, the whole argument of ‘ their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, ‘ how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much ‘ would

‘ would fall to every single share, and for how long a time the city was ‘ behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeti‘ cians; and he was thought a man of worth, who could find most rea‘ son to encrease their demands to the very highest, even beyond their ‘ due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the encourag‘ ing words and promises of their Captains leading them forth to any ‘ dangerous fight, were called to mind as so many obligations, not to be ‘ cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some extraordinary ‘ bounty.

‘ In this manner passed the time away, till at length, the whole army, ‘ being arrived and united, Hanno (chief magistrate of Carthage) appear‘ ed at Sicca to clear the accompt. Now was the day come, when they ‘ were all to be made rich, especially if they could hold together, in ‘ maintaining resolutely the common cause. Full of these thoughts and ‘ expectations they assembled themselves to hear what good news this ‘ messenger had brought; with firm purpose to help his memory in case he ‘ should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them,
‘ which were all to be considered in the reckoning.

‘ Hanno begins a very formal oration, wherein he bewails the poverty of ‘ Carthage; tells them how great a sum of money is to be paid to the Ro- ‘ mans; reckons up the excessive charges the commonwealth had been at,
‘ in the late war, and in conclusion desires them to be contented with part ‘ of their pay, and out of the love which they bore to the city, to remit the rest.

‘ Few of the hearers understood this Orator’s discourse: For the Car- ‘ thaginian army was composed of sundry nations, as Greeks, Africans, ‘ Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. But ‘ when such as conceived the whole tenor of his speech had informed the ‘ rest what message he brought, they all broke out into such a storm of rage,
‘ that nothing would serve to appease them. The insurrection and revolt ‘ were universal, each nation at first caballing apart, and then all the se‘ veral nations joining together in a general sedition; of which the dif‘ ference of languages greatly encreased the tumult and confusion.

‘ Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how:
‘ for he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his ora‘ tion. An army, collected out of so many countries, that have no one ‘ language common to all, is neither easily stirred up to mutiny, nor ea‘ sily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Han-
‘ no could do, was to use the help of their own officers as his interpreters ‘ and messengers; but these interpreters mistook his meaning, some for ‘ want of skill, others on purpose; and such as delivered his errands in ‘ the worst sense were the best believed. In short, nothing was to be seen ‘ but fluctuation of mind, jealousies, distrusts and caballing. Among ‘ the other causes of the soldiers anger, was this also, that the Carthagi- ‘ nians, instead of sending to them some one of those officers, under whom ‘ they had served in Sicily, who knew their merits, and who so often had ‘ promised them rewards, had sent a man who had not been present in ‘ any of those actions where they had signalized their courage. In short,
‘ they

‘ they considered themselves as not only wronged, but insulted. Full ‘ of indignation therefore they hastily left Sicca, and to the number of ‘ 20,000 men advanced towards Carthage, as far as Tunes, where they took ‘ up their quarters, about 15 miles from the capital. And now when it ‘ was too late, the Carthaginians became convinced of their mistakes; for ‘ it was a mighty fault in them to permit such a body of strangers to as‘ semble all in one place; and it was yet a greater error to turn out of ‘ their city the wives, children, and goods of these poor soldiers, ‘ which had they retained them in shew of kindness, they might have used
 ‘ as hostages for their own safety, and as means to bring the army
 ‘ to their own terms: But now the terror they were in from the neigh‘ bourhood of their mutineers carried them to yield to every demand, ‘ though never so unreasonable. They furnished a market at Tunes for ‘ the soldiers, whom they suffered to buy what they pleased, and at what ‘ price they pleased. Deputies out of the body of the senate were from ‘ time to time dispatched to them, to assure them, that all their demands,
 ‘ if possible to be performed, should be satisfied. The soldiers easily ‘ perceived the cause of this change; and taking advantage of the fright
 ‘ the city was in, they every day invented some new article to insist upon;
 ‘ and their insolence was the greater from the persuasion, that having ser‘ ved with honour against the Romans in Sicily, neither the Carthaginians
 ‘ nor any other people would have the courage to face them in the field.
 ‘ No sooner therefore had they adjusted their demands of pay, but they ‘ proceeded further to exact satisfaction for the horses they had lost in the ‘ service. When that was agreed to, the next demand was on ac‘ count of short allowance of provisions for many years. They would be ‘ paid for the deficiency; and, in this reckoning, the corn should be va‘ lued at the highest price it had at any time born during the whole ‘ war.

‘ In short, as there were many factious and seditious spirits in the ar‘ my, these incited the multitude to make new and exorbitant demands, ‘ such as it was impossible for the republic to comply with; nevertheless,
 ‘ as the Carthaginians promised to do every thing in their power to satisfy ‘ them, it was at length agreed, that the difference should be referred to ‘ some one of the Generals who had been in Sicily, and that the soldiers ‘ should chuse the arbitrator. Accordingly they pitched upon Gisco, part‘ ly out of affection to him, who had shewn himself at all times a friend‘ ly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were ‘ to be transported into Africa; and partly out of a dislike they had con‘ ceived of Amilcar, because he had not visited them in all this busy time.

E. W. R. ‘ [It is probable that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument ‘ in defrauding his own soldiers of their wages; especially considering,
 ‘ that as he could best bear witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, ‘ that means to content them were not wanting, had the citizens been ‘ willing to do it.]

‘ Gisco then embarks and comes among them, and to please them the ‘ better brings money with him. He calls to him first of all the principal officers, and then the several nations apart, rebuking them gently for what had passed; advising them calmly concerning the present, and exhorting them to continue their affection to a state, which had long entertained them in its pay, and would be always mindful of their good services. He then offered to give them their whole pay in hand, proposing to defer the consideration of other reckonings to a more convenient time. This might have been well accepted, and might have served to restore things to quiet, if two seditious ringleaders of the multitude had not opposed it.
 ‘ pal

Among the mutineers there happened to be one Spendius a Campanian, who had been a slave to a Roman master. He was strong of body, and in all occasions of danger very forward; this fellow fearing to fall into the hands of his master, (for by the custom of Rome his fault was punished with death) laboured both with words and actions, to trouble and perplex the treaty they were upon; and to hinder by all means possible their agreement with the Carthaginians. Another there was whose name was Matko, an African, of free condition, and a soldier among them, who having been an active stirrer in this conspiracy, and fearing punishment, joined with Spendius to obstruct the accommodation, possessing the Africans with the belief, that as soon as the strangers should be paid, and dispatched to their own countries, it would be their lot to pay for all; and that the Carthaginians would take such revenge on them, for what they had done, that all Africa should tremble at it. The soldiers grew hereupon enraged anew, and in regard they were not likely to receive of Gisco any other satisfaction than their arrears of pay, what was due for their horses and bread being respited to another time, they therefore took thence occasion of fresh disorders, and ran together in a mutinous manner. To Spendius and Matko they lent a willing ear, who railed both against Gisco and the Carthaginians, and if any one presumed to offer them temperate counsel, he was forthwith stoned to death, even before it could be understood what the purport of his discourse was, whether for or against Spendius; and now great slaughter was made both of officers and private soldiers, and nothing was heard during the tumult but throw, throw, down with him; and what greatly augmented the rage of those people, was the excess of wine they had drank, having newly risen from their repast. So that the word throw was no sooner heard, but the person against whom it was designed, was immediately slain. At length there appearing no one who presumed to open his mouth to divert their determinations, they chose Spendius and Matko for their Leaders and Commanders in chief.

Gisco was not without a due sense of the danger he was in among these people, but he let that consideration give place to the duty he owed his country. He foresaw that if this mutiny once came to a head, the commonwealth would be driven to great straits; to prevent which, he was willing to be exposed to any hazard. He therefore with great constancy of mind pursued his purpose of reducing them to their duty ‘ duty by all means possible : Sometimes treating with the officers, some‘ times with the sundry nations apart. It happened, that the Africans ‘ coming rudely to Gijco to demand the corn-money, which they pretend‘ ed was due to them ; he to reprove their insolence, bid them in a con‘ temptuous manner go ask their captain Matbo for it. This answer put ‘ all into a flame. Without any hesitation they tumultuously ran, and ‘ seized on the money, which had been brought in order to their pay‘ ment.

‘ Matbo and Spendius fomented with all their art and industry this au‘ dacious proceeding of the multitude, being persuaded, that to do some ‘ outrageous act, in violation of the treaty they were upon, and contrary ‘ to the law of nations, would be the surest way to put things past accom‘ modation, and to kindle the war they so much desired. Thus there‘ fore, not only the money and baggage of the Carthaginians were seized ‘ by the mutineers, but Gijco and all the Carthaginians who accompanied ‘ him were arrested, put in irons, and thrown into prison ; and these vio‘ lences were immediately followed by an open declaration of war against ‘ Carthage.

‘ AND now Matbo dispatched deputies to the cities round about, ex‘ horting them to lend him succours, enter into confederacy with him,
 ‘ and bravely recover their liberty. It was not needful for the deputies
 ‘ to use much persuasion, the very fame of this rebellion sufficing to draw
 ‘ the whole country into it. The merciless impositions of the Carthaginians ‘ upon their African subjects, were the cause of this universal proneness to ‘ a revolt. They had taken from the country people during the late ‘ war one half of their corn, and had doubled the tributes paid by the ‘ inhabitants of the cities, not exempting even the poorest from these ex-‘ actions. When new magistrates were to be elected for the provinces, ‘ the choice never fell on those who were likely to govern the people with ‘ lenity and moderation, but on such whose rigour promised the Electors
 ‘ the richest fruits of oppression. Hanno, for example, was of this sort,
 ‘ and therefore a great favourite at Carthage.

‘ All these things considered, it is no wonder that the Africans were ‘ not backward to rebel. Not only such as could bear arms readily ten‘ dered their service in this commotion, but the very women (who had ‘ seen their husbands and fathers dragged to prison by the tax-gatherers) ‘ brought forth their jewels and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the ‘ maintenance of so just a quarrel. And by this great forwardness, and ‘ liberal contribution, Matbo and Spendius were supplied with a strong ‘ reinforcement of 70,000 Africans, and were moreover furnished with ‘ money, not only to give the soldiers the arrears of their pay, (which ‘ to engage them in the revolt they had promised) but sufficient to carry ‘ on the war begun, though it should be of long continuance.

‘ The Mercenaries using the advantage of their present strength, laid ‘ siege to Ulica and Hippo, two maritime cities of great importance, ly‘ ing to the west of Carthage, and not far from it ; nor did they abandon ‘ their

‘ their camp at Tunes, which on the other side, lay commodiously to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the country that way.

‘ Carthage was situate on a Peninsula, which is bounded on one side by the sea, and on the other by a lake. The Isthmus that joins this Peninsula to the continent is about three miles broad. Utica stood on that side of Carthage which regards the sea, Tunes on the other side, upon the lake: so that the enemy, from those two posts, marching sometimes by day, and sometimes by night, to the very walls of the capital, filled the inhabitants with extreme terror. The Carthaginians, in this distress, appointed Hanno to be their General. He had gained some reputation in that capacity, when employed to conquer that part of Africa which lay towards Heccatompolis. Hanno did not fail to make with diligence all needful preparations (for that was his talent :) He got together whatever was necessary, as well to relieve a town besieged, as to batter and assail any place defended against him. With these provisions and with a hundred elephants he came to Utica so suddenly, that the mercenaries, as men surprized, forsook their trenches and retired to a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his huge beasts.

‘ Hanno, having been accustomed to make war with the Africans and Numidians, who upon any defeat were wont to fly for two or three days together, imagined that the enemy he had only routed, were utterly ruined even beyond a possibility of recovery; neglecting therefore to keep guard, and leaving his men at liberty, he immediately entered the town, there to recreate and divert himself. But those old soldiers, with whom he was now at war, had learned of Amilcar to sustain such shocks as they had just suffered, without being discouraged, and to retire and to fight again many times in one day, as occasion required. Wherefore as soon as they perceived that Hanno knew not how to make use of a victory, they instantly rushed down from their retreat, assailed their own camp, and with great slaughter drove the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within the walls of Utica; and they also got possession of all the stores that Hanno had brought for the relief of the town. Nor was this the only occasion wherein Hanno gave marks of his insufficiency. Twice he might have defeated the enemy in pitched battle, and twice by surprize, yet he unaccountably neglected these opportunities, and even suffered the enemy to take possession of all the passes in the Isthmus, which joins the Peninsula, whereon Carthage stood, to the firm land.

‘ The Carthaginians, dissatisfied with the conduct of Hanno, had now recourse to the undisputed abilities of Amilcar, whom they sent into the field with 10,000 men and 70 elephants. Amilcar was for some time at a loss how to meet with the enemy upon equal ground. For, beside the other places of advantage, which the mercenaries had seized, Hanno had suffered them to get possession of the only bridge by which the river Macar or Bagrades was passable to those who were to travel from Carthage into the Continent. This river had not many fords, and the ' few it had were so well watched, that it was not easy for even a single

 ' man to get over without being seen. As for the bridge itself, the ene' my guarded it with the utmost vigilance, and had built a town close by
 ' it, for the more commodious lodging of the troops that were appointed
 ' to that service. Amilcar, having in vain tried all means possible to force
 ' a passage, at length bethought himself of an expedient to gain one by ' stealth. He had observed that upon the blowing of certain winds, the ' mouth of the Macar used to be choaked up with sand and gravel, which ' formed a kind of bar across it. Marching therefore to the mouth of ' the river, he there waited, without communicating his design to any ' body, the blowing of those favourable winds; which no sooner happen' ed, but he passed the stream with his army by night unperceived, and ' the next morning appeared in the plain, to the great astonishment both ' of the Carthaginians and of the enemy.

' Spendius and his followers were extremely troubled as well as amazed at
 ' this news, as knowing that they had no longer to deal with the im-
 ' provident gravity of Hanno, but with an able captain, even their own ' master in the art of war, whom they still admired though they hated
 ' him. Amilcar marched directly towards those of the enemy, who guard' ed the bridge. Spendius advanced to meet him with 10,000 men, whom ' he drew out of the town that was near it. He had ordered 15,000 to ' come from before Utica and join him. Upon the arrival of this rein' forcement, the fear with which the mercenaries had been struck was ' changed into presumption. They thought to surround Amilcar, and ' bear him down by numbers. Amilcar had disposed his elephants in the ' front, his cavalry and light armed infantry in the second line, and
 ' his heavy armed foot in the rear of all. He had || probably ex' pected that the 15,000 men from Utica would have fallen upon ' his rear, instead of joining the forces with Spendius; and this ex' pectation was the reason of his placing his main strength in the ' rear. But when he saw, that the enemy, neglecting their advantage,
 ' had joined their two bodies of troops together, he immediately changed
 ' the order of his battle, making his horse wheel about and go to the ' rear, and his infantry advance. This sudden retreat of the Carthaginian
 ' cavalry was mistaken by the mercenaries for a real flight and a mark of ' fear. They advanced therefore briskly to the attack without observing ' any order, and in full confidence of victory. But no sooner did they ' perceive that cavalry, which they had thought routed, appear again in ' good array, covering the whole body of the Carthaginian foot, (for by ' the general's order, the horse wheeling from the rear to the right and ' left, had now placed themselves in the same line with the infantry) than ' their astonishment at this movement quite took away their courage.
 ' They instantly turned their backs and fled, and being warmly pursued
 ' by the horse and elephants of Amilcar, suffered a very great slaughter.
 ' In this overthrow, 6000 of the mercenaries were slain, and 2000
 ' taken prisoners; the rest escaped, some to the camp before Utica, others
 ' to the town by the bridge, whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that
 ' he easily possessed himself of that place, the enemy not having sufficient-

| Chev.
 Folard.

ly

ly recovered their spirits to make a defence, but flying thence to Tunes at his approach. After this he speedily reduced several other towns, partly by force, partly by composition, and by this happy progress gave the Carthaginians some better hopes of their affairs.

As for Matbo, he still continued the siege of Hippo, advising Spendius, and Autaritus, chief captain of the Gauls, to follow Amilcar so as never to lose sight of him, yet always to keep the higher grounds, or the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the horse and elephants of the Carthaginians. He also sent into Numidia and Africa, admonishing the people to furnish those two commanders with supplies, and to exert themselves on this occasion for the recovery of their freedom. Spendius with six thousand men, chosen out of the several nations encamped at Tunes, and with 2000 Gauls, that followed Autaritus, (these being all that remained of those who had served under this captain in Sicily, the rest having deserted to the Romans at Eryx) pursuant to the counsel of Matbo, continually coasted the Carthaginians, but always keeping the foot of the hills. One day, when Amilcar was encamped in a plain encompassed on all sides with hills, the succours which Spendius had waited for arrived, and the Carthaginian general was not a little embarrassed thereby; for he had now to deal with a body of Africans in front, and another of Numidians behind him, while the army of Spendius lay on his flank. In this difficulty the fame of Amilcar's personal worth was of great benefit to his country. In the enemies troops there happened to be a certain Numidian, named Naravasus, a man of distinction both for his birth and courage. He had inherited from his father an inclination to the Carthaginians, and it was much increased by what he had heard of Amilcar's merit. Thinking that he had now an opportunity of gaining the friendship of this people, he came to the camp attended by about 100 Numidian horse. Having halted near the lines without any shew of fear, he there made a sign with his hand. Amilcar not a little wondering at the hardiness of the action, sent out to him a horseman; to whom Naravasus signified, that he desired a conference with the general. The latter not readily complying with the motion, the Numidian no sooner perceived his distrust, but dismounting, he gave his horse and arms to those who were with him; and with a noble confidence, entered the camp alone. Every body wondered at the bravery of the man, but received him amicably. Being conducted to Amilcar, he told him, he wanted not good inclinations for the Carthaginians in general; but that his principal motive of coming there was to engage in a friendship with him; which if he approved, he should find him for the future a faithful friend, both in counsel and in action. This discourse, together with the manly assurance and ingenuous simplicity with which it was spoken, filled Amilcar with unspeakable joy; insomuch, that he not only consented to make him his companion in all his enterprizes; but to purchase his fidelity to the Carthaginians, promised him his daughter in marriage.

‘ After this conference and treaty, Naravasus brought to the camp 2000
 ‘ Numidians, that were under his command; with which reinforcement ‘ Amilcar offered the enemy battle. Spendius, on his part being strengthened ‘ by the Africans, advanced boldly into the plain, where the battle was ob‘ stinately fought. Amilcar, in the end, had the day: the elephants did ‘ great service; and Naravasus signalized himself most eminently. Spendius
 ‘ and Autaritus escaped by flight, about 10,000 of their men being slain, and ‘ 4000 taken prisoners. Amilcar received kindly all those of the prisoners, ‘ that were willing to take his pay, and serve under him, and he armed them ‘ with the spoils of the dead. As for those that were not willing to serve, ‘ he assembled them all, and then told them, that he freely pardoned their ‘ past fault, and gave them their liberty; but bid them remember, that if ‘ ever they were taken again in arms against the Carthaginians, they were to ‘ expect no mercy.

‘ During these transactions, the mercenaries that were in garrison in Sar- ‘ dinia mutinied, after the example of Matbo and Spendius; and having shut ‘ up Bostar their chief commander in the citadel, they at length murdered ‘ both him and all the Carthaginians with him. Hereupon the republic, in ‘ order to quell these mercenaries, dispatched from Carthage into that island
 ‘ a body of troops, which, if we may judge from their proceedings, were ‘ also mercenaries (a strange policy of the magistrates.) These soldiers no ‘ sooner arrived, but they entered into the views of the mutineers, and ‘ joined the revolt. The united forces seized on the leader of the new ‘ comers and crucified him; they likewise in the most cruel manner mur‘ dered all the Carthaginians they could meet with, possessed themselves of ‘ the towns, and remained masters of the whole island; until at length a ‘ quarrel happened between them and the natives, who prevailing, con‘ strained them to leave the country, and fly for refuge into Italy. But ‘ thus Sardinia became entirely lost to the Carthaginians.

‘ To return to the mercenaries in Africa.

‘ Matbo, Spendius and Autaritus having advice of the clemency which ‘ Amilcar exercised towards the prisoners, and fearing the effect it might ‘ have upon the Africans, and their other troops, resolved to engage them ‘ in some new act of villainy, such as should put them past all hopes of in‘ demnity. With this view they assembled the whole army. A messenger ‘ presently arrives with a pretended letter from those who had followed ‘ their steps in Sardinia. This letter admonishes them to be careful in ‘ guarding Gisco, and the rest of the prisoners (whom they had seized at ‘ the treaty of Tunes) there being some prisoners in the army, who held se‘ cret intelligence with the Carthaginians for their release. Spendius took oc‘ casion from this letter to warn the soldiers not to rely on the specious hu‘ manity of Amilcar towards those who had fallen into his hands; whose ‘ real intention, he said, was not to spare them, but by a feigned clemency
 ‘ to draw the rest to submission; to the end, that having all at his mercy,
 ‘ he might at once take vengeance upon all. He likewise counselled them,
 ‘ to be especially watchful not to suffer Gisco to escape; who being a prin‘ cipal leader, and in great authority, would prove one of their most dan‘ gerous

'gerous enemies. Spendius had hardly ended his discourse, when a second
 'courier, pretending to come from Tunes, arrived with a letter pressing
 'the same matter that was contained in the other. Upon this Autaritus,
 'the Gaul, immediately stepped forth and declared to the assembly, that 'their safety and success could only be found in renouncing all hopes of re'conciliation with the Carthaginians; and that whoever should appear to 'have turned his thoughts that way, ought to be distrusted as a traitor to
 'the common cause, and as being in secret correspondence with the enemy;
 'and he advised them to be guided wholly by those, who were for carry'ing things to the utmost extremity against the Carthaginians. After this
 'he gave it as his opinion, that they ought to put to death by torments,
 'not only Gisco and all the Carthaginians then in their custody, but all those
 'that should hereafter fall alive into their hands. Autaritus was always in 'these assemblies of the soldiers a leading man, having the advantage, by 'his knowledge of several languages, of being able to make himself un'derstood by the greatest part of his hearers. His proposal was received 'with almost universal applause; nevertheless there were some of every 'nation, who joined in one common request, that in regard to the many 'benefits they had received from Gisco, he might at least have the favour 'to suffer only death, and not be put to torment. As they spoke in several 'languages, and all at once, it was not presently understood what they de'manded; but no sooner was their intention known, and some one in the 'assembly had cried out, down with them, knock them all on the head, but 'these intercessors were stoned to death by the multitude. Then, by or'der of Spendius, was Gisco with the other Carthaginian prisoners, to the 'number of 700 persons, brought out to suffer the sentence pronounced 'against them. The executioners (beginning with Gisco, that same Gisco, 'whom but a little before the whole army had owned for their benefactor,
 'and whom they had made choice of to be arbitrator of their differences
 'with the republic) cut off their hands, broke their legs, and then threw 'them alive into a ditch, there to expire in misery. The Carthaginians re'ceiving intelligence of this cruelty, and being deeply affected with the sad
 'fate of so many of their citizens, sent orders to Amilcar and Hanno, to use 'their utmost diligence to revenge it. They likewise dispatched heralds to 'the mercenaries, to demand the bodies of the dead; but the villains were
 'so far from complying with this demand, that they threatened to treat
 'whatever messengers should hereafter be sent to them, in the same man'ner they had treated Gisco. And in fact it became an established law
 'among them, that all Carthaginian prisoners they took should be tor-
 'mented to death; and that those who were allies of the Carthaginians
 'should have their hands cut off, and in that condition be sent back to 'them; and this law was afterwards rigorously executed.

' Amilcar, seeing no means left to put an end to the unbounded audaci-
 'ousness of the enemy, but by utterly exterminating them, sent to Hanno
 'to come and join him with the forces, which, without performing any thing
 'worthy of notice, he had hitherto separately commanded. It was hoped 'that with their united strength they might be able to give a happy issue to ‘ the war. And in the mean time it was resolved, that in return for the ‘ barbarity practised by the enemy, all those of them, who should fall alive ‘ into the hands of the Carthaginians, should be thrown to wild beasts to ‘ be devoured.

‘ But now when affairs began to have a promising aspect, a dispute, that ‘ arose on a sudden between the two generals, was carried so far, that by
 ‘ it they lost many fair occasions of beating the enemy, and even gave them ‘ frequent advantages in the war. Upon the news of this division, the ma‘ gistrates of Carthage came to a resolution, that one of the two should ‘ quit his command, and that the option should be left to the army.

‘ This quarrel so unseasonable, and its consequences above-mentioned,
 ‘ were not the only misfortunes that befel the Carthaginians at this time. A ‘ convoy from Emperium with provisions, and other stores, much wanted for ‘ the army, was lost by tempest at sea: and to fill the measure of their ad‘ versity, the towns of Utica and Hippo, that had hitherto stood firm to the ‘ Carthaginian party, not only in this war, but even in the time of Agathocles,
 ‘ and when the Romans made their descent on Africa, now abandoned ‘ them on a sudden, without any plausible motive; and not only entered into ‘ a league of fast friendship with the Africans, but conceived an implacable ‘ hatred against the Carthaginians; which they sufficiently testified by mur‘ dering all those they had of that nation in garrison, and throwing their bo‘ dies over the walls, without suffering them to be buried. These events en‘ couraged Matbo and Spendius to think of laying siege even to Carthage itself.

‘ The Carthaginian army having declared in favour of Amilcar, Hanno
 ‘ was constrained to relinquish his authority, and was succeeded by Hanni‘ bal, whom the Senate appointed to command in his stead. Assisted by this ‘ new colleague, and especially by Naravasus, who was eminently useful in ‘ all expeditions, Amilcar scoured the country, and endeavoured to cut off ‘ all means of subsistence from the enemy, who now invested Carthage.

‘ The city, blocked up on all sides by land, was forced to have recourse
 ‘ to her allies. Hiero king of Syracuse, who had all along had a watchful ‘ eye upon the events of this war, and had supplied the republic with eve‘ ry thing she had desired of him, was now, in her greatest distress, more ‘ than ever diligent to assist her; as being well aware, that to maintain his ‘ own authority in Sicily, and his alliance of friendship with the Romans, it ‘ was necessary that Carthage should be preserved in a condition to ballance ‘ their power; otherwise he himself might soon be at their mercy, and in‘ stead of their friend become their subject.

‘ In this, says Polybius, he acted wisely, for it greatly behoves a Prince ‘ not to neglect a mischief of this kind, in the beginning, nor to suffer the ‘ exorbitant growth of a neighbouring power, till he is no longer able to ‘ contest with it for his own indisputable right.

‘ Not only king Hiero, but the Romans also, (faithfully observing their ‘ treaty of peace) supplied the Carthaginians with such provisions and stores ‘ as they wanted; so that the city, being thus succoured, was in a condi‘ tion to defend itself against the efforts of the besiegers.

‘ In the mean time Amilcar was so active and diligent in preventing any ‘ supplies from going to the camp of Matho and Spendius, that he at length ‘ reduced them to great straits for provisions, and in the end constrained ‘ them to raise the siege. And now Spendius, assisted by one Zarxas an Af- ‘ rican leader, and by Autaritus the Gaul, issued into the field, at the head ‘ of 50,000 chosen men, to try the fortune of war against Amilcar, (Matho
‘ was left at Tunes, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care ‘ of the business.) The elephants of Carthage and the horse of Naravasus ‘ made Spendius afraid of descending into the plains, so that he betook ‘ himself to his former method of keeping the hills and rough grounds, or ‘ occupying the streight passages, wherein the desperate courage of his ‘ men might shew itself with little disadvantage. But Amilcar, having more ‘ skill than he in the trade of war, artfully contrived to draw him to many ‘ skirmishes; in all which the success was such, as added courage to the ‘ Carthaginians, and abated the strength and spirit of their enemies. Thus ‘ he continued alarming and provoking them by night and by day; and,
‘ through his skill in laying ambushes, never failed to entrap some of them, ‘ when they engaged in small parties, nor to cut off great numbers when ‘ the action was more general; and those who fell alive into his hands he ‘ gave to be devoured by wild beasts.

‘ At length he surprized them in a place that was very commodious for ‘ his own army, and very disadvantageous to theirs. They presently saw ‘ their disadvantage, and therefore had not heart to fight. Amilcar pru‘ dently foreseeing that necessity might draw them to attempt the most ‘ desperate enterprizes, took the opportunity of their present fear, and shut ‘ them close up with a trench and rampart. There they waited miserably
‘ and in vain for succour from Tunes; and having spent all their provisions ‘ were so pressed with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their pri‘ soners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing they had not deserved ‘ any favour from Carthage; and hoping still that their friends at Tunes ‘ would not neglect them. But when at length they were driven to such ‘ extremity, as to be forced to devour their own companions, and yet saw ‘ no appearance of relief, then was their obstinacy quite broken, and they ‘ began to threaten their captains. Spendius, Zarxas and Autaritus having ‘ therefore consulted together, came to a resolution to yield themselves to ‘ Amilcar, if required, as the condition of peace. They sent a herald to de‘ mand a pass, which being granted them, they came in person to the Car- ‘ thaginian general. What they could say to him is hard to conjecture; ‘ yet by the conditions that Amilcar granted, it would seem that they took ‘ the blame upon themselves, and begged pardon for the multitude. The ‘ conditions were, That the Carthaginians should chuse out of the whole num- ‘ ber of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion;
‘ and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in one single coat. When the ‘ treaty was thus concluded, Amilcar told Spendius, and those who were with ‘ him, that he chose them as part of the ten; and then immediately ordered ‘ them to be seized and secured. The army receiving intelligence that their ‘ leaders were detained, and not knowing that a treaty was concluded for ‘ them.

‘ them upon such gentle terms, presently imagined they were betrayed. In ‘ amazement therefore they all ran to arms. But now they wanted cap‘ tains to order and conduct them; and the same astonishment that made ‘ them break the covenants of peace, of which they were ignorant gave ‘ Amilcar both colour of justice in accomplishing revenge, and facility in ‘ doing the execution. They were all slain, being 40,000 or more in number.

‘ The news of this exploit, (as may well be supposed) gave new life and ‘ spirit to the people at Carthage, and was terrible to the revolted cities.
 ‘ Amilcar, with Naravasus and Hannibal, carried the war from town to town,
 ‘ and found all places ready to yield, except Utica, Hippo, and Tunes,
 ‘ the two first standing out through fear of deserved vengeance, and the ‘ last being held by Matto, with the remainder of the rebel army. It was ‘ thought fit to begin with Tunes, where lay the chief strength of the ene‘ my. Coming before this town, they brought forth Spendius with his fel‘ lows, and, in view of the garrison, crucified them under the walls, to ‘ terrify those of his old companions, that were still in arms. With this ‘ rigour the siege began, as if speedy victory had been assured. Hanni‘ bal quartered upon that side of Tunes, which lay toward Carthage; ‘ Amilcar on the opposite side; too far asunder to help one another in ‘ sudden accidents. It behoved them therefore to be more circumspect.
 ‘ Nevertheless Hannibal, secure, as if all danger were past, neglected to ‘ keep good guard. Matto perceived it, and, using his advantage, sal‘ lied out with unexpected fury against that part of the Carthaginian ‘ army, and so successfully, that, after a great slaughter of the enemy,
 ‘ he put the rest to flight, forced their camp, pillaged it, and took Han‘ nibal himself prisoner. After the victory, having caused the dead body ‘ of Spendius to be taken down from the cross, he ordered Hannibal to be ‘ fixed alive in his place, and executed him with unspeakable torments.
 ‘ The rest also of the noblest of the Carthaginians, who had fallen into his ‘ hands, were by his command slain round the body of Spendius. Of all ‘ this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength ‘ enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the siege; but was ‘ obliged to break it up, and remove to the mouth of the river Bagra‘ das, where he encamped.

‘ The terror in Carthage, upon the news of this disaster, was not less ‘ than had been the joy for the late important victory. All that could ‘ bear arms were sent into the field under Hanno; and the Senate com‘ missioned thirty principal men of their body to labour with all the force ‘ of persuasion, to bring Amilcar and him to a reconciliation. This could ‘ not be effected presently. Amilcar was perhaps nearly touched in his ‘ honour, that the carelessness of Hannibal seemed to be imputed to him, ‘ by sending his enemy to share with him the conduct of affairs, and be ‘ a check upon his proceedings. Nevertheless, after many conferences,
 ‘ the authority of the Senators prevailed; and the two Generals passed ‘ their words to live in friendship, and act in concert for the public good.
 ‘ And thenceforward all affairs were successfully managed to the satisfac‘ tion of their fellow citizens.

‘ Matto

‘ Matbo, during these transactions, was come abroad into the field, ‘ wisely purposing to make advantage of the reputation of his late suc‘ cess, while it gave some life to his cause. But this African Leader ‘ wanted the necessary skill to cope with Amilcar, who in all skirmishes
 ‘ and encounters between parties never failed to worst him, and thereby ‘ to diminish both his strength and his credit. Matbo, sensible of this ‘ growing mischief to his affairs, resolved therefore to try the fortune of ‘ one battle, whereby either his ambition should be accomplished, or his ‘ cares at an end. The Carthaginians were no less disposed to a general ‘ action, having many advantages above their enemies, and especially ‘ (which was worth all the rest) such a commander, as was not easily to ‘ be matched in that age. Both parties being thus agreed, the confede‘ rates and friends of both were called together, and the towns drained
 ‘ of their garrisons to augment the armies. At length with joint consent, ‘ in time and place, the battle was fought. The Carthaginians won the ‘ day. The greatest part of the African army was slain upon the spot;
 ‘ the rest fled to a town, that not being defensible quickly surrendered;
 ‘ Matbo himself was there taken alive. Immediately upon this victory ‘ all the African cities which had been in the rebellion, submitted to their ‘ old masters, Utica and Hippo only excepted, these, by their treacherous ‘ and outrageous proceedings, having cut off from themselves all hopes ‘ of pardon. However, these also were constrained to surrender at mer‘ cy. Matbo and his companions, being led in triumph to Carthage, ‘ were put to death by all the torments that revenge could devise.

‘ Thus was a period given to this inexpiable war, which had lasted three ‘ years and near four months, and had abounded with more acts of wick‘ edness and cruelty, than any other to be met with in story.’

ROME during all this time took no advantage of her rival’s distress to promote her ruin, but continued faithfully to observe the treaty of peace with her; and even assisted her as a friend in many instances. Once indeed there seemed to be some danger of a rupture. For as the Carthaginians at the beginning of this war, made prize of all vessels that came on the coast of Africa to supply the rebels with provisions, it happened that they had at one time in custody 500 Italians, whom they had taken carrying on this traffic for the profit of private merchants. The Romans, offended at the detaining of these traders in prison, began to turn their thoughts to revenge; but they were soon appeased by a respectful embassy from Carthage, who restored the prisoners in so frank a manner, that the Romans, not to be behind her in courtesy, enlarged, without ransom, all the Carthaginian captives, that yet remained of those who had been taken during the Sicilian war.

Y. R. 515.
 Bef. Chr.
 237.
 214 Conf.

- ‘ Part of the Y. of R. 512. Q. Lutatius, and A. Manlius.
 Y. of R. 513. C. Claudius, and M. Sempronius.
 Y. of R. 514. C. Mamilius, and Q. Valerius.
 Part of the Y. of R. 515. Tib. Sempronius, and P. Valerius.

Y. R. 515.
 Ref. Chr.
 257.
 214 C. 116.

They also permitted their merchants to supply Carthage with whatsoever she stood in need of, and prohibited all commerce with her enemies. Nay, more than this, when the people of Utica, having revolted from the Carthaginians, would have put that city into the hands of the Romans, the latter rejected the overture; as they also did an offer made them of the Island of Sardinia by the mercenaries there, who, following the example of those in Africa, had turned their arms against the masters in whose pay they were, and had forcibly seized upon that Island.

Sir W. R.

This behaviour towards a rival power (says a learned writer) might have served as a notable example of Roman faith to all posterity, had not the issue proved that it proceeded wholly from the hope of greater profit thereby, than could reasonably be expected from an open violation of the treaty of peace. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, upon the virtue of Amilcar, and had he been overthrown by the rebels in one main battle, that mighty city must either have fallen into the hands of merciless villains, or have humbled herself under the protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately contended for superiority. She was once, during the war, reduced by the rebels to so great extremity as not to be far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking ship, to run herself aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did ambition put off her goodly vizour. Though the Romans had formerly refused this Island, when offered them by the mercenaries, (who were afterwards driven thence by the natives) they now resolved to take possession of it by force of arms. One of the Consuls passed thither with an army, and denounced war against Carthage, under the shameless pretence, That the preparations made (by that enfeebled and impoverished city) to reduce Sardinia, were indeed designed against Rome. The Carthaginians were in no condition at this time to enter upon a new war with so potent an enemy: yielding therefore to necessity, they relinquished all pretensions to the Island for ever; and not only so, but submitted to the exactions of the Consul, who further demanded of them, as the price of a peace, the sum of * 1200 talents: Detestable injustice and extortion, which, as Livy assures us, were the chief cause of that bloody war, in which Hannibal afterwards, with hereditary hatred and an implacable spirit of revenge, pushed the Romans to the very brink of destruction.

Polih. B.
 1. c. 88.

Sinnies
 Capto apud Pump.
 Fati. in voce
 Sardi Venales.

* 242500 L.
 Arbuthnot.

C H A P. XII.

Wars of the Romans with the Boian Gauls, Ligurians, Sardinians and Corsicans.

DURING the three years and some months that the war of Carthage with her mercenaries had lasted, the Roman Consuls had no affairs abroad, and seem to have chiefly employed their thoughts to establish bliss good order in Italy, and to secure the frontiers against the Gauls and Ligurians, by planting colonies in their neighbourhood. The Republic however would gladly have engaged in some quarrel, if she could have found a plausible pretence for it. Entropius tells us that after the conclusion of the war in Sicily, she sent Ambassadors to Ptolemy Evergetes, King of Egypt, to offer him her assistance against Antiochus of Syria, surnamed the God: but the Egyptian having got rid of his enemy before the Ambassadors arrived, his answer was only a compliment of thanks. And we have seen, that after the conclusion of the African war, in which Carthage was triumphant, the Romans would have renewed hostilities against that hated rival, on account of Sardinia, if they had not been prevented in this project, by an unwilling cession of that Island to them.

Y. R. 515.
Eef. Chr.
237.
214 Conf.

Entrop. l. 3.
c. 1.

But about the same time these ambitious and restless spirits found sufficient opportunity to keep their hardy legions in exercise. In the Consulate of Tib. Sempronius, and P. Valerius, those Italic Gauls who were called Boii, and who, after infinite losses and calamities sustained in their struggles with the Romans, had continued quiet 45 years, resolved at length, upon some very trivial pretences, to break the peace, which had been so long maintained with the republic. The old men, all those who had felt the hardships and sufferings of the former wars, being extinct, the young men, their successors, who had experienced nothing of those miseries, and feared nothing from fortune, began, according to the nature of man, to grow turbulent and desirous of some change in their condition; and this was the true source of their rash enterprize.

See B. 3.
ch. 25. §.
1, 2. Polyb.
L. 2. c. 21.

The Ligurians also (whom Rome had not yet begun to subdue) being in motion, and seeming to threaten her with war, the Consuls for the year were obliged to divide their forces.

Liv. Epit.
20.

Valerius led a consular army against the Gauls, and was vanquished in his first battle with them, in which he lost 3500 men. Upon the news of this defeat, the Romans immediately dispatched M. Genucius Cippus, one of the Prætors, from the city, with a reinforcement for the Consul. Valerius looking on this precaution as a personal affront, and believing that he was still strong enough to cope with the enemy, notwithstanding the blow he had received, hastened to attack them again, before Cippus could arrive. His soldiers were no less zealous than himself to recover their honour; and being animated by this motive behaved themselves so gallantly that they slew 14,000 of the Gauls and took 2000 prisoners. However, this victory did not obtain the Consul a triumph, because he had been rash in the attempt, and had not paid sufficient deference to the sentiments of the senate and people.

Orof. B. 4.
c. 12.
Val. Max.
B. 5. c. 6.

In the mean time Sempronius, the other Consul, gained a battle, (though not a decisive one) against the Ligurians.

These wars were continued by the next year's Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Fulvius acquired no honour by the

Y. R. 516.

* Liguria comprehended at this time the whole extent of country between the Arno, the Apennines, the country of the Ananes, the Po, the maritime Alps, and the Ligurian sea (now the sea of Genoa.)

Y. R. 516.
Bef. Chr.
236.
215 Conf.

Zon. B. 8.

Eutrop. B.
3. c. 1.

Ken. Antiq.
Part 2. B. 5.
c. 7.
Lib. II.
cap. 4.
Miscel.
cap. 38.

* De Die Natali,
cap. 17.

campaign. It was with great difficulty that he preserved his camp from being forced by the Gauls, whose country on this side of the Po he had entered; he was obliged to keep within his intrenchments, and to act entirely on the defensive.

Cornelius had better success against the Ligurians near Hetruria. He obtained a victory, for which he was rewarded with a triumph.

During these wars, preparations were made at Rome to celebrate the 'secular games: Hiero King of Syracuse came to see the show, and brought with him 200,000 Modii (measures containing a peck and a half) of wheat, that the vast concourse of people might not cause a scarcity of provisions.

* Ludi Seculares, the most remarkable games that we meet with in the Roman story. The common opinion makes them to have had a very odd original, of which we have a tedious relation in Valerius Maximus, of the Antients, and Angelus Politianus of the Moderns. Monsieur Dacier, in his excellent remarks on the secular poem of Horace, passes by this old conceit as trivial and fabulous, and assures us, that we need go no farther for the rise of the custom, than to the Sybilline oracles, for which the Romans had so great an esteem and veneration.

In these sacred writings, there was one famous prophecy to this effect; that if the Romans, at the beginning of every age, should hold solemn games in the Campus Martius to the honour of Pluto, Proserpine, Juno, Apollo, Diana, Ceres, and the Parce, or three fatal sisters, their city should ever flourish, and all nations be subjected to their dominion. They were very ready to obey the oracle, and, in all the ceremonies used on that occasion, conformed themselves to its directions. The whole manner of the solemnity was as follows: In the first place, the heralds received orders to make an invitation of the whole world to come to a feast which they had never seen already, and should never see again. Some few days before the beginning of the games, the Quindecimviri, taking their seats in the capitol, and in the Palatine temple, distributed among the people purifying compositions, as flambeaux, brimstone and sulphur. From hence the people passed on to Diana's temple on the Aventine mountain, carrying wheat, barley, and beans, as an offering; and after this they spent whole nights in devotion to the destinies. At length, when the time of the games was actually come, which continued three days and three nights, the people assembled in the Campus Martius, and sacrificed to Jupiter, Juno, Apollo, Latona, Diana, the Parce, Ceres, Pluto, and Proserpine. On the first night of the feast, the Emperor accompanied by the Quindecimviri, commanded three altars to be raised on the bank of Tiber, which they sprinkled with the blood of three lambs, and then proceeded to burn the offerings and the victims. After this they marked out a space which served for a Theatre, being illuminated by an innumerable multitude of flambeaux and fires: here they sung some certain hymns composed on this occasion, and celebrated all kinds of sports. On the day after, when they had been at the capitol to offer the victims, they returned to the Campus Martius, and held sports to the honour of Apollo and Diana. These lasted till the next day, when the noble matrons, at the hour appointed by the oracle, went to the capitol to sing hymns to Jupiter. On the third day, which concluded the feast, twenty-seven young boys, and as many girls, sung in the temple of Palatine Apollo, hymns and verses in Greek and Latin, to recommend the city to the protection of those deities whom they designed particularly to honour by their sacrifices.

The famous secular poem of Horace was composed for this last day, in the secular game held by Augustus. Dacier has given his judgment on this poem, as the masterpiece of Horace; and believes that all antiquity cannot furnish us with any thing more happily compleat.

There has been much controversy, whether these games were celebrated every hundred or every hundred and ten years. For the former opinion, *Censorinus alledges the testimony of Valerius Antias, Varro and Livy; and this was certainly the space of time which the Romans called saeculum, or an age. For the latter he produceth the authority

The year of the secular games was not a year of tranquillity. The new Consuls, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus, were obliged to take the field to oppose the Gauls. The confidence of their leaders being raised by the multitudes of men they had assembled, and by the expectation of a strong reinforcement of their countrymen from the other side the Alps, they demanded the restitution of Ariminum, formerly taken from them by the Romans. Lentulus and Varus, to gain time (not having their troops compleat) referred the matter to the determination of the senate, and in the interim agreed upon a truce with the enemy, whose commanders were very ready to consent to a cessation of arms till they should be joined by the forces they expected from Transalpine Gaul. When these forces arrived, their number proved so great as to give umbrage to those whom they came to assist. The Cisalpine Gauls, more afraid of the new comers than of the Romans, turned their arms against them and put them to flight, but first slew their own two Generals (or Kings) Ates and Gelates, for having of their own head, and without consulting the nation, invited such dangerous allies to cross the Alps. The enemy being thus defeated by themselves, two consular armies were no longer necessary to repress them. Lentulus with his legions alone, not only reduced the Boii to yield a part of their country as the condition of a peace; but took a great number of forts from the Ligurians, partly by force and partly by composition.

Y. R. 517.
Bef. Chr.
235.
216 Conf.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 21.

In the mean time, Varus made preparations for going to the Island of Corfica, which, by the secret intrigues of the Carthaginians, had been in-

Zon. B. 8.

thority of the registers, or commentaries of the Quindecimviri, and the edicts of Augustus, besides the plain evidence of Horace in his secular poem; 21.

Certus undenos decies per annos, &c.

This last space is expressly enjoined by the Sybilline oracle itself; the verses of which, relating to this purpose, are transcribed by Zosimus in the second book of his history.

Ἄλλ' ἐπεὶ αἱ μέγιστα ἔκη χροῖα ἀνθρώπων
Ζῶντες, εἰς ἑταίρῳ ἰκατὸν δίκαια κύκλον ὀδεύον,
&c.

Yet according to the ancient accounts we have of their celebration in the several ages, neither of these periods are much regarded.

The first were held A. U. C. 245, or 298.

The second A. 330, or 408.

The third A. 518.

The fourth either A. 605, or 608, or 628.

The fifth by Augustus, A. 736.

The sixth by Claudius, A. 800.

The seventh by Domitian, A. 841.

The eighth by Severus, A. 957.

The ninth by Philip, A. 1000.

The tenth by Honorius, A. 1157.

The disorder, without question, was owing to the ambition of the Emperors, who were extremely desirous to have the honour of celebrating these games in their reign; and therefore upon the slightest pretence, many times made them return before their ordinary course. Thus Claudius pretended that Augustus had held the games before their due time, that he might have the least excuse to keep them within sixty-four years afterwards. On which account, Suetonius tells us, that the people scoffed at his cryers, when they went about proclaiming games that nobody had ever seen, nor would see again; whereas there were not only many persons alive who remembered the games of Augustus, but several players, who had acted in those games, were now again brought on the stage by Claudius. Sueton. Claud. 21.

What part of the year the secular games were celebrated in, is uncertain; probably in the times of the commonwealth on the days of the nativity of the city, i. e. the 9, 10, 11. Kal. Maii, but under the Emperors, on the day when they came to their power.

Mr. Walker of Coins, p.
168.

duced

Y. R. 517.
Bef. Chr.
236 C.

Zon. B. 8.

Dio. apud
Vellei. p.
593. Val.
Max. B. 6.
c. 5. §. 3.

Zon. B. 8.
Eutrop. B.
3. c. 2.

Orosius. B.
4. ch. 12.

Dio. in Excerpt. xi.
p. 922.

Y. R. 518.
Bef. Chr.
234
217 C.

duced to throw off the Roman yoke. The Consul, not finding a fleet ready to transport his whole army, sent away before him a small number of ships with a detachment under the command of that Claudius Glycias, who had formerly been named to the Dictatorship in derision. Claudius had served, since that time, with good reputation, in several posts of a lower order, but had never commanded in chief. Seeing himself now at the head of a part of the Consular army, his ambition was raised, and fancying it would be much for his honour to gain this Island to the republic without bloodshed; he, without the consent of Consul or Senate, made a shameful peace with the Corficans. The Consul, at his arrival, annulled the treaty, renewed the war, and subdued the Island by force of arms. As for Claudius, by a decree of the senate, he was delivered up to the resentment of the Corficans, for having drawn them, as it was alledged, into a bloody war by a fallacious peace: In which sentence the republic, beside the punishing a breach of duty and order, had the further view of preventing the reproach that might have been cast upon the Consul, for having made war on a people who depended on the faith of a treaty. However, the Corficans disdained this reparation, and sent Claudius back to Rome. There he was put to death in prison, and then his body, being first carried to the top of the steps called Scala Gemonia, on which the bodies of the greatest malefactors used to be exposed, was thence dragged away with an iron crook and thrown into the Tiber.

This execution of Claudius did not satisfy the Corficans, who had been amused by a treaty of peace, only to give their enemies the better opportunity to subdue them by a war. The near neighbourhood of Sardinia made it easy for them to communicate their discontent to the people of that Island; and it is said, that Carthage under-hand excited the Sardinians to revolt from the Romans; and that Rome, for this reason, made preparations for a new war with the African Republic. Alarmed at this news the Carthaginians sent ambassador after ambassador to negotiate an accommodation; but all in vain. At length they dispatched to Rome, for the same end, ten of the principal members of their state, among whom was one Hanno, a young man of great spirit and vivacity. When these new deputies had for a while employed the lowest submissions and the humblest entreaties to procure a reconciliation, and all to no effect, Hanno, weary of so much cringing, and full of indignation at the rough and haughty answers of the Senate, cried out, with an air of confidence and dignity, “ Well then, if you are resolved to break the treaty, restate us in the condition we were in before it was concluded. Restore to us SICILY and SARDINIA. With these we bought of you, not a Short Truce, but a Peace that was to be perpetual.” The Senators, ashamed, dismissed the Deputies with a milder answer.

After this the Consuls for the new year, C. Attilius Balbus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, drew lots for their provinces; the former continued in Italy, while the latter easily recovered Sardinia, and settled peace there, but without reducing it to a Roman province.

And

And now the temple of Janus was shut up for the first time since the reign of Numa Pompilius. For near 450 years the Romans had been almost continually in arms : And so steady was their ambition, and so unwearied their constancy in pursuing its dictates, that in the succeeding parts of this history we shall see them, in spite of numberless misfortunes, still forming new enterprizes upon the neighbouring nations, and never ceasing to push their conquests till they have attained to universal empire.

The present tranquillity lasted but a few months. In the following Consulship of L. Posthumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius, three armies were raised to act against the Sardinians, Corficans and Ligurians, who had (probably) engaged themselves, by secret treaties, mutually to assist one another. Posthumus succeeded against the Ligurians; but the Prætor Cornelius, who commanded in Sardinia, was, with many of his soldiers, carried off by distemper. Carvilius (from Corfica) transported his Legions thither, gained a victory over the Sardinians, and then returned to Rome in triumph.

In this Consulship, the Censors, observing the number of the Citizens to be considerably lessened, and imputing it to mens marrying only with a view to interest, deserting their own wives for fear of having many children to maintain, and carrying on unlawful intrigues with other women, they obliged all the citizens to swear, that they would not marry with any other view, than that of increasing the subjects of the republic. This oath raised many scruples; and caused many ruptures between husbands and wives. Among the rest, one Carvilius Ruga, a considerable man, thought himself bound by his oath to divorce his wife whom he passionately loved, because she was barren; and accordingly he put her away, contrary to his inclination, and married another; the first instance of divorce at Rome in 519 years, notwithstanding that the laws had always allowed it. And it was on this occasion that marriage-contracts were first introduced, to secure women's portions in case of divorces, which we shall see hereafter grow scandalously frequent, as a corruption of manners prevailed in the republic.

The fresh revolts of the Sardinians and Ligurians obliged the new Consuls, M. Pomponius Matko and Q. Fabius Maximus, (the same Fabius who afterwards acquired so much glory in the wars of Hannibal) to divide the Roman forces. It now falling to Fabius's lot to make war with the Ligurians, he drove them out of the flat country, and forced them to take shelter under the Alps. In the mean time, his colleague Pomponius sailed for Sardinia, and gained some victories there, for which a triumph was granted him at his return home.

It is conjectured, that about this time the Æbutian Law (so called from the two Æbutii, Tribunes of the people, who proposed it and got it passed) was promulged. It retrenched many frivolous customs, ordained by the twelve tables to be observed in processes relating to civil affairs, and it also directed that three able and judicious men should be chosen

Y. R. 518.
B. 1. C. 12.
217 Conf.

Entrep. B.
3. c. 7.
Vell. Pat.
B. 2. c. 38.
Oros. B. 4.
c. 12.
Liv. B. 1.
c. 19.
Y. R. 519.
Bef. Chr.
237.
218 Conf.

Zon. B. 8.
Liv. epit.
20.
Tab. Tri-
umph.

Gell. B. 4.
c. 3. and
B. 17. c. 21.
in fine.
Sulp. de dotibus.
D. Hal. p.
93.

Y. R. 520.
Bef. Chr.
232.
219 Conf.

Plut. life of Fab.

Tab. Tri-
umph.

A. Gell. B.
xvi. c. 10.

Pompon. de
orig. Juris

chosen out of each tribe, to form a new tribunal, which subordinate to the Prætors, might assist them, and remedy the inconveniencies often occasioned by their absence from Rome. These new judges were called, for brevity's sake, Centumvirs^b, though they were 105 in number; and when they were afterwards augmented to 180, they still kept the same name.

Y. R. 521.
Bel. Chr.
232
233 Cons.

Cic. in.
Bruto, c. 14.
Polyb. B. 2.
c. 24.

The establishment of this new tribunal made no change as to the direction of state affairs, which continued wholly in the Senate and Comitia. Flaminius, one of the Tribunes, made a motion to the Commons, at this time, to distribute a fruitful country lately taken from the Gauls, among the poor citizens of Rome. All motions of this kind had ever been opposed by the Senators, out of private interest; and now they had indeed a better reason to unite their strength, in order to hinder Flaminius's motion from passing into a law. They foresaw that the Gauls, on both sides the Po, would impatiently bear the distribution proposed of those lands. Neither the threats of the present Consuls, M. Æmilius Lepidus, and M. Publius Malleolus, nor the entreaties of the Senate, nor yet the tears of his own father, whom the Patricians had gained over to them, could prevail with Flaminius to desist. On the day appointed for proposing the law to the Comitia, he mounted the Rostra and spoke to the people in favour of it; but in the midst of his harangue, his father appearing on a sudden, ascended the Rostra, took him by the arm, and commanded him to follow him home; and then Flaminius immediately obeyed without reply; and, what is most extraordinary, not the least noise nor murmur was heard in the assembly. Nevertheless, the affair was now only postponed; it was afterwards carried into execution; and what the Senators had apprehended came to pass; a dangerous war from the angry Gauls.

Val. Max.
B. 5. c. 4.
& 5.
Cic. de Inv.
Rhet. B. 2.
c. 17.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 21.

Y. R. 522.
Bel. Chr.
232
233 Cons.

Zon. B. 8.

Fab. Cap.

In the following year the new Consuls, M. Pomponius Matho, and C. Papirius Majo, entirely finished the conquest of the two islands of Sardinia and Corfica, which were then reduced to the state of a Roman Province, upon the same foot as Sicily. It is probable, that after this regulation Pomponius continued in the new province to govern it in quality of Pro-Consul, or Prætor, when the year of his Consulate, which was not far from a conclusion, should expire; but Papirius returned to Rome. At his arrival he found the grand elections over; a Dictator had been created to hold the Comitia, so that during the few remaining days of his magistracy, he had nothing to do, and he also quickly perceived, upon trial, that he had no more credit than business. The Senate, dissatisfied with him for some reason unknown, refused him a triumph. This provoked him to take a method entirely new, to do himself honour. At the Pha. Jun.

B. 5. Epist. 2.
Cicero de
Orat. B. 1.
c. 28.

^b They were divided into four courts or chambers. The causes, which fell under their cognizance, were such as related to prescriptions, guardianships, degrees of consanguinity, or affinity, damages occasioned by inundations, contents about building or repairing middle walls, the windows a man might open upon his neighbour, with an infinite number of other matters, that often raised disputes between the inhabitants of the same city.

head of his army he marched to the temple of Jupiter Latialis on the hill of Alba, with all the pomp with which triumphant victors were wont to march to the Capitol; he made no alteration in the ceremony, except that instead of a crown of laurel, he wore a crown of myrtle, on account of his having defeated the Corficans in a place where was a grove of myrtles. This example of Papyrius, was afterwards followed by many Generals to whom the Senate refused the honour of a Triumph.

Vol. Max.
B. 3. c. 6.
Pliny, l.
15. c. 25.
Festus, l.
v. c. Myr-
ta.

C H A P. XIII.

The first Illyrian War.

THE next year M. Æmilius Barbula, and M. Junius Pera, being Consuls, the republic engaged in a new war out of Italy. Illyricum, or rather that part of the country so called, which lies upon the Adriatic, and confines upon Macedon and Epirus, was at this time governed by a woman, named Teuta, the widow of King Agron, and guardian to her son, Pineus, under age. The success of her late husband's arms, who had vanquished the Ætolians, made her vain and presumptuous; and being governed by evil councils, she, instead of prudently managing the affairs of her ward in peace, commissioned her subjects to practise piracy on the sea coast, and seize all the places they could; which was, in a manner, declaring herself a common enemy to all nations. Her pirates had taken many ships belonging to the Roman merchants, and she was now besieging the island of Issa in the Adriatic; the inhabitants of which, had put themselves under the protection of the Republic. Upon the complaints of those merchants, and to protect the people of Issa, the Senate dispatched two ambassadors, Caius and Lucius Coruncanius, to the Illyrian Queen, to require of her that she would restrain her subjects from infesting the seas with their piracies. To this demand the Queen answered, that she would take care, that no injury should be done to the Romans by the Illyrian NATION, but that she thought it was never the custom of Princes to hinder private subjects from making what advantages they could from the sea. But the Romans (replied the younger of the ambassadors) have an excellent custom, which is, to punish private injuries by a public revenge, and to relieve the oppressed. Teuta, by the help of the Gods, we shall find means to make you speedily reform your royal institutions. The proud Queen, angry to excess at these words, secretly contrived to have the ambassadors murdered in their return homeward. Upon the news of this cruel breach of the law of nations, the Senate, having first done honour to the manes of the ambassadors, by erecting, as was usual in such cases, statues, three feet high, to their memory, equipped a fleet with all expedition to begin the war. Teuta, alarmed with these preparations, dispatched an embassy to Rome, to disown her

Y. R. 523.
Bef. Chr.
229.
222d Conf.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 2.
Appian in Illyri

Zon. B. 8.
Dio. in Excerpt. xii.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 8.

Pliny, B.
34. c. 6.

Dio. in Ex-
cerpt. xii.

Zon. B. 8. having had any share in the murder: Yet, when the Romans demanded that the murderers should be delivered up, she peremptorily refused it.

Y. R. 524. The Consuls therefore for the new year, P. Posthumius Albinus, and Bef. Chr. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, both embarked for Illyricum. Fulvius had the 228. command of the fleet, consisting of 200 gallies, and Posthumius of the 2233 Conf. land-forces, which were 20,000 foot, and a small body of horse. The Polyb. B. 2. Queen, in the beginning of the spring, had augmented her fleet, and
 C. 12. sent it to plunder the coasts of Greece. One part sailed to Corcyra *;
 * N. a. Car- (a small island lying near Pharos in the Adriatic) the rest anchored be-2012. fore Epidamnum. These, who had thought to surprize the town, having failed of their hope, rejoined the squadron that lay before Corcyra;
 the people of which place had called in the Ætolians and Achæans to their assistance. Nevertheless, the Illyrians, being assisted by the Acarmanians, had the victory in a brisk action by sea: so that Corcyra, being no longer in a condition to defend itself, capitulated; and received an Illyrian garrison, commanded by Demetrius of Pharos: after which, the conquerors sailed to Epidamnum, and renewed the siege of that place.

Fulvius sailed directly for Corcyra; and tho' he learnt by the way that the city had surrendered, he pursued his course, having a secret intelligence with Demetrius; who, knowing that some ill offices had been done him with Teuta, and fearing her resentment, had promised the Consul to deliver up the place to him; and this he did with the consent of the Cor-cyreans, who thought it the only means of getting a protection from the insults of the Illyrians.

By the advice and assistance of the same Demetrius, the Romans (after Posthumius had landed his forces) made themselves masters of Apollonia (a great city, and one of the keys of Illyricum on the side of Macedon) and of many other places; of which, to reward his services, they appointed him governor. Teuta was quickly constrained by Posthumius's army to retire for safety to the inner part of Illyricum; while Fulvius, with his naval forces, cleared the sea of her pirates.

Y. R. 525. Upon the election of Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Verrucosus, to the Bef. Chr. Consulate, Fulvius was recalled from Illyricum with the greater part 227. of the fleet, and of the land-forces; and Posthumius received orders to 222 Conf. stay there with the remainder, in quality of Pro-consul. Teuta, who perhaps had built some hopes on a change of the Roman magistrates, finding that Posthumius not only wintered in Illyricum, but was raising fresh troops to pursue the war, sent, early in the spring, from Rhizon, (whither she had retired) an embassy to Rome to divert the storm. The Polyb. B. 2. Senate granted her a peace on these conditions. That she should pay an C. 12. annual tribute to the Romans. Surrender to them all Illyricum, a few in Illyr. places excepted. (Appian mentions Corcyra, Pharos, Issa, Epidamnum (or Dyrrhachium) and the country of the Atintanes as yielded to the Romans.)

mans.) And (which principally concerned the Greeks) that not more than two of her ships, and these unarmed, should be permitted to sail beyond Lissos, a sea-port on the confines of Illyricum and Macedon. Thus ended the first Illyrian war, which had not lasted quite two years. As for Teuta, whether out of shame, or compelled to it by a secret article of the treaty, she abdicated the Regency, and Demetrius took her place.

Y. R. 526.
Bef. Chr.
227.
224 Conf.

Posthumius, after this, sent ambassadors to the Ætolians and Achæans, to lay before them the reasons for which the Romans had undertaken the war, what had been the events of it, and upon what terms a peace had been concluded. The ambassadors, having performed their commission, returned to Corcyra, much pleased with the courteous reception they had met with from those states. In reality, the treaty was of great benefit to the Greeks, and delivered them from vexations and perpetual fears: for all Greece had been plagued and infested with the Illyrian piracies.

Polybius remarks, that this was the first time that any Roman troops cross the sea into Illyricum; and the first time that there was any intercourse by ambassadors between the Greeks and the Romans. The latter, about the same time, sent ambassadors to Corinth and to Athens. They were honourably received. The Corinthians, by a public act, decreed that the Romans should be admitted to the celebration of the Isthmian games. And Zonaras tells us, that the Athenians declared the Romans Citizens of Athens, and decreed them the privilege of being admitted to the mysteries of Eleusis; that is, of the festival of Ceres celebrated at Eleusis, a city of Attica.

Polyb. B. 2.
C. 12.
Zon. B. 2.

C H A P. XIV.

The Romans vanquish the Gauls on both sides the Po.

BEFORE the Illyrian war was well ended, the Italic Gauls on both sides the Po began to be in motion. Nevertheless it does not appear, that P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Attilius Regulus, the Consuls for the new year, took the field against them, or performed any military exploit^a.

Y. R. 526.
Bef. Chr.
226.
225 Conf.

The Romans had the extremest dread of those enemies, who had formerly reduced their state to the very brink of total destruction. There was a prophecy, at this time current at Rome, That the Gauls and Greeks should one day be in possession of it. This prophecy is said to have been found in

^a Some authors say, that the first establishment of two Provincial Prætors, one for the government of Sicily, and one for that of Sardinia and Corfica, was in this Consulate, and not at the time before mentioned. Be that as it will, it was in this year, that, at the motion of two Tribunes, Villius, and Titius, a law passed, empowering the Roman Prætors to appoint, as well in the provinces belonging to the Republic, as at Rome, guardians to those women and children who had none. This law was called Villia-Titia. Catrou.

Pomp. de
Orig. Juris.
Justinian.
Inst. B. 1.
Ulpian.
c. 11. de tutelis.

V. R. 327.
Euf. C. 17.
226.
226 C. 17.

Zon. B. 3.
Oros. 4.
B. 4. c. 13.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 24.

the Sylline books. The completion of it seemed now to approach, when the states of the Republic were bounded on one side by the Greeks, and on the other by the Gauls. The succeeding Consuls therefore, M. Valerius Maximus, and L. Apustius Fulvius, consulted with the Pontifices, how to quiet the apprehensions of the people; and immediately an edict was published by the Decemvirs, who had the care of the Sylline books, commanding that two Greeks, a man and a woman, and two Gauls, a man and a woman, should be buried alive in the Ox-Market; and by this they persuaded the people, that the prophecy was fulfilled, and that the Gauls and Greeks had taken possession of Rome.

The difficulties raised by superstition being thus surmounted, the Romans applied themselves to create divisions among the Gauls, and to levy a prodigious force; which (according to Polybius^b) amounted to near 700,000

	Foot.	Horse.
^b The numbers found upon the muster, as recorded by Polybius , are as follow. With the Consuls marched four legions of Romans , each legion consisting of 5,200 foot, and 300 horse.	20,800	1,200
They had also with them, of the allies,	30,000	2,000
Of the Sabines and Hetrurians were sent, under the command of a Prætor, to the frontiers of Hetruria ,	50,000	4,000
Of the Umbrians and Sarcinates (from the Appennines) 20,000, and as many of the Veneti and Cenomani were appointed to invade the Boii , in order to oblige them to keep a part of their forces at home, for their own defence,	40,000
At Rome were kept ready to march, (on any exigence) of the citizens,	20,000	1,500
These were strengthened by a body of the allies, amounting to	30,000	2,000
On the muster rolls sent to the Senate, from the allies were,
Of the Latins ,	80,000	5,000
Of the Samnites ,	70,000	7,000
Of the Iapyges , and Messapyges ,	50,000	16,000
Of the people of Lucania ,	30,000	3,000
Of the Marfi , Marrucini , Ferentini , and Vestini ,	20,000	4,000
The Romans had also in Sicily and Tarentum two legions, consisting each of 4,200 foot and 200 horse,	8,400	400
Beside all these, of the common people, in Rome and in Campania , were mustered, as fit to bear arms,	250,000	23,000
	699,200	69,100

Polybius, on occasion of this muster, expresses his admiration of the hardy enterprise of Hannibal, to attack an empire of such prodigious strength with an army of scarcely 20,000 men.

But Sir Walter Raleigh observes, that this muster seems to have been like to that which Ludovic Sforza made, when Lewis the XIIth invaded Milan; at which time, the better to encourage himself and his subjects, he took a roll of all persons able to bear arms within the Dutchy, though indeed he was never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certain it is, (adds our historian) that the battles of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion as was answerable to this large account. Yet were the Romans fain to arm their slaves, even for want of other soldiers, after their overthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marvel is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified 700,000 foot, and near 70,000 horse, so great was the terror which the threatened invasion from these Barbarians spread over all Italy. The Gauls nevertheless, with only fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, began the hostilities, entered Hebruria, pillaging and laying waste the country without opposition.

The Republic had promoted L. Æmilius Papus, and C. Attilius Regulus, to the Consulship. The latter went into Sardinia, to quiet some commotion there; while Æmilius took upon him the conduct of the war with the Insubrian and Boian Gauls, joined by a numerous army, from the other side of the Alps, of the Gæsatæ so^c called (says Polybius) because they served for pay, the word having that signification. They were commanded by two kings, Concolitanus, and Aneroestus.

Æmilius being uncertain what rout the Gæsatæ would take after they had passed the Alps, had led his troops to Ariminum, to hinder the enemy from entering upon the Roman lands by the coasts of the Adriatic sea. At the same time a Prætor, with a body of 50,000 foot, and 4000 horse, had been ordered into Hebruria, to defend the frontiers of that country. But in his march he missed of the enemy; who were advanced to the neighbourhood of Clusum (within three days march of Rome) when they heard that a Roman army was behind them, and would soon be at their heels. They immediately turned back to meet the Prætor and give him battle. It being about the close of day, when the two armies came in sight of each other, they both encamped. But in the night, the leaders of the Gauls, having meditated a stratagem, marched away with their infantry towards Fæsula^a, leaving only their cavalry to appear in the field, when day should return. In the morning, the Prætor seeing nothing but horse to oppose him, sallied out of his entrenchments and attacked them. The Gallic cavalry, according to their instructions, instantly gave ground, and took the road to Fæsula. Their flight drew the Romans terrified with the report of such a multitude: For, all heads are not fit for helmets; though the Roman citizens were, in general, as good fighting men as elsewhere might be found.

Another reason may be also assigned why Hannibal should not be much frightened at these muster rolls, even supposing the far greater part of the men, there registered, to be fit to bear arms. Polybius tells us, that the people of Italy, terrified at the approach of the Gauls, did not consider themselves now as being to fight only as allies of Rome, and for the preservation of her empire, but for their own proper safety, their families, their fortunes, all that was dear to them; and that it was for this reason they so readily executed the orders that were sent to them from the Senate. The contest with the Gauls was looked upon as the common cause of all Italy.

But when Hannibal passed the Alps, the case was widely different; for we may well conclude from the neutrality and cold behaviour generally observed by the allies of Rome, on that occasion, that they looked upon this war as regarding her only, and in which they themselves had little concern.

^c According to the Jesuits, the Gæsatæ were not a particular people of Transalpine Gaul, but probably Germans dispersed through all the Gallic nations, whose profession was arms, and who hired themselves to whoever would employ them in war. They had their name from a weapon they bore, called Gæsum.

^a A city of Hebruria, at the foot of the Apennines.

Polyb. B. 2. c. 25.

Y. R. 528. Def. Chr. 224. 227 Conf.

B. 2. c. 22.

B. 2. c. 26.

c. 25.

Y. R. 525.
B.C. Chr.
227.
227. Con.

after them, never suspecting that they should find the enemy's infantry in their way. The latter on a sudden appeared and fell vigorously upon the Prætor's troops already fatigued with the pursuit. 6000 of his men were killed upon the spot; the rest in disorder fled to a neighbouring hill, where they entrenched themselves. The first thought of the Gaulic Generals was to force the enemy immediately in this post; but considering afterwards that their own troops were wearied with the former night's march, they thought it best to give them some repose, and defer the attack till the next day.

P. L. B. 2.
c. 24. 10
c. 31.

In this distress of the Prætor's army, the Consul Æmilius came seasonably to their relief. Being informed of the approach of the Gætæ towards Rome, he had instantly quitted his camp at Ariminum, and had marched with expedition to the defence of his country. He was now encamped within a small distance from the enemy; and the Prætor's troops seeing the fires in his camp, and conjecturing the truth, took courage. The Gauls, perceiving the same fires, were greatly alarmed at the Consul's unexpected arrival; and being unwilling to hazard by a battle the loss of the rich booty they had got, they, by the advice of their King Mercobus, decamped in the night, purposing to march home through Lybria; and when they had secured their booty, to return to the war. In their march they kept along the shore of the Ætrurian sea. Æmilius, though his army was now strengthened by the remains of the Prætor's troops, did not think it adviseable to hazard a pitched battle; but chose rather to follow the enemy close, and watch his opportunity to harass them in their retreat, and, if possible, to recover some part of the spoils they were carrying off. It luckily happened, that his colleague Attilius, having put a speedy end to the troubles in Sardinia, had, in his return home, landed with his army at Pisa, and was now marching along the coast of the Ætrurian sea towards Rome: he was overjoyed when, near Talemon, a little port of Ætruria, he learned, by his scouts, the situation of things. And, in order to intercept the Gauls, he immediately drew up his infantry, making as wide a front as he could; and then commanded them to advance slowly to meet the enemy. He himself hastened with his cavalry to the top of a hill, by the foot of which the enemy must necessarily pass. His ambition was to have the chief glory of the success; and he persuaded himself, that by being the first to begin the battle, he should obtain that advantage.

The Gauls imagined at first that this body of Roman horse was only a detachment from Æmilius's army, and therefore ordered their cavalry to advance and drive them from their post. As for Æmilius, as soon as he perceived fighting at a distance, he concluded it was his colleague Attilius, attacking the enemy in front, for he had been informed of his landing at Pisa. He immediately detached all his horse to fetch a compass and join those of Attilius. Upon the arrival of so powerful a reinforcement the Romans renewed the attack with more briskness than ever.

ever. Attilius fighting with the utmost intrepidity was killed in the engagement. A Gaul cut off his head, and sticking it on the top of a lance, carried it through all the files of the Gallic troops. However the death of this brave man proved no advantage to them. One of his lieutenants took his place, and the action was continued as before. The Romans in the end had the victory, and kept possession of their post.

Y. R. 523.
E. C. 1.
274.
227 Cont.

During the conflict between the cavalry, on both sides, the Gallic Generals had time to form their infantry. Having two consular armies to deal with, one in their front, the other in their rear, they divided their battallions pretty equally, one half of them turning their backs to the other half; and to avoid being attacked in flank, they placed all their waggons and other carriages on the wings. Their plunder they had carried to a neighbouring hill, where they left it under a good guard.

The Gesatae who made the first line of the troops that faced Æmilius, confiding in their gigantic stature and strength, and observing that the plain where they were drawn up was full of bushes and briars, to avoid being incommoded in the battle by the thorns catching in their clothes, stripped themselves naked, keeping only their arms. But this vain confidence proved their destruction. For having only small bucklers, which were not sufficient to ward their huge bodies from the darts that were unexpectedly showered upon them by the Romans at a distance, they presently fell into discouragement and perplexity. Some transported with rage and despair threw themselves madly upon the enemy, where they found certain death; others, pale, discomfited and trembling, drew back in disorder, breaking the ranks that were behind them. And thus were quelled at the very first attack the pride and ferocity of the Gesatae.

And now the Roman dartmen retiring within the intervals of the army, the cohorts advanced to encounter the Insubrians, Boians, and Tauriscans, who fought with great resolution; for though they were hard pressed, and covered with wounds, they sustained the shock and kept their post, and may be truly said to have been inferior to the Romans only in their arms. Their shields were not so large as those of the Romans, and their swords were made only for cutting. Nevertheless they maintained the fight till the Roman cavalry, who had been victorious on the eminence, driving at once full speed upon them, put an end to the struggle. The defeat was general; 40,000 of the Gauls remained dead upon the field of battle, and 10,000 were made prisoners, together with Concolitanus, one of their kings. The rest escaped by flight, but Aneroestus their other king, the bravest soldier, and most experienced commander of all the Gauls, cut his throat afterwards in rage and despair. Æmilius after this victory marched his army into the country of the Boian Gauls, enriched his soldiers with booty, and then returned to Rome, where he had a magnificent triumph.

Diod. Sic.
B. 25. in Eclog.

The

Y. R. 529.
P. 100.
223
P. 100.
B. 2.
The fear of the Gaulic war was over, but the desire of revenge remained; and the next year's Consuls therefore, T. Manius Tergentius, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, had Gaul assigned them for their province. But these great men did not succeed, to the expectation of the Romans, nor pass the Po, as it was hoped they would. Their marches were retarded by violent rains, and a plague infected their army, which latter calamity not suffering them to return to Rome at the usual time, the famous Cæcilius Metellus was created Dictator, to hold the Comitia in their absence, for the new elections.

Y. R. 530.
P. 100.
223
P. 100.
B. 2.
C. Flaminius Nepos, and P. Furius Philo, being chosen Consuls, put the design of their predecessors in execution, and notwithstanding the vigorous opposition of the Gauls, passed the Po, and entered Insubria; but having suffered much both in their passage, and afterwards, and finding they could perform nothing of moment, they made a truce with this people, and retired into the territory of their friends the Cænomani. There they continued a while augmenting their army with auxiliaries; and then renewed their incursions on the Insubrian plains at the foot of the Alps. Hereupon the princes of this nation, perceiving the fixed determination of the Romans to subdue them, resolved to put all to the hazard of a battle; and having collected all their strength, which amounted to 50,000 men, marched against the enemy, and encamped within sight of them.

Z. 10. B. 5.
P. 100.
223
B. 2.
It happened a little before this that the Romans were much frightened by various prodigies in the heavens, in the waters, and upon the earth. In Ettruria extraordinary lights appeared in the air. At Ariminum three moons were seen at the same time. A river of Picenum rolled waters as red as blood. The Italians felt the violent earthquake that overturned the Colossus of Rhodes. At Rome a vulture lighted in the middle of the Forum, and staid there a considerable time. The Augurs being consulted upon these prodigies declared that there must have been some defect in the ceremonial at the election of the Consuls: upon which, a courier was immediately dispatched from the Senate, with letters commanding them to return to Rome. But when these letters arrived, the Consuls being on the banks of the river Addua, were in sight of the powerful army of the Insubrians; and Flaminius either guessing at the substance of the letters, or having been informed of it by his friends, prevailed with his colleague not to open the packet till after the battle.

Y. R. 531.
P. 100.
223
B. 2.
The Romans, being sensible that the enemy exceeded them in numbers, had intended to use the aid of those Gauls with whom they had reinforced their army. But now, remembering the faithlessness of these people, who were to be employed against troops of the same nation, they could not resolve to trust them in the present important conjuncture. At the same time it was by no means proper to express a diffidence of them, in such a manner as should give them occasion to quarrel. Flaminius, to free himself from this perplexity, made his Gauls pass to the other side side of the river on a bridge of boats; and then, by causing the boats to be hawled to his own side, put it out of the power of those suspected troops to do him any harm during the action. By this means also his own army was left without any hopes but in victory; for the river which they had at their backs was unfordable. Thus far the conduct of Flaminius appears commendable: but he was guilty of a great oversight in drawing up his army too near the brink of the river; for he left so little space between that and his rear, that had the Romans been ever so little pressed during the engagement, they had no whither to retire but into the water. However this defect of the Consul's management was supplied by the bravery and skill of his soldiers, instructed by their Tribunes. These officers had observed in former conflicts, that the Gauls were not formidable but in the ardour of their first attack, and that their swords were of such a fashion and temper as, after two or three good cuts, to stand bent in their hands, and so become useless to them if they had not time to streighten them on the ground with their foot. The Tribunes therefore furnished the first line of the Roman troops with the arms of the triarii, or third line; that is to say, with long javelins, like our halberts, and ordered the soldiers, first to make use of these, and then to draw their swords. These precautions had the desired success. The swords of the Gauls by the first strokes on the Roman javelins became blunted, bent, and useless; and then the Romans closing in with them, stabbed them in the face and breast with their pointed swords, making a terrible slaughter. Nine thousand of the enemy were killed, and seventeen thousand taken prisoners.

V. R. 530.
Bef. Chr.
222.
229 Conf.

After the action the Consuls opened the packet. Furius was for immediately obeying the order; Flaminius insisted on pursuing the war: The victory, he said, was a sufficient proof that there had been no defect in the auguries, and that the letters of revocation were wholly from the envy of the senate; that he would finish his enterprize, and would teach the people not to be deceived by THE OBSERVATION OF BIRDS, or any thing else. Pursuant to this resolution he attacked and took several castles, and one considerable town, with the spoils of which he enriched his soldiers, to prepare them for his defence in that quarrel which he knew would arise between him and the Senate. His colleague would not accompany him in these expeditions, but continued encamped, waiting to join him when he should return from his incursion.

Omf. B. 4.
c. 13.

Zon. B. 8.

When the two colleagues came back to Rome with their armies, the people as well as the Senate at first showed their resentment, by a very cold reception; but the troops of Flaminius, whom he had enriched, found means to prevail with the former to grant both the Consuls the honours of the triumph. The Senate, however, obliged these magistrates afterwards to depose themselves; such a respect, says Plutarch, had the Romans for religion, making all their affairs depend on the sole

Life of Marcellus.

will of the Gods, and never suffering, even in their greatest prosperities, the least contempt or neglect of the antient oracles, or of the usages of their country; being fully persuaded, that what most contributed to the welfare of their state was not the success of their arms, but their steady submission to the Gods.

Y. R. 531.
Bell. C. 2.
231
231 C. 2.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 34.

The Comitia being held by an interrex, M. Claudius Marcellus (of a Plæbeian branch of the Claudian family) who became afterwards so famous, was raised to the Consulate, with Cn. Cornelius Scipio. They were scarce entered upon their office when a deputation came to Rome from the Insubrians, to implore a peace; but the Senate, at the instigation of the new Consuls, who represented those Gauls as an untractable people, on whom there could be no dependance, dismissed their deputies with a refusal. Upon this they resolved to bring into Italy a fresh inundation of Gælatæ, who were always ready to fight for hire. Thirty thousand of these mercenaries crossed the Alps under the command of their king, Viridomarus.

Plut. life of
Marcellus

Early in the spring the Consuls passed the Po, and laid siege to Acerræ, a place near that river, and in the neighbourhood of Cremona. The Gauls were now ninety thousand strong, yet they thought it more advisable to oblige the Romans to raise the siege of that frontier town, by making a useful diversion, than to hazard a battle. Viridomarus therefore with ten thousand men passed the Po, entered the Roman territories, and advanced towards Clastidium in Liguria. Upon the news of this motion of the Gauls, Marcellus followed by only two-thirds of the Roman cavalry, and about six hundred of the light-armed infantry, left his camp and came up with the enemy near the place before named. He drew up his little army all in one line, giving it as much extent as he could. The Gauls seeing the infantry of the Romans so inconsiderable, and always despising their cavalry, had no doubt of the victory. But when the two armies were just ready to join battle, Viridomarus advancing before his troops, desired the Roman general to single combat. Marcellus joyfully accepted the challenge (for single combat was his talent) rushed upon his enemy, killed him and stripped him of his armour: and then the Gælatæ were so disheartened that the victor, with his handful of Romans, put them intirely to flight.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 34.

Entrep. B.
3. c. 6.

Zon. B. 3.

Vide Pigh.
ad Ann.
531.

During the absence of Marcellus, his colleague had taken Acerræ, and laid siege to Milan (or Mediolanum) the chief city of Insubria, but was himself besieged by the Gauls, while he lay before the town. The return of the victorious Consul changed the scene; the Gælatæ quite discouraged broke up their camp, fled, and repassed the Alps; and Milan immediately surrendered at discretion. Como was reduced to the same necessity; and, in short, the whole nation of the Insubrians submitted to receive law from the republic. Insubria and Liguria were now made one province, and called Cisalpine Gaul: and thus did all Italy become subject to Rome, from the Alps to the Ionian sea.

The

The Senate decreed Marcellus a triumph, and it was said in the decree to be, for having conquered the Insubrians and Germans, which makes it probable that the Gæsatae were originally German. The Consul, in his triumphal procession, carried on his shoulders a trophy of the spoils of Viridomorus; and this was the third and last triumph in which any opima spolia were seen at Rome. As for Cornelius Marcellus's colleague, he was continued in the new province as Pro-Consul, to regulate the affairs of it; and the same Comitia which allotted him that post, chose M. Minucius Rufus, and P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, to be the Consuls for the new year. The conquest of Istria, on the borders of the Adriatic, was the only military exploit during their magistracy.

Plut. life
of Marcell.

Fast. Cap.

See vol. i.
B. i. c. 2.
§. xii. & B.
2. c. 33.
§. 1.

Y. R. 532.
Bef. Chr.
220.
231 Conf.

Eutrop.
B. 3. c. 7.

C H A P. XV.

The second Illyrian war.

ABOUT this time Demetrius of Pharos, whom the Roman republic had placed in the government of Illyricum, and guardianship of the young king Pinaxus, seeing the Romans engaged in a troublesome war with the Gauls, and that Carthage wanted only a fair opportunity to break with them, had despised their orders, forced the Atintanes to renounce their alliance with the republic, and sent fifty ships of war beyond Lyffos to pillage the Islands, called Cyclades, in the Archipelago.

The new Consuls, L. Veturius Philo, and C. Lutatius, would have sailed for Illyricum, if they had not been forced to depose themselves upon some defect found in the ceremony of their election. They were succeeded by M. Æmilius Lepidus, and M. Valerius Levinus; but the season was now too far advanced to begin the expedition, so that it was postponed to the next Consulship. [By a Census taken this year, the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms appeared to be two hundred seventy thousand, two hundred and thirteen. The Census, as usual, was followed by a Lustrum, the forty-third from its institution.]

BOTH the Consuls of the new year, M. Livius Salinator, and L. Æmilius Paulus, embarked for Illyricum. Demetrius had assisted Philip, King of Macedon, (while a minor under the tuition of his uncle, Antigonus Dofon) in his wars with the Lacedæmonians, and had thereby secured himself a retreat with that prince, in case of a disaster. He had also fortified Dimalum, a city of importance in Illyricum; and having assembled the choicest of his troops in the Island of Pharos, his own country, held his court there. Early in the spring Æmilius sat down before Dimalum, and by surprising efforts took it in seven days; upon which all the old allies of Rome, who had been compelled to submit to the tyrant, returned joyfully to their former engagements. The next attempt was upon Pharos, the last refuge of the traitor. As the en-

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 16.

App. Illyr.
Dio. in Eclog. 9. ap.
Valef.

Y. R. 533.
Bef. Chr.
219.
232 Conf.

Vit. Pigh.
ad Ann.
533.
Liv. Epit.
20.

Y. R. 534.
Bef. Chr.
218.
233d Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 16. c. 18, 19.

Y. R. 534.
Bef. Chr.
218.
2559 Conf.

terprize was difficult, Æmilius thought it necessary to join artifice to valour. The Roman fleet had two Consular armies on board it; one of them was ordered to land in the Island, in the night, and hide itself in forests, and behind rocks. This done, a detachment of the fleet appeared off Pharos, in open day, as it were with design to land some forces there. Demetrius drew his army out of the town, to the sea-shore, to hinder the descent; which when the Legionaries, that were already landed, perceived, they left their ambush, and marching silently seized an eminence between the city and the port. It was of the last consequence to Demetrius to drive the Romans from this post, and therefore having encouraged his men he led them strait to the attack.

Pol. B. 4.
c. 66.

This gave the Consuls on board the fleet an opportunity to make their descent, and then the Illyrians finding themselves invested on all sides presently took to flight. As for the regent he made his escape to Macedon in a bark kept ready for that purpose.

B. 3. c. 19.

The defeat of the Illyrian army was followed by the taking of Pharos, which the Romans first plundered and then levelled with the ground. Thus Rome became a second time mistress of Illyricum. However, she did not reduce it to the state of a Roman province, having some compassion for the young king, who had been embarked in these affairs merely by the fault of his guardians.

App. in Illyr.

Auth. of the lives of illust. men.
c. 50.

The Consuls returned to Rome and obtained a triumph for their victories. Their conduct, nevertheless, had not been, in all respects, pleasing to the people, as appeared after the expiration of their magistracy*. Livius and Æmilius were then accused before the Tribes of having applied a great part of the spoils taken from the enemy to their own use, and of having distributed the rest of the booty partially among the soldiers. Æmilius upon his trial was acquitted, but Livius was condemned by all the Tribes, except the Mæcian, an affront which he resented to excess, as we shall see hereafter when he comes to be Censor.

Front.
Strat. B. 4.
c. 1. § 45.
Liv. B. 29.
c. 37.

Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 3.
§ 3.

In this Consulship the Senate observing, that the great concourse of strangers from Egypt and the Levant had introduced into the city the worship of Isis and Osiris, to whom several sanctuaries were already built, ordered these to be all demolished, agreeably to one of the twelve Tables, forbidding the worship of strange Gods. No workman, however, would venture the guilt of sacrilege by doing it, such credit had their worship gained among the people. The Consul Æmilius therefore, full of zeal for the religion and laws of his country, laid aside his Consular robe, took a hatchet and beat down those oratories to the ground.

Plin. B. 19.
c. 1.

* It was at this time Archagathus of Peloponnesus introduced surgery into Rome. At first he met with great applause, and a shop was built for him at the public charge, in a part of the city where four streets met:

But as his constant practice in the cure of wounds was to make large incisions, which are painful remedies, his art soon fell into disrepute.

But

But the most important transaction of this year was the planting colonies at Placentia and Cremona in the Gallic territories; this being the chief motive which inclined the Boians and Insubrians to favour Hannibal in his attempt upon Italy, that memorable and surprizing event which is next to engage the reader's attention.

Y.R. 534.
Bef. Chr.
218.
233d Conf.
Liv. Epit.
B. 20. Liv.
B. 21.
C. 25.

C H A P. XVI.

The second Punic war, or the war of Hannibal.

Its causes and commencement.

TWENTY-TWO years were now past, since Carthage, bending to the superior fortune of Rome, had with shame and reluctance submitted to the hard conditions of that treaty, which put an end to the FIRST PUNIC WAR. To relinquish the fair Island of Sicily to an imperious rival was a sore and grievous article; and perhaps the payment of those large sums, that were further exacted for the peace, was a yet more sensible mortification to a republic of avaritious merchants: But necessity compelled; nor could even the courage and abilities of the incomparable Amilcar furnish any remedy, in the then distressful situation of affairs. For after the defeat of Hanno at the Ægates, which made the Romans masters of the sea, neither the army of Amilcar at Eryx, nor the garrisons of Lilybæum and Drepanum could receive any supply of provisions or military stores. Sicily therefore was unavoidably lost: The army might be preserved; but the only visible way to preserve it was by a peace with the enemy. Amilcar's immediate object in the treaty was this preservation of the troops. Yet even this neither he nor they would consent to purchase at the expence of their honour as soldiers. They chose rather to perish than to give up their arms. As for the annual sums which the Consul Lutatius demanded from Carthage, Amilcar, on the part of his republic, readily yielded to that imposition. Nor did he much hesitate in complying with the further demands of money, which the ten commissioners from Rome insisted upon, before they would ratify the peace. What rendered him so tractable on this head, was doubtless (beside the danger of his army) the resolution he had secretly formed, that no more of the stipulated tribute should be paid, than was required to be paid at the time of the ratification. For as we learn from Polybius, he was determined to renew the war against Rome as soon as it should be possible to do it. Whatever fears some of the citizens of Carthage might have of the war's being transferred from Sicily to their own gates, if a peace were not concluded, it is evident that Amilcar, with that army of hardy veterans he then commanded, feared no enemy but famine; and could 534.

Y. of R.

See p. 62.

B. 3. c. 9.

Y. R. 114.
P. 1. C. 1.
2. 1. 1.
2. 1. 1. C. 1.

Polyb. L.
3. 1. 1.

could he have found means to transport those troops safely into Africa, without a peace, he would have entered into no treaty with the Romans.

The indignation of Amilcar, when he was thus constrained to leave Egy and abandon Sicily, is assigned by Polybius for the first cause of that memorable war which we are going to enter upon: For though this implacable enemy of the Romans did not live to attempt that vengeance, which to his last breath he was ever meditating, we shall presently see, that his spirit of revenge was not extinguished by his death.

P. 1. 1. 1.

P. 1. 1. 1.
3. 1. 1.

The dreadful and destructive conflict at home, to which on his return thither from Sicily he was obliged to give all his attention during more than three years, unavoidably suspended the execution of his purpose against Rome. And when that domestic disturbance was happily quelled, the treasury and strength of Carthage were too much exhausted to furnish what was necessary to support her in so arduous an enterprize. The Romans sensible of her weakness took advantage of it (as we have seen) to extort from her not only the cession of Sardinia, but the sum of 1200 talents; a fine shamelessly demanded for the reparation of an injury they had not received. And this odious extortion is held to be the second and the principal cause of that war which followed it at almost 20 years distance. For so barefaced an injustice, so insulting a procedure, as it furnished Carthage with a just ground to attack the Romans whenever she should be in a condition to do it, so it also brought all the Carthaginians in general to concur with their brave captain in his resentment and designs; it being now sufficiently manifest that they must either resolve to become obedient subjects of Rome, or take some effectual measures to render themselves the more potent republic.

With this view Amilcar, soon after the re-establishment of tranquillity at home by the suppression of the mercenaries and rebels, had a new army committed to him, to be employed in extending the Carthaginian empire in Spain; a country that both abounded with riches and was able to supply the republic with a sufficient number of brave troops, to make head against those multitudes of soldiers with which Italy furnished the Romans.

C. 1. 1.

How deeply Amilcar's hatred to Rome had rooted itself in his heart, and that revenge was his chief aim in this expedition, we have a singular and incontestible proof, in what he did just before his departure from Africa. His son Hannibal, at that time about nine years old, was with him, when he performed a sacrifice to Jupiter for the success of his intended voyage. The rites being all ended, and Amilcar having ordered the rest of the assistants to withdraw, he called his son to him, and tenderly caressing the boy, asked him, whether he were willing to accompany him into Spain? The boy not only most readily declared his consent, but with all the blandishments and eager vivacity peculiar to children, begged of his father, that he would permit him to go. Amilcar then taking him by the hand led him to the altar, made him lay his hand upon upon it, touch the sacrifice, and swear, that he would never be in friendship with the Romans.

THE CARTHAGINIAN passed the Straights of Hercules, and landed with his army on the western coast of Spain. Nine years he conducted the war in this country with uninterrupted success, reducing ^b many nations to the obedience of his republic: but at length, in a battle which he fought with the Vettones, a people of Lusitania, (defending himself a long time with admirable resolution) he was encompassed and slain: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and reputation, which by many signal victories he had acquired, together with the name of a second Mars.

This happened about the time when the Romans made their first expedition against the Illyrians.

Upon the death of Amilcar the command of the army was given to his son-in-law Asdrubal, at that time admiral of the galleys. He was no bad soldier, and a very able statesman; by his wisdom and gentle manners attracting the good-will of many princes of that country, and gaining more subjects to Carthage by his wonderful address in negotiation, than his predecessor had done by the sword. He also built new Carthage, (the present Cartagena) a town commodiously situated to be a magazine of arms, and to receive succours from Africa.

ROME began now to be alarmed. Her jealousy of Carthage had been asleep during Amilcar's remote conquests in Spain: but the formidable growth of her rival's power under the management of Asdrubal awakened it. She did not dare, however, to exact any thing of the Carthaginians very grievous, or to commence hostilities against them, being at this time in extreme dread of the Gauls, who threatened her with an invasion. Ambassadors were therefore sent to ^c Asdrubal, to draw him by fair words into a treaty, wherein he should covenant, that the Carthaginians would confine their arms within the Iberus. No mention was made of any other part of Spain in this treaty.

As the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between the two states, this demand was unreasonable; and the Romans seem to have

^b According to Zenaras, in the Consulate of Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius, [in the 520 of Rome, when Amilcar had been about five years in Spain] the Romans believing that the wars they had to sustain against the Ligurians and Sardinians, were owing to the secret practices of the Carthaginians, sent to these some ambassadors, who demanded of them in harsh terms, certain sums of money due by treaty, and that they should forbear touching at any of the Islands in the Roman jurisdiction: and to gain the readier compliance to these demands, the ambassadors presented a caduceus and a javelin, the one a symbol of peace, the other of war, bidding the Senate take their choice. The Carthaginians, nothing terrified at this menace, answered, that they would chuse neither, but would readily accept whichever they should think fit to leave them.

If this story [which does not seem probable] be true, the boldness of the Carthaginians proceeded doubtless from the great success of Amilcar in Spain.

^c According to Appian the treaty was made at Carthage, but the sequel proves this to be false.

Y. R. 534.
Bef. Chr.

218.
233d Conf.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 1.

Portugal,

Liv. B. 21.
c. 10.

See p. 90.

Polyb. B. 2.
c. 13.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 2.

See p. 91.
Polyb. B. 2.
c. 13.

V. R. 554.
Bef. Chr.
= 18.
233d Conf.

sought by it a pretext of quarrel, when by freeing themselves from the Gauls, they should be in a condition to begin a new war with Carthage. For should Asdrubal refuse to engage, or engaging not perform, they would in either case be furnished with such a pretext, though perhaps in neither would the pretext be just ^a.

Asdrubal was full of the same spirit as Amilcar, and had the same designs ever at heart. However he made no difficulty to comply with the motion of the ambassadors, having much to do, before he could pass that boundary which the Romans were for fixing to his conquests.

Sir W. R. By this treaty, Rome acquired some reputation in Spain. For when it was conceived by the Spaniards, that the African republic, which sought to be mistress over them, stood herself in fear of a more potent state, they began to turn their eyes hither for protection; and the Saguntines, whose city was on the south-side of the Iberus, entered into a confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly received.

Polih. B. 2.
c. 36.

WHEN Asdrubal had governed in Spain for the space of eight years, he was treacherously murdered ^a by a certain Gaul whom he had provoked by some injury. The Carthaginians, upon receipt of this news, suspended the nomination of a new commander, till they could learn the inclinations of the army; and they no sooner understood that the soldiers had unanimously made choice of Hannibal for their leader, than they called an assembly, and with one voice ratified the election.

222 B. 3.
c. 33.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 3.

Hannibal

^a This will be explained when we come to the proper place for it.

^b Livy and Appian say, that Asdrubal was killed in revenge by a slave, whose master he had put to death.

^c It is surprising that the judicious Mr. Rollin (in his Hist. Anc. 380,) should follow Livy, in relating an idle story full of absurdity, and which he afterwards (following again the same author) manifestly contradicts.

The Latin Historian reports, “ that Asdrubal [about three years before his death] wrote to Carthage to have Hannibal, who was then hardly at the age of puberty, sent to him, that the young man might be trained up to war, so as one day to imitate his father’s prowess. He adds, that Hanno and others opposed this motion in the Senate, imputing to Asdrubal dishonest intentions with regard to the lad; but that it was carried by a majority. That Hannibal arriving in Spain, drew all eyes upon him; and that the old soldiers observed in his person and manner, a wonderful resemblance to “ his father, &c. That he served three years under Asdrubal, and was then declared general of the army.” Now is there the least probability, either that Hannibal should arrive at such a masterly knowledge in the art of war in three years service; or that the Carthaginians should trust the conduct of their army and their empire in Spain to a young man of so short experience? That Livy was very careless in delivering this tradition, appears sufficiently from the age he gives to Hannibal, at the time of his being sent into Spain, at Asdrubal’s request, HUNC VIX DUM PUBEREM, when he was scarce fourteen. By the historian’s own account Hannibal was nine when Amilcar went into Spain; Amilcar lived there nine years; and Asdrubal had commanded near five years, before he sent for the young man.

Mr Rollin, aware, I suppose, of this inconsistency, drops the vix dum puberem, and makes Hannibal to be twenty-two at the time of his going from Carthage to Asdrubal; and by this indeed he avoids the anachronism: but then he seems not to have been Hannibal, soon after his confirmation in the command of the troops, undertook the reduction of the Olcades. The success was answerable to his desires. Having amassed much treasure by the sale of the booty taken in several towns, he marched to New Carthage, which he made his winter quarters; where liberally paying the soldiers who had served under him, and promising them farther gratifications, he both gained their affections, and inspired them with extraordinary hopes.

Y. R. 554.
Pct. Ch.
218.
253d C. n. l.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 13.

Early the next spring he led his army against the Vaccæi, and made a fortunate expedition: but in his return home, being attacked by the Carpetani, whom great numbers of the fugitive Olcades and Vaccæi (driven out of their own countries) had joined, he was reduced to very great straits. Could the enemy have compelled him to a pitched battle, he had inevitably been undone; but he, with great skill, making a slow retreat, till he had got the river Tagus between him and them, so judiciously disposed his horse and elephants, as entirely to defeat their endeavours to cross the river after him, which they attempted to their prodigious loss, by several fords at one and the same time. After which, passing the river himself, and pursuing his advantage, he, with terrible slaughter, routed this army of 100,000 Barbarians.

c. 14.

The Vaccæi being thus vanquished, there remained no nation on that side the Iberus, who durst think of opposing the Carthaginians, except the Saguntines. Hannibal had hitherto carefully forbore all hostility against this people, being ever mindful of his father's advice, which was, to avoid giving occasion to the Romans to declare war against Carthage, until such time as by the enlargement of her dominion and strength she was in a condition to cope with them. This time was now at hand; and the great success of the Carthaginian arms in Spain, under the conduct of Amilcar, Asdrubal, and Hannibal, is therefore assigned by Polybius for the THIRD CAUSE of the SECOND PUNIC WAR.

B. 3. c. 10.

While Hannibal was meditating the first blow he intended to give, and was clearing the way for the attack, by the several enterprizes above-mentioned, the Saguntines dispatched frequent messengers to the Romans, partly out of apprehension of their own impending danger, and partly out of friendship to their allies, that they might be perfectly informed of the progress of the Carthaginians. Little attention was given, at Rome, to these advices, for a long time; but at last it was judged proper to send some ambassadors into Spain, to examine into the truth of the facts.

c. 15.

Hannibal having carried his conquests as far as he had proposed that year, returned to take up his winter-quarters in New Carthage, which been aware that the whole story is overthrown by what Hannibal says in the Senate of Carthage at the end of the second Punic war, That he had never before been at home since he was nine years old. See Livy, B. 30. and Mr. Rollin, Vol. I. p. 486.

was then become the seat of the Carthaginian government in Spain. There he found the Roman ambassadors; and, giving them audience, was by them admonished, upon no account to attempt any thing against the Saguntines, a people received into the protection of Rome; and also to leave the army, with Asdrubal, and to forbear passing the river Iberus.

Hannibal, young, full of martial fire, fortunate in his enterprizes, and mortally hating the Romans, answered with a careless and haughty air, pretending a friend to the Saguntines. That a sedition having formerly happened among the citizens of Saguntum, the Romans, to whose arbitration they referred the dispute, had unjustly condemned to death some of the magistrates; and that he would not suffer this injustice to go unpunished; for it had ever been the custom of the Carthaginians to undertake the cause of those who were wrongfully persecuted.

The ambassadors departing with this answer, failed to Carthage (pursuant to their instructions, in case of such a reception from Hannibal) there to expostulate upon the matter with the Senate; though they well saw, that a war was unavoidable. Little indeed did they imagine that Italy would be the theatre of it; but concluded that Saguntum and its territory would be the scene of action.

Hannibal at the same time sent to Carthage for instructions how to proceed with regard to the Saguntines, who, as he said, encouraged by their confederacy with Rome, committed many outrages against those who were in alliance with Carthage. According to Livy, these allies of Carthage were the Turdetani, between whom and the Saguntines, Hannibal had contrived to raise a quarrel, that he might have a pretence, in quality of friend to the former, to attack the latter.

What answer the Roman ambassadors received from the Carthaginian Senate is not recorded; but we may well gather from the sequel, that it was by no means satisfactory. The Senate of Rome, nevertheless, being in the same prepossession as their ambassadors, concerning the seat of the war, that it would be in a remote country; and considering also that the war when once begun would probably be carried to a great length, resolved, before they entered upon it, to give a period first to their affairs in Illyricum, and punish the perfidy of Demetrius; believing that they should be able to effect this, and yet have sufficient opportunity to defeat the designs of Hannibal.

But these proved vain deliberations; for Hannibal was too much in earnest. He marched with his army towards Saguntum, at the same time that the Roman Consuls embarked for Illyricum; and before the Consuls had finished their expedition, Saguntum was taken.

The Carthaginian used the more diligence in attacking this strong and wealthy city, for many weighty considerations. The reduction of Saguntum would probably deprive the Romans of all hope of making war in Spain: The nations, he had already conquered, terrified by this new success of his arms, would be held in better obedience; and those who were yet unconquered would stand in greater awe of his power. And, what was still of greater importance, he should be able to pursue his enterprizes with more security when he had no enemy at his back. He farther considered, that this town, should he take it, would yield him large supplies of treasure for carrying on the war; that his army would be more at his devotion when he had enriched them with booty; and that he should be enabled to secure to himself friends at Carthage, by sending thither a part of the spoil.

Y. R. 534.
Bef. Chr.
218.
2331 Conf.

From all these motives he was indefatigable in pressing the siege; which nevertheless lasted many months. The Roman Senate no sooner received advice of his having begun it, but they sent ambassadors into Spain with instructions to give him warning to desist, and, in case of his refusal, to sail to Carthage and there demand of the Senate, the delivering up of their general to the Romans by way of compensation for the breach of the league between the two states.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 6.

HANNIBAL hearing of the arrival of these ambassadors on the coast of Spain, dispatched some messengers to meet them at the sea-side, and to signify to them, that neither would it be safe for them to come to his quarters; nor had he leisure to give them audience. And, as he knew very well to what place they would direct their course, after receiving such a message, he without delay sent proper emissaries to Carthage to prepare the chiefs of the Barchine faction for the occasion.

c. 7.

Livy reports that Hanno, the avowed enemy of Amilcar's family, and the head of the opposite faction, was the only man, in the Carthaginian Senate, who was for complying with the demands of Rome; and that he spoke to this effect:

c. 10.

“ How often have I conjured you by those Gods, who are the witnesses and arbiters of leagues and treaties, not to suffer any of Amilcar's race to command your armies! How often have I told you, that neither the manes nor the progeny of that man would ever be at rest, and that no friendship, no peace with the Romans could be preserved inviolate, so long as there remained one alive of the Barchine name and family! Hannibal is an aspiring youth, proudly ambitious of being a monarch; and who thinks nothing so conducive to his purpose, as to draw upon us war after war, that so he may live in arms, and be always surrounded with legions: And you, by making him the general of your armies, have furnished fuel to his fire; you have fed the flame which now scorches you. Your forces at this time besiege Seguntum, contrary to the faith of treaties. What can you expect, but that Carthage be soon invested by the Roman legions, under the conduct of those very Gods, who in the former war took vengeance on us for the like ^s perfidiousness?

“ Are

^s Hanno refers here (as he afterwards explains himself) to some attempts of the Carthaginians upon Tarentum, [at the time, I suppose, when Pyrrhus's troops held that city.

Y. R. 534.
B.C. 218.
218. C. 534.

“ Are you yet to learn what kind of enemies they are whom you provoke? Are you still strangers to yourselves? Are you ignorant of the fortunes of the two Republics?

“ Your worthy general would not vouchsafe the ambassadors of your allies a hearing; he has violated the law of nations. The ambassadors of our friends, worse treated than the messengers from an enemy were ever known to be, have now recourse to you. They demand satisfaction for the unjust violation of a treaty. They would have you clear the body of the nation from the shame of so odious a breach of faith, by giving up into their hands the author of the crime. The more moderate they are at present, the more exasperated, I fear, and the more implacable will they be hereafter. Remember the Ægates, and the affair of Eryx, with all the calamities you suffered for four and twenty years together. And yet we had not then this boy at the head of our armies, but his father, Amilcar himself, a second Mars, as some are pleased to style him. But we could not then forbear making attempts upon Tarentum in violation of treaties, as we do now upon Saguntum. The Gods declared themselves against us in that war, and, in spite of all our pretences of right, made appear by giving victory to our enemies, which of the two nations had unjustly broken the league.

“ ’Tis against Carthage that Hannibal now plants his mantelets and erects his towers; it is her wall that he now shakes with his battering rams. The ruins of Saguntum (I wish I may prove a false prophet!) will fall upon our heads; and the war begun with the Saguntines must be maintained against the Romans.

“ But, say you, shall we then deliver up Hannibal into the hands of his enemies? I know that my opinion will have little weight with you, because of the old animosities between his father and me: Yet I must declare, that, as I rejoiced when Amilcar fell, because, had he lived, he would have engaged us before now in a war with the Romans, so I hate and detest this youth as a fury and the firebrand to kindle a Roman war. Yes, I think it fit, that Hannibal be delivered up to expiate the breach of the league; and, if no-body had demanded him, I should vote to have him transported to the remotest corner of the earth, whence his name might never reach our ears to disturb the repose of our state.

“ My conclusion therefore is, that deputies be forthwith sent to Rome to pacify the Senate; others into Spain, with orders to the army to raise the siege of Saguntum, and deliver up their general to the city. See Vol. I. p. 601.] In the Epit. of Livy, B. 14. it is said, that the Carthaginians came with a fleet to the succour of Tarentum, whereby they broke their league with the Romans. And this doubtless is the foundation whereon Zenaræ builds his report, that the motive assigned by the Romans for their beginning the first Punic war, was the assistance which the Carthaginians had given the Tarentines against Rome. See p. 15. of this Vol.

“ Romans;

“ Romans; and a third deputation to the Saguntines to make reparation for the injuries they have sustained ^h.”

Y. R. 534.
Bef. Chr.
218.
233d Conf.

The Senate, though they heard this orator with respectful attention, as a man of authority and reputation among them, paid no regard to his remonstrance, invective, or advice on the present occasion. Nay, the Senators in general exclaimed, that he had spoken more like an enemy than a subject of Carthage. As for the Roman ambassadors, they were dismissed with this answer, That the war was begun by the Saguntines and not by Hannibal. And that the Romans would act injuriously to Carthage, if to her ancient alliance with them, they preferred the later friendship of the Saguntines.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 11.

Hannibal was all this time pressing the siege of Saguntum with uninterrupted diligence. He animated his soldiers in person, working in the trenches among them, and mingling with them in all hazards. The defence was brave even to obstinacy; and it is said to have lasted eight months. When the besieged could no longer hold out, many of the citizens, rather than listen to the hard terms of peace which Hannibal exacted, (as the giving up their arms, leaving their city to be demolished, and moving off with nothing more of all their substance than two suits of apparel) threw themselves into a great fire, where they had first cast all their most valuable effects. While this was doing, it happened that a tower which had been much battered and shaken, fell down on a sudden. A body of Carthaginians immediately entered at the breach; and Hannibal, upon notice of this accident, seizing the opportunity, made a general assault and carried the place without difficulty. He gave orders, that all who were found in arms should be put to the sword; an unnecessary order, for they themselves were firmly determined to die fighting: many of the inhabitants shut themselves up, with their wives and children, and burnt the houses over their heads. But notwithstanding all this destruction of men and effects, the place yielded to the conquerors great store of wealth and many slaves. The money he appropriated for carrying on the war against Rome; the slaves he divided among the soldiers; and all the rich household stuff he sent to Carthage.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 17.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 14.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 17.

The Roman ambassadors who had been dispatched to the Carthaginian Senate, brought the answer they had there received, to Rome, about the same time that the news arrived of the destruction of Saguntum.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 16.

Livy tells us, that the compassion of the Romans for this unfortunate city, their shame for having failed to succour such a faithful ally, their indignation against the Carthaginians, and their apprehension of the main

^h The reader, I am persuaded, will not easily believe, that a speech of this tenor was really delivered either by Hanno or any other Carthaginian Senator. The greater part of the matter of it doubtless belongs to Livy no less than the form. However, thus much we may conclude from the party spirit of Hanno, that he disapproved the proceedings of Hannibal, and was against a rupture with Rome.

event of things, as if the enemy were already at the gates of Rome;) all these various passions, and other circumstances, that at first they only mourned and trembled, instead of consulting for the common safety.

But it being now no longer a question whether they should enter into a war, they quickly began to make the necessary preparations for action. The Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, and the Prætor Sempronius Longus drew lots for their provinces. Scipio was to sail to Sempronius, and Spain to Cornelius. Sempronius with two Roman legions, consisting each of 4000 foot and 300 horse, and with 12,000 foot and 1800 horse of the allies, on board a fleet of 100 galies, was to go first into Sicily, and thence into Africa, in case the other Consul should prove strong enough to hinder the Carthaginians from sailing into Italy. Cornelius for this purpose had two Roman legions, with 12,000 foot and 1600 horse of the allies committed to his conduct; and, with a fleet of 60 quinqueremes, he was to sail to Spain, and endeavour to prevent Hannibal's leaving that country. The Consul had no stronger a navy appointed him, because it was supposed that the enemy would not come by sea, nor chuse to fight in that kind of service. And his army was also the less numerous, because the Prætor Mambrius had two Roman legions, with 10,000 foot and 1000 horse of the allies, to guard the province of Gaul. The whole number of the forces raised by the republic on this occasion was 24,000 Roman foot and 1800 horse, 40,000 foot, and 4400 horse of the allies; and their ships of war amounted to 220.

These extraordinary preparations sufficiently shew the terror the Romans were in at the approaching war. And indeed it will not appear to be ill grounded, if we consider that the Carthaginians, ever since Amilcar's going into Spain, had been fighting and conquering, and that the Spaniards, by whom their army was strengthened, were men steady even to obstinacy. Besides, the Roman republic had now no general equal to Hannibal, a man of immense views; ever judicious in his enterprizes; a wonderful genius for seizing the critical moment to execute his designs; the greatest master in the art of appearing not to act, when he was most busy; inexhaustible of expedients; as skillful in recovering himself out of danger, as in drawing an enemy into it. He had been bred up to arms from his infancy, and though now only in the flower of his age, had the experience of several years command of an army. For Asdrubal being himself no great warrior, had committed to him the conduct of all dangerous and difficult enterprizes. So that no general then living had had more exercise than he; nor were any troops better disciplined than his. Hannibal's design of carrying the war from the remote parts of Spain into the very center of Italy, is said, by an ingenious writer, to be the boldest project that ever captain durst conceive, and what was justified only by the event. But this does not seem to have been the opinion of Polybius, who tells us, that Hannibal nibal had taken all prudent measures for facilitating his march, and for securing the assistance of the Gauls about the Alps and about the Po, which it was the easier to do, because he and they had one common interest with respect to the Romans, the hated enemies of both.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234. Conf.

Though the Romans made the preparations above mentioned for war, as a thing certain and unavoidable, yet that nothing might be wanting to the exact observance of forms, they dispatched¹ a third embassy to Carthage, to demand once more, what they did not expect would be yielded, That Hannibal and his council should be delivered up to them; and the ambassadors were also now instructed to declare war in case of refusal.

Polyb. B.
3. c. 20.
Livy. B. 21.
c. 18.

When they were come to Carthage, and admitted to audience, the Senate heard the haughty demand they brought with a coldness approaching to contempt. Nevertheless, one of the Senators best qualified, was directed to speak in maintenance of the Carthaginian cause. This orator, without taking the least notice of the treaty made with Asdrubal, (as if no such treaty had been made, or, if made, was nothing to the purpose, because made without authority) dwelt wholly on that which was concluded at the end of the Sicilian war; in which, as he alledged, there was no mention of Spain. He al-

Polyb. L. 3.
c. 21.

¹ Polybius mentions only two embassies from Rome to the Carthaginians on the affair of Saguntum, one before the siege, another after the town was taken. Livy also mentions only two; but, according to him, the first was during the siege, when (he tells us) Hannibal refused the ambassadors an audience; the second, after the reduction of the place. That we may not reject Polybius's authority, who relates an audience which Hannibal before the siege of Saguntum, gave at Carthago to some ambassadors from Rome; nor yet accuse Livy or his vouchers of inventing the story of Hannibal's refusing audience, and of all that followed thereupon at Carthage, we have supposed (what seems most probable) that there were three embassies from Rome in relation to Saguntum, the first before the siege, the second while it was carrying on, the third after the place was taken.

To the first ambassadors Hannibal gave audience and a haughty answer, of which they made complaint to the Carthaginian Senate. Those who came next were refused audience by him, and they also carried their complaints to Carthage. The last embassy was sent only to Carthage.

Father Catrou, not liking, I suppose, that the Romans should appear in so disadvantageous a light as they do, upon this occasion, is angry with Livy, for making them send even twice to Carthage before they declare war; though if any thing may be depended on in the Roman story, this fact has a title to credit.

It may indeed seem hard to be accounted for, that the Romans, contrary to their former methods of proceeding, should so shamefully neglect to succour their allies, the Saguntines, and, when the case required the most vigorous measures, should lose so much time in vain and fruitless embassies to a people they had formerly vanquished and rendered tributary. Chevalier Fénelon conjectures, that the Romans were really intimidated by Hannibal's superior genius and skill in war, being conscious of their having no general of equal ability with the Carthaginian. And may we not also reasonably suppose, that at the time when Hannibal began to threaten Saguntum, the Roman republic was not in a condition to send by sea into Spain an army of sufficient strength to make head against the numerous and victorious troops of Carthage?

Y. R. 516.
E. C. 17.
217.
234 C. 71.

lowed indeed, that it was there covenanted, that neither of the contracting parties should make war on the allies of the other, but added, that the Saguntines were entirely out of the question, they not being at that time in alliance with Rome; and he caused the articles of the treaty to be read.

Y. R. 511.
E. C. 12.
212.
234 C. 71.

The Romans refused absolutely to enter into a verbal discussion of this point. They said, there might have been room for such a discussion, had Saguntum been then in the same state as formerly, but that this city having been sacked contrary to the faith of treaties, the Carthaginians must either clear themselves of perfidy, by delivering up the authors of the injustice, or confess themselves guilty, by refusing the satisfaction required. And finding that the Senate would give no answer to the question, whether Saguntum was besieged by public or private authority, but would confine the debate to the justice or injustice of the action, the eldest of the ambassadors, gathering up the skirt of his gown, and making a hollow in it, Here, said he, we bring you Peace and War, take which you will. At which they all cried out with one voice, Give us which you please. I give you War, then, said the Ambassador, letting his robe loose again. We accept it, they all answered, and with the same spirit that we accept it, we will maintain it.

L. B. 21.
119.

A mutual denunciation of war being thus made, the ambassadors did not return directly homeward, but, pursuant to their instructions, passed into Spain, to solicit the states and princes of that country, who were on the north side of the Iberus, to enter into an alliance with Rome, or at least not to contract any friendship with the Carthaginians. They were courteously entertained by the Bergusians. But when they came to the Volscians, they received from this people an answer, which being reported all over the country, was a means to turn away all the other nations from siding with the Romans. With what assurance, said they, can you ask of us to prefer your friendship to that of the Carthaginians, after we have seen the Saguntines, who did so, more cruelly betrayed by you, their allies, than destroyed by their open enemies. Go seek for confederates among those who never heard of the ruin of Saguntum. The miserable fate of this city will be a warning to all the nations of Spain, never to repose confidence in Roman faith or amity. The same kind of reception they met with from all the Spanish states to which they afterwards addressed themselves. So that finding their negotiations in this country fruitless, they passed into Gaul, endeavouring to persuade the several nations there, not to suffer the Carthaginians to march through their territories into Italy. The first public assembly of Gauls, to whom they made this proposal, burst into so loud a laughter, mixt with a murmur of indignation, that the magistrates and seniors could hardly still the noise of the younger sort, so impudent and foolish did it seem, to request of them, That they would suffer their own lands to be ravaged and spoiled, to preserve those of other men who were utter strangers to them. But silence

C. 22.

at

at length being made, the ambassadors were answered, That neither had the Romans deserved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill at their hands, that they should take arms, either in behalf of Rome, or against Carthage. That, on the contrary, they had heard, that some of their countrymen had been driven out of their possessions in Italy by the Romans, constrained to pay tribute, and made to undergo other indignities. The like answers to the like demands were made in the other public councils of Gaul. Nor did the ambassadors meet with any thing like friendship or even peaceable disposition towards them, till they came to Marseilles, which was in alliance with Rome; and where, upon careful enquiry made by their allies, they learnt that Hannibal had been beforehand with them, and by the force of gold, of which the Gauls were ever most greedy, had gained them over to side with him. And with this unpleasing news they returned to Rome.

V. B. 119.
Bel. Car.
217.
214. C. 11.

Hannibal was all this time extremely busy in settling the affairs of Spain, and in taking all the proper measures his foresight could suggest, for the happy execution of his great designs. After the reduction of Saguntum, he had retired into winter quarters at New Carthage. And the better to dispose his Spanish soldiers to his service, he had given them permission to return to their respective homes till the beginning of the spring, when, he told them, he expected their appearance again. In the mean while, as one of his chief cares was to provide for the safety of Africa, he transported thither, of Spaniards, (raised among the Thersives, Mastii, and Olcades) 13,850 foot, and 1200 horse, together with 800 slingers of the Baleares. And while he thus furnished Africa with Spanish troops, he took order for the security^k of Spain, by sending for a supply of near 15,000 Africans, to be commanded by his brother Asdruba, whom he intended to leave governor in his absence. He furnished him also with 50 quinquereines, 4 quadriremes, and 5 triremes, that he might be in a condition to oppose any descents that should be attempted there by the Romans.

Polyb. B.
3. c. 33.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 21.

Livy and Polybius commend the prudence of the Carthaginian in this exchange of troops; because both the Africans and Spaniards would probably prove the better soldiers for being thus at a distance from their respective countries, and they would be a kind of pledges or hostages for the mutual fidelity of the two nations.

Besides these precautions, Hannibal (as has been already hinted) had dispatched ambassadors to the Gauls on both sides the Alps, to sound their dispositions, and to engage them to take part with him in his enterprise. For this end he was extremely liberal, not only of his promises,

Polyb. B. 5.
c. 34.

^k Livy reports, that Hannibal selected 4000 young men out of the chief cities in Spain, and of the best families, and caused them to be brought to [New] Carthage, there to remain as hostages for the fidelity of the Spaniards. These were probably the same youths which are afterwards said to be left by him in Saguntum, as we shall see in its proper place.

Y. 3. 55.
B. 6. 35.
— C. 6.

but of his gold, believing it would be a main step towards a happy issue of his undertaking. In, by avoiding war in his way to Italy, he could lead his army entire against the Romans. The answers he received were favourable to his wishes; For the Gauls most willingly agreed to his proposal, and expected him with impatience. They also sent him word, that though the passage of those mountains was difficult, it was not insuperable. Animated with new hope by these reports, he began early in the spring to march his troops out of their winter quarters; and having now the concurrence of the Senate and people of Carthage to his purpose, he began openly to discourse of his intended war against Rome, exhorting the soldiers (whom he assembled for this purpose) cheerfully to engage in the expedition; and telling them, in order to raise their indignation against the Romans, that they had impudently demanded a surrender of both him and all his chief officers into their hands. He also expatiated on the fertility of the country which he purposed to invade, the good will of the Gauls, and the confederacies he had made with their princes: and when the army had loudly declared their readiness to go whithersoever he was disposed to conduct them, and he had, with thanks, applauded their fidelity, and prefixed the day for their march, he dismissed the assembly.

Polyb. B.
3. 6. 35.

The Spaniards, whom Hannibal had permitted to visit their families during the winter, being returned to their service, and the day¹ appointed for the general rendezvous being come, the whole army took the field. It consisted of 90,000 foot and 12,000 horse, and with this mighty force the Carthaginian immediately began his march from New Carthage towards the river Iberus.

BUT now, before the reader accompanies Hannibal into Italy, he may perhaps be willing to make a pause, and enquire into the justice of the cause that leads him thither.

E. 3. c. 35.

“ If the destruction of Saguntum (says Polybius) be considered as the “ CAUSE of the SECOND PUNIC WAR, we must necessarily determine, “ that the Carthaginians engaged in it very unjustly: Whether regard
“ be had to the treaty of Lutatius, whereby each party became bound “ to offer no violence to the allies of the other: Or regard be had to the “ treaty of Adrubal, in which it was stipulated that the Carthaginians “ should not carry their arms beyond the Iberus.

See p. 63.

See p. 103.

“ But if, for the CAUSE of the war made by Hannibal, we assign the “ seizure of Sardinia by the Romans, and the money which they extorted “ from Carthage at that time, we shall be obliged to confess, that the

¹ According to Livy, Hannibal, before he began his expedition against the Romans, went from New Carthage to Gades, there to discharge some vows he had made to Hercules, and to bind himself by new ones, in order to obtain success in the war he was going to enter upon. Polybius says nothing of the matter.

“ Carthaginians

“ Carthaginians acted not unjustly in entering upon this war. For they “ did no more than lay hold of a favourable opportunity to revenge “ themselves on those, who had taken advantage of their distresses, to “ iniure and oppress them.”

*T. R. c. 5.
 Bet. C. 1.
 217.
 214. C. 6.*

Here then the question of right is decided by our author. For he had before declared, and enlarged upon it, that the siege of Saguntum and the passing the Iberus were only the beginnings of the war and not the causes; and that the affair of Sardinia, and the money extorted at that time were the principal cause of it. And he now declares, that this principal cause is sufficient to justify the Carthaginians.

B. 3. c. 6.

Our author nevertheless, in another part of his history, observes, that though Hannibal had a just motive to begin the war, and though he did begin it from that just motive, yet because he did not publicly assign that motive for beginning it, but made use of a false pretext, his enterprize seemed contrary to justice. After relating the haughty and evasive answer of Hannibal to the first ambassadors that were sent to him from Rome, he adds,

Sec p. 126.

“ Thus Hannibal, transported by a violent hatred, acted in every thing “ without consulting his reason, and, instead of declaring the true motives “ of his proceeding, had recourse to false pretexts, after the manner of “ those, who, prepossessed by their passion, do what they have deter“ mined, without regard to equity or honour: Otherwise, had it not “ been better to have demanded of the Romans the restitution of Sardinia,
 “ and the money, which, during the weakness and distress of the Cartha- “ ginian republic, they had extorted from her, and, in case of refusal, “ to declare war against them? But as he concealed the true cause, and “ made use of the false pretext of injuries done to the Saguntines, he seem“ ed to enter into that war without reason, and contrary to justice.”

*Polyb. B. 3.
 c. 15.*

The reader observes, that Polybius here takes it for granted, that Han- nibal, in attacking Saguntum, made war upon the Romans. Now Han- nibal and the Carthaginians denied that the treaty with Lutatius could be broke by the siege of Saguntum. They alledged, that, as the Sagun- tines were not allies of Rome at the time of making that treaty, they could not be comprehended in it. Polybius indeed thinks, that future allies as well as present ought to be understood to be comprehended in that treaty; and so said the Romans. But what then? It was surely a point that might well bear a debate. Yet the Roman ambassadors (as we have seen) would enter into no discussion of this matter with the Cartha- ginians, but, upon their refusal to give up Hannibal as having unjustly violated that treaty by the siege of Saguntum, declared war.

And this makes it difficult to conceive why Polybius, on the present occasion, mentions the treaty with Asdrubal; that treaty, according to him, relating only to the Carthaginians passing the Iberus, which river Hannibal did not attempt to pass till after the declaration of war by the Romans.

Reverend. Polybius never speaks of the Saguntines as concerned in that treaty, but expressly that, when it was concluded, no mention was made in it of any other part of Spain, i. e. of any part on the south of that river; consequently no mention of the * Saguntines.

Livy indeed tells us, that the Saguntines were included in the treaty with Asdrubal, and makes the Carthaginians confess it; which, if true, we must suppose that a new article in favour of the Saguntines was inserted into that treaty, after Rome had entered into an alliance with them.

Livy adds, that the Carthaginians, in their conference with the Roman ambassadors, would have evaded the obligation of the treaty with Asdrubal, by saying, that it was concluded by him without authority from Carthage, and that, in paying no regard to it, they did but follow the example of the Romans, who had refused to abide by the first treaty of Lutatius in Sicily, for the like reason. Doubtless, if the Carthaginians employed this subterfuge, it was weak and trifling, because (as the same author, from Polybius, observes) in the treaty of Lutatius this clause was added, That it should be firm and inviolable, if ratified by the people of Rome; but in Asdrubal's treaty there was no proviso of like import.

But it is possible that Asdrubal might make an absolute treaty, and yet have no authority for so doing. At least, it was a common practice with the Roman generals, to make such treaties; and it was as common with the Roman Senate to break them, as having been concluded without sufficient authority.

To return to the main question, the justice of the war made by Hannibal:

It is plain that if the treaty of Sicily could not be construed to extend to future allies as well as present; and if Asdrubal's treaty was made without sufficient authority from Carthage, (both which the Carthaginians pleaded) there can be no pretence to charge Hannibal with beginning a war against Rome, by his attacking Saguntum.

But let us suppose, with the Romans, that the Saguntines were unquestionably within the treaty of Sicily; and also, that Asdrubal, in his treaty, acted with ample authority. What will follow? Not, that the second Punic war is to be imputed to the injustice of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, or that they were the first violators of the treaty of peace

* Livy, in making the Carthaginians use this plea at the time of the conference in question, seems to found himself on Polybius; and perhaps Polybius ought to be so understood: But as the Greek historian tells us, that the Carthaginian orator past over the treaty of Asdrubal in silence, as if no such treaty had ever been made, or, if made, was nothing to the purpose; I imagine, that the plea above-mentioned was not employed at the time of the conference; but that afterwards, when they used to speak of the justice of their cause, they urged among other things the nullity of Asdrubal's treaty: For, as Polybius relates, the Roman Ambassadors did not, at their audience in the Carthaginian senate, object that treaty, nor set forth their rights, or pretensions of right, till after the war was begun. B. 3. c. 29.

between the two nations. No: The Romans had scandalously violated that treaty by their seizure of Sardinia, and extortion of the 1200 talents; and all conventions between Rome and Carthage following that first violence and breach of the peace, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this menace, on the part of the Romans, Do whatsoever we require; otherwise we will make war, without regard to our oath, which we have already broken. And as their engaging Asdrubal to covenant, that he would not pass the Iberus, was a new breach of the peace of Italy, and a new insult upon Carthage; because Rome had as yet no foot in Spain, on the one side of that river, whereas Carthage, on the other side, held almost all the country: So the alliance, which the Romans made with the Saguntines, was in reality a breach of their treaty with Asdrubal. For the Romans could have no sort of colour for requiring that Asdrubal should not pass the Iberus, but an implicit covenant that this river should be a boundary, over which they themselves would not pass in any discovery or conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain; and that the Carthaginians should be free to push their conquests as far northward as to this limit. And so Livy says expressly, that by Asdrubal's treaty, the river Iberus was to be the boundary between the two empires. Only he adds (inconsistently with Polybius's account) that the Saguntines were included in that treaty.

It would seem then that the Carthaginians were not obliged, by any treaties with Rome, or by any consideration of justice, to abstain from the war which Hannibal began. And as to that open declaration of his true motives, the want of which made his enterprize seem dishonourable, he could not have made that declaration without throwing a bar in the way to the execution of his main design, the marching into Italy. For by demanding the restitution of Sardinia, and of the 1200 talents, he would have discovered the extent of his meditated revenge, and would thereby have put the enemy on such preparations for war, as might have disappointed all his views of doing justice to his country. It was to avoid this inconvenience, that he would seem at first to have no design but against the Saguntines; and we find his policy had its effect: For the Romans (as has been observed) had not the least apprehension of his intending so soon to invade Italy, but imagined that the seat of the war, they should have with him, would be in Spain.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.
Sir W. R.

B. 21. c. 22

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 16.

C H A P. XVII.

The march of Hannibal, from the Iberus in Spain, to the Po in Italy: and how the Roman arms were employed in the mean time.

First Year of the War.

T. R. 111.
E. C. 111.
217.
212 C. 111.

P. 111. E. 111.
C. 111. A. 111.
L. 111. B. 111.
S. 111. A. 111.

HANNIBAL, having passed the Iberus, subdued in a short time all those parts of Spain, which he had not before entered, and which lie between that river and the Pyrenees. His successes however cost him many hard conflicts, in which he lost abundance of men. Of this newly conquered country he appointed one Hanno to be governor, instructing him to have a particular watch over the Bargusians, of whom he had the greatest jealousy, on account of the friendship they had contracted with the Romans. And for the support of his government, he left under his command 10,000 foot and 1000 horse; and he committed likewise to his keeping all the heavy baggage of the main army, who left it behind them, that they might march light and disencumbered.

Being arrived at the borders of Spain, 3000 of his Spanish soldiers (not so much from fear of the war, as of the fatigue of so long a march, and of passing over the Alps, returned home without asking leave; which that others might not also do or attempt, he courteously dismissed above 7000 more, who seemed willing to be gone; a condescension that made the journey seem less tedious to those that did follow him, as not being enforced by compulsion. His army consisted now of but 50,000 foot and 6000 horse; but they were good men, and had been long trained, and in continual action during the wars in Spain, under the ablest captains that Carthage could ever boast. With these he passed the Pyrenees and entered into Gaul. He found the Gauls, that bordered upon Spain, ready in arms to forbid his entrance into their country. However by gentle words and rich presents to the leaders, he gained them over to favour his expedition, which he assured them was not designed against them; and he continued his march without any dangerous molestation, till he arrived upon the banks of the Rhone.

Polyt. B. 3.
C. 42.

Here he bought up from the Gauls, (who, on the west side of the river, favoured his passage for money and to get rid of him) all the boats large and small he could meet with, whereof the inhabitants, practising commerce, had a great number; and he also amassed prodigious quantities of timber for making floats, of which the soldiers, labouring in that employment with great diligence, in two days time made abundant provision. Nevertheless the Carthaginian found that it would be impossible to compass his passage without some stratagem, because

cause of the opposition of the Gauls on the east side of the river, who, in great multitudes, had determined to defend their bank. Wherefore, after three days deliberation, he in the night detached an officer named Hanno with a considerable part of the army, to go a good way up the river, then cross it, and endeavour to get behind the enemy. Hanno passed the stream about 25 miles from the Carthaginian camp, made silent marches towards the camp of the Gauls, and, in the morning after the fifth night, by smoke in several places, (the appointed signal,) gave notice of his approach to Hemilal, who thereupon immediately began to attempt his passage. He put into the larger boats a part of his cavalry, ready for action. The horses of the rest, which could not be embarked, swam in tow after the small boats, one man, on each side of a boat, holding three or four horses by the bridles. The horsemen and the infantry went in small vessels and on floats; and that their passage might be the easier, the largest vessels were so disposed, a little higher up the stream, as to break the force of the current. When the Gauls perceived the Carthaginians advancing on the river, they by dreadful howlings (according to their custom,) signified, that they waited the attack with resolution. But when they heard a great noise behind them, saw their tents on fire, and themselves assailed in rear, as well as front, they made but a short resistance. Vanquished and broken, they fled every man to his own village.

It has been already observed, that the Romans, without waiting the return of their ambassadors from Carthage, had ordered the Consul P. Cornelius Scipio into Spain, and Tib. Sempronius into Sicily, from whence he was to go into Africa.

Cornelius, though, before he set out, the news arrived that Hannibal had passed the Iberus, was still in hopes he should be able to hinder him from marching out of Spain. For this end having embarked his forces at Pisa, on board the fleet of sixty galleys, which had been assigned him, he steered along the coast of *Liguria, and in five days arrived at Marseilles. Learning here that Hannibal had already passed the Pyrenees, he proceeded no further in his voyage than to the nearest mouth of the Rhone, where he landed his men, with intention to wait for the enemy on the banks of that river, and there put a stop to their further progress. The difficulties of the way from the Pyrenees, and the divers nations, through which Hannibal was to make his passage, induced the Consul to conclude, that he was yet a great way off. The Carthaginian however was at this time actually employed in passing the Rhone, at the distance of about four days march † from the sea. The Consul heard a report of this; but it seemed so incredible, that he could not believe it. Nevertheless, thinking it advisable to endeavour after such intelligence as he might rely on, while the army lay to refresh themselves after the fatigue of their voyage, he commanded out

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 43.

See p. 110.
Polyb. B. 3.
c. 40.

c. 41. & 42.

* Genoa.

† A little above Avignon.

Y 2. 300. 1000 of horse to make discovery, giving them, for guides, some Gauls in the service of Hannibal.

1000. 1000. This discovery was made with a party of 500 Numidian horse, not far from the Consul's camp. For Hannibal, the next morning after his passage, and some Numidians were waiting over the elephants, having received intelligence of the Consul's arrival at the mouth of the Rhone, had sent this party out to bring him an account of the strength and situation of the enemy. The conflict between the Romans and Numidians was very bloody, an hundred and sixty of the former were left dead upon the spot, and more than two hundred of the latter. The Romans had the honour of the day, forcing the Numidians to quit the field, and pursuing them so near their entrenchments as to be eye-witnesses of what they were sent to learn. After which they returned with all diligence to carry the news to the Consul.

1000. 1000. Scipio, while these things passed, was giving audience, in the presence of his whole army, to Magilus a Gallic Prince, who was come to him from the countries about the Po. Magilus (with whom the Consul's son had before had a private conference) assured him by an interpreter, that the Gauls impatiently expected his arrival, and were ready to join him; and that he himself would be the guide to conduct the army through places, where they would find every thing necessary, and by a road, which would bring them speedily and safely into Italy. When the Prince was withdrawn, Hannibal in a speech to his troops reminded them of all their exploits to that time, and of the success they had met with in every occasion of danger, by following his counsels. He exhorted them to continue their confidence in him, and to fear nothing for the future; since having passed the Rhone, and secured such good allies as they found the Gauls to be, the greatest obstacles to their enterprize were now surmounted. The soldiers applauded all he said, expressing great willingness, and even ardour, to follow him whithersoever he should lead the way. He commended their good dispositions, made vows to the Gods for the preservation of all his troops, admonished them to refresh themselves well, and prepare to march next day, and then dismissed the assembly.

1000. 1000. Just at this time the Numidians, who had survived the skirmish, returned with an account of their adventure. Hannibal, as he had before resolved, broke up his camp, the next morning as soon as it was day, and posting his horse as a body of reserve, a little down the river, ordered his infantry to march. He himself staid behind, waiting the arrival of the elephants that were not yet all waited over the stream.

1000. 1000. The method of doing it was this. From the bank of the river they threw a large float of timber, which, being strongly held by great ropes twisted about some trees, they covered over with earth, that the elephants might be deceived by this appearance, and take it for firm ground.

At

At the end of this first float was fastened a second, but so, as it might be easily loosened from it. The female elephants were brought upon the first float, the males followed them; and when they were all got upon the second float, this was loosened from the first, and by the help of small boats towed to the opposite shore. It does not appear how many of these animals were transported at a time. But when the first were landed, the float was sent back to fetch others, and so on till the whole number was brought over. Some of them being unruly fell into the water, but they at last got safe to shore; not a single elephant was drowned, though some of their conductors were.

And now Hannibal, making his horse and elephants the rear-guard to his infantry, marched along the banks of the river *northward, (though that was not the shortest way to the Alps) being resolved to avoid an engagement with Scipio, that he might lead his troops as entire as possible into Italy.

Scipio, upon the information brought him by his discoverers, having immediately ordered all the baggage on board his ships, was coming by long marches with his whole army to attack the Carthaginians; but he did not arrive at the place where Hannibal had passed the Rhone, till three days after he was gone from thence. Despairing therefore to overtake him, he made haste back to his fleet, embarked his army, dispatched his brother Cneius with the greatest part of it into Spain, to carry the war into that country, and set sail himself for Italy, in hopes, by the way of Hetruria, to reach the foot of the Alps before Hannibal could arrive there.

The Carthaginian, after four days march, arrived in a country which, from its situation, was called the Island, being washed on two sides by the Rhone, and another^m river which runs into that. Its form is triangular,

^m It has been much disputed whether this other river was the Arar [now called the Saone,] or the Isara, [the Isere.]

“ The text of Polybius, says Mons. Rollin, “ as it has been transmitted to us, and “ that of Livy, place this island at the “ conflux of the Rhone and the Saone, “ that is, in the place where the city of “ Lyons now stands. But this is a manifest “ error. It was, in the Greek, Σαῶνος, “ instead of which ἰσᾶρος has been substituted. J. Gronovius says, that he had “ seen in a manuscript of Livy, Bisarat,
“ which shews, that we are to read Isara, “ Rhodanusque amnes, instead of Arar, Rhodanusque; and that the island in question “ is formed by the conflux of the Isara and “ the Rhone.”

VOL. II.

Chevalier Folard, who knows perfectly well the road from the place where Hannibal passed the Rhone (which is agreed to be between Orange and Avignon) to Lyons; and who also knows perfectly well what an army like Hannibal's is capable of doing, maintains, that it was absolutely impossible for it to march to Lyons in four days, it being 35 leagues; and, though he does not omit the reasons brought by Mr. Rollin, he lays the main stress of his argument (in behalf of the Isere) on the length and badness of the way to the Saone, there being three rivers to pass, and almost the whole way being through defiles.

I know not whether some aid to this cause might not be drawn from the time employed in Scipio's march, who was so eager

R

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

* Polybius
(c. 47.) says
Eastward,
but this agrees not with the context.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 31.
Polyb. B. 3.
c. 49.

Y. R. 335.
B.C. 187.
370.
214 C. 1.

gular, and resembles the Delta of Egypt, with this difference, that the country here spoken of, is bounded on it's third side by high mountains, eager to come up with the Carthaginians, and give them battle. It is said that he did not arrive at the place where Hannibal passed the Rhone, till three days after he was gone from Liens. Now it is reasonable to suppose that he began his march the very same morning that Hannibal began his: the fourth between the parties having happened the morning before, and there being time enough for Scipio to receive intelligence by his scouts where the enemy was: and though, to get to that place, he had not half the way to make, that Hannibal had, to reach Liens, it cost him, with all his expedition, three days march.

On the decision of this question, another is made very much to depend, Over what part of the Alps the Carthaginian army passed into Italy? Whether over the Alpes Pennine, that stand a good way to the north of Turin, or over the Alpes Cottia, that stand a little to the south of that city? Livy is for the latter, and wonders that this fact should ever be questioned, since it is agreed that the part of Italy which Hannibal first entered, was the territory of the Taurini [the people of Turin] into which country the other passage would not have brought him; nor does he believe that passage was then open. He tells us also that the army crossed the Durance, in its way to the mountains, which agrees very well with the opinion of its going over the Alpes Cottia, as may be seen by the maps. But the rest of Livy's account does not well accord with these particulars, nor indeed with common sense.

Chevalier Felard, who is well acquainted with the Alps, and all the roads thither, is sure, that Hannibal went the shortest road, from the country of prince Proculus to Turin; not only because it was the shortest, but because it was the safest and the best. He won't allow, that Hannibal went so far northward, along the banks of the Rhone, as even to the conflux of that river and the Ijere. He says, there was no occasion to do it, on account of any danger, either from Scipio or any allies of Rome. According to the chevalier, Hannibal, leaving Genève on his left, passed the Dia [which runs into the Ijere] over against Vizille. Thence he successively marched to Bourg d'Osson, Le Mont de Lens, Le Lausaret, Briançon, Le Mont Genèvre, Suzanne, Le Mont Sestrières, Suze, Cel de la Fenestre, and Pignerol; at a small distance from which last he encamped in the plains.

The fathers Catrou and Renillé differ from the chevalier in both these questions. According to them, Hannibal crossed the Rhone, at its conflux with the Saone, and then turning eastward marched along the Rhone, on its north-side; then crossed it again, marching on its South-side to the Durance (which they suppose to be Livy's Durance) and thence to the foot of the Alpes Pennine, which they passed, by the Great St. Bernard.

As to the objection of the 35 leagues march, in four days, they think it is sufficient to say, that Hannibal was in haste to get out of Scipio's way.

And as to Σαγας [Sceras] (the supposed † antient name of the Ijere) "It can only impose, say they, on those who don't know that the Saone was antiently called Scene, and by corruption Saucona. Amianus Marcellinus calls it so, and it had the name of Matijona, because Maven is situated upon its banks. So that here is correction for correction. Is it not more natural and more probable that Sceras should be changed into Sceras, than that Sceras should be changed into Ijara?"

But the main strength of their argument is from Polybius, who tells us, that Hannibal continued his march along the Rhone EASTWARD. "Now, say the reverend Fathers, it is evident by a cast of an eye on the map, that if the Carthaginian army marched up the Rhone from west to east, it must first have marched along it as far as to Liens." The necessity of this consequence I can't see. However, much doubtless might be built on this passage of Polybius, if we did not meet with it at a time when it is impossible it should be true; but it is just when Hannibal is setting out to go NORTHWARD along the river, and even 35 leagues northward, if he went to the conflux of the † Culture-Flak

* E. g. c.
47.

tains, whereas the Delta, which the Nile washes on two sides, is bounded on the third by the sea.

Here he found two brothers disputing for the kingdom, and the nation engaged in a civil war. The two armies were just ready to give battle when Hannibal arrived. At the request of the elder brother (named Brancus) he assisted him, and forced the younger to retire. Hannibal had foreseen, that it would be very advantageous to him to have the friendship of a prince of this country; and he immediately reaped many benefits from it. The Gaul furnished his troops, not only with provision and arms, but with clothes; for they were in a tattered condition, most of them barefoot, and very ill provided for a march over the snows and ice of the mountains. But the most essential service he did was by putting his troops in the rear of Hannibal's army, (which could not without great dread enter the territories of the Gauls called Allobroges;) and escorting it to the place where it was to ascend the Alps.

Hannibal, thus attended, marched 100 miles in ten days without molestation. So long as he was in the flat country the petty princes of the Allobroges made no opposition to his progress, either fearing the Carthaginian cavalry, or being held in respect by the Gauls that were in the rear of the army. But when these had retired to go home, and the Carthaginians began to ascend the mountains, they perceived that the mountaineers had possessed themselves of the highest cliffs that commanded the streight through which the army was to pass, with a resolution to oppose its passage. Here Hannibal therefore was obliged to make a halt and encamp. Had the mountaineers, says Polybius, concealed their designs till the Carthaginian army was advanced a good way into the narrow passes, it had been inevitably destroyed. Hannibal having learnt by the means of some of those Gauls, who served him for guides, that the

Y. R. 575.
E. C. Chr.

217.
234 Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
C. 19.
Liv. B. 21.
C. 31.

Polyb. B. 3.
C. 5.

the Rhone and the Saone. Casaubon seems to have been shocked at this inconsistency; for in his translation he has neglected the words πρὸς τὸν ποταμὸν. (along the river.)

As to the PASSAGE OF THE ALPS,
"There are six reasons, say the Jesuits,
"which incline us to believe that Hannibal
"crossed the Alps by the Great St. Bernard,
"[one of the Alpes Penninæ.]"

I shall mention only three of them.

"1. Livy and Polybius say, that this general, to encourage his troops, shewed them from the top of the mountain the rich plains of Italy that lay near the Po. Now supposing he had marched by the Alpes Cotticæ, as Livy pretends, he could not possibly from thence discover those plains; other mountains would have intercepted his view."

"2. Polybius reckons 1400 stadia, or about 175 miles from the place where Hannibal passed the Rhone to the foot of those Alps which he ascended to go into Italy. And if we say with Livy, that he passed any of the Alpes Cotticæ, it is impossible to make out that distance."

"3. Polybius tells us, that Hannibal passed the Alps near the place where the Rhone rises. Consequently he passed over the Alpes Penninæ."

These reasons seem decisive, as to the passage of the Alps, (whatever becomes of Scoras, and the 35 leagues march) Polybius's authority being unquestionable, since, as he tells us, he made a journey on purpose to visit the places where Hannibal had passed, that he might be the better able to give an account of them.

V. P. 55.
 E. 1. 55.
 254. 55.
 254. 55.

Polyb. B. 5.
 c. 51.

enemy quitted their posts every night, retiring to a town not far off, he took his opportunity with a detachment of his best men (leaving the greatest part of his forces with the baggage) to advance by night and seize those posts, before the return of the Barbarians; who in the morning were extremely surprized to find themselves thus dispossessed. However, as they perceived the cavalry and beasts of burden moving forward in the streights at a great distance, they ran thither and fell with fury upon the rear-guard of the army. The Carthaginians suffered a great loss of men, horses, and beasts of burden upon this occasion; which destruction was owing more to the difficulty of the passage, than the swords of the enemy. For the horses, when wounded by the mountaineers, or frightened by their howlings, rushed upon the beasts of burden, oversetting them and every thing else that stood in their way, and hurrying all down the precipices that bordered the road.

Hannibal, being sensible that the loss of his baggage would alone be sufficient to destroy his army, hastened with his detachment to the succour of the troops that were thus embarrassed. Falling on the enemy from the higher ground he slew most of them, and put the rest to flight, yet not without sustaining considerable loss of men himself. What remained of his horses and beasts of burden now passed the streight, but with much difficulty, because of the ruggedness of the way. After which, taking with him those of his men who were the least fatigued with the combat, he attacked the town from whence the enemy had sallied upon him, and he easily made himself master of it, the inhabitants having been almost all drawn out of it by the hopes of plunder. This conquest proved of great advantage to him. For he recovered a good number of men, horses, and beasts of carriage which had fall into the enemy's hands. He also found a sufficient quantity of corn and cattle to sustain his army for two or three days. And he gained this farther benefit, that the mountaineers of these parts were now so struck with dread, that they thought no more of interrupting his march.

6. 55.

Here he encamped and staid a whole day to refresh his troops. He then pursued his march, which for some days was unmolested. On the fourth, the people inhabiting the places near the road, having contrived a stratagem to attack him by surprize, came to meet him with olive branches and garlands, the usual signals of peace among these nations. Hannibal, mistrusting them, was very inquisitive concerning the intention of their coming. They told him, that having been informed of what had happened to their neighbours, and being themselves unwilling either to do or to suffer any injury, they were come to assure him of their peaceable dispositions; of which if he doubted they would give him hostages for his security.

Hannibal was for a while in suspense what resolution to take: But considering that if he accepted their offer with condescension, they might possibly become more easy and tractable, and that, if he rejected it, it, he should have them immediately for open enemies, he at length pretended a great willingness to be upon terms of friendship with them.

Y. R. 535.
Bel. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Upon which they brought him hostages, furnished him with cattle, and seemed to place entire confidence in the Carthaginians. Hannibal seeing this, and either having, or seeming to have a better opinion of them, told them, they should be his guides to conduct him through the remaining part of his way over the mountains. Thus for two days they marched at the head of the army. But when it was got into a hollow way, overlooked by steep and craggy rocks, these faithless friends, in concert with others of their countrymen who had lain concealed, fell suddenly upon the troops in front, flank and rear. The greatest number attacked the rear. The army would have been utterly destroyed, says Polybius, if Hannibal, who all along retained some diffidence of these Barbarians, had not taken his precautions to guard against them, by placing his baggage and his cavalry in the van, and his heavy armed infantry in the rear-guard. These sustained the shock of the enemy. Nevertheless he lost a great number of men, horses, and beasts of burden. For the Gauls having possessed themselves of the cliffs, and advancing thereon as the Carthaginians advanced in the hollow way, rolled down upon them huge stones, which occasioned an exceeding terror among them. Hannibal was obliged, with one half of his army, to remain all night in the open air, upon a rock, to defend the horses and beasts of carriage, as they filed along through the streight below; for which movement that night was hardly sufficient, the train was of such a length.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 53.

The next day, the enemy being retired, Hannibal rejoined his horse and baggage, and continued his march. The Gauls after this made no more attempts upon him, except in small parties, that, sallying out by surprize from their lurking places in the hollows of the rocks, sometimes upon his van, sometimes upon his rear, seldom failed to carry off a part of his baggage, which was their chief purpose. The elephants were of great use to the Carthaginians on these occasions, for wherever they chanced to appear, they struck such a terror into the mountaineers as made them instantly take to their heels.

Hannibal at length, after nine days march from the first ascent, gained the summit of the mountain. Here he staid two days, that those of his men, who with infinite toil had climbed to this height, might take breath; and that his sick and wounded, who were still behind and moving slowly on, might have time to crawl up. And Polybius adds, that while the troops continued here, they had the agreeable surprize of seeing many of the horses and beasts of burden which had fallen in the way, or had by fear been driven out of it, and were thought lost, arrive safely at the camp, having followed the track of the army.

It

It was now about the end of autumn, and abundance of snow was newly fallen on the top of the mountain. Hannibal perceiving his soldiers to be extremely discouraged by the sufferings they had already undergone, and by the apprehension of those that were to come, called them together, that he might try to revive their hope. Having led them to a convenient spot for taking an extensive view of the plains below; "There," said he, "cast your eyes over those large and fruitful countries. The Gauls who inhabit them are our friends. They are waiting for us, ready, and impatient to join us. You have scaled, not only the ramparts of Italy, but the walls of Rome itself. What remains is all smoothness and descent. One battle gained, or two at most, and the capital of Italy will be ours."

The next day he broke up his camp and began to descend. But now, though he had no enemies to encounter except a few lurking robbers, he is said to have lost almost as many men and horses in going down the mountain as in coming up. The way was so steep and slippery in most places, that the soldiers could neither keep on their feet, nor recover themselves when they slipped; and the ground being covered with snow, it was difficult to hit the right path, and if they missed it, they fell down frightful precipices, or were swallowed up in depths of snow. Nevertheless being inured to such dangers, they supported this with fortitude. But at length they came to a place much worse than any they had before met with, and which quite took away their courage. The path, for about a furlong and a half, naturally very steep and craggy, was rendered much more so by the late falling away of a great quantity of earth: so that neither elephants nor horses could pass. Here therefore they stopt short. Hannibal wondering at this sudden halt, ran to the place, and having viewed it, plainly saw there was no advancing farther that way. His first thought was to try another, by fetching a compass. But he quickly desisted from this attempt, it being found impracticable. For though the snow that had last fallen, being soft and of no great depth, yielded good footing enough for the soldiers and horses that marched foremost; yet when this had been so trampled upon, by them, that the feet of those who followed came to the hard snow and ice under it, the latter could by no means advance, or even keep upon their feet. And when they endeavoured to sustain themselves on their hands and knees, they often slid down and were lost in pits and precipices. And as for the horses and beasts of burden, when they struck their feet into the ice to preserve themselves from falling, they could not draw them out again, but remained there as if they had been themselves frozen. It was necessary therefore to seek some other expedient.

Hannibal having caused all the snow to be removed that lay upon the ground near the entrance of the first way, he there pitched his camp;

camp; and then gave orders to cut out a winding path in the " rock itself; and this work was carried on with so great diligence and vigour, that at the end of one day the beasts of burden and the horses were able to descend without much difficulty. He immediately sent them forward, and, removing his camp to a place that was free from snow, put them to pasture. It now remained to enlarge the way, that the elephants might pass. This task was assigned to the Numidians, and it took up so much time, that Hannibal did not arrive with his whole army in the plains below, on the confines of Insubria, till four days after he began to descend. He had been fifteen days in passing the Alps, and these included, five months and a half in his march (of about 1000 miles) from New Carthage.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Of the thirty-eight thousand foot with which the Carthaginian general had crossed the Rhone, he had now but 12,000 Africans, and 8000 Spaniards; and his eight thousand horse were reduced to about 6000. This enumeration is according to Hannibal's own register, which he afterwards caused to be engraved on a column near the promontory of Lacinium in Calabria.

c. 56b

His first care, after entering Italy and pitching his camp in the plain at the foot of the mountain, was to refresh his men, who stood in great need of it. Famine and fatigue had so disfigured them, that they looked like Savages. But as soon as he saw that both men and horses had recovered their strength, and were fit for action; he marched against the Taurini *, who were at that time in war with the Insubrians, and who had rejected his repeated solicitations to enter into an alliance with him. He sat down before their chief city and took it in three days, putting all who had opposed him to the sword. This expedition struck such a terror into the Gauls of this neighbourhood, that they came of their own accord and surrendered themselves at discretion. The remoter Gauls of the plains about the Po would have also been glad to join him, as they had long intended to do. But as the Roman legions had passed beyond those plains, and had escaped the ambushes there laid

c. 60.

* The people of Taurin.

" Mr. Rollin seems very loth to part with Livy's VINEGAR, which was poured upon the rock to soften it, after this had been first made red hot under flaming piles of huge trees. " Many, says Mr. Rollin, " reject this fact as fabulous. Pliny observes, that vinegar has the force to " break stones and rocks. Saxa rumpit infusum, quæ non ruperit ignis antecedens. " Lib. 23. For which reason he calls " vinegar Succus rerum dormitor. Lib. 33. c. 2. Dio, speaking of the siege of Eleuthera, says, that the walls of it were made " to fall by the force of vinegar. L. 36. p. 8.

" It is likely, [apparemment] adds Mr. Rollin, what makes people question the " truth of Livy's account, is the difficulty " that Hannibal would have to procure in " those mountains a sufficient quantity of " vinegar for the operation." Doubtless the unbelievers do imagine this to be an insuperable objection to the story. But this is not all. For a better authority than Livy assures us, that Hannibal had no wood to make a fire with; That there was not a tree in the place where he then was, or near it. Polybius, B. 3. c. 55. Τὸν γὰρ Ἀλκιὺν τὰ μὴ ἄκρα, καὶ πρὸς τὰς ὑπερῶνας ἀνιχνύει, τελευτᾷ ἀδυνατεῖ καὶ ψυχὰ παύει ἐστὶν.

for

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

for them, these Gauls thought it better now to keep quiet; nay some of their nation were constrained to take arms for the Romans. Hannibal therefore judging that he had no time to lose, resolved to march into their country, and endeavour by some exploit to raise the courage of a people who were so well disposed to favour him.

Pol. B. 3.
c. 51.

Lit. B. 21.
c. 39.

He was full of this design when he received intelligence that Scipio had passed the Po with his army, and that he was not far off. The two Generals are said to have conceived a high opinion of each other. Hannibal's name had been long renowned, even before the taking of Saguntum; and, that Scipio must be a captain of eminent worth, the Carthaginians had well concluded, from the Romans having chosen him, preferably to all others, to be his opponent. But this mutual impression was now become much stronger, by the hardy enterprize of the one to march over the Alps, with the happy execution of it: and the expeditious courage of the other in coming from the banks of the Rhone, to meet him, at the foot of those mountains.

But nothing had ever so astonished the people of Rome, as the news of the Carthaginians being so near. They had scarce ordered one of their Consuls into Africa to attack Carthage, and another into Spain to stop Hannibal, when they hear, that this same Hannibal is in Italy at the head of an army besieging towns. Such terror seized them, that they immediately dispatched an express to the Consul Sempronius, then at Lilybæum, to postpone every other affair, and come with all expedition to the defence of his country.

Pol. B. 3.
c. 41. and
L. B. 21.
c. 40. &
105.

Sempronius, to whom a considerable army, and a fleet of 160 galleys had been committed, and who had made mighty preparations at Lilybæum for a descent upon Africa, was so elated with ambitious hope, that he thought of nothing less than laying siege to Carthage itself, when he had first cleared the coasts of Italy and Sicily of the Carthaginian fleets: Before he went into Sicily, the Roman prætor of that province had gained some considerable advantages by sea over the Carthaginians, and had disappointed a design formed by ~~him~~ to possess themselves of Lilybæum by surprize. When the Consul arrived at Messina, he was there met by king Hiero, who, continuing his friendship to the Romans, not only clothed the legions and furnished them with corn at his own expence, but with his fleet accompanied theirs to Lilybæum. From this place Sempronius made a successful attempt upon the Island of Malta; a conquest which served to cover Sicily on that side. After which, being returned to Lilybæum, and having learnt there, that a Carthaginian fleet was ravaging the coasts of Calabria, he made preparations to drive the enemy from thence; but while he was getting ready for this expedition, he received the order above-mentioned to return into Italy to the assistance of his colleague. Hereupon he gave one part of his fleet to his lieutenant Pomponius, to guard the coast of Italy, another to Æmilius prætor of Sicily, and with the rest, having embarked his army, set sail for Ariminum in the Adriatic.

C H A P. XVIII.

The Battle of the TICIN.

WHILE the forces of Sempronius from Sicily were in their voyage, Hannibal and the Consul Publius Scipio were advancing to meet each other. Scipio (as was before * observed) had, from the mouth of the Rhone, sent almost all his own consular army, under the conduct of his brother Cnecius, into Spain. The forces which he now commanded were chiefly the remains of an army † which had been assigned to the Prætor Manlius, to guard the province of Gaul, and which had since been defeated by the Boii.

Y. R. 535.
P. C. 5.
217.
234 C. 5.

† Scip. 121.
‡ Scip. 121.
119.

For these Gauls had no sooner heard of Hannibal's passing the Iberus, in his way to Italy, but, regardless of the hostages they had given at the conclusion of the last war with Rome, they rose in arms against her, and drew the Insubrians into the revolt. What made the Boii so forward in this matter, was their extreme dissatisfaction with the republic, for planting two colonies in their neighbourhood at Placentia and Cremona; an affair which, though long intended, was not quite finished when the Carthaginian began his march from Spain. The Boii fell first upon those lands which had been destined for the new colonies, pursuing the Romans who fled before them, to *Mutina, another Roman colony. In this place, which they besieged, were three Romans of great distinction, (one of them having been Consul, and the other two, Prætors) who had been commissioned to make the partition of the lands. The Gauls, contrary to their faith given, seized upon the persons of these commissioners at a conference for an accommodation, hoping by this treachery to recover their hostages. The news of it roused the Prætor Manlius. He hastened to the relief of Mutina: But the Gauls having got notice of his approach, fell upon him by surprise, in his passage through a forest, and cut off a great part of his army, he himself narrowly escaping with the remainder to Tanetum, a small town on the banks of the Po. To this place the enemy pursued him, and there held him invested, till the Prætor Attilius, with a legion, that had been raised for Spain, and 5000 men of the allies, were sent from Rome to his assistance. Upon the approach of these troops the Gauls raised the sieges of both Mutina and Tanetum, and retiring thence dispersed themselves about the country.

Polib. B. 3.
c. 40.

* Modena.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 26.

The forces of Manlius and Attilius, which had been thus employed, composed the army, which Scipio (who had landed at Pisa, and gone thence to Placentia) led against Hannibal. Having passed the Po, he turned to the left, and advanced to the Ticin^a, over which he caused a Polib. B. 3.

c. 56.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 39. & 40.

^a A small River on the north side of the Po, and running into it.

V. R. 555.
B. C. 117.
317.
B. C. 117.

bridge to be laid. But before he marched further, he thought it proper to assemble his soldiers, and endeavour to animate their courage for the approaching occasion. He spoke to them in words to this effect.

“ Were you, Soldiers, the same army, which I had with me in “ Gaul, I might well forbear saying any thing to you at this time.
“ For, what occasion could there be to use exhortation to a CAVALRY, “ that had so signally vanquished the squadrons of the enemy upon
“ the Rhone; or to LEGIONS, by whom that same enemy, flying before “ them to avoid a battle, did in effect confess themselves conquered?
“ But, as those troops, having been enrolled for Spain, are there with “ my brother Cneius, making war under my auspices (as was the will “ of the Senate and people of Rome) I, that you might have a Consul
“ for your captain against Hannibal and the Cartaginians, have freely “ offered myself for this war. You then have a new general, and I a “ new army. In this circumstance a few words from me to you will be “ neither improper nor unseasonable.

“ And that you may not be unapprized of what sort of enemies you “ are going to encounter, or of what is to be feared from them, they “ are the very same, whom in a former war, you vanquished both by “ land and sea; the same from whom you took Sicily and Sardinia, “ and who have been for these twenty years your tributaries. You will “ not, I presume, march against these men with only that courage, “ with which you are wont to face other enemies, but with a certain “ anger and indignation, such as you would feel, if you saw your “ slaves on a sudden rise up in arms against you. Conquered and en“ slaved, it is not boldness but necessity that urges them to battle: un“ less you can believe that those, who avoided fighting when their army “ was entire, have acquired better hope by the loss of two thirds of “ their horse and foot, in the passage of the Alps.

“ But you have heard perhaps, that, though they be few in number,
“ they are men of stout hearts and robust bodies, heroes of such strength “ and vigour, as nothing is able to resist.—Meer effigies! nay sha“ dows of men! wretches emaciated with hunger, and benumbed with “ cold! bruised and battered to pieces among the rocks and craggy “ cliffs! their weapons broke, and their horses weak and foundered!
“ Such are the cavalry, and such the infantry with which you are going “ to contend; not enemies, but the fragments of enemies. There is “ nothing which I more apprehend, than that it will be thought, Han- “ nibal was vanquished by the Alps, before we had any conflict with “ him. But perhaps it was fitting that so it should be; and that with “ a people and a leader, who had violated leagues and covenants, the “ Gods themselves, without man’s help, should begin the war, and “ bring it near to a conclusion; and that we, who, next to the Gods, “ have been injured and offended, should happily finish what they “ begun.

“ I need not be in any fear, that you should suspect me of saying “ these things merely to encourage you, while inwardly I have “ different sentiments. What hindered me from going into Spain?
 “ That was my province; where I should have had the less dreaded “ Asdrubal, not Hannibal, to deal with. But hearing, as I past along “ the coast of Gaul, of this enemy’s march, I landed my troops, sent
 “ the Horse forward, and pitched my camp upon the Rhone. A part “ of my cavalry encountered and defeated that of the enemy; my in“ fantry not being able to overtake theirs which fled before us, I return“ ed to my fleet, and with all the expedition I could use in so long a “ voyage by sea and land, am come to meet them at the foot of the “ Alps. Was it then my inclination to avoid a contest with this tre“ mendous Hannibal? And have I lit upon him only by accident “ and unawares? Or am I come on purpose to challenge him to “ the combat? I would gladly try, whether the earth, within these “ twenty years, has brought forth a new kind of Carthaginians; or “ whether they be the same sort of men who fought at the Ægates;
 “ and whom, at Eryx, you suffered to redeem themselves at 18 * denarii “ per head: Whether this Hannibal, for labours and journies, be, as “ he would be thought, the rival of Hercules; or whether he be what “ his father left him, a tributary, a vassal, a slave of the Roman people.
 “ Did not the consciousness of his wicked deed, at Saguntum, torment “ him and make him desperate, he would have some regard, if not to “ his conquered country, yet surely to his own family, to his father’s “ memory, to the treaty written with Amilcar’s own hand. We might “ have starved them in Eryx; we might have passed into Africa with “ our victorious fleet, and in a few days have destroyed Carthage. At “ their humble supplication we pardoned them; we released them when “ they were closely shut up without a possibility of escaping; we made “ peace with them when they were conquered. When they were “ distressed by the African war, we considered them, we treated them “ as a people under our protection. And what is the return they make “ us for all these favours? Under the conduct of a hair-brained young “ man, they come hither to overturn our state and lay waste our country.
 “ —I could wish indeed, that it were not so; and that the war we are “ now engaged in, concerned only our glory and not our preservation.
 “ But the contest at present is not for the possession of Sicily or Sardi- “ nia, but of Italy itself. Nor is there, behind us, another army “ which, if we should not prove the conquerors, may make head against “ our victorious enemies. There are no more Alps for them to pass, “ which might give us leisure to raise new forces. No, Soldiers, here
 “ you must make your stand, as if you were just now before the walls “ of Rome. Let every one reflect, that he is now to defend, not his “ own person alone, but his wife, his children, his helpless infants.

Y. R. 535.
 Ref. Chr.
 237.
 234 Conf.

* 118. 7d. $\frac{1}{2}$
 Arbuth.

V. R. 444.
Be. Chr.
217.
224 C. J.

“ Yet let not private considerations alone possess our minds; let us re“ member that the eyes of the Senate and people of Rome are upon us,
“ and that as our force and courage shall now prove, such will be the “ fortune of that City, and of the Roman empire.”

This discourse, supported by the authority of the speaker, the certainty of some things he had said, and the probability of others, had the wished for effect on the minds of the hearers.

R. 2.
217.
224 C. J.

On the other side, Hannibal made use of a new kind of rhetoric to inspire his soldiers with resolution. He had taken prisoners, some young men of the mountaineers who opposed his march over the Alps; and, to prepare them for his purpose, had caused them to be treated in the severest manner, loaded with irons, tormented with hunger, and macerated with stripes. In this miserable condition he had them brought into the presence of his whole army; where, shewing them such weapons as the Gallie Princes were accustomed to use in single combat, and placing also before their eyes horses and handsome suits of apparel, he demanded, Who of them would be willing, with those weapons, to fight in duel one against another, to the death of one of the duellists, on the condition, that the victor should have his liberty, and the prizes they beheld? There was not a single wretch of these prisoners, who did not instantly and eagerly call out for the arms; for, at worst, they were sure of this advantage, to be by death delivered from all their miseries. Hannibal hereupon directed that they should draw lots for entering the lists. At the hearing of this order, all the young men lifted up their hands to heaven, each conjuring the Gods that he might be of the number of the combatants; and all those, whose fortune it proved to be so, exceedingly rejoiced and exulted, while the rest were as much dejected.

When these duels were over, those of the prisoners who had been only spectators seemed to envy the conquered, no less than they did the conquerors.

The spectacle had made the like impression on the greater part of the Carthaginians, who comparing the fortune of the dead with that of the living, who had not fought, compassioned these, and thought the others happy.

Hannibal, having thus brought his soldiers to the temper and disposition he desired, advanced into the midst of them, and then spoke in the following manner.

“ If in the estimation of your own fortune, you will but bear the “ same mind which you just now did, in contemplating the fortune of “ others, the victory, Soldiers, is ours. What you have seen, was not “ a meer show for amusement, but a representation of your own real “ condition. I know not whether you or your prisoners be encom“ passed by fortune with the stricter bonds and necessities. Two seas “ inclose “ inclose you on the right and left;—not a ship to fly to, for escaping.

 “ Before you is the Po, a river broader and more rapid than the Rhone; “ behind you are the Alps, over which, even when your numbers were “ undiminished, you were hardly able to force a passage. Here, then, “ Soldiers, you must either conquer or die, the very first hour you meet
 “ the enemy. But the same fortune which has thus laid you under the “ necessity of fighting, has set before your eyes those rewards of victory, “ than which no men are ever wont to wish for greater from the im“ mortal Gods. Should we by our valour recover only Sicily and Sar- “ dinia, which were ravished from our fathers, those would be no in“ considerable prizes. Yet, what are those? The wealth of Rome, “ whatever riches she has heaped together from the spoils of nations, “ all these, with the masters of them, will be yours. You have been “ long enough employed in driving the cattle upon the vast mountains
 “ of Lusitania and Celtiberia; you have hitherto met with no reward “ worthy of the labours and dangers you have undergone. The time “ is now come to reap the full recompence of your toilsome marches “ over so many mountains and rivers, and through so many nations, “ all of them in arms. This is the place, which fortune has appointed “ to be the limit of your labours; it is here that you will finish your “ glorious warfare, and receive an ample recompence of your com“ pleted service. For I would not have you imagine that victory will “ be as difficult as the name of a ROMAN WAR is great and sounding.
 “ It has often happened that a despised enemy has given a bloody bat“ tle, and the most renowned kings and nations have by a small force “ been overthrown. And if you but take away that glitter of the “ Roman name, what is there, wherein they may stand in competition “ with you? For, (to say nothing of your service in war for twenty “ years together with so much valour and success) from the very pillars
 “ of Hercules, from the ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth, “ through so many warlike nations of Spain and Gaul, are you not come “ hither victorious? And with whom are you now to fight? with raw “ soldiers, an undisciplined army, beaten, vanquished, besieged by the “ Gauls the very last summer, an army unknown to their leader, and “ unacquainted with him.

“ Or shall I, who, I might almost say, was born, but certainly brought “ up in the tent of my father, that most excellent general, shall I, the “ conqueror of Spain and Gaul, and not only of the Alpine nations, but,
 “ which is greater yet, of the Alps themselves, shall I compare myself “ with this half-year-captain? A captain before whom should one place
 “ the two armies, without their ensigns, I am persuaded he would not “ know to which of them he is Conjul? I esteem it no small advantage,

V. R. 535.
 Bef. Chr.

217.
 234 Conf.

^b Here we have another proof from Livy himself of his own inadvertency in delivering the idle story mentioned, p. 104.

“ Soldiers,

Y. R. 333.
B.C. 217.
234 Cons.

“ Soldiers, that there is not one among you, who has not often been an “ eye-witness of my exploits in war; not one, of whose valour, I myself “ have not been a spectator, so as to be able to name the times and “ places of his noble achievements; that with soldiers, whom I have a “ thousand times praised and rewarded, and whose pupil I was, before I “ became their general, I shall march against an army of men strangers “ to one another.

“ On what side soever I turn my eyes, I behold all full of courage “ and strength; a veteran infantry, a most gallant cavalry; you, my “ allies, most faithful and valiant; you, Carthaginians, whom not only “ your country's cause, but the justest anger impels to battle. The hope,
“ the courage of assailants is always greater, than of those who act upon
“ the defensive. With hostile banners displayed you are come down “ upon Italy; you bring the war. Grief, injuries, indignities fire your “ mind, and spur you forward to revenge.—First they demand me,
“ that I, your General, should be delivered up to them; next, all you,
“ who had fought at the siege of Saguntum; and we were to be put “ to death by the extremest tortures. Proud and cruel nation! Every “ thing must be yours, and at your disposal? You are to prescribe to “ us, with whom we shall make war, with whom we shall make peace?
“ You are to set us bounds, to shut us up within hills and rivers; but “ you, you are not to observe the limits which yourselves have fixed?
“ Pass not the IBERUS. What next? Touch not the SAGUNTINES; “ SAGUNTUM is upon the IBERUS; move not a step towards that city.
“ It is a small matter then, that you have deprived us of our ancient “ possessions, Sicily and Sardinia; you would have Spain too? Well, we “ shall yield Spain; and then—you will pass into Africa. Will pass, “ did I say?—This very year they ordered one of their Consuls into “ Africa, the other into Spain. No, Soldiers, there is nothing left for us “ but what we can vindicate with our swords. Come on then. Be men.
“ The Romans may with more safety be cowards; they have their own “ country behind them, have places of refuge to fly to, and are secure “ from danger in the roads thither: But for you there is no middle for“ tune between death and victory. Let this be but well fixed in your “ minds, and once again I say, you are CONQUERORS.”

* Livy's expression is, Genereffimorum gentium equites frænatos & infrænatos, horsemen that ride with bridles, and those that ride without bridles, by the latter meaning the Nuridians, who had no bridles nor saddles to their horses, and who in action resembled the modern Hussars.

† By the words which Livy here puts into the mouth of Hannibal, it is plain, that the Saguntines were not included at first in the treaty with Asdrubal; that this treaty only restrained the Carthaginians from passing the Iberus, as Polybius declares; and that the alliance of the Romans with the Saguntines was posterior to it, and a real infraction of it. See pag. 116, 117.

* Hannibal, the more to incense his hearers against the Romans, makes these assert an impudent falsehood, that Saguntum is upon the Iberus.

Livy

Livy reports, that Hannibal, further to animate his men, assured them, that they should have every one of them lands in property, either in Africa, Spain, or Italy, or else an equivalent in money, if they preferred money. And these assurances he ratified in form. Taking a flint in one hand, and holding a lamb with the other, he said, Great JUPITER, and all ye Gods, if I do not perform my promise, slay me as I do this lamb! at which words he broke with the flint the skull of the lamb; a solemnity which much augmented the confidence of his troops.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 45.

The next day the two armies advanced towards each other along the Ticin, on that side of it which is next the Alps, the Romans having the river on their left, the Carthaginians the same river on their right. The day following each army receiving intelligence by its foragers that the enemy was near, encamped in the place where it then was. The third, Scipio with his cavalry and light armed foot marching forward to discover the strength and situation of the Carthaginians; and Hannibal, with his cavalry only, coming on with the like intention, they soon perceived each other's approach by the dust they raised in the plain, and there-upon immediately prepared for battle. The Roman General sent before him his Gallic horse, assisted by his dartmen to begin the fight, he himself with the rest of his cavalry in one line following slowly in good order. The Gauls behaved themselves courageously, but the foot, that should have aided them, shrunk at the first onset, or rather fled cowardly through the intervals of the squadrons without casting a dart, fearing to be trodden down by the enemy's horse. Nevertheless the Gauls maintained the fight, as presuming they should be well sustained by the Roman horse behind them. Nor did the Consul neglect his part, but hazarded his person so far, that he received a dangerous wound, and had been left upon the place, if his son^f, a mere youth, (afterwards the great Africanus) had not, by a surprizing effort of courage, brought him off. Whilst the Romans were busied in assisting their Consul, an unexpected storm came driving at their backs, and obliged them to look to their own preservation. For Hannibal had ordered his Numidians, who were in the wings, to wheel and give upon the Romans in flank and rear, while he with his Spanish and other horse sustained their charge in front. The Numidians performed their instructions, and having first cut in pieces the scattered foot that had run away at the beginning of the action, fell instantly upon the backs of the Roman cavalry, who by this impression were intirely broken and forced to betake themselves to their speed, leaving to their enemies the honour of the day.

Polyb. B. 39
c. 65.

Scipio the night following decamped secretly, and marched with expedition over the plains to the Po, which he now repassed, retiring to

c. 66.

^f So Livy is inclined to believe, with the greater number of authors; but adds, that Celius the historian gives the honour of the Consul's rescue to a Ligurian slave.

the

Y. R. 515.
B. 3. c. 37.
217
218 C. 37.

the neighbourhood of Placentia. For he thought it not safe, wounded as he was, to stay in a flat open country, with an enemy so near, that was much superior to him in horse. Hannibal, who had expected to have an engagement with the enemies infantry, no sooner learned that the Romans were retired, but he followed them as far as to their bridge upon the Ticin. Here he surprized and made prisoners 600 men who had been left behind to destroy the bridge so soon as the army should be passed. The work was however effected; the boats which had composed the bridge being loosed from one another were floating down the stream; which Hannibal perceiving, and hearing also that the Romans were far advanced in their march, he immediately turned back, went down the Ticin, and then up along the banks of the Po, to find a convenient place where he might lay a bridge of boats over this river. After two

* Livy says that Scipio retired to Placentia; which if true, Placentia must have had a different situation from what it has now, and must have been, not on the east but the west side of the Trebia. For we find, that Scipio, after his first retreat, passed the Trebia to get further from Hannibal. Polybius's words import no more than that the Romans retired to the neighbourhood of Placentia, viz. westward.

* Livy, who, in this part of his history, plainly borrows from Polybius, seems to have misunderstood him with regard to the Bridge, at which Hannibal is said to have arrived in his pursuit of the Romans. The Latin Historian makes it to be their bridge over the Po, as if they had no river to pass in their way to the Po; which, if true, we must say, that the battle was fought on the east side of the Ticin, the side towards Placentia: For Polybius expressly affirms that Scipio at the head of the battle had the Ticin to his left, and Hannibal the same river to his right. Yet, that the battle was fought on the west side of the Ticin, we have Livy's own authority. He makes Scipio's march, in order to meet Hannibal, to have been from Placentia to that river, over which he passed by a bridge, before he gave battle to the Carthaginians. Ponte peracto traducit Romanus exercitus in agrum Insubrium, B. 21. c. 45. And in this he does not disagree with Polybius. Now, if the battle was fought on the east bank of the Ticin, and Scipio had this river to his left, it is evident that the Carthaginians were between him and the Po, and that he could not steal a march to the Po (in the way to Placentia) without first repassing the Ticin; which Hannibal must also have crossed in the pursuit of his enemy to the Po. But not one word is any where said of Hannibal's passing, or attempting to pass, the Ticin.

The bridge therefore to which Hannibal came, in pursuit of the Romans, must have been their bridge over the Ticin; at the entrance of which, according to Livy, Scipio had raised a fort and placed a guard. And it was this guard which Hannibal surprized.

The reason which Polybius assigns for Hannibal's turning back, when he came to the broken bridge, is the distance of the enemy: He heard that the Romans were got a great way off (too far to be overtaken.) This furnishes another proof, that the river in question was the Ticin and not the Po. For as he had determined to pass the Po with all expedition, how could he find a more convenient time to lay his bridge, than when he had no enemies to oppose him? But the distance of the enemy was a good reason why he should not lay a bridge over the Ticin; since this would be only loss of time and labour, and could not in the least further his intention of passing the Po, or coming up with the Romans. And what necessity could he be under of spending two days (as Livy says he did) in search of a convenient place to lay a bridge over the Po, if he was already at that very place where the Romans had laid their bridge over that river. Chevalier Felard's translator of Polybius, understands him as Livy does. Yet the chevalier, in his comment, regardless of his text, speaks of the bridge in question, as the bridge over the Ticin, tom. 4. p. 129.

days

days march, a proper place being found, and the bridge formed, he ordered Asdrubal to lead over the army, while he himself was employed in giving audience to ambassadors come to him from the Gauls of the neighbouring countries, who, after his success at the Ticin, retaining their first design, now offered to join their forces to his, and to furnish him with whatever he wanted.

Y. R. 525.
B.C. 217.
254 Cont.

When the army was all passed, the Carthaginian took his march down the river, and at the end of the second day came within view of the Romans. The third, he drew up his forces in battlea, in the face of the enemy: But finding his challenge not accepted, he retired and pitched his camp about six miles from them.

At this time certain Gauls, to the number of 2000 foot and 200 horse, who served in the Consul's camp, observing the fortunate state of Hannibal's affairs, plotted together to desert to him. After supper they retired to their tents, and there kept quiet till towards day-break; but then, having suddenly armed themselves, they fell upon the sleeping Romans, who lay nearest to them, slew a great number and wounded many others; after which they fled out of the camp, carrying with them to Hannibal the heads of those they had slain. The Carthaginian received these traitors kindly, exhorted them to continue their zeal, and promised them rewards proportionable to their services; but distrusting perhaps their fidelity, he did not enrol them among his troops, but dismissed them to their respective towns and villages, that they might publish among their countrymen the success of his arms, and exhort them to enter into alliance with him. There was in truth little need, for that end, of the exhortations of these emissaries, whose recent treachery alone sufficed to put the rest of the Boii under a necessity of siding with the Carthaginian. A party of them at this very juncture, brought to Hannibal's camp the three Roman commissioners, whom, contrary to faith given, they had seized at a conference (as was before mentioned) and they put them into his hands. Hannibal, after many kind words and promises to these Gauls, made a treaty with them, and then restored to them the three captives, whom he advised them to keep under strict guard, and to make use of (as they had at first proposed) to recover their hostages from the Romans.

Polyb. B.
3. c. 6.

Scipio, alarmed at the bloody treason of his Gallic deserters, and not doubting but the Gauls in general would quickly declare themselves in favour of Hannibal, thought it adviseable to retire into a country where the friendship of the inhabitants was more to be depended upon. He decamped therefore about three hours after midnight, to pass the Trebia, and take post upon the eminencies near that river, where he believed the enemy would not have the boldness to attack him. Hannibal, upon notice of this motion of the Romans, detached his Numidian cavalry after them,

c. 68.

¹ A small river running northward into the Po near Placentia.

Y. R. 535.
L. C. 5.
277.
277 C. 5.

he himself soon following with the rest of the army. The Numidians, finding the Roman camp deserted, stopt to set fire to it, a delay very fortunate to the Romans, who, had they been overtaken in the plain, and before they had got their baggage over the river, would have been extremely embarrassed. But when the Numidians came up, the main body of the Consul's army, together with the baggage, had already passed the stream. There remained on the other side some of his rear guard only, of which the enemy slew a part and took the rest prisoners.

The Consul having fortified himself in his new camp, resolved to wait there the arrival of his colleague Sempronius with the troops from Sicily, and, in the mean time, to attend carefully to the cure of his wound, that he might be in a condition to act, when, after the junction of the two armies, a favourable opportunity should present. Hannibal advanced, and pitched his camp about five miles from that of the Consul, the Trebia running between them. Great numbers of Gauls from the circumjacent country flocked to the Carthaginians, and supplied him abundantly with arms and provisions.

C H A P. XIX.

The Battle of the TREBIA.

Hannibal passes over the Apennines into Hetruria.

Pol. B. 3.
a. 62.

WHEN the news came to Rome of the action upon the Ticin, though the publick expectation was much disappointed by the ill success, yet they endeavoured to account for it by reasons that would leave no discouragement upon their minds. Some imputed the misfortune to rashness in the Consul, stimulated by too eager a desire of fighting: others to perfidy in the Gauls of his army, whom they supposed to have designedly suffered themselves to be vanquished; a conjecture founded on the subsequent treachery of some of their countrymen: and as the Roman infantry remained unbroken, no danger to the republick was yet apprehended, from a defeat which the horse alone had sustained. The arrival of Sempronius, from Sicily, at Ariminum, with his legions, confirmed this confidence. It was imagined that when these had joined the forces of Scipio, the very appearance of so powerful an army would alone be sufficient to put the Carthaginians to flight.

Sempronius marched with all diligence from Ariminum to join his colleague. Having pitched his camp near him, and refreshed his legions, which had been fatigued by their voyage ^k, and march from Lilybæum to

^k Livy sends the troops of Sempronius, all the way from Lilybæum to Ariminum, by sea. Polybus represents them traversing the city of Rome, and marching from thence to Ariminum.

Ariminum, which took up forty days, he gave orders to get all things ready for battle. While these preparations were going forward, he made frequent visits to Scipio, enquiring of him all the circumstances of the late action upon the Ticin, and consulting with him upon future measures.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

In the mean time Hannibal found means to get possession of Clastidium, a small town on the confines of Liguria, where the Romans had formed a magazine of arms and provisions. To give an impression of his clemency, and engage more of his enemies to have recourse to it, he treated the garrison with all gentleness. And as the governor had betrayed the place to him, he most richly rewarded him, in hopes thereby to allure other officers intrusted by the Romans to the like treachery.

Polyb. B.
3. c. 69.

Soon after this, having notice that certain Gauls who inhabited between the Trebia and the Po, and who had made alliance with him, continued nevertheless (that they might have a refuge in all events) to hold a secret correspondence with the enemy, he detached 2000 foot and 1000 horse to pillage and lay waste their lands. His orders were punctually executed, and the booty proved considerable; the plundered Gauls flocking to the Roman entrenchments to ask succour.

Sempronius, who had impatiently waited an occasion of fighting, seized this pretext. He sent out the greater part of his cavalry with a thousand light armed foot, who expeditiously passing the Trebia, attacked the pillagers that were carrying off the booty, put them to flight, and obliged them to retire within their entrenchments. But a vigorous sally being made from thence, the pursuers were repulsed, and obliged in their turn to fly to their camp. Hereupon Sempronius put all his cavalry and all his light armed troops in motion, so that the enemy were once more forced to retire. Hannibal, who was not prepared for a general action, and who thought it not the part of a prudent commander, to hazard one lightly, and without a premeditated design, contented himself with stopping the flight of his men, and making them face about. He forbade them by his officers, and by his trumpets, either to charge or pursue the enemy; who after they had continued some time upon the place, retreated to their camp.

The loss of men had not been very considerable on either side; but as the Romans had lost fewer than the Carthaginians, Sempronius, much elated with this trivial advantage, could think of nothing now but a decisive action. Nevertheless, he continued to observe the decency of advising with his colleague. Scipio's opinion was, that in prudence they ought to avoid fighting, till the troops, having been trained and exercised during the winter, might more reasonably be depended upon than at present: He added, that the Gauls were naturally too fickle and inconstant to keep long in friendship with the Carthaginian, and would infallibly turn against him, if they found him out of a condition to enterprise any thing of importance; and he therefore intreated Sempronius to

c. 70.

F. R. 535.
Bel. Chr.
217.
234 C. 26

lay aside, for some time, all thoughts of a general battle; an occasion, in which (he modestly added) he himself, when his wound was healed, might perhaps be of some use. Sempronius could not but be sensible, that this advice was judicious; but his passion to distinguish himself overpowering his reason, and begetting a confidence of success, he, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of his colleague, bent his whole mind to bring on a general action, as soon as possible; that so neither Scipio's cure, nor the election of new Consuls (the time for which drew near, might prevent his acquiring the sole glory of finishing the war. And thus, says Polybius, as he considered not what was seasonable for the publick, but for himself, it was impossible but he must take wrong measures.

Hannibal formed the same judgment as Scipio upon the situation of things, and was therefore no less desirous than Sempronius of coming to a decisive battle without delay. He was well aware of his present advantages in the favourable disposition of the Gauls to him, the inexperience of the Roman troops, and the inability of Scipio to be in the action: But his strongest motive was the necessity an invader is under of being almost incessantly active, and of performing repeated exploits, if he would preserve to himself the esteem, and keep alive the hopes of his confederates.

Polyb. B. 3.
C. 72

The Carthaginian had viewed and fully examined the ground between the two armies. It was an open plain, through which ran a winding rivulet. The banks of this small stream being pretty high, and also thick set with bushes and brambles, Hannibal perceived that it was easy not only for foot, but even for horsemen to be there concealed. Having imparted to his chief officers the design he had formed, and finding it universally approved, he after supper sent for his brother Mago, a young man of great spirit and a good soldier, and directed him to choose out a hundred horse and a hundred foot of the bravest men in the army, and to bring them before night to his tent. This done, and the general having exhorted the two hundred to behave themselves gallantly in the post he should assign them, he bid each man go and choose out of the corps to which he belonged, nine others, such as he knew to be the stoutest soldiers in it, and then to repair to him at a certain place in the camp. The whole number came, a thousand horse, and a thousand foot. He furnished them with guides, and under the conduct of his brother, to whom he signified the time when they should fall upon the enemy, sent them to the place he had chosen for the ambush.

The next morning, at day break, he assembled his Numidian cavalry, a hardy people inured to fatigue; and when he had promised ample rewards to every one that should distinguish himself in the discharge of his duty, he ordered them instantly to pass the Trebia, brave the enemy in their camp, skirmish with them if they sallied out, and, in skirmishing, retire and repass the river.

Hannibal's

Hannibal's view in making this movement so early in the morning, was to provoke the Romans to an engagement while they were yet fasting, thoughtless of fighting, and unprepared for it.

Sempronius no sooner saw the Numidians approach, but he sent out his cavalry to attack them. The cavalry were followed by 6000 dart-men; and the general himself not long after came out of his entrenchment with all the rest of his army. His numerous forces, and the light advantage he had gained the day before, made him vain enough to think, that there needed little more than his appearance in the field to secure the victory.

It was yet winter, it snowed, the weather was extremely cold, and the soldiers had begun their march before they had eaten any thing to sustain them. And therefore though they moved forward briskly at first, and with an eager desire of fighting, yet when they came to ford the river, which being swelled by the rain of the night before, was breast-high, they began to shrink; and when they had waded through it (the day being then pretty far advanced) they found themselves extremely pinched and weakened both with cold and hunger: Whereas on the other hand the Carthaginians had, by Hannibal's order, taken a good repast in their tents, rubbed themselves with oil, and put on their arms before the fire.

When Hannibal perceived that the Romans had passed the Trebia, which was the favourable moment he had waited for, he instantly sent out, to the succour of his Numidians, the slingers of the Baleares, and his other light-armed infantry, to the number of 8000; after which he led forth his main army. His foot consisted of 20,000 men, Gauls, Spaniards, and Africans. His cavalry, including the Gauls his allies, amounted to above 10,000. He drew up the whole horse and foot, in one line, about a mile from his camp, posting the horse on the wings. His elephants he placed before the points of his body of infantry.

In the mean time, Sempronius by a signal called off his cavalry that were fatiguing themselves to little purpose against the Numidians. For it was the custom of these to attack briskly; then on a sudden break their ranks, turn their backs and fly; and presently after return to the charge in as good order, and with as much boldness as at first: A manner of fighting, which being entirely new to the Roman cavalry, perplexed and disconcerted them.

The Consul's infantry consisted of ¹ 16,000 Roman legionaries, and 20,000 foot of the allies. He formed his battle after the usual manner of the Romans, the infantry in three lines, and the horse, amounting to 4000, upon the wings. In this order he advanced slowly towards the enemy. The light-armed troops on both sides began the action, much to the advan-

V. R. 117.
Bel. Carth.
217.
234 Conf.

Polib. B. 3.
c. 72.

¹ Livy says 18,000. He adds, that the Consul's army was strengthened by a body of the Cenomani, the only nation of the Gauls that continued faithful to the Romans.

Y. R. 333.
B.C. 217.
217.
217.

tage of the Carthaginians: for the dartmen of the Romans, having suffered cold and hunger ever since the morning, and having spent the most of their darts against the Numidians, were by no means a match for those of Hannibal, who had but just left their camp well armed, fresh and vigorous.

When these straining troops had retired through the intervals of the respective armies to which they belonged, a general charge ensued. The Roman cavalry being soon routed and driven from their ground by the superior numbers of the Carthaginians, left the wings of their infantry exposed to be attacked in flank. The Numidians who had been employed to provoke the battle, and the light armed troops who had begun it, were ready on the part of Hannibal for this service, having, after their retreat, posted themselves to the right and left behind the Carthaginian cavalry; falling furiously therefore on the two wings of the Roman infantry in flank, they put them into great disorder, and disabled them from defending themselves against the elephants, that attacked them in front. These wings, utterly broken and put to flight, were chased into the river.

Y. R. 333.
B.C. 217.

At the same time the 2000 men, who had lain in ambush in the brook before-mentioned, came out, and fell upon the rear of the Roman legions in the center, which caused a terrible confusion there. The foremost ranks of this center were the only troops of the Consul's army that could keep their ground. They fought a long time with undaunted bravery against the heavy armed forces of the enemy, and at length, urged by necessity, broke their way through them with great slaughter. But seeing that their wings were defeated, and not thinking themselves able either to succour them, or to return to their camp, by reason of the enemies numerous horse and the river that were in the way, they formed themselves into a close compact body, to the number of 10,000, and took the direct road to Placentia. Hither they retreated without the least danger, or opposition; and they were followed by all those of the rout, horse and foot, that could escape out of the field, without passing the river. Of the remainder of the Roman army, some had the good fortune to get safely over the stream to their camp; but the greater part perished on the banks of it, either trodden down by the elephants or slain by the horse. The Carthaginians pursued the enemy no farther than to the river, which the rigour of the season restrained them from passing. They returned to their intrenchments. Their victory was complete, and their loss inconsiderable. A few only of the Africans and Spaniards remained upon the field; the Gauls suffered most. Yet after this victory the Carthaginians, through the inclemency of the weather, lost a great number both of men and horses; and of the elephants all died but oneⁿ.

As

ⁿ Livy, B. 21. c. 58. speaks of seven elephants, that, after this time, perished of cold, in a fruitless attempt which Han- nibal made to pass the Apennines, being forced back from the top of those hills by a hurricane. The same author relates a battle

As for the Consul Scipio, and those that were with him, they stole away from their camp, the very night after the battle, crossed the Trebia upon boats or upon rafts, and got safe to Placentia; the enemy either not perceiving their flight, or not being able to pursue them, for cold and weariness.

Sempronius, to conceal the shame of his defeat, sent messengers to Rome, whose tidings imported only, that there had been a battle, and that the severity of the weather had snatched the victory out of his hands. This report passed currently at first, but the true situation of affairs was quickly known; that the Roman forces had been utterly vanquished; that the rout had fled to the neighbouring colonies for refuge; that Scipio after his flight to Placentia, not to ruin that place by keeping too great a number of soldiers there, had crossed the Po with his part of the army, and retired to Cremona; that the troops had no provisions but what were brought by sea and up the Po; and lastly, that all the nations of the Gauls had declared for Hannibal.

The people of Rome were yet in their first fright and consternation at all this bad news, when Sempronius himself, after escaping many dangers from the enemies cavalry that were dispersed, in parties, over the country, arrived in the city. His business was to hold the Comitia by centuries, for electing new Consuls.

Notwithstanding the late disasters and the present distress, party favour had a greater share in the elections, than a due regard to the exigencies of the state. For (with Cn. Servilius) was raised to the Consulate C. Flaminius, a rash hot-headed man, who, when in the same station six years before, had signalized himself by his disobedience to the senate, and his contempt of religion. His merit with the people, and what now procured him the falces, was his having been the only man of the Conscript Fathers, that assisted in promoting a law, which enacted, that no Senator, nor father of a Senator, should have a ship at sea, carrying above eight ton or thereabouts. A vessel of that burthen was thought sufficient for transporting to Rome the produce of any man's lands; and it was intended by this law to confine commerce to the Plebeians.

Sempronius's year not being yet expired, he immediately after the elections returned to his winter quarters at Placentia.

The Senate provided for the next campaign. They made new levies amongst the allies, ordered troops into Sicily and Sardinia, put garrisons into Tarentum, and other places where they were most wanted, and sent provisions to Ariminum and into Uetruria; through which country the army was to march against Hannibal. They also dispatched ambassadors to ask assistance of King Hiero, who furnished them with 500 Cretan battle that presently followed Hannibal's return into the plains, and was terminated by the night's coming on, when there had been no great slaughter on either side. Po- lybius says nothing of all this, and there is nothing of probability in the story, but a good deal of poetry.

archers,

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 56.
Polyb. B. 3.
c. 75.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 56.

See p. 96,
and 97.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 63.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 75.

archers, and 1000 other light armed soldiers. And lest the Carthaginians should from Africa attempt to land troops in Italy, they equipt sixty quinqueremes to guard the coast. In a word, they omitted nothing that was necessary for carrying on the war with the utmost vigour, it being the peculiar character of the Romans, says Polybus, that they are then most to be feared when they are most afraid.

On the side of Spain all was safe; for in that country during the late unfortunate campaign in Italy, the arms of the republic, under the conduct of Cn. Scipio, had prospered beyond expectation. He had entirely defeated Hannibal, the Carthaginian General, and reduced almost all the nations between the Atlas and the Pyrenees, to the obedience of Rome.

As for Hannibal, he did not remain inactive after his victory at the Trebia. Wounded and repulsed in an attack upon one town belonging to the Romans, he assaulted and took another called Vicumetia, in Liguria, and gave it up to be plundered by the soldiers.

The Carthaginian, during his winter quarters among the Gauls, with whose levity he was well acquainted, and who, he feared, might repent of their newly contracted alliance with him, is said to have put in practice some of his Punic arts, to preserve himself from their snares. He not only wore false hair, but at different times the habits of different ages, frequently changing his dress in order to disguise himself. And because the Gauls were extremely dissatisfied that their country continued to be the seat of the war, and were impatiently desirous (from a hatred, as they pretended, to the Romans, but in truth, from an eagerness to enrich themselves with plunder, or being led into the territories of the allies of Rome, he resolved to pass as soon as possible over the Apennines into He-truria. Just before he entered upon this expedition, he assembled all his captives that were of the Roman allies, and when he had assured them that he was come into Italy, not as their enemy, but their friend, to restore them to liberty and to the possession of the towns which the Romans had taken from them; and when he had exhorted them to join with him in the common cause, and to engage their countrymen to do the same, he dismissed them all without ransom.

After this, having made enquiry about the several roads into He-truria, he learnt that there was one much shorter than any of the rest, but very difficult to pass, as it led through marshy grounds; the other roads more easy, but known to the enemy, and in their possession. Hannibal for these reasons, or perhaps because he had naturally a turn for those dangerous enterprizes, which are apt to raise mens admiration of a general, and strike his enemies with terror, chose the difficult road, which was now rendered more so by the overflowing of the Arno. Having passed the Apennines, he entered the marshes. His Africans and Spaniards, who were inured to this sort of fatigue, and who marched first, went into the water without hesitation, and kept their order. The Gauls had more difficulty the way being made much worse by the multitudes

multitudes of men and beasts of burthen that had gone before them) and many of them were killed with the fatigue: for to add to the distress, they were obliged to march thus in mire and water four days together, with but very little sleep, such as they could get lying upon their baggage, or upon the beasts which had carried it, and had perished in the mud. Hannibal himself was not without his share of the inconveniences of this march, for though he rode upon an elephant (the only one remaining) his continual watchings, and the unwholesome damps, brought such a defluxion upon his eyes that he lost one of them. When he was come out of the marshes, he halted for some days that he might refresh his army, and enquire into the situation of the country, the strength and designs of the enemy, and the character and disposition of their General.

Y. R. 535.
Bef. Chr.
217.
234 Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 80.

C H A P. XX.

SECOND YEAR of the War.

The BATTLE of the Lake THRASYMENUS.

Fabius Maximus Cunctator is sent against Hannibal; who deceives him by a very singular stratagem.

Transactions in Spain.

FLAMINIUS, as was before observed, had obtained the consulship by the favour of the people, contrary to the inclinations of the Senate. Being apprehensive that the augurs, influenced by his enemies, would, to render his election invalid, pretend some defect in the auspices, he took a bold unprecedented step, left Rome, without performing the usual ceremonies of religion, went straight to Ariminum (where he had ordered the army to rendezvous) and was there invested in the consulate. The Senate, highly offended at this proceeding, sent two of their body to recal him to Rome, that he might perform those ceremonies which he had despised. But the Consul paid no regard to their orders. At the head of four legions (two of which he received from Sempronius, and the other two from the Prætor Atilius) he crossed the Apennines, and encamped his army under the walls of Aretium in Hetruria; and there he still was when Hannibal came out of the marshes.

Y. R. 536.
Bef. Chr.
216.
235 Conf.
Liv. B. 21.
c. 63.

The Carthaginian having learnt that Flaminius's chief talent was haranguing the people, in whose assemblies he was a leading man, but that he wanted the skill for conducting a war, was of a hasty disposition, easy to be inflamed, and confident of his own abilities, did not

Polyb. B. 5.
c. 80. 82.

T. R. 336.
P. C. 336.
216.
336 C. 336.

1. 2. 3.
C. 336.

C. 336.

P. C. 336.
C. 336.

doubt but he should be able, by provoking his high spirit, to lead him whithersoever he pleased. With this view, having put his army in march, he laid waste, before the Consul's eyes, the fertile fields of Hetruria, and in seeming contempt of him, passed by his camp at Arretium, and advanced nearer to Rome, as if he intended to carry on his devastations to the walls of the capital. Flaminius beheld the lands of Cortona (one of the most considerable cities of Hetruria) in a flame behind him. Enraged at being thus insulted by Hannibal, he immediately called a council of war, but would not listen to his officers who advised him to continue in his camp till he was joined by his colleague, and in the mean time content himself with sending out strong parties to hinder the enemy from ravaging the country. He rushed out from the council in great wrath, and gave orders for marching. And when word was brought him, that one of the standards stuck so fast in the ground that they could not pull it out, he asked the messenger whether he had not likewise brought letters from the Senate forbidding him to fight. He added, Since fear has not left the soldiers strength enough in their hands to pull up the standard, bid them dig it up. He then began his march with a full resolution to fight Hannibal as soon as he could overtake him. And though his officers were greatly dissatisfied, yet the common soldiers applauded the confidence of their General, who to such an extravagant height had raised the hopes of the vulgar, that an immense number of them followed the camp in expectation of booty, and went loaded with chains for the multitude of enemies that were to be taken prisoners.

Hannibal was pursuing his march in the way towards Rome, having the lake Tbrasymentus (now Lago di Perugia) close on his right, and the town of Cortona at some distance on his left, when he learnt that the Consul was following him. Upon this advice, he turned his thoughts to seek out a convenient spot of ground where he might draw the enemy into an ambuscade. Nor was it long before he found a place fit for his purpose. He came to a valley, which, extending lengthways from the lake to a hill very steep and difficult of access, was lined on the two sides by ridges of little hills. Upon the steep hill Hannibal posted himself with his Africans and Spaniards in open view. Behind the ridge of hills, on the right of the valley, he placed in a long line the Baleares and other light-armed infantry; and behind that on the left, his cavalry and the Gauls, who formed a line, the extremity of which reached to a narrow pass, whereby he had entered the valley. These dispositions being made in the beginning of the night, he continued the remaining part of it in quiet and silence in his camp.

It was late before the Consul arrived at the lake; he therefore encamped that night by the side of it. But next morning by break of day, without examining the ground, he marched into the valley through the pass before mentioned. As soon as Hannibal was apprised that the Roman army were entered, and that their vanguard was not far from him, he gave orders orders for a general onset. So thick a fog from the lake at this time covered the valley, that the Romans found themselves attacked in front, flank and rear, almost before they saw the enemy. Many of them were slain in the order of their march, not having had time to turn themselves for battle: and so closely was the greater part hemmed in, that they could neither fight nor fly". Fifteen thousand were slaughtered in the valley, among whom was the Consul Flaminius. Great numbers being pushed into the lake, perished there. A body of six thousand men forced their way through the enemy. Could these brave legionaries have seen (says Polybius) what passed, they might, by facing about, and falling upon the backs of the Carthaginians, have given a turn to the fortune of the day. But they expecting to encounter new enemies, continued advancing on till they arrived at the summit of a hill: From which, when the fog was dispersed, seeing the total defeat of the rest of the army, they retreated to a neighbouring village. The Carthaginian General detached Mabarbal after them with a large body of horse and foot, to whom they surrendered next day upon a promise of their lives, and, if we may credit Livy, their liberties: Whence he takes occasion to reproach Hannibal with breach of faith, because when the next day he had assembled all his prisoners to the number of 15,000, and had separated the Romans from the other Italians, he delivered the former as his soldiers, to be kept in chains, and released only the latter. Polybius tells us that Hannibal declared he did not think himself bound by the promise which Mabarbal had made, as being without authority from him: but then according to the same historian, that promise was only of their lives, which, if true, Hannibal cannot on this occasion be charged with breach of faith, whether he was in reality bound by Mabarbal's promise or not. The loss on the side of the Carthaginians amounted only to 1500 men, most of them Gauls.

The first report of the defeat of the Roman army spread an unspeakable consternation in Rome. The people flocked in crowds to the forum, calling upon their magistrates to give them an account of the battle. It being impossible for these to conceal or disguise the truth for any long time, the Prætor Pomponius, towards sunset, mounted the rostra. All he said was, We are vanquished in a great battle. And the people, little accustomed to misfortunes in war, much less to hear their magistrates plainly and publickly own that they were conquered, could not bear this so heavy a calamity with patience and moderation. In this universal dejection the Senators alone preserved their steadiness. The Prætors assembled them, and kept them sitting several days together from sun-

ⁿ Livy and Plutarch tell us that this battle was fought with so much eagerness and fury on both sides, that the combatants were not sensible of an earthquake, which happened during the engagement, and which ruined many cities in Italy, overturned mountains, and changed the course of rivers. Livy, B. 22. c. 5. Plut. life of Fabius.

N. P. 536.
Esf. C. ...
211.
235 C. 16.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 6.

P. P. B. 3.
c. 5.

Y. R. 336.
B. C. 216.
275 C. 216.

rising to sun-set. Before they came to any fixed resolution in what manner to oppose the conqueror, they were alarmed with the news of a second defeat. The Consul Servilius having heard at Ariminum that Flaminius was following Hannibal with an intention to give him battle, had detached C. Centenius with 4000 horse to strengthen the Roman army. But this reinforcement had come too late. And Hannibal, after the action, hearing of Centenius's approach, had sent Maharbal, with the light armed foot, and part of the cavalry, to encounter him. Near 2000 Romans were killed in the engagement; the rest fled to a rising ground, but being invested by the enemy, were next day obliged to surrender.

It was thought by the Senate that the present exigency required a magistrate with dictatorial authority. Yet because there was no precedent of the people's naming a Dictator, and because their only Consul Servilius, to whom that nomination legally belonged, was absent, and all communication between him and Rome cut off by the enemy, it was agreed that the Comitia should create a magistrate, whose authority should be superior to the Consular, but somewhat inferior to the Dictatorial; and that he should be styled Pro-Dictator. Fabius Maximus was the person pitched upon; and the only privilege he seems to have wanted of those belonging to a Dictator, was that of naming his General of the horse. To this office the people appointed M. Minucius Rufus, a young man much in their favour. Fabius was a Senator distinguished for the coolness of his temper, and the great caution with which he proceeded in all his actions. He was as wary and circumspect in his conduct, as Sempronius and Flaminius had been rash and impetuous. The Pro-Dictator began the exercise of his office by acts of religion. The Sybilline books were consulted to know the causes of the present calamities; and the guardians of those oracles declared, that the misfortunes of the republic were owing to the undue performance of a vow to Mars; that it ought to be repeated, and four new vows made to several Deities, besides a dedication to Jupiter of all the pigs, lambs, kids and calves which should be produced in one spring. This last required the authority of the people: the other were made by the proper magistrates. This done, Fabius and Minucius immediately applied themselves to repair the fortifications of the city. They also posted guards in proper places, caused the bridges over the rivers to be broke down, and sent orders to the people all over the country through which it was thought Hannibal would pass, to burn their houses, destroy the fruits of the ground, and retire into places of strength and safety.

Before the Pro-Dictator took the field, he advised with the Senate concerning the troops that should serve under him. They allotted him the army of Servilius, and decreed that he should make what new levies he pleased, either at Rome or amongst the allies. Fabius raised but two new legions, which having commanded to repair to Tibur upon the Anio, he set out for Oricum, a city of Umbria, there to meet the troops from Ariminum under the Consul Servilius. These forces he himself led to Tibur, where he was joined by the new recruits. And having been informed that a Carthaginian fleet had taken, near the coast of Liguria, some Roman ships of burthen which were carrying provisions to the army in Spain, he sent the Consul Servilius to equip with all diligence what vessels were at Rome and Ostia, and with them to take upon him the guard of the coast of Italy. After these regulations Fabius began his march towards Hannibal, in which he proceeded with great caution, carefully searching all the places through which the army was to pass.

I the

L. E. 22.
C. 3.

Y. R. 530.
B. C. 216.
235 C.

The Carthaginian, immediately after the defeat of Centenius, had led his army through Umbria and Picenum to the territory of Adria, a considerable town on the Adriatic, destroying the country wherever he passed, and putting to the sword all the Romans he found in his way, that were able to bear arms; such was his hatred to the Roman name. Here he halted for some time, because the country abounded with good provisions and store of old wines, which served to recruit the strength of his exhausted troops, who had contracted distempers from bad food, and the fatigues they had undergone. He armed his Africans after the Roman manner, out of the spoils he had taken from the enemy. And being now near the sea, for the first time since his coming into Italy, he laid hold of the opportunity, and sent to Carthage an account of his success. Then having ravaged the territories of Arculan and Adria, he proceeded to the countries of the Prætutiani, the Marfi, the Marucini, the Peligni and Frentani. Last of all he entered Apulia, and was laying waste this country, when Fabius arrived and pitched his camp upon the hills near ^o Æce, within six miles of him. Hannibal instantly led his army to the Roman entrenchments, and offered battle to the enemy. But the Pro-Dictator remaining quiet in his camp, the Carthaginian, after waiting some time, drew off his men, openly reproaching the Romans, (says Livy) that at length their martial spirit was broke, that the war was at an end, and that they plainly owned themselves vanquished. Nevertheless he was inwardly grieved to find he had to do with a General very different from Sempronius and Flaminius, and was much more afraid of Fabius's prudence than his strength. He had not yet tried his constancy. To provoke him to battle he made frequent incursions into the countries of the Roman allies, and destroyed them with fire and sword; employing likewise all his arts by sudden marches and counter-marches to ensnare him. All was to no purpose; he could neither surprize Fabius, nor make him leave his hills, where he kept himself continually on his guard against so active an ene-

Polyb. 2.
3. c. 29.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 12.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 50.

* A town on the borders of Apulia.

Y. B. 374.
179.
1790.

may. He did not suffer his soldiers to stir out of their camp, except in large bodies; he followed the Carthaginians, but at a considerable distance, because he would on no account hazard a pitched battle; yet he had frequent skirmishes with the enemy, and intercepted such parties of them as ventured too far from their camp. And indeed this was the surest method to ruin Hannibal. The Romans were in no danger of wanting men or provisions in their own country; whereas the Carthaginian could only subsist by pillage, and when his men dropped off, had but small opportunities of recruiting. While the Pro-Dictator was thus baffling his enemy, he had the continual murmurs of his General of the horse, and of his soldiers to contend with. Minucius being a favourite of the people, and ambitious of the chief command, openly accused Fabius of real cowardice concealed under the appearance of prudence. But neither the invectives of this seditious man, nor the fresh devastations of Hannibal, who passed over the Apennines into Samnium, could make him alter his wise measures.

The Carthaginian having ravaged Samnium, and taken the town of Telisia, resolved to penetrate into Campania, one of the finest countries in the world, and at the same time the most inaccessible. Except on one side where it is bounded by the sea, it is encompassed by a chain of high mountains through which there are but three passes, and those very narrow and difficult. It was a bold step in Hannibal to undertake this expedition in sight of a Roman army commanded by an expert General; but he had his reasons for it. He would thereby either force the enemy to a battle, or shew plainly to the neighbouring nations that he was master of all the open country; by which means he hoped to draw over some of the towns to his party, not one of which had hitherto fallen off from the republic. Add to this, that the cities of Campania were the richest of any in Italy, and their trade the most considerable. Hannibal entered Campania by a pass at the foot of mount * Callicula°, near the Vulturnus, and encamped on the banks of that river. Fabius was indeed surprized at the boldness of the Carthaginian, but Minucius and the rest of the army, transported with rage at the being thus insulted, impatiently demanded to be led to battle, insomuch that the Pro-Dictator was forced to pretend the same eagerness to fight, and march with much greater expedition than usual. But when he came near the enemy, he returned to his former conduct, encamped upon mount Massicus, and from thence quietly beheld the • Polyb.

2. 22. 13.
Encl. 11.

* Livy tells us (B. 22. c. 13.) that Hannibal designed to enter Campania by a pass near Casertum, a town of Latiens, beyond the Liris, because by guarding that pass he was told he might prevent the Romans from assisting their allies. But the Carthaginian not pronouncing the word Casertum well, his guides thought he had said Casilinum, and accordingly led him to that town, which was situated on the Vulturnus, at the foot of mount Callicula. Hannibal was so enraged at the mistake, that he immediately ordered the chief of his guides to be crucified, for a terror to the rest.

Carthaginian

Carthaginian army gathering the fruits and rich harvests of the Falerian fields. This so provoked his soldiers, that they called him in derision the Pedagogue of Hannibal. And Minucius joining in the insolent raillery, said, their General had chosen for them a fine theatre, from whence they might conveniently behold the ravages of Italy. He then asked the friends of Fabius, whether the Pro-Dictator did not think the earth an unsafe place for him, and was therefore going to pitch his camp in heaven, and cover himself with the clouds. When these things were told Fabius, he only replied, that he should be indeed more cowardly than they made him, if he changed his resolution through fear of idle raileries or reproaches. He added, it is no inglorious thing, to fear for the safety of our country. That man is not fit to rule others who will be influenced by foolish calumnies, or subject himself and his government to the caprice of those whom he ought to command. Fabius continued the same conduct the whole summer, though he was not ignorant that his caution was blamed at Rome as well as in the army.

Y. R. 536.
Bef. Chr.
216.
235 Conf.

Plut. life
of Fabius.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 15.

Hannibal despaired of bringing the Romans to a battle, and therefore having got an immense booty, he began now to look out for a place in which to secure it, and where he might likewise take up his winter quarters; for though Campania abounded with fruits and wine, it yielded not corn sufficient to subsist a numerous army for any considerable time. For these reasons Hannibal began to draw towards the pass by which he had entered this country. Fabius perceiving his design, detached 4000 men to seize the streight, which being commanded by mount Callicula, he encamped the rest of his army towards the top of that hill. From thence he sent a garrison into Casilinum, a town on the Vulturnus, on the other side the pass, and ordered L. Hostilius Mancinus, with 400 horse, to observe the enemy. This young officer rashly engaging with a party of Numidians, was himself slain together with the greatest part of the detachment. The same day Minucius joined Fabius. He had been sent to guard a pass at Terracina, a city of Latium, to hinder Hannibal from penetrating that way into the territory of Rome ^p.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 92.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 15.

The Carthaginian, not being able to dislodge Fabius, contrived the following stratagem to be executed in the night. Being encamped at the foot of mount Callicula, he ordered Asdrubal to pick out 2000 of the strongest oxen, to cause faggots of dry wood to be tied to their horns, and then to keep the cattle, with the herdsmen, ready without the camp. After supper, when all things were quiet, the oxen were brought to the foot of an eminence not far from the pass, that was guarded by the 4000 Romans. Upon a signal given, the wood on the horns of those beasts was

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 93.

^p Hannibal, according to Livy, advanced towards Fabius, and sent his light horse to try once more to provoke him to battle. But though the Pro-Dictator had greatly the advantage of the ground, he would not hazard a general action, but contented himself with skirmishing with the enemies cavalry, of whom he killed eight hundred, with the loss of only two hundred of his own men.

set

V. R. 336.
B. C. 216.
213 C. 216.

set on fire, and the herdsmen, who had been instructed to drive them if possible to the top of the eminence, immediately set out, being followed by the light armed infantry. These had orders to assist the herdsmen as long as the cattle kept together, but upon their dispersing, to seize the top of the hill, making as great a noise as they could, and be in readiness to defend themselves in case they were attacked by the enemy. In the mean time Hannibal led his army to the very entrance of the pass. The Africans marched first, next followed the cavalry, then the booty, and last of all the Spaniards and Gauls. The Roman detachment seeing the fires approach the top of the eminence, thought Hannibal was endeavouring to escape that way; they therefore left the pass in all haste, and marched up in order to oppose him. But as they came nearer the cattle, which now were running up and down, firing the bushes wherever they went, they knew not what to think of these lights, their imaginations suggesting to them a thousand fears. In this perplexity they began to skirmish with the Carthaginians on the top of the hill, but the cattle running in among the combatants separated them; after which both parties continued quiet waiting for day-light. Fabius was surprised at what he saw, but suspecting it to be some stratagem of the enemy, would not stir from his camp, lest he should be entrapped, or, contrary to his intention, be forced to hazard a general action. Hannibal finding the pass open, marched safely through it with his army and baggage: but that his light armed foot might not be overpowered by the Romans on the eminence, he, as soon as it was day, sent his Spaniards to their assistance, who brought off the detachment, with the slaughter of a thousand of the enemy. The Carthaginian continued his march to the neighbourhood of Alife, a city on the confines of Samnium and Campania.

L. B. 22.
C. 18.

Fabius, though rallied by his soldiers by being thus over-reached, kept steady to his first resolution; he marched directly after Hannibal, but encamped on the eminencies near him. The latter having again pillaged Samnium and the country of the Peligni, returned to Apulia, where he took Geronium, the houses of which he turned into granaries, and pitched his camp under the walls. From thence he sent out two thirds of his army to forage; part of the remainder he kept to guard the camp, and the rest he disposed in different stations to protect his foragers. As these were in great number, and the country was very fertile, vast quantities of provisions were brought in daily. The Pro-Dictator, continuing to follow him, at length encamped in the territory of Larinum, in the country of the Frentani. From thence he was recalled to Rome to perform a solemn sacrifice which required his presence. Both the Senate and people were at this time much discontented with him. For beside that his caution had not succeeded to their wishes, Hannibal, by sparing the lands of Fabius in the general devastation, had rendered him suspected at Rome of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy. And as he had, without consulting the Senate, agreed upon an exchange of of prisoners with Hannibal, and to purchase the redemption of 247 captives which the Carthaginian had more than he, the Senate refused him the money. Fabius, determined to keep his word and release his countrymen, directed his son to sell his lands, and pay the sum stipulated. And though most of the prisoners afterwards offered to reimburse him their respective ransoms, he would not consent to it.

Y. R. 536.
Euf. Chr.
216.
235 Comf.

Plut. life of Fabius.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 94.

Fabius, upon his leaving the army, had advised, entreated, and by his authority commanded his General of the horse not to fight during his absence. But Minucius, even while the Dictator was making his exhortation, had his thoughts wholly intent upon a battle, which he was determined to hazard the very first opportunity. After Fabius's departure he indeed staid some time on the hills, in hopes that Hannibal would give him an opportunity of coming to an engagement with him there. But in this being disappointed, he marched down into the plain, and drew nearer the enemy. The Carthaginian, upon his approach, leaving one third of his army to be employed in foraging, advanced with the rest from Geronium to meet him. Between the two camps there was a rising ground, that would be very commodious to which ever party should possess it. A detachment of 2000 Carthaginian light armed troops seized it by night. Minucius the next day drove them from it, and there entrenched his forces. As Hannibal's principal affair at this time was to provide abundantly not only for his men but for his horses, that they might be in good condition for action the next summer; and as the Romans did not for several days stir from their camp, the Carthaginian detached great numbers of his soldiers to forage. Minucius laid hold of this advantage, and marched his legions to the very entrenchments of the enemy, at the same time sending out his horse and the light armed men, in parties, to attack their foragers, who being dispersed over the fields, and loaded with booty, could make no resistance. Nor had Hannibal sufficient strength within his camp to venture out against those that assailed it. He was induced to keep upon the defensive, till Asdrubal, informed of the danger by those who had escaped the Roman horse, came from Geronium, with 4000 men, to the assistance of his General. Upon the arrival of this succour he sallied out, and Minucius retired. The Carthaginian fearing lest the Romans should attack his camp at Geronium, and make themselves masters of the plunder and provisions he had laid up in it, returned thither, and after this time became more cautious in sending out parties to forage.

When Minucius's success was known at Rome, his friends took advantage of it to extol his bravery and abilities above those of Fabius. M. Metilius, a tribune of the commons, assembled the people, and made a speech to them full of injurious reflections upon Fabius's conduct, and concluded with a motion to give the General of the horse an equal authority with the Pro-Dictator. The latter thought it to no purpose to defend himself in the assemblies of the people, since he had

Liv. B. 24
c. 25.

Y. R. 196.
P. C. 196.
195 C. 196.

not a favourable hearing even in the Senate. There he endeavoured to convince the Fathers that their losses had been owing to the rashness of their Generals; and he did not scruple to say, that if the Dictatorial power continued in him, he would call Minucius to an account for disobeying his orders; that he hoped soon to make it evident to all the world, that fortune was of small moment to an able General, and that reason and good conduct sufficed; adding, that for his part he thought it a greater glory for a General to preserve his army (if he did it without ignominy) than to destroy many thousands of enemies. Having assisted at the sacrifice to which he had been called, and presided at the election of a new Consul, (M. Atilius Regulus, who was substituted in the room of Flaminius) he left the city the night before the comitia were to determine in his affair, that he might not be present at the affront which was going to be put upon him. Next day, when the people were assembled, though they were prejudiced against Fabius, and zealous for Minucius, yet scarce any one had courage enough to harangue them in favour of Metilius's proposal. C. Terentius Varro was the only man that seconded the Tribune. Varro was the son of a butcher, had been a shopkeeper, then a pleader, undertaking poor mens causes right or wrong. By this practice, and by railing at the nobility, he had ingratiated himself with the multitude, and by their favour obtained successively the offices of Quæstor, Ædile and Prætor, and was now aiming at the Consulship. The motion in short was carried, Minucius was put upon an equal foot with Fabius, and the Senate confirmed the decree of the people.

P. C. 196.
3. C. 196.

Fabius being arrived at the camp, it was agreed between him and his late Master of the horse, now his colleague, to divide the army equally between them. The former kept on the hills, and Minucius posted himself at the distance of 1500 paces below him. Between the entrenchments of Minucius, and those of the Carthaginian at Geronium, was an eminence from whence either camp might be annoyed. This post Hannibal resolved to seize, not doubting but Minucius would attempt to dispossess him; and he hoped to draw him into a snare. With this view he had over night chosen out 5000 foot and 500 horse, divided them into bodies of 200 and 300 men each, and hid them in several cavities at the foot of the hill. And lest his ambush should happen to be discovered, he, to fix the attention of the Romans another way, sent a detachment to take possession of the eminence as soon as it was light. When Minucius perceived the Carthaginians upon the top of the hill, to dislodge them, he sent first his light armed foot, then his cavalry, and last of all (seeing that Hannibal sustained his own men by successive detachments) he followed in person with the legions. When the battle became general, the ambush, upon a signal given, rose on all sides. Minucius's army was quickly routed, and would have been entirely destroyed, but that Fabius had too much zeal for his country to let himself be swayed by private resentment. We must make haste, said he to those that were

Part. Life of Fabius.

were about him, to rescue Minucius, who is a valiant man, and a lover of his country. And if he has been too forward to engage the enemy, we will tell him of it at another time. Instantly he gave orders to march to the relief of his colleague and his routed troops, who at his approach began to rally, and retire to him for protection. Hannibal, seeing a fresh army advancing against him in good order, was obliged to give over the pursuit and found a retreat. He is reported to have said to some of his friends while he was retiring, Have not I often told you, that that cloud which hovered upon the mountains would one day break upon us in a storm? The Carthaginian, after the battle, having possession of the eminence, fortified it, and placed a guard on it to secure his camp on that side.

V. R. 536.
Bel. Chr.
216.
235 Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 105.

Plot. life of Fabius.

Minucius and Fabius returned each to his entrenchments. The latter did not drop a word which favoured of contempt for his colleague, and Minucius, now convinced of his error, did justice both to Fabius and himself. Having assembled his troops, he ingenuously owned to them that he had learnt by experience, he was not fit to command, adding, that both he and they for the future ought to obey the orders of Fabius. Then marching them to the Pro-Dictator's camp, he presented himself before him, made his acknowledgments, and resigned the dignity last conferred on him by the people. Fabius received him with great kindness, the soldiers embraced one another, and there was an universal joy. The Pro-Dictatorship being almost expired, Fabius sent for the Consuls Servilius and Atilius to take upon them the command of the army.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 30.

Servilius, with a fleet of 120 ships, had made an expedition into Africa, where as he was ravaging the coast, he fell into an ambuscade, and was forced to retire to his fleet with the loss of a thousand of his men. Weighing anchor in all haste, he sailed to Lilybæum in Sicily, and from thence, after delivering up the fleet to the Prætor Otacilius, was returned to Italy.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 31.

The Consuls following the advice and example of Fabius, no action of moment happened between the two armies, though Hannibal still continued at Geronium, and the Romans held their camp so near him as to watch all his motions.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 106.

THE SAME YEAR, while the war was thus carried on in Italy, Cn. Scipio had great success, both by sea and land, against the Carthaginians in Spain^a. Ambassadors came to him from all the nations between the Iberus

Liv. B. 22.
c. 20.
vid. infr. p.
229.

^a The Romans at first divided this country into Hither Spain and Further Spain. Augustus Cæsar afterwards divided Further Spain into two provinces, Bætica and Lusitania, and gave the name of Tarracenia to Hither Spain.

Bætica, so called from the river • Bætis, which runs through the middle of it, was the most southern province, and comprehended the present kingdom of Granada, Andalusia, part of New Castile, and Estremadura. Cadix, called by the X-2
ancients,

• Guadalquivir.

Y. R. 536.
Ref. Chr.
216.
235 Conf.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 22.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 93.

Iberus and the Pyrenees, and a hundred and twenty cities surrendered to him. To add to this good fortune, his allies, the Celtiberians, defeated Asdrubal in two battles, killed 15,000 of his men, and took 4000 prisoners. This was the state of the Roman affairs in Spain, when P. Scipio, the brother of Cneius, arrived there with the character of Pro-Consul. The view of the Senate in carrying on the war with vigour in this country, was to divide the forces of Carthage, who would be more jealous of her conquests in Spain than of those in Italy, and by sending powerful succours to Asdrubal, would be less in a condition to supply his brother Hannibal. P. Scipio brought with him thirty ships of war, 8000 Roman soldiers, and a great quantity of arms and provisions.

Asdrubal being employed in the Celtiberian war, the two brothers with joint forces passed the Iberus, and advanced to Saguntum without seeing an enemy. This city Hannibal had rebuilt, placed a garrison in it, and assigned it for the residence of all the young noblemen, whom he had obliged their parents to put into his hands as pledges of their fidelity. There was then at Saguntum a Spaniard named Abelox, of a good family, and considerable interest in his country, and hitherto looked upon as firmly attached to the Carthaginians. This man seeing their affairs declining in Spain, while the Romans were daily gaining ground, began to think of going over to the prevailing party. But considering at the same time that a deserter, how well born soever, makes but an indifferent figure, unless he can gain himself credit, by some important services to his new friends, formed a scheme to put the young hostages into the hands of the Romans. At this time Bostar commanded the Carthaginians in those parts, having been sent by Asdrubal to hinder the Scipio's from passing the Iberus; but not daring to wait

Strabo l. 3.
p. 171.

† Tarragon.

Strab. l. 3.
p. 139-142.

• Scythia.

ancients, Gades and Gadira, is a town situated in a small island of the same name, on the western coast of Andalusia, about nine leagues from Gibraltar. It is said that Hercules having extended his conquests to the ocean, and imagining he was come to the extremity of the world, raised two pillars near Gades, as monuments of his victories. Geographers are not agreed about the place where these pillars were erected. Bætica was the most fruitful, the wealthiest and the most populous part of Spain. It contained two hundred cities, the chief of which stood on the Bætis, Castulo towards the source of that river, Carduba (the native place of Lucan and the two Seneca's) lower down, and • Hispalis nearest the sea. It's chief inhabitants were the Turdetani.

Lusitania was bounded on the west by the ocean, on the north by the river Durius, and on the south by the river Anas. Between these two rivers runs the Tagus. Lusitania included what is now called Portugal, together with part of Old and New Castile.

Terraconia comprehended the rest of Spain, that is to say, the Kingdoms of Murcia and Valencia, Catalonia, Aragon, Navarre, Biscay, the Asturias, Gallicia, the Kingdom of Leon, and the greatest part of the two Castiles. Terraco †, a city on the sea coast, not far from the Iberus, gave name to the province. Pretty near this town lay Barcino, which from it's name is thought to have been built by Amilcar Barco the father of the great Hannibal. The chief nations of Terraconia were the Celtiberi beyond the river Iberus, the Cantabri, where Biscay now lyes, the Carpetani, whose capital was Toledo, and the Overtani, &c. Rollin, Hist. Anc. Tom. L. p. 247.

for

for them, he had retired to Saguntum, and encamped under its walls. Bostar was a good natured easy man, and placed great confidence in Abelox, which the latter abusing, insinuated to him that the Romans having now passed the Iberus, it would be no longer possible for the Carthaginians to keep Spain in obedience by fear; that Saguntum being threatened with a siege, he had an opportunity of attaching all the Spaniards to the interest of his republic, by restoring the hostages to their parents, who would think themselves under a perpetual obligation to him for so early providing for the safety of their children, and that if the Romans should by force or artifice get them into their hands, they would certainly act the part which he advised him to act, and by that means bring over many nations to their party. Abelox added, that if he was sent to conduct the hostages to their respective countries, he did not doubt but he should be able to represent the obligation in such a light to the Spaniards, as that they should continue firm to the interest of a Republic, who had given so eminent an example of her regard for her allies. The easy Carthaginian, deceived by an appearance of friendship, gave his consent to the proposal. Abelox hereupon stole away in the night to the Roman camp, acquainted the Pro-consul with what he had done; and it was agreed between them that a detachment of Romans should lye in ambush the night following, and intercept the youths with their leader. The project was executed with success; and Scipio, by sending back the hostages to their relations, gained to himself a considerable interest in the country.

Y. R. 536.
Bef. Chr.
216.
235 Conf.

To return to Italy: The Senate at Rome was attentive to every thing that concerned the interest of the Republic. To maintain her dignity, and preserve to her the respect of foreign nations, they sent to Pineus the Illyrian king for the annual tribute he had engaged to pay, and to Philip of Macedon to demand the treacherous Demetrius, who had sheltered himself in his dominions, and was exciting him to take advantage of the misfortunes of Rome, and make a descent upon Italy; at the same time she refused to accept a present of forty vases of gold from the city of Naples, that the world might see her finances were not exhausted.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 33.

Polyb. B. 5.
c. 101.
Liv. B. 22.
c. 32.

C H A P. XXI.

THIRD YEAR of the WAR.

BATTLE of CANNÆ.

THE time for a new election of Consuls drawing on, and the present Consuls Servilius and Atilius not thinking it safe to leave the army, one of them, at the desire of the Senate, nominated a Dictator

Liv. B. 22.
c. 54.

Y. R. 446.
 215.
 436 Cons.

to hold the comitia. L. Veturius Philo was the person pitched upon, but as he seems to have been attached to the interests of the people, it was probably for this reason that the Senators made the Augurs find some defect with regard to religion, in his nomination. After fourteen days exercise of his office he was forced to abdicate; and an interregnum ensued. P. Cornelius Afræ, one of the interreges, convened the centurians; and then amongst the candidates for the consulship appeared C. Terentius Varro, who had scarce any thing to recommend him but his hatred of the nobility, and the zeal he had lately shewn for advancing Minucius the General of the horse to an equal authority with the Pro-Dictator Fabius. The Patricians, as the most effectual way to disappoint the hopes of Varro, set up against him competitors of such known merit, both out of their own body, and from among the Plebeians, as must naturally prepossess the people in their favour. But Varro happened to have among the tribunes of the commons a relation named Q. Bebius Herennius. This man, in a speech to the people, inveighed bitterly against the nobility. He asserted that it was the Patricians who had brought Hannibal into Italy; that an end might have been put to the war had not they fraudulently protracted it; and that the Carthaginian would never be conquered till a true Plebeian, not such a one as was only Plebeian by extraction, and being dignified and ranked among the nobility, had imbibed the patrician spirit, but a new man, not infected with their maxims, was at the head of the Roman armies. The people full of these impressions declared Terentius Varro Consul, and would name no other that day, that Varro might preside in the comitia for choosing his colleague. The nobility, vexed at their disappointment, prevailed with great difficulty upon L. Æmilius Paullus, an enemy to the Plebeians (on account of the affront they had put upon him after his victories in Thericum) to offer himself as a candidate; and the other competitors yielding to him, he was chosen Consul in the next assembly. The other offices were bestowed with great judgment. Servilius and Atilius were directed to remain in quality of Pro-Consuls, at the head of the same armies they at present commanded. P. Scipio was continued Pro-Consul in Spain, M. Cl. Marcellus was appointed Prætor, in Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus in Cis-Alpine Gaul. All these, except Terentius Varro, had born the same offices before; so careful were the Romans to have men of experience to conduct their affairs at so critical a time.

Y. R. 447.
 216.
 436 Cons.

See p. 100.

The Senate also in the present exigence augmented the army to eight legions (each consisting of 5000 foot and 300 horse) without reckoning the allies.

E. 3. c. 107.

The usual practice (says Polybius) is to raise yearly but four legions, each of 4000 foot and 200 horse; and it is only in the most important conjunctures that these numbers are increased to 5000 and 300. The infantry furnished by the allies is only equal to that of the legions,

but

but the cavalry ¹ twice the number of the Roman horse. Generally speaking each Consul has two legions and one half of the auxiliary forces, and commands his army separately, against a different enemy. It rarely happens that the four legions, with proportionable number of auxiliaries, are employed in the same expedition. But in this the Romans employed not only four but eight legions, so great was their apprehension of the impending danger.

Y. R. 537.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236 Conf.

Though the Republic would not receive any presents from her dependents in Italy, she readily accepted at this time a very rich one from King Hiero, a statue of Victory of massy gold, and of great weight, 75,000 bushels of wheat, 50,000 bushels of barley, and a 1000 dartmen and slingers to oppose the Baleares and Numidians. The King's present was accompanied with an exhortation to the Senate to employ a fleet and some land forces to make a descent upon Africa. The Conscript Fathers returned him a grateful answer, and in pursuit of his advice ordered a reinforcement of twenty-five quinqueremes to T. Otacilius the Pro-prætor in Sicily, (for Marcellus was not yet arrived there) giving him permission to carry the war into Africa if he thought proper. Before the Consuls took the field, the soldiers (which had never been done before) were required to take an oath to this effect, that they would assemble at the command of the Consuls, and not depart afterwards without leave; and whereas they had been accustomed voluntarily to swear that they would not forsake their ensigns through fear, nor go out of their ranks unless to take up a weapon, or to smite an enemy, or to save the life of a citizen, this oath also was now enjoined them by authority.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 37.

While these preparations were making at Rome, the army under the Pro-Consuls Servilius and Atilius continued to observe the motions of Hannibal. As those Generals had received orders from the Senate not to venture a battle, but only to train and discipline their men, and harass the enemy by frequent skirmishes, all the spring passed, as the winter had done, without any considerable action on either side.

Polyb. B. 5.
c. 106.

But the time of harvest being come, Hannibal decamped from Geronium, and to drive the enemy to the necessity of fighting, seized upon the castle of Cannæ, where the Romans had lodged the ammunition and provisions they had brought from Canusium. The town of Cannæ had been destroyed the last year; the castle was left standing, and Hannibal,

¹ We read thrice in Polybius, doubtless through a mistake of the copyist. Livy says twice, and this must be the truth, otherwise the cavalry of the Roman army at the battle of Cannæ (which is going to be related) would have amounted to 9600, and Polybius himself says they were little more than 6000. Here again there must be some mistake, it should be little more than 7000: for reckoning 300 horse to each of the eight legions, and supposing the allies to have furnished double the number that the Romans did, the whole amount will be 7200, and so Livy, who frequently copies Polybius, seems to have understood him in this place. Some historians, says he, write, that when the battle of Cannæ was fought the Romans were 87,200 strong (i. e. 80,000 foot and 7,200 horse.) B. 22. c. 36.

Y. R. 537.
 Bef. Chr.
 215.
 236 Cons.

by possessing himself of it, threw the Roman army into great perplexity: for beside being master of those provisions, he was now in a post which by its situation commanded all the adjacent country. The Pro-Consuls dispatched messenger after messenger to ask instructions from the Senate, concerning the measures they should take. In their letters they represented that the country all around was ruined, that it was impossible to advance near the enemy without being obliged to fight; and that all the allies, attentive to the uncertain state of things, were in suspense waiting the event. The Senate judged it expedient to come to a decisive action with the enemy, but wrote to Servilius and Atilius to defer it, till the Consuls (whom they now sent from Rome) were arrived in the camp. Great dependance had the Fathers on the virtue and abilities of Æmilius; and indeed his known prudence, and the eminent services he had done his country some years before in the Illyrian war, justified the confidence they reposed in him. At his departure from Rome, when they had represented to him the great importance of the present occasion, they urged him to exert himself, as a true citizen mindful of the majesty of the Roman name. Nor was Æmilius wanting either of a just sense of his country's danger, or of the warmest zeal for its preservation: So that when he was arrived at the camp, and had assembled the soldiers to impart to them the pleasure of the Senate, he made use of all the arguments he could think of to restore their courage, much abated by so many preceding disasters. He told them that several good reasons might be assigned for the defeat of the former armies; but that no excuse could be found if this should fail of victory. That the soldiers of those armies were new-raised men without discipline or experience, and entirely unacquainted with the sort of enemy they had to deal with: That those who fought at the Trebia were not recovered from the fatigue of their voyage from Sicily when they were led to battle: That at the lake Thrasymenus the Romans, so far from seeing the enemy before the battle, did not even see them during the conflict: That in none of the preceding engagements had there been two Consuls with two consular armies; but that now all circumstances were changed: "By frequent skirmishes with the enemy
 " you have learned their manner of fighting. You have not only both
 " the Consuls of the present year to conduct you, but both the Consuls
 " of the last year, who have consented to continue with us and share
 " the fortune of the day. With equal numbers you have seldom failed
 " of beating the enemy in small engagements: It would be strange
 " therefore, nay I think it impossible, that now when you are double " their number you should be vanquished by them in a general action.
 " But what need of further exhortation? The fate of Rome, the pre" servation of whatever is dear to you, depends at this time upon your " courage and resolution."

The

The next day the Consuls put their army in march towards the place where the Carthaginians were posted, and the day following pitched their camp within six miles of them. As it was a smooth plain, and the Carthaginian cavalry were far superior to the Roman, Æmilius judged it not proper to come to a battle in that situation. He was for drawing the enemy, if possible, to some ground where horse would have little opportunity to act. But the next day, it being Varro's turn to command, he, in spite of all that his colleague could say to dissuade him from it, decamped and drew nearer the enemy. Hannibal with his cavalry and light-armed foot advanced to meet him, fell furiously upon the Romans in their march, and put them into great disorder. Varro, when he had sustained this first shock by means of some of the heavy-armed foot, commanded his horse and dartmen to charge, and he had the prudence to mingle with these some of his legionaries; this gave him the advantage in the combat, to which the night at length put an end.

The day following, Æmilius, who was against fighting, and yet could not safely retreat, encamped two thirds of his army along the *Aufidus*¹, which lay to their left. The other third he led over the river, and made them intrench themselves at the distance of about 1300 paces eastward from his greater camp, and somewhat more than that distance from the camp of the enemy, which lay to the south. By this disposition he could protect his own foragers and distress those of the Carthaginian.

Hannibal foreseeing that these movements of the Romans would infallibly bring on a general action, thought it adviseable, before he came to that hazard, to animate his soldiers for the occasion; lest their late repulse should have left some impression of fear upon their minds. Having called them together, he bid them cast their eyes over the country all around, and then tell him, "Whether, being superior as they were to the enemy in horse, they could possibly, had the Gods consulted their wishes, have desired any thing more to their advantage than to come to a decisive battle on such a spot?" They all agreed that they could not have chosen better. He added, "Thank the Gods then

¹ Livy differs from Polybius with regard to the particulars that happened before the battle of Cannæ. The Latin historian tells us that Hannibal had not yet removed from Geranium when the Consuls began their march from Rome; that he had then scarce ten days provisions in his camp, that the Spaniards were ready to desert him, and that he himself had thoughts of running away into Gaul with his cavalry, and leaving his infantry to shift for themselves. He adds several other circumstances as little worth relating as these.

And, indeed, the accounts that he, Appian, and the later writers, give of these affairs, are intermixt with so many things evidently fabulous, and often inconsistent with one another, that in the text Polybius has been chiefly followed, who wrote the nearest to the times he speaks of, was himself a soldier, and whose history is the most consistent and the most judicious.

² The Aufidus runs through the Apennines into the Adriatic, and is the only river in Italy which takes that course.

Y. R. 517.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236 Conf.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 106.

Y. R. 537.
 Bel. Chr.
 215.
 236 Conf.

“ who have brought your enemies hither, that you may triumph over “ them; and remember also your obligation to me, for having reduced “ the Romans to the necessity of fighting: for, advantageous as the “ ground is to us, here fight they must, there is no avoiding it.” He concluded with reminding them of their former exploits, and with assuring them that one victory more would give a period to all their labours, and put them in possession of all their hopes, the wealth of Rome, and the dominion of Italy.

The Carthaginian after this entrenched his forces on the west side of the Aufidus, where lay the greater camp of the Romans, and the next day but one drew out his army and presented battle. Æmilius not liking the ground, and being persuaded that want of provisions would very soon oblige Hannibal to quit his post, declined the challenge, but took great care to have his two camps well fortified and guarded. Han- nibal, after waiting a while in the field, returned to his intrenchments, and detached some of his Numidians to pass the Aufidus, and fall upon certain parties that from the Roman lesser camp were coming to the river for water. The Numidians having easily put these to flight, advanced so far as to brave the Romans in their very camp; an insult so offensive to the soldiers in general as well as to Varro, that had it not been Æmi- lius’s turn to command, those of the greater camp would have instantly crossed the river to join their fellows, and offer battle to the enemy.
 “ Their impatience to fight, says Polybius, was extreme; for when men “ have once resolved upon a difficult and dangerous enterprize, no time “ seems so tedious as the space between the determination and the exe“ cution.”

The same author tells us, that when the news came to Rome of the armies being near each other, and of their daily skirmishing and picqueering, the people, remembering their former defeats, were universally in the utmost anxiety and fear, well foreseeing the fatal consequences of a new overthrow; that they talked of nothing but oracles, extraordinary appearances, prodigies seen both in temples and in private houses; and that their whole time was spent in vows and supplications: He adds, “ for in-“ all public calamities and dangers the Romans are extremely careful to “ pacify the anger of the Gods; nor of the many religious ceremonies pre“ scribed for such occasions, is there one, of which, how frivolous and im“ pertinent soever it may appear, they think the practice unbecoming.”

At sun-rise in the morning after the insult by the Numidians, Varro, having the command, led his troops of the greater camp over the Au- fidus, and joining them to those of the lesser, drew them up in the plain after the accustomed manner *, excepting that, in all the three lines, the battalions stood closer, and those in the first line were deeper than usual. The Roman knights, commanded by Æmilius, formed the right wing close to the river; the cavalry of the allies, under Terentius Varro, made the left. The Pro-Consuls Servilius and Atilius led the main

The battle of Cannæ.
 Polyb. E. 5.
 c. 11.
 * See Vol. I.
 B. 3. c. 10.
 § 6.

main body consisting of 70,000 foot; for Varro had left 10,000 men in the greater camp, with orders to attack that of Hannibal when the armies should be engaged.

V. R. 537.
Bul. Chr.
215.
250 Conf.

The Carthaginian ^a no sooner perceived the Romans in motion, but he sent over the Aufidus his slingers and the other light-armed foot. The rest of the army followed, passing the river at two different places. He drew up his forces in one front. To face the Roman knights he posted his Spanish and Gallic cavalry in his left wing; next these were placed one half of his African infantry, then the Spanish and Gallic foot, then the other half of his Africans; and the Numidian horse made his right wing.

The Africans were armed after the Roman manner, out of the spoils taken from the enemy in former battles. The Gauls, naked from the waist upward, and the Spaniards, clothed in linen jackets trimmed with purple, were armed each after the manner of their country. They had shields alike; but the Gauls used long broad swords fit only for cutting strokes, and at a certain distance; the Spaniards short and well pointed blades proper both for striking and thrusting. The cohorts of these two nations being ranged alternately, this medley of troops of such different appearances, is said to have been terrible to behold. Strong of body and furious in charging were the Gauls, but accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt; the Spaniards less eager and more wary, were neither ashamed to give ground when over-matched, nor afraid to return and renew the fight whenever it was practicable. As the impetuosity of the one, and the patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper, so the place which they held in this battle added confidence to them both: For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked by the Africans, whose name was grown terrible in Spain by their conquests, and in Gaul by this their present war. Asdrubal commanded the cavalry of the left wing, Hanno * the right, and Hannibal with his brother Mago took the conduct of the main body: This amounted to about 40,000 foot; the horse were 10,000. The armies were neither of them incommoded by the rising sun, the Romans facing to the south, their enemies to the north.

* Livy says
Maharbal.

^a Plutarch reports that Varro's confidence and his numerous army alarmed the Carthaginians; that Hannibal with a small company went out to take a view of the Romans, and that one of his followers, called Gisco, saying to him, that the number of the enemy was very astonishing; Hannibal with a serious countenance answered, There is something yet more astonishing which you take no notice of, That in all that multitude there is not one man whose name is Gisco. This jest made all the company laugh, who telling it to every one they met in their return, the laughter was continued till they reached the camp. The army seeing Hannibal and his attendants come back laughing, imagined that without doubt this mirth proceeded from the good posture of their affairs, and their contempt of the enemy; which did not a little raise the spirits of the soldiers.

The action began with the skirmishing
 of the velites or light armed troops, with little advantage to either side.

Sir W. R.

The action began with the skirmishing of the velites or light armed troops, with little advantage to either side. During this skirmish the Roman knights came to an engagement with the Spanish and Gaulic cavalry. Being shut in by the river on one side, and by their own infantry on the other, they could practise none of the evolutions and returns commonly used in fight by the horse in those days. There was no way but to bear forward in a right line; and both parties rushing violently on, the men came at length to grapple with one another, and many of them, their horses running from under them, fell to the ground, whence starting up again, they fought on foot. In conclusion, the Roman cavalry were overborn and forced to recoil. This the Consul Emilius could by no means remedy, for Adrubal with his boisterous Gauls and Spaniards was not to be resisted by the Roman knights, unequal both in number and horsemanship. The greater part of them, after they had defended themselves with the utmost bravery, were slain upon the spot, and most of the remainder, in their flight along the river; for Adrubal gave no quarter.

Before this rout was quite finished, the heavy armed infantry on both sides joined battle. Hannibal, in advancing against the enemy, had caused his Gauls and Spaniards, who held the middle of his line (and probably * made nine tenths of it, to march, some faster some slower, so as by degrees to form the figure of a crescent, the convex side towards the Romans, and the extreme points touching the Africans to the right and left. The middle or most prominent part of the curve being the thickest † (as its figure of a crescent implies) and the best strengthened against all impression, sustained the shock of the enemy for some time with great bravery and steadiness; till the Roman center, reinforced by some battalions from the wings, compelled, by its very weight, the curve to yield: but by the artful management of Hannibal, this curve so yielded and bent inward as at length to form a new curve, the concave side towards the enemy. The Roman legions following their supposed victory, and pressing still forward against the Gauls and Spaniards, who continued retiring before them, came insensibly between the two bodies of African infantry, which had not yet moved from their posts, and the depth ‡ of whose files was, perhaps, at first concealed by the sides

* The reason for this opinion will be given hereafter.

† Polybius (B. 3. c. 115.) tells us that the Gauls were thinly ranged, and therefore easily broken. But if this be meant of the convex crescent, how will it accord with the stout fight which he himself says the Gauls maintained, or with the necessity which the Roman center, already deep, was under of being strengthened by draughts from the wings, in order to break that crescent. I imagine therefore, that Polybius speaks here of the sides only of the crescent, the parts towards the horns, and not of the middle part, which though thick and strong, was already broken by the superior weight of the Roman center.

‡ Neither Livy nor Polybius say any thing of the proportion which the number of the Gauls and Spaniards bore to that of the Africans;

sides of the concave into which the Romans entered, and was but gradually discovered in proportion as the Gauls and Spaniards recoiled. The two bodies of Africans, as the conjuncture itself dictated, facing one to the right, the other to the left, attacked the Romans in flank, so that these could fight no longer in the order of a phalanx (which form they had taken during the conflict) but were obliged to divide themselves into platoons or small bodies, to make head against those unexpected enemies.

The Consul Emilius, after the defeat of his cavalry, seeing that all depended upon the foot, had by this time put himself among the legionaries, animating them both by words and example. Hannibal acted the like part among the Gauls and Spaniards, the conduct of whom he had taken upon himself from the beginning.

Hitherto there had nothing of moment happened between the Numidian horse and the cavalry of the Roman allies, commanded by Varro; for the former would neither give nor sustain any charge: yet by making frequent offers, they kept their enemies so employed as to hinder them from assisting the legions. But now the last and fatal blow, which completed the destruction of the Roman army, was given by the same hand that gave the first. For Asdrubal, having cut in pieces almost all the horse of the Roman right wing, hastened to the assistance of the Numidians. The cavalry of the Roman left wing, perceiving his approach,

Africans; nor whether the African battalions were longer in rank or in file. Nor do they give us any light concerning those wonderful movements, by which Hannibal could, without confusion, form his center from a straight line into a crescent, the convex to the enemy; and afterwards, without confusion, invert its figure.

² Chevalier Felard (tom. 4. p. 377.) from this expression of Polybius, triumphantly concludes that the Romans were originally drawn up by Varro in a phalange coupée, that is, says the Chevalier, in columns with small intervals between them. The inference is not well deduced. For, supposing the Romans to have been ranged at first in three lines as usual, yet Polybius might well speak of them as in the order of a phalanx at this time. It was the constant practice for all the three lines to form themselves into one phalanx, whenever it happened that neither the first alone, nor the first and second united, could make any impression on the enemy. And that this was the present case with the center of the Roman army is plain from the necessity the Generals were under of bringing some battalions from the wings to strengthen it. If the Hastati, Principes and Triarii of the center, united in one phalanx, had not failed in the attempt to break Hannibal's crescent, what occasion could there be of adding strength to them from the wings?

⁴ According to Livy, when the two armies were just ready to join battle, 500 of these Numidians came galloping away from their fellows, with their shields cast behind their backs (as was the manner of those that yielded) and throwing down their arms, surrendered themselves. Varro had not leisure to examine them, but thinking them really disarmed, ordered them behind the lines. In the heat of the battle, these pretended deserters, having short swords under their jackets, flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, while all eyes and thoughts were bent another way, so that they did great mischief, and caused yet a greater terror: Polybius mentions nothing of this, which he would hardly have omitted had there been any foundation for it. Nor does he say any thing of a certain wind called Vulturnus, which, according to the Latin historian, proved very pernicious to the Romans, by blowing dust in their eyes.

did.

Y. R. 537.
Ref. Chr.
215.
256 Conf.

Y. R. 437.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236 Cons.

did not wait to be attacked. They immediately fled. Hereupon Asdrubal ordering the light Numidians, as fittest for that service, to pursue them, turned with his Spanish and Gallic horse upon the rear of the Roman main body, which by this means was entirely surrounded. Then was the slaughter dreadful, and then fell the Consul ^b Æmilius quite covered with wounds, nobly discharging in this conclusion of his life, as in all the former parts of it, the duties of a good citizen. The Romans, encompassed on all sides, faced every way, and held out for some time: But the outermost ranks of their orb being still mowed down, they were gradually forced into a narrow compass, and becoming at length a mere throng, unable to wield their arms, were all put to the sword ^c.

During

^b Livy tells us, that Æmilius had been wounded in the action between the cavalry, yet being assisted by those of the Roman knights who had escaped from Asdrubal, he made head against Hannibal, and restored the fight in several places. At length, unable through weakness to manage his horse, he was obliged to dismount; his attendants did the like; and it being told Hannibal that the Consul had ordered his cavalry to quit their horses, he is reported to have said jestingly, I had rather be had delivered them to me bound. Livy adds, what is hard to be conceived, that some of the Roman knights, when they saw the battle irrecoverably lost, remounted their horses and escaped. One of them, Cn. Lentulus, a legionary tribune, galloping along, found the Consul covered with blood, and sitting upon a stone. Lentulus entreated him to rise and save himself, offering him his horse; but Æmilius refused it, exhorting the tribune to trust for himself, and not to lose time, adding, that it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgment by the people; be an accuser of his colleague, or be himself charged with that day's loss. He further desired Lentulus to give the Senate notice to fortify Rome, and to tell Fabius that he had been mindful of his counsel to the last. The Consul had no sooner uttered these words, but first a multitude of his own men in the rout, and then the enemy in the pursuit, came upon him: the latter, not knowing who he was, dispatched him with their darts. Lentulus escaped by the swiftness of his horse.

^c THE ACCOUNTS transmitted to us by Polybius and Livy of the battle of Cannæ, are not sufficiently full and clear to convey to those who read them at this distance of time, distinct and satisfactory ideas of what passed in that memorable day; but have left much room for conjecture.

In the plans that are commonly given by the moderns of this battle, the infantry of the two armies are equal in front. Hannibal's center which he formed into a crescent, the convex side towards the enemy, makes but one third of his line of foot. How then came it to pass, that this crescent, when it yielded and retreated, so as gradually to invert its figure, and present a concave to the enemy, drew after it, and within it, more of the Roman infantry than had stood opposite to it, when the armies first faced each other? This may be answered from Polybius, who tells us, that during the conflict between the centers of the two armies, the Romans, by draughts from their wings, thickened or deepened their center, which therefore broke, by its very weight, the Carthaginian center or crescent, consisting of the Gauls and Spaniards. He adds, that the Romans pressing unwarily after these Gauls and Spaniards, came at length between the two bodies of African infantry; which by a conversion, one to the right, and the other to the left, instantly pressed the Romans on their flanks; and that Asdrubal soon after came thundering upon their backs with his victorious cavalry.

All this is conceivable and credible: and we here see how not only the cohorts that were originally in the Roman center, but those which were drawn from the wings to deepen it, became totally encompassed by

During the slaughter of the Roman foot, the Numidians were pursuing Terentius and the horse of the left wing. Of all the Roman cavalry

Y. R. 537.
Bef. Chr.
215.
235 Conf.

by the enemy; by the Gauls and Spaniards in front, by the Africans in flank, and by Asdrubal in the rear.

But the great difficulty still remains: For it is generally agreed (and indeed Polybius's words seem to import) that the whole, or almost the whole of the Roman infantry, in one deep phalanx, pressed after the retiring Gauls and Spaniards, and so became at length wedged between the two bodies of Africans. Now, how could this happen, if the space between those two bodies was but one third of Hannibal's line of foot? For is it credible, that the Roman Generals could be so infatuated as, in the heat of the battle, to contract the front of their army to one third of its first extent, draw ALL the battalions of the wings to the center, and leave no troops to oppose the two wings (two thirds) of Hannibal's line, that were standing before them in battle array? And if those Generals, to deepen their center, only thinned their wings (as Chevalier Folard supposes) what advantage could Hannibal hope from drawing the Roman center within his two wings? Since these wings, while employed in attacking the flanks of that center, would themselves be exposed to be attacked both in flank and rear by the remainder of the Roman wings; which, if we suppose them diminished by one half, were still equal in number of men to the Carthaginian wings.

It would seem therefore that the plans which represent Hannibal's crescent, as making but one third of his line, must be extremely faulty.

Chevalier Folard, though he speaks as if he were a perfect master of the subject, is as unsatisfactory in his account of the battle as any writer before him. His plan of it (tom. 4. p. 391.) represents Hannibal's curve, as but one third of his line of foot: but being aware of the small number of Africans in the Carthaginian army, much too small to make the other two thirds of the line (as they do in the Jesuits plan) he represents the curve as consisting of only a part of the Gauls and Spaniards; the remainder of which troops stand extended to the right and left from the horns of the crescent, and between it and the Africans, who make only the extremities of the line, or the outer parts of the wings.

The employment which the Chevalier finds for these wings, is not to give upon the flanks of the Romans that were advanced within the hollow of the inverted curve, but to wheel, extend themselves, and attack both in flank and rear the Roman wings, which he supposes to be still subsisting, though much weakened by the imprudence of their leaders.

This account of the action has not the least foundation in Polybius, who does not say, that the Romans of the center, by rashly pursuing the Gauls and Spaniards of Hannibal's crescent, came between other Gauls and Spaniards of his wings (as they must do according to the Chevalier's plan) but between the two bodies of Africans. The Africans are the only troops the historian speaks of as coming upon the flanks of the Romans. Nor does he say any thing of the Africans wheeling and extending themselves to attack the Roman wings in flank and rear, but that turning or inclining (κλινάμενοι) one part of them to the shield, the other to the spear, i. e. one facing or turning to the right, the other to the left, they pressed upon the flanks of those Romans that were pursuing the Gauls and Spaniards of Hannibal's crescent or center.

The Roman wings, says the Chevalier, still subsisted, though much weakened by the draughts made from them. I know not how much the Chevalier would allow them to be weakened. But if we suppose them to be diminished by one half, they were still equal, (as I said before) in number of men to the Carthaginian wings; and it is hardly credible that the Roman wings having at this time no enemies to contend with but the Carthaginian wings, should stand still while these were wheeling and extending themselves to come upon their flank and rear; or that the Carthaginians should find their account in such an attempt.

I shall observe, by the way, that Polybius never speaks of any part of the Roman army being attacked in rear by the Carthaginian foot. This was left for Asdrubal and his horse.

Y. P. 111.
L. 111.
111.
111.

cavalry twenty only escaped with the Consul to Venusia, and about three hundred more into other neighbouring towns, two thousand were taken prisoners, the rest were slain.

The

But, who could hardly have performed this part without riding over the Africans, had been behind the Africans behind.

What seems to have drawn the Cavalry to all their dangers from his author, is the fatal mistake of forming Hannibal's crescent out of but one third of his line.

• Sept. 12. • That Walter has gone into the other error of the account for the whole Roman army's being engaged by the enemy, he supposes that Hannibal's crescent was of such extent, as to make his whole front; that the Romans saw nothing before them but a crescent; that the Africans (deep in file) were hid behind its two corners, and not discovered by the Romans till they were attacked by them. "For it is agreed," says he, that the Romans were overcome, passed unopposed, and that they behaved themselves as men who thought upon no other work than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run headlong with the whole bulk of their army into the throat of slaughter, had they seen those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashness of inferior captains: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in war, being vanquished in haste, had put himself among the legions, it cannot be supposed that he and they did wilfully thus engage themselves."

That Hannibal's crescent of Gauls and Spaniards made the whole of his front, cannot be reconciled with Polibius or Livy, who expressly relate, that the Carthaginian drew up all his infantry in one line, of which the Africans made the two points or wings; and Polibius more than once in describing the action, calls this crescent ex parte the middle or center of Hannibal's battalia, and the Africans are spoke of, not as hid, but as appearing to the enemy armed after the Roman manner.

But it is not credible, says Sir Walter, that the Romans would have been so mad as to run with the whole bulk of their army between the Africans, had they seen them at first.

I will not pretend to remove this difficulty. All I can aim at, is, in some measure to lessen it.

Hannibal's infantry is said to have consisted of about 40,000 men, extended at first in one straight line. Of this line the Gauls and Spaniards (who afterwards formed themselves into a crescent) made the middle or center, and the Africans the wings. Now if that middle part, instead of being but one third, was at least nine tenths of the line, as there is good reason to believe, it will much lessen our wonder, that the Romans, when they had forced that middle part to give ground, should imagine themselves secure of the victory, and unwarily engage themselves between the Africans, who made so narrow a front, as only a small of the Carthaginian line, that is to say, at each extremity a twentieth.

That the Africans made but a very narrow front, in respect of the rest of the line, may, I think, be fairly collected from the small number to which we are obliged to reduce them, and from the manner in which it is reasonable to believe they were drawn up.

It cannot be supposed that the Africans amounted to above 8000 men. Hannibal brought into Italy but 20,000 foot, of which number 12,000 only were Africans, and the other 8000 Spaniards. At the battle of the Trebia, his heavy armed infantry, Spaniards, Africans, and Gauls, were but 20,000 in all. He lost some of his Africans in this battle, some at the lake Thrasymenus; and doubtless the Africans suffered with the rest of the troops in their march through the fens of Hetruria, and in their other fatigues. Hannibal had now been three years in Italy, and had received no recruits from Africa; and from all these considerations we may well conclude, that his Africans were diminished by one third at least, before the battle of Cannæ.

Now supposing the Africans to be but 8000 of Hannibal's 40,000 foot, and supposing his battalia to be every where of equal

The whole of the infantry that had been in the battle, was cut off except about 3000^d who fled, most of them to Canusium. Among the dead were, beside the Consul Æmilius, the two Pro-Consuls Servilius and Attilius, M. Minucius late master of the horse to Fabius, two military Quæstors, twenty-nine legionary Tribunes, with eighty persons who had either been Senators, or had born such offices as entitled them to be chosen into the Senate. Those of the infantry who were taken prisoners had not been in the fight. Varro, by the advice of Æmilius, had left 10,000 foot in his greater camp, with orders to attack the camp of Hannibal during the battle. The Consul's view in this was, to oblige the Carthaginian either to abandon his baggage, or to leave a greater part of his forces to guard it than he could well spare from the general action. The design so far succeeded, that Hannibal was just upon the point of losing his camp, when (after his victory in the field) he came

Y. R. 537.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236 Conf.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 49.

Polyb. B. 3.
c. 117.

equal depth, it is plain that the Africans could make no more than one fifth part of the Carthaginian front, or one tenth of it at each extremity of the line. But if we consider that Hannibal's intention, from the beginning of the day, was to draw the bulk of the Roman army between his Africans, it is reasonable to believe that he so disposed those Africans as to hide their strength as much as possible; and that he gave them no more extent in front, than was necessary to be their depth when they should face, one part of them to the right, and the other to the left, to attack the flanks of the Romans pressing after the retiring Gauls and Spaniards; and if so, it is probable that the front, which the Africans made, was not so much as a tenth part of the line, or, at each extremity a twentieth. And this being granted, it will not be so astonishing that the bulk of the Roman army should run precipitately between them. That the subtle did, strictly speaking, engage themselves between the Africans, I do not conceive necessary to be supposed, in order to account for the event of the battle. For it seems from Polybius's relation, that none of those who did so engage themselves, escaped destruction. Yet we find according to the same author, that 3000 of the Roman foot escaped from the battle, and according to Livy, a much greater number. These might be of the troops that were in the points of the Roman battalia, and who probably took to their heels as soon as they saw Asdrubal with his horse coming upon the rear of the legions.

^d Dionysius of Halicarnassus agrees nearly with Polybius as to the number of men the Romans lost in this battle. Of 6000 horse (says he, Antiquit. B. 2. p. 37.) there remained only 370, and of 80,000 foot there escaped somewhat more than 3000. But Livy differs from them, and is not very consistent with himself. According to the first account he gives, the sum total of those that were slain and taken prisoners amounts to about 59,400, and of those that escaped to about 5670. In which reckonings (supposing, as he seems to do, that the whole Roman army at Cannæ consisted of 87,200 men) there are above 18,000 omitted. He afterwards tells us (B. 22. c. 45, 49.) that there were got together of the fugitives 10,000 at Canusium, and 4070 at Venusia. In this case the number of the prisoners and the slain would be 73,130. But (c. 56.) he makes Varro write to the Senate from Canusium (after he had brought to that place those that had fled to Venusia) that the whole remains of the Roman army were only 10,000 men. And yet in the same book (c. 60.) M. Terquatus tells the Senate, that if the captives who petitioned to be ransomed, and who (as one of themselves had said a little before) amounted to 8000 men, were added to the forces at Canusium, the republic would have there an army of 20,000 men. According to Appian, the whole Roman army at Cannæ consisted of 70,000 foot and 6000 horse, of which 50,000 were slain, a great number taken prisoners, and about 10,000 escaped to Canusium.

In Hannibal. c. 523.

Y. R. 577.
1. 4. C. 11.
215.
2. 5. C. 11.

to the assistance of the few troops he had left to defend it. Upon his approach, the assailants fled to their own entrenchments; where being invested, they surrendered themselves prisoners, after they had lost 2000 of their number*.

Hannibal's loss of men on this important day amounted to no more than 4000 Gauls and Spaniards, 1500 Africans and 200 horse†.

Plut. B. 3.
C. 113.

The consequence of this victory (says Polybius) was such as both parties had expected‡. Hannibal became master of almost all Great Greece.

* Livy relates that 7000 Romans fled out of the battle to the lesser camp, 10,000 to the greater, and that 2000 took refuge in the village of Cannæ. These last were immediately surrounded by Carthago, and taken prisoners. The soldiers in the greater camp, who were without leaders, and but half-armed, sent a messenger to those in the lesser, desiring they would come over to them in the night, that they might march together and take refuge in Cannæ, a city not far distant. But the troops in the little camp could not be prevailed upon to hearken to this proposal, fearing to be intercepted by the enemy in their passage. Nevertheless 600 of them, encouraged by Sempronius Tuditanus, a legionary tribune who commanded them, drew themselves up in the form of a wedge, and casting their shields upon their right arms, to defend themselves from the darts of the Nomidians, to which they were exposed upon that side, made their way through the enemy to the great camp, from whence, in conjunction with another large body, they escaped to Cannæ. Next day Hannibal having invested the little camp, the Romans surrendered upon terms. They had leave to depart each with one garment, upon paying a certain ransom. In the mean time about 4000 foot and 200 horse escaped from the great camp in straggling parties to Cannæ. The rest yielded upon the conditions granted to those of the little camp.

Liv. B. 22.
C. 52.

† According to the Latin historian the loss of the Carthaginians amounted to 8000 men.

B. 22. C. 52.

‡ Livy thinks it might reasonably have been expected that Hannibal should have taken Rome immediately after the battle of Cannæ. When the Carthaginian officers (says that author) flocked round their General, congratulating him on his victory, and advising him to spend the rest of that day, and the following night, in refreshing himself and his wearied Troops. Maharbal, on the contrary, pressed him not to lose a moment's time. That you may know (said he) the importance of this victory, follow me, I will instantly march away with the cavalry, and be at Rome before they have notice of my coming. In five days we shall sit in the capitol. Hannibal commended his zeal, but told him that what he had proposed was of too great moment to be suddenly resolved upon, and that he would take time to consider of it. Nay then (said Maharbal) I find that no one man is endued by the Gods with all talents. Hannibal knows how to conquer, but he knows not how to make advantage of his victories. It is generally believed (adds Livy) that this day's delay was the preservation of the city and empire of Rome.

Several of the ancients have joined with Livy in blaming Hannibal for not laying siege to Rome without delay, but whether justly or not may very well be a question. If the advantages he had gained were, as Polybius says, chiefly owing to the superiority of his cavalry, those could be of little use in a siege, and the Roman infantry not inferior to his, would be invincible behind walls. Rome was provided with every thing necessary to sustain a siege. After the battle of Thrasymen, its fortifications had been repaired, (Liv. B. 22. c. 8.) and Polybius takes notice of the care of the Senate upon the present occasion to put the city in a posture of defence, (B. 3. c. 118.) Rome abounded with soldiers well trained to war. Livy speaks of four new legions and 1000 horse raised in the city by Junius Pera, who was made Dictator immediately after the battle of Cannæ. (Liv. B. 22. c. 57.) And exclusive of these the same Dictator led out an army of 25,000 men (id. B. 23.

Greece^h. Nay, the Carthaginians were not without hope, by some sudden stroke, to possess themselves of Rome. The Romans, on the other hand, despaired of being able to retain the dominion of Italy, and, every moment expecting to hear of Hannibal's approach, were in the utmost anxiety for themselves and for their country. The Senators nevertheless preserved their fortitude and dignity; they all zealously applied themselves to put the city in a posture of defence, and did every thing that could be done for the common safety. And though the Romans were now undoubtedly vanquished, and yielded, for the present, in military glory, to their enemies, yet by their courage, steadiness, and unwearied labours, the wisdom of their counsels, and the constitution of their government, they not only recovered the empire of Italy, but totally subdued the Carthaginians, and in a few years after became lords of the world.

Y. R. 537.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236 Conf.

B. 23. c. 14.) which he would not have done, had not he thought he had left troops enough in the town to defend it. Marcellus had also sent from Ostia 1500 men to strengthen the garrison of Rome (Liv. B. 22. c. 57.)

Now what forces had Hannibal to bring against so powerful a city? His army after the battle of Cannæ consisted of scarce 45,000 men, 9800 of which were cavalry. He was moreover intirely unprovided of implements for carrying on a siege. And had he marched directly to Rome, it is not probable any of the nations of Italy would have gone over to him. At most they would have waited the issue of the siege, in which, if he had not succeeded, they would have been the less disposed to venture themselves under his protection. Nor perhaps would it have been prudent in him, when not one city in Italy had declared for him, to neglect the other towns (that were beginning to waver in their fidelity to the Romans) to go and besiege the capital; especially since his hopes of success in this undertaking must have depended more on the terror of his name, than the force of his arms. And that both these would have been insufficient seems plain from the little effect they had upon Nola and Naples, which cities were twice in vain attempted by Hannibal soon after his victory at Cannæ, (Liv. B. 23. c. 1, 14, 16) Nuccria also and Casertum, two inconsiderable towns, gave him a great deal of trouble before he could reduce them. The latter held out more than a whole winter, though defended by only 960 men. (Liv. B. 23. c. 15, 17, 18, 19.)

Add to this, that had Hannibal laid siege to Rome, it is not likely that the Latin nations, and those other of the allies who always continued steady to her interest, would have quietly looked on till the city had been taken, and that these allies were not yet exhausted of soldiers, is plain from the great levies made among them in the course of this war. In the Dictatorship of Junius Pera, just after the defeat at Cannæ, the Roman armies in Italy (reckoning the remains of Cannæ at 10,000) amounted to above 84,000 men, as appears from Livy, B. 22. c. 57. and B. 23. c. 14. The year after, the Republic had twelve legions on foot, and the year after that eighteen legions (Liv. B. 24. c. 11.) The third year after the battle they had twenty-one legions, and the fourth, viz. in the Consulship of Q. Fulvius Flaccus and Appius Claudius Pulcher, twenty-three Legions. (Liv. B. 25. c. 3.)

Upon the whole, Livy's censure of Hannibal's conduct seems not well founded, and the rather as we do not find that Polybius has any where blamed him upon this article.

^h The nations that revolted to the Carthaginians, after the battle of Cannæ are thus reckoned up by Livy (B. 22. c. 61.) The Atellani, Calatini, and Hirpini, part of Apulia, the Samnites except the Penri, all the Bruttians, the Lucanians, the Surrentini, and almost all Great Greece, the Tarentines, Metapontines, Crotoniensis, Locri, and all the Cisalpine Gauls.

C H A P. XXII.

The extreme terror, with which the Romans were struck, by their defeat at Cannæ. Their reception of Terentius Varro at Rome. They refuse to redeem the prisoners. Hannibal gets possession of Capua, and winters there. He sends to Carthage an account of his victories. The Romans create a Dictator for the sole affair of filling the many vacant places in their Senate.

AMONG those Romans, who had fled from the late battle to Canusium, were four legionary Tribunes. Of these the soldiers chose two, to be their chief commanders, Appius Claudius Pulcher and P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of the Pro-Consul in Spain. Whilst Scipio (who was now about nineteen years of age) was deliberating with his colleague, and some others, what measures to take, notice was brought them, that certain young men of the best families of Rome, at the head of whom was L. Cecilius Metellus, giving up all for lost, had resolved to embark at the first port, and fly from Italy. So base a thought stirred up Scipio's indignation. Turning therefore to the company, he said, Let those who value the preservation of Rome follow me. They all went immediately to the house where the young Patricians were assembled. Scipio, as he entered their chamber, I swear, said he, drawing his sword, that I will never abandon the Republic, nor consent that any of her citizens forsake her; I call the great Jupiter to witness this my oath: And then addressing himself to Metellus, he added, Do you, Metellus, and all that are here present take the same oath, or not a man of you shall escape this sword. His look, his action, his menaces so terrified them all, that they readily came into the engagements he required.

The consternation and despondency of the people at Rome almost equalled those of Metellus and his companions. For it was there currently reported that both the Consuls were killed, and their armies so entirely destroyed, that not an officer, nor hardly a single soldier remained alive; and that Hannibal was master of Apulia, Samnium, and all Italy. The Conscript Fathers, the pilots of the state, did not, however, leave the helm because the storm blew high. For want of Consuls the two Prætors assembled them. As Fabius's cunctation, that lingering war, he had counselled and practised against Hannibal, was discovered, by the present calamity, to have been the dictate of wisdom, he now was principally listened to. He advised, that some horsemen well mounted should be sent out upon the Ælian and Latine roads, to learn, if possible, of such as they met, the true state of affairs, what was become of the Consuls; to what place the remains of the army, if there were any, had retreated; where Hannibal was encamped; what he was doing, and what he designed to do: That the women should be forbid to appear in public, disturbing the city with their lamentations: That

That when any courier arrived, he should be brought privately and without noise to the Prætors; and that no person should be suffered to go out of the city.

Y. R. 537.
Bef. Chr.
215.
236. Conf.

Not long after, a messenger arrived from Terentius; his letters imported that the Roman army had been defeated; that his colleague Æmilius was slain; that he himself was retired to Canusum, where he was assembling the remains of the troops; that about 10,000 men of different corps, and for the most part without officers, had joined him; and that Hannibal was still at *Cannæ*¹.

At the same time a bark arrived from Sicily with advice from the Pro-Prætor Otacilius, that one Carthaginian Squadron was ravaging the coast of Syracuse, while another appeared off the Ægates ready to make a descent at Lilybæum; and that it was necessary to send a fleet thither with all speed. The Conscript Fathers, not dejected at these additional cares, prepared for the defence both of Italy and Sicily. Marcellus, appointed Prætor for the last named province, and now at Ostia aboard the fleet, was ordered to resign the conduct of it to P. Furius Philus, the Prætor Peregrinus, and to go and take upon him the command of the army at Canusum. As for Terentius Varro, the Senate recalled him to Rome; and nothing has been more wondered at, than the respect with which he was received at his arrival. Multitudes of people of all ranks went out to meet him, and the Senate returned him thanks for that he had not despaired of the commonwealth. How different this conduct, says Livy, from that of the Carthaginians, who were wont to put their unsuccessful Generals to the most cruel deaths^k!

Liv. B. 22.
c. 61.

As

¹ Livy says that Hannibal, after this famous battle, acted more like a man that had finished his conquests than one that had a war to carry on, and that he was sitting at Cannæ bargaining about his plunder and the captives, in a manner very unbecoming a great General (Liv. B. 22. c. 56, 58.) If this be not a calumny, at least the Carthaginian did not continue long thus employed; for the same author begins his 23d book by telling us, that Hannibal, after the battle of Cannæ, having taken and plundered the Roman camps, marched immediately (confestim) from Apulia into Samnium.

^k The Reception Varro met with at Rome, and his being afterwards intrusted with the command of an army, seem to have been the effects of just policy in the Romans. This General had done nothing irregular, nothing contrary to orders. The Senate and people had sent him to fight Hannibal, not to follow him at a distance like Fabius. Æmilius, it is true, was against fighting at that time; and he was an able General. But what then? Varro was not obliged to follow his advice. In a dispute they had had a little before about marching, Æmilius had no officer of his opinion, except the late Consul Servilius, as we are informed by Livy. And there is reason to think that it was not only the general inclination of the soldiers, but agreeable to the judgment of most of the officers, that Varro should fight when he did. No objection is made to the order of his battle. If a fatal error was committed during the action, through the rashness of the infantry imagining themselves victorious, this was no more imputable to Varro than to Æmilius. In short, as Varro does not appear to be chargeable with any thing worse, than the having such a dependence on the number and valour of his troops, as to venture a battle contrary to the advice of his colleague, it ought not perhaps to be so surprising that the Senate and people received him in the manner they did. They could not have treated him with rigour without

Y. R. 537.
Liv. B. 22.
c. 57.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 57.

Fab.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 21.

Fabius, B.
2. c. 6.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 56, 57.

B. 59.

As the present situation of things required an absolute magistrate to govern the state, M. Junius Pera was, by the authority of the Senate named Dictator, and Sempronius Gracchus to be his General of the horse. Junius made it his whole business to put the army in a condition to resist the enemy. Four legions and a thousand horse were raised among the citizens of Rome. The two Latiums, the Municipia, and the colonies furnished their contingents as usual; and to all these were added 8000 slaves, whom the Republic bought of their masters, and who were called Volentes, from the word volo (I will) which every one returned in answer, when he was asked, whether he would serve in the troops. To recruit the treasury, which was greatly exhausted, and to put the public revenues under a good regulation, three men of eminent prudence and integrity were chosen for that trust. And then, the Senators giving the example, and being followed by the knights, the whole people in general of the Roman tribes brought all their gold to the public treasury; the Senators only reserving their rings, and the bulle about their childrens necks. The silver coin was now, for the first time, alloyed with copper.

While they were thus employed at Rome, Hannibal, to get a supply of money, and with the further view of abating the obstinate resolution of the Romans in battle, by the hopes of being ransomed, in case they should be defeated and taken, gave leave to his Roman prisoners, to redeem themselves. These chose out ten of their body, to send to Rome, to negotiate their redemption; and Hannibal exacted no other security for their return than an oath. They were accompanied by a noble Cartaginian, named Carthalo, who, in case he found the Romans inclined to peace, was empowered to declare upon what terms Hannibal would grant it. Upon the first report of Carthalo's arrival, the Dictator sent a lictor to order him out of the Roman territory. The ten deputies were admitted to an audience of the Senate. M. Junius, the chief of them, pleaded with great earnestness in behalf of the captives. He justified them from the charge of cowardice in having yielded themselves prisoners to the enemy. He alledged that they had been left in the camp to defend it, that they had done nothing cowardly or unworthy the Roman name, but by the adverse fortune of the day, the troops in the field being all cut off, they had been under a necessity of surrendering to the conqueror. He cited precedents of the regard had to prisoners in former times, and urged the advantage it would be to the Republic, to have in her army 8000 Romans, redeemed at a less price than the purchase of so many slaves would without discouraging their Generals, which might have been of dangerous consequence at this juncture. Nor is it much to be wondered at that they employed him again. He was very humble after his defeat at Canna, and behaved himself to the general satisfaction of both Senate and people. However, they never put him at the head of a great army; he seldom had the command of above one legion.

¹ The ransom of each horseman he fixed at 500 denarii (16l. 2s. 11d.); that of each soldier at 300 (9l. 3s. 9d.); and that of each slave at 100 (3l. 4s. 7d.).*

^m This (says Sir W. Raleigh) is but a tale devised to countenance the Roman proceedings,

* Liv. B.
22. c. 58.

would amount to. His discourse was seconded by the multitude, whose concern for their relations in captivity had brought them together; and they implored the clemency of the Fathers in a suppliant manner.

Y. R. 537.
Ref. Chr.
215.
236 Con..

The Senate debated the matter for some time, being much divided in opinion; but at length they concluded absolutely against the redemption of the captives: For having penetrated into Hannibal's views, they would convince their soldiers, that they must either conquer or be at the mercy of their enemies.

Hannibal, after his victory at Cannæ, marched without delay from Apulia into Samnium. Compsa, a city of Hirpini, almost at the head of the Aufidus, surrendered to him, and was the first which fell off from the Romans. Having here placed a garrison, together with all his plunder and baggage, he divided his army. One part of it he gave to his brother Mago to reduce the towns and fortresses of this country and of all Bruttium; and with the other he himself marched towards Naples, to get possession, if practicable, of that maritime city, which would open to him an easy communication with Africa. But though he drew a part of the garrison into an ambuscade, and cut them off, yet the strength of the place deterred him from laying siege to it.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 1.

From thence he turned towards Capua. This city, which had been formerly governed by Roman laws, and a Roman prefect, was now a Municipium, and chose her own magistrates; and the Capuans had the uncommon privilege of intermarrying with the Romans. After the battle of the lake Tbrasymenus, one Pacuvius Calavius, a man of the greatest interest among the people, and then governor of the town, had laid a design to assassinate the Senate, who were odious both to himself and the people, and deliver up the place to Hannibal: But afterwards he thought that to assume a kind of sovereignty himself there, would be a better scheme, than that of introducing a stranger to usurp it. The only difficulty he had was to engage the Senators, who were universally for adhering to the Romans, to favour the project of his ambition. To this end he told them that the people had sworn to cut their throats, and to surrender up Capua to the Carthaginians; but that if they would leave themselves to his conduct, he would preserve them. The Senators trusted him, upon his oath, and suffered him to

c. 2. & seq.

ings, as if they had been severe, when as indeed they were suitable to the present fortune, poor and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proof, that Hannibal valued those Roman slaves whom he had taken in the camp among their masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common soldier's ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might have been made, than was by the state at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withal consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while unto the commonwealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them, until the war should be ended. [Liv. B. 24. c. 18.] If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for ready money, they chose rather to say we will not give, than we can not. Hist. of the World, part 1. B. 5. ch. 3. §. 9.

A

shut them up in the temple, where they were then assembled, and to sit a guard at the door. He then called the people together, and acquainted them, that the Senate were now entirely in his power, and that he would abandon those detestable slaves of Rome to their resentment, to be treated according to their demerits; but he insisted that (in order to preserve the old form of government, which ought not to be destroyed as soon as any one of them had received sentence, and before he was executed, the people should name some man of probity, to succeed him; by which stratagem, Pacuvius saved the lives of all the Senators; for the multitude could not agree upon this man of probity. Some disqualification or other was still objected to whoever was named; so that in the end, the people finding that they could not rid themselves of their present Senate without choosing a worse, desired that all the prisoners might be released: and from this time the Senate courted the people by all manner of kindness and adulation, and if we may credit Levy, Pacuvius acquired an absolute ascendant over both.

After the defeat of the Romans at Canne, the Capuans were again disposed to side with the Carthaginians. Two reasons restrained them; the intermarriages before-mentioned, and the consideration that the flower of their nobility were in the service of the Romans, in Sicily, and were therefore as so many hostages for their fidelity. And the relations of these young men prevailed to have a deputation sent to the Consul Terrontius, then at Verusa, to offer him succours. These deputies found the Consul so dejected and desponding, that, weighing the circumstances of things, they thought the time now come to shake off the Roman yoke, and recover their antient liberty. But to do this with the more decency, they first sent ambassadors to Rome, with such proposals as they knew would not be received. They demanded, that for the future Rome and Capua should be upon a perfect equality, and that every year one of the Consuls should be chosen out of the Capuans.

The *Conscrip*t Fathers having haughtily rejected the demand, it was carried by a majority of voices, both of the Senate and people of Capua, to send deputies to treat with Hannibal. They demanded entire liberty and independence, and that three hundred Roman knights should be put into their hands, to be exchanged against the same number of Capuan youths in the service of Rome. Hannibal readily granted all that was asked; and then the people contrived to have all the Romans in the city shut up in the public baths, and there suffocated. One Decius Magius, a man of a Roman spirit, and a friend to the Romans, loudly declared against these proceedings of his countrymen, warning them not to receive a Carthaginian garrison, and putting them in mind of Pyrrhus's tyranny over the people of Tarentum; but his discourse was despised. When Hannibal was to make his entry, all the town crowded to meet him, except this Magius, and some few of the nobility, among whom was Perolla, the son of Pacuvius, who though not governor of Capua

Capua at this time, had been the foul of all the late proceedings. Perrelius was afterwards obliged by his father to go and pay his homage to Hannibal; nevertheless having deeply imbibed the sentiments of Magius, he formed a resolution to stab the Carthaginian General, at a magnificent entertainment which Perucius and some other of the principal citizens were to give him: But the young man, having communicated the design to his father, was by his tears and entreaties dissuaded from it. The next day the Senate assembled, and Hannibal complaining to them of the disaffection of Magius, this brave man was delivered up to him, loaded with irons, and put on board a ship bound for Carthage. A tempest drove the vessel into the port of Cyrene, a city belonging to the kings of Egypt; there the prisoner finding means to get to a statue of Ptolemy Philopater, and laying hold of it, the Carthaginians durst not drag him from that sanctuary. The Cyrenians conveyed him to Alexandria, where he chose to continue under the protection of Ptolemy.

About this time Hannibal dispatched his brother Mago to Carthage with an account of his success. Mago reported to the Senate, "That their General had defeated six Consular armies, slain above 200,000 Romans, and taken more than 50,000 prisoners; that Bruttium and Apulia, with a part of Samnium, and a part of Lucania had revolted to the Carthaginians; that Capua, the chief city, not of Campania only, but (in the present low estate of Rome) even of Italy, had surrendered to Hannibal:" and he concluded with saying, "That for so many and so great victories it was meet to return solemn thanks to the immortal Gods." To verify his report, he spread abroad in the Senate-house, some say one, others three bushels of corn taken from the Roman Knights and Senators. Having thus procured the Senate in favour of his brother, he proceeded to solicit large supplies of men, corn, and money, that he might be enabled to carry on so successful a war. The request was universally applauded; and Himilco, a Senator of the Berberine faction, turning towards Hanno, as it were to insult him, "Well, Hanno, are you still dissatisfied that we entered into a war against Rome? Are you still of opinion that we ought to deliver up Hannibal? Come, declare against our giving thanks to the Gods for our success; speak, Hanno, let us hear the language of a Roman in a Carthaginian Senate." Hanno rose up; "To day, Fathers, if I had not been compelled to speak, I should have held my peace, that, in this concert of your common gladness, no discordant word might drop from me. But to be silent when thus interrogated by a Senator, would argue either pride or disaffection to the state, a disregard of other mens liberty or of my own. To Himilco, therefore, I answer, that I do still condemn the war, and that I never shall cease to blame our invincible General, till I see it ended by a peace upon some tolerable conditions. The exploits which Mago has boasted of, have caused much joy to Himilco and his friends.

VOL. II.

A a

" To

Y. R. 537.
Lef. Cl. R.
216.
236 Conf.Liv. B. 23.
c. 12.Liv. B. 23.
c. 12.

c. 13.

Y. R. 557.
B. C. 215.
236 C.C.-4

“ To me too they may prove matter of joy, if a proper use be made of “ them for bringing about an honourable peace. But what is the “ ground of all this exultation ? To what does it amount ? I have slain, “ says Hannibal, whole armies of enemies : Send me soldiers. What else “ could he have asked had he been vanquished ? I have taken two camps, “ full, doubtless, of wealth and provisions : Supply me with corn and money.
 “ What other demand could he have made, had he lost his own camp,
 “ with every thing that was in it ? And, that I alone may not wonder “ at all this, I would have Himilco (for as I have answered him, I “ have now surely a right to interrogate, ; I say, I would have Himilco “ or Mago answer me some questions. The Roman empire, it seems, “ was overturned at the battle of Cannæ, and all Italy is revolting : Is “ any one, I pray, of the Latine nations come over to us ? Has any one “ man of the five and thirty tribes deserted to Hannibal ?” When Mago
 “ had to both these answered in the negative : “ There remain then (re“ plied Hanno, a huge number of enemies still to be subdued. And this “ multitude, what heart, what hope have they ?” Mago answered, That “ he knew not. “ And yet (returned Hanno) there is nothing easier to be “ known. Have the Romans sent any ambassadors to Hannibal to treat of “ peace ? Has intelligence been brought you, that any mention of peace “ was made at Rome ?” No, said Mago. “ Why then (replied the other)
 “ the progress made in this war, is exactly the same, as when Hannibal
 “ first entered Italy. The vicissitude of our fortune in the first Roman “ War many of us here present can well remember. Our affairs were “ never in a more prosperous course both by land and sea, than just be“ fore our defeat at the Ægates. Should the like turn of fortune
 “ (the Gods avert the omen !) happen to us again, can we hope to obtain “ when vanquished, that peace, which when we are victorious we dis“ dain to think of ? Were it now in debate to offer or to accept a peace, “ I know what I should say : If you ask my opinion concerning the “ supplies which Mago demands for the army, my answer is, That if “ they be truly conquerors, they little need them ; and if they deceive “ us with vain hope, they less deserve them.” Hanno’s speech made no “ impression on the Senate. It was carried by a great majority to send to “ Hannibal from Africa, 4000 Numidians, 40 elephants, and 1000 talents “ of silver *. And one of the magistrates was immediately commissioned “ to go with Mago into Spain, and there hire 20,000 foot and 4000 horse “ for recruiting the armies in that country and in Italy. These prepara“ tions however went on slowly, as is usual in times of prosperity. On “ the other side, neither the character, nor the present circumstances of “ the Romans would permit them to be dilatory in their proceedings.
 “ The Senate neglected nothing, deferred nothing, that was necessary for “ supporting the war. The Consul Varro shewed himself extremely dili“ gent in whatever belonged to his office ; and the Dictator Junius Pera, “ after performing the usual ceremonies of religion, marched out of Rome
 “ at

* 197, - 5 = 1

Li. B. 23.
* 24

at the head of 25,000 men. This army was composed of two legions, which had been raised in the beginning of the year for the defence of the city, of some cohorts from Picenum and the Gellic territory^m, of the 8000 Velones before-mentioned, and of 6000 prisoners for crimes and debt, whom Junius had released, upon the condition of their enlisting themselves in the troops, and whom he had armed out of the spoils Flaminius had formerly brought from Gaul.

Y. R. 537.
Dei. Chr.
215.
236 Const.

As for Hannibal, having settled his affairs at Capua, he made a second attempt upon Naples, with as little success as in the first. From thence he marched to Nola, in hopes that the populace, who were inclined to his party, would deliver up the town to him. But their Senate, alarmed at the danger, had sent for assistance from Marcellus, who commanded the Roman army at Canusium, and who came in all haste to the defence of the place. Hannibal, disappointed here, once more attempted Naples. As this city had lately received a Roman garrison, under the command of M. Junius Silanus, the Carthaginian soon despaired of being able to reduce it by force; and he turned his arms against Nuceria, a town not far from the other. The inhabitants, for want of provisions, were obliged to capitulate: Yet he could not prevail upon any of them to serve in his army. After he had plundered and burnt Nuceria, he again sat down before Nola. Marcellus sallied out upon him at three several gates, and killed 2300 of his men, with the loss only of 500 of his own. The Carthaginian being thus repulsed, laid siege to Acerra, a small town on the banks of the Clanis, near Nola, and took it. Here he learnt that the Dictator was approaching to Casilinum with his army. Whereupon being afraid lest the neighbourhood of the enemy might occasion some sinister accident at Capua, he drew near to this city, and at the same time sent a part of his forces to attack Casilinum. These not succeeding, he himself marched thither with his army, and besieged the town in form. It was not garrisoned by Campanians. A body of Prænestini, to the number of 500 men, happening to pass that way, had found the inhabitants wavering in their fidelity to Rome, and had therefore cut their throats in the night, and possessed themselves of the walls. The Prænestini, were afterwards reinforced by about 400 Perusini from Hetruria, and some Romans and Latines. All these being men of bravery and resolution, made a vigorous resistance. Winter approaching, Hannibal discontinued the siege, intending to renew it in the spring. He left a small body of troops before the town, and retired to Capua with the rest of his army.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 15.

c. 17.

Livy and some other historians tell us, that both Hannibal and his soldiers were extremely softened by the effeminate life they gave themselves up to, this winter at Capua, and are very particular in their descriptions of the luxury of the Carthaginians, making Capua prove as fatal a place

c. 18.

^m This was a tract of land between the Rubicon and the Esis, formerly taken from the Galli Senones, and divided amongst some Roman citizens by virtue of a law lately enacted.

Y. R. 537.
E. A. C. 53.
235.
235 C. 53.

Lib. B. 23.
C. 13.

C. 20.

233 32

C. 21.

to them as Cannæ had been to the Romans. It does not however appear by their after behaviour, that they had lost much of their martial ardour. The principal cause of the decline of Hannibal's affairs in Italy after the battle of Cannæ, seems to have been his not receiving supplies from his own country. He had not men enough to oppose so many armies as the Romans sent against him, and at the same time to garrison the towns and protect the countries, that had submitted to him. And that his residence at Catæ had abated nothing of his wonted activity, seems plain from Livy himself, who informs us, that as soon as the rigour of the season began to lessen he renewed the siege of Casertum, and this in sight of an army, which without reckoning the allies, amounted to 25,000 men. This army was now under the conduct of Sempronius, General of the horse, the Dictator having been recalled to Rome on account of some religious affair. Sempronius continued quite in his camp; for he had received orders not to fight. Marcellus (according to Livy) would have gone to the assistance of the besieged, if he had not been hindered by the swelling of the Vulturius, and by the people of Nola, who feared that the Catæ would attack them if the Roman garrison should withdraw. In the mean time Casertum was reduced to great extremities for want of provisions, insomuch that many of the soldiers threw themselves from the walls, or exposed themselves without defence to the darts of the enemy. Sempronius attempted to relieve them, first by throwing barrels of meal into the Vulturius, that ran through the town, and afterwards by scattering in the stream great quantities of nuts, which the besieged stopped with hurdles. These convoys of provisions being discovered and cut off, the garrison were reduced to live upon rats, and what other vermin they could find; nay, they pulled off the leather that covered their shields, boiled it in soft water, and eat it. And when Hannibal, to hinder them from gathering any weeds or roots that grew close under the wall, had ploughed up the ground, they threw turnip seed out upon the mold; which when the Carthaginian heard of, he cried out, What! am I then to sit here till their turnips are come to maturity? And from this time he became more willing to grant them terms. They were at length allowed to march out of the town, provided each freeman among them paid seven ounces of gold. The condition was accepted; they remained prisoners till the money was paid, and the Carthaginian put a garrison of 700 men into the place.

The inhabitants of Paestum, in Bruttium, gave likewise a signal proof of their attachment to the Republic, and shewed how agreeable her government was to her subjects. They resolutely stood a siege, though refused assistance from Rome on account of the distress she was in; and Himilco, one of Hannibal's Lieutenants, found almost as much difficulty in subduing them, as the General had met with, in reducing the garrison of Casertum.

About the same time couriers arrived from Sicily and Sardinia, with complaints from the Prætors of those two provinces, of the want both of provisions and pay for their armies and fleets. The answer was, that they must shift for themselves as well as they could; for that Rome was not in a condition to help them. King Hiero supplied the Prætor of Sicily with what money he wanted, and six months provisions; and the cities of Sardinia in alliance with the Republic raised contributions among themselves for the Prætor of that island.

of

Y. R. 537.
Bel. Chr.
215.
236 Conf.

And now the Senate began to think of filling up the many vacant places in their assembly. When this matter was in debate, Sp. Carvilius proposed that the present opportunity might be taken to oblige the Latines, those antient and faithful allies of Rome, by admitting two out of each nation of them to sit among the Fathers: but the motion was rejected with indignation; and Fabius reproved Carvilius for his imprudence in exposing the Senate to a shameful innovation, or to the danger of affronting the Latines, at so critical a conjuncture. He added, that it was of the utmost consequence to observe a strict silence upon this head, that so the allies might never know such a proposal had been made. The matter was kept secret; no mischief followed.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 22.

As there were no Censors in being, to fill up the vacancies in question, and the Dictator was now with the army, the Consul Terentius, by order of the Senate, nominated M. Fabius Buteo, the oldest of the former Censors, to be a second Dictator, whose office should be confined to this affair. And never did Dictator discharge his trust with more modesty and prudence. The first upon his list were all those who since the last Censors had obtained curule magistracies, but had not yet been ranked among the Fathers; then all those, without exception, who had been Tribunes of the people, Plebeian Ædiles or Quæstors; and lastly, such of the citizens as could shew the spoils of enemies by them vanquished, or had been rewarded by their Generals with a Civic Crown. By this impartial election the Romans had the happiness to see 177 new Senators created without jealousy or contention. Fabius was highly applauded for his conduct, and when he had finished his list, he immediately abdicated the Dictatorship, though he had been named to it for six months.

c. 23.

C H A P. XXIII.

The FOURTH YEAR of the War.

A Roman army destroyed by the Gauls. King Philip of Macedon enters into league with Hannibal against Rome. Favourable accounts from Sardinia and from the Scipios in Spain. After the death of King Hiero, Syracuse takes part with the Carthaginians.

THE next affair, at Rome, was to appoint the great officers of the state for the new year. T. Sempronius Gracchus (General of the horse to the Dictator Junius) and L. Posthumius Albinus, now at

Y. R. 538.
Bel. Chr.
216.
237 Conf.

the

V. R. 23.
Bel. Can.
23. Consul

L. B. 23.
c. 30.

c. 24.

c. 25.

the head of an army in Cisalpine Gaul, were elected Consuls. Then the several Prætors were named, and Marcellus had the power and title given him of Pro-Consul; because, of all the Roman Generals in Italy, he was the only one who had gained any advantage over the enemy since the battle of Cannæ. The elections being over, Junius returned to his camp in Apulia, but Sempronius continued in the city, to consult with the Senate about the operations of the approaching campaign. While they were deliberating on these things, news came to Rome that Posthumius Albinus (one of the Consuls elect) with all his army, was destroyed by the *Gauls. The fortitude of the Romans enabled them to surmount this last calamity of so unfortunate a year. Sempronius assembled the Senate, and endeavoured to raise their dejected spirits. "The defeat of Cannæ ought to have hardened us against every adversity that can happen in war. Shall we be discouraged by moderate losses, after having supported the greatest calamities? The war with the Gauls may be deferred. Let us have no more armies in Gaul, but turn all our forces against Hannibal! When he is once driven out of Italy, the rebellious nations will soon be reduced again." This advice was followed, and all the Roman forces were ordered to the provinces near Hannibal.

V. R. Max.
E. 2. c. 5.
f. 2.
F. 2.
S. 2.
L. B. 23.
c. 31.

In the new disposition of employments, Terentius Varro, notwithstanding his former ill success, was intrusted with the command of an army in Apulia, and had the character of Pro-Consul. His behaviour since his misfortune had softened every body to him. He had let his hair and beard grow, and had never taken a meal lying on a bed, as was the manner of the Romans. Nay, it is said, he modestly declined the Dictatorship, to which the people, still well affected to him, would have raised him.

L. B. 23.
c. 31.

It now remained to choose a new Consul in the room of Posthumius Albinus; and Marcellus being sent upon a commission to the army, it was suspected, and complained of in the Senate, that he was kept out of the way on purpose that he might not be present at the comitia. Sempronius therefore deferred convening the centuries till the return of Marcellus, and then he was unanimously chosen Consul. But as it had happened to thunder during the assembly, the augurs laid hold of this accident to declare the election disagreeable to the will of the Gods. Their true reason for opposing it was his being a Plebeian, for Sempronius also being of that order, should Marcellus's election be confirmed, Rome would have two Plebeian Consuls. Hereupon Marcellus abdicated, and Fabius Cunctator was chosen (the third time) in his stead.

* According to Livy (B. 23, c. 24.) the Gauls made use of a very extraordinary stratagem upon this occasion. Posthumius being to pass through a wood, they, against his coming, had, on each side the road, felled all the trees so far that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore the whole army had entered this dangerous passage, the Gauls that lay about the wood, began to throw down the trees, which falling one against another, those that were nearest the road came upon the heads of the Romans, so that scarce ten men of them escaped being crushed.

And

And now the Romans began to be in motion. Fabius put himself at the head of those troops which the late Dictator had commanded. Sempronius was General of the Volones, and of 25,000 auxiliaries. The troops that had escaped from Cannæ, and which after that battle had served under Marcellus, and all the weak soldiers in the army lately under the conduct of Junius Pera, had been sent into Sicily, there to serve as long as the war should last in Italy. In the room of these, Marcellus led to his camp near Suessula (a city nine miles from Nola) two legions that had been raised for the defence of Rome. The Prætor Levinus was ordered to cover Apulia with two legions, which arrived from Sicily, and to defend the coast from Brundisium to Tarentum, with a fleet of twenty-five ships. A like number of vessels was sent under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the other Prætor to guard the coast near the capital. The legion under Varro being commanded into Sicily, he was ordered to make new levies in the country of Picenum, and to continue there to protect that and the neighbouring territories.

While the Prætor Levinus lay encamped at Luceria in Apulia, a company of Macedonians were to his great surprize brought before him.

At the head of them was an Athenian named Xenophanes. These strangers had landed not far from the Lacinian promontory, and were making their way to Hannibal's camp near Capua, when Levinus's scouts intercepted them. Being examined by the Prætor, the Athenian answered that he was commissioned by King Philip of Macedon to treat of an alliance with the Roman Republic. Levinus overjoyed at this, shewed great respect to the ambassador, and furnished him with guides to conduct him to Rome. It is not known by what artifice he got to Hannibal's camp: But the league which, in his master's name, he made with the Carthaginian, is preserved to this day°. Having finished his commission

° The form of the league as it is in Polybius, B. 7. c. 2. runs thus.

The treaty confirmed by oath, which Hannibal the General, Mago, Mircan, Barmocur, and all the Senators of Carthage that are with him [Hannibal] and all the Carthaginians that serve under him, have concluded with Xenophanes the Athenian, the son of Cleomachus, whom King Philip, the son of Demetrius, hath sent to us, in his own name, and in name of the Macedonians, and of his allies.

In the presence of Jupiter and Juno, and Apollo; in the presence of the tutelary Divinity of the Carthaginians, and of Hercules, and of Iolaus; in the presence of Mars, of Triton and Neptune; in the presence of the Gods who accompany our expedition, and of the sun, the moon, and the earth; in the presence of the rivers, the fields, and the waters; in the presence of all the Gods who rule over Carthage; in the presence of all the Gods who rule over Macedon and the rest of Greece; in the presence of all the Gods who preside over war, and at the making this treaty; Hannibal the General hath said, and all the Senators of Carthage that are with him, and all the Carthaginians that are in his army.

If it seem good unto you and to us, this shall be a treaty of amity and good will between you and us, as friends, allies, and brethren, upon condition that King Philip, and the Macedonians, and all the other Greeks that are his allies, shall preserve and defend the Carthaginian Lords, and Hannibal the General, and those that are with him, and the Governors of provinces dependent

Y. R. 538.
Ref. Chr.

214.
237 Conf.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 32.

c. 33.

11. 1. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909. 910. 911. 912. 913. 914. 915. 916. 917. 918. 919. 920. 921. 922. 923. 924. 925. 926. 927. 928. 929. 930. 931. 932. 933. 934. 935. 936. 937. 938. 939. 940. 941. 942. 943. 944. 945. 946. 947. 948. 949. 950. 951. 952. 953. 954. 955. 956. 957. 958. 959. 960. 961. 962. 963. 964. 965. 966. 967. 968. 969. 970. 971. 972. 973. 974. 975. 976. 977. 978. 979. 980. 981. 982. 983. 984. 985. 986. 987. 988. 989. 990. 991. 992. 993. 994. 995. 996. 997. 998. 999. 1000.

To return to Hannibal. Campania was now the chief seat of the war; and the Campanians themselves, to assist him, raised an army of 12,000 men. These having, in vain, solicited Cume, a city in the neighbourhood, to join with them; endeavoured, with no better success, to surprize the Comens by treachery. After which Hannibal, at the request of the Campanians, laid siege to the place. Fabius was then encamped at Cales, but durst not cross the Vulturnus, to go to the assistance

dent upon the Carthaginians; and those that use the same laws with them; and the inhabitants of Ugent, and of all the cities and countries subject to the Carthaginians, and all the soldiers and allies, and all the cities and nations in confederacy with us in Italy, Gaul, and Liguria, and all those in this country who are in friendship and alliance with us. In like manner the Carthaginian armies and the inhabitants of Ugent, and all the cities and nations subject to Carthage, and the soldiers and allies, and all the nations and cities with which we have amity and alliance in Italy, in Gaul, in Liguria, and with which we may contract amity and alliance in this country, shall preserve and defend King Philip and the Macedonians, and all their allies amongst the Greeks. We will not secretly devise evil against one another. We will not lay snares for one another. We [the Macedonians] with all affection and good will, without guile or fraud [declare that we] will be enemies to the enemies of the Carthaginians, except to those kings, cities and ports with which we are in friendship and alliance. In like manner, we [the Carthaginians] will be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, except to those kings, cities and nations with whom we are in alliance and friendship. You [the Macedonians] shall engage in the war we have with the Romans as it please the Gods to give success to our arms and yours. You shall assist us with what is necessary, according as shall be agreed upon between us. But if the Gods shall not grant to you and us a happy issue of the war against the Romans and their allies, and if we be reduced to make peace with the Romans, we shall do it in such a manner as that you shall be included in the treaty; and on condition that they shall not be allowed to declare war against you; that the Romans shall not be masters of the Corymbi, nor of the Aschamates, nor of the Dyrachini, nor of Pelous, nor of Dymallus, nor of the Parthini, nor of Antarctia. They shall likewise restore to Demetrius Phorus all his friends and relations who are in the Roman dominions. If the Romans shall declare war against you or against us, we will assist each other as the occasion shall require. We will act in the same manner in case any other shall declare war against us, except the kings, cities and nations with whom we are in alliance and friendship. If either of us shall judge proper to add any thing to this treaty, or retrench any thing from it, it shall not be done without the consent of both of us.

of

of the besieged, because of unlucky omens and prodigies. Sempronius had a little before entered the place, and he defended it. He is said to have slain in a fall 1300 of the Carthaginians. Hannibal the next day presented battle, in hopes the Consul, flushed with his success, would venture to fight: but the Romans keeping close within the walls, he at length drew off his men, and returned to his camp, which was on mount Tifata.

Y. R. 538.
B. of Chr.
214.
237 Conf.
Polyb. B. 3.
c. 37.

Whilst Sempronius Gracchus was thus defending Cumæ, the Roman armies prospered in two other places. Another Sempronius, surnamed Longus, gained a victory over Hanno in Lucania, and drove him from thence into Bruttium. And Lævinus retook three cities of the Hirpini, which had revolted to Hannibal.

About the same time the intercepted ambassador from King Philip, and his letters, were brought to Rome. And the Senate finding that the treaty was actually concluded, came immediately to the wise and noble resolution of keeping the Macedonian out of Italy, by carrying the war into his country.

c. 38.

And now Fabius, having made expiation for the prodigies, at length passed the Vulturnus, and both the Consuls carried on the war in concert together. Fabius recovered some towns that had declared for Hannibal, and had received Carthaginian garrisons. At Nola, the people still disaffected to Rome, were secretly plotting to destroy their Senators, and betray the city to Hannibal. To prevent this, Fabius sent Marcellus with his army into Nola, and he himself removed to the Pro-Consul's camp near Suessula. There he continued quiet while Marcellus made frequent incursions into the lands of the Hirpini and the Samnites about Caudium. Deputies from these two nations came to Hannibal to inform him of the devastation of their country, and to desire relief. They even added reproaches to their complaints. "We believed (said they) that so long as you were safe and our friend, we might have banished all fear, not only of the Romans, but (were it lawful so to speak) even of the angry Gods themselves. Yet certain it is, that whilst you are not only safe and victorious, but so near us too, that you can see the burning of our houses, and almost hear the cries of our wives and children, we have been miserably harassed this summer by Marcellus, as if he, and not you, had been conqueror at Cannæ. The Romans give out that you are like a bee that can sting but once^p."

c. 39.

c. 40.

c. 42.

Hannibal

^p The Roman historians frequently reproach Hannibal with inaction after the winter he spent in Cepua, and Livy upon this occasion has put very severe reflections upon him into the mouths of the Samnite deputies. The truth of the matter seems to be this: The Romans had now learnt by their defeats that they were not a match for Hannibal in the open field. It was a long time before they would yield this point; but the battle of Cannæ seems to have convinced them. At first they sent one Consul to oppose him with the usual army of two legions (consisting of about 4000 men each) with a proportionable number of auxiliaries. The misfortune at the Ticin, and

Y. R. 538
 Def. Chr.
 214
 237 Conf.

Liv. B. 23.
 c. 43.

c. 44.

Hannibal returned a civil answer to the deputies, and encouraged them to hope for a happy issue of the war. "Of the victories I have gained," said he, the last has always been the greatest. That of the lake Trafalgar was more considerable than that of the Trebia, and the victory of Cannæ surpassed them both. I shall soon gain a fourth victory superior to all the past." With this answer, and rich presents, he dismissed the deputies.

Hannibal, being soon after joined by Hanno with some troops from Bruttium, invested Nola, which was defended by Marcellus, who (if we may credit the Latin historian) boldly marched his troops out of the town, and came to a pitched battle with the Carthaginian before the walls: victory declared for the Romans, and Hannibal lost 5000 men⁹.

About

and what immediately followed it, obliged them to send the other Consul with his army to join his colleague. These being defeated at the Trebia, the Republic increased her armies the next year. Flaminius had alone the command of four legions, and his colleague of two. The former being vanquished at the lake Trafalgar, and Fabius's dilatory arts not having any sensible good effect, the Romans seemed resolved to exert their whole strength, and ruin Hannibal at a blow. They doubled their legions, increased the number of men in each, and sent both their Consuls at the head of an army of near 90,000 men to fight a decisive battle. The victory over these at Cannæ was so complete, that the Romans saw plainly they could not hope to conquer the Carthaginian in a general battle, and that they must change their manner of carrying on the war. Accordingly they divided their troops into many armies, never risked their whole strength in one action, but contented themselves with wasting Hannibal's forces in small engagements, harassing his allies, and protecting their own. This very year they besieged him, as it were, with armies. Fabius commanded one at Literum, Sempronius had another at Cuma, and Marcellus a third at Stessula, all in Campania where Hannibal was. Lælius defended Apulia, and Tarentus Varro, Picenum. Each of these Generals had at least two legions under him, except T. Varro, who had but one. beside these, Livy mentions a Sempronius Longus, who had an army in Lucania sufficient to defeat a considerable part of the Carthaginian army under Hanno, of which 2000 were slain in the action. All these forces joined together would have made a greater army than the Romans had at Cannæ, but the Republic had now altered her measures. Nay so steady was she in pursuing this new method of carrying on the war, that though Hannibal was many years hemmed in among the Bruttians, in a corner of Italy, without supplies from his own country, and in great want of men and money, she never ventured to unite her forces, in order to compel him to a general battle. Now considering the small number of his troops, his want of money, the many armies he had to deal with, the towns he had to garrison, and the several allies he had to protect, it is more to be wondered at that he kept footing so long in Italy, than that he made no progress in conquest.

⁹ Livy, Plutarch, and others, relate several victories gained by Marcellus over Hannibal. But Corn. Nepos (in Vit. Hannib.) tells us, that the latter was always victorious in Italy, and that after the battle of Cannæ no one ever ventured to pitch a camp in the plain against him. Quamdiu in Italia fuit, nemo ei in Acie resistit, nemo adversus eum, post Cannensem pugnam, in Campo Castra posuit. Polybius's history of the Roman affairs after the battle of Cannæ is not entire; but we have several considerable fragments of it remaining, none of which mention any victory over Hannibal in Italy. From a passage in B. 9. c. 3. it is plain, that Hannibal was never defeated by any Roman General before the siege of Capua, and consequently not by Marcellus this year. Who (says the historian) "can help admiring the Romans? That they who durst not draw out an army in battle against Hannibal, but "used

About this time, 1272 of his Spanish and Numidian horse went over to the enemy. These deserters continued faithful to Rome, and did her important services, for which they were recompensed with lands in their own countries at the end of the war. The Carthaginian General raised the siege of Nola, sent Hanno again into Bruttium with the forces he had brought from thence, marched himself into Apulia, and pitched his camp near Arpi, where he purposed to winter. As soon as he was gone, Fabius made two incursions, with the greatest part of his army, into the flat country of Campania, gathered in all the corn, and carried it to his camp at Suessula, which he put in a condition to serve him for winter quarters. He then ordered Marcellus to keep no more soldiers at Nola than were necessary to defend the town, and to send the rest to Rome, that they might neither be a burden to the allies nor an expence to the Republic. The Consul Sempronius marched his legions from Cumæ to Luceria in Apulia; from thence he dispatched the Prætor Lævinus with the army under his command to Brundisium, to guard the coast of Salentum, and provide what was necessary for the Macedonian war.

Y. R. 538.
Bel. Chr.
214.
237 Cont.

Liv. B. 23.
c. 46.

c. 48.

While affairs in Italy were in the situation that has been described, good news came to Rome from Sardinia and Spain. The Prætor, Manlius Torquatus, had defeated the rebel Sardinians, though assisted by an army sent from Carthage under the command of Asdrubal the Bald. Twelve thousand of the enemy were killed upon the spot, Asdrubal himself, with Hanno and Mago his chief officers, taken prisoners, and the island entirely reduced.

c. 34, 49.
41.

The Scipios had been equally fortunate in their wars in Spain. However they wrote to the Senate, that the troops wanted their pay, clothes to cover them, and provisions to subsist them. As to the first indeed, they added, that if the public treasury was exhausted, they would find means to get money from the Spaniards; but that the other necessaries might be sent from Rome, otherwise they could neither keep the province in obedience, nor support the army. The Senators were all sensible of the reasonableness of the request; but how to comply with it was the difficulty. They considered the numerous forces they already had to maintain both at land and sea, and what a large new fleet must presently be equipped, if a war with Macedon should be commenced: That as to Sicily and Sardinia, which, before the war, brought in considerable subsidies to the treasury, they were now scarce able to maintain the forces necessary for the defence of these provinces; and that

c. 48.

“ used to lead their legions, and that with “ difficulty, along the hills, should venture “ to lay siege to a strong city, while they “ themselves were harassed by an enemy “ whom they dared not to think of en“ countering in the field. But the Car- “ thaginians, who had been conquerors in “ every battle, suffered no less than the “ vanquished, &c.” And in B. 15. c. 16.

he expressly asserts, that Hannibal was never vanquished before the battle of Zama.
And in chap. 11. he represents Hannibal, just before that battle, reminding his soldiers, that they had been victorious in every battle they had fought in Italy.

Y. R. 55.
Liv. B. 22.
c. 4.
B. 23, 30.

to tax the citizens at home for the supply demanded, would quite oppress and ruin them. The result of all was, that Fulvius the Prætor found a plan to relieve the people, and by letting them the necessities of the state, and exempting from the public tax those who were grown rich by farming the public revenues, to send the public for a while, a part of what they had gained by it, and furnish the army in Spain with necessaries, under a promise of being reimbursed the first of any of the public creditors, when the treasury should be in a condition to discharge debts. The Prætor accordingly represented the matter to the people, and also appointed a day when he would bargain for clothes and corn, to be sent to the troops in Spain, and for other necessaries to equip the fleet.

When the day came, three companies of nineteen persons each, presented themselves as undertakers; but they insisted on two demands, That while thus employed, they should be exempted from serving in the war: And That, if what they shipped were taken by the enemy, or cast away by storm, the public should bear the loss; both which conditions being agreed to, they undertook this affair, so that now the Roman armies were subsisted by the purses of private subjects; nor was any thing wanting to carry on the war in Spain more than if the treasury had been full.

The ships, thus supplied, immediately took the field, and (according to Livy), performed strange things, as shall hereafter be related.

Liv. B. 22.
c. 4.
B. 23, 30.

The accounts from Sicily were not so satisfactory as those from Spain and Sardinia. King Hiero was dead, and had left his dominions, by will, to his grandson Hieronymus (whose father Gelo had rebelled against the old King the year before his death, and had come to an untimely end) under the tuition of fifteen guardians; whom he had entreated, a little before his decease, to keep up a good understanding with the Romans, as he himself had done for fifty years past. Hieronymus, being suffered by his guardians to take the reins of government into his own hands at fifteen Years of age, ran into many excesses of vice and cruelty. He affected an extravagant pomp, was difficult of access, gave audience with an air of contempt, and often adding insulting jests to refusals. Three lords of distinction engrossed his favour, Asarandorus and Zeippus (his two uncles in law) and Thraſo surnamed Charracus. This last was a friend to the Romans; the other two favoured Carthage. Thraſo being put to death, upon a false accusation of treason, the uncles easily persuaded their nephew to enter into a negotiation with Hannibal. Ciculus Pulcher, the Roman Prætor in Sicily, sent a deputation to the King, to renew the alliance formerly made by his grandfather with the Romans. Hieronymus insulted the deputies, asking them, What fortune they had at the battle of Cannæ? because, said he, Hannibal's ambassadors have given most incredible accounts of it; and I would fain know the truth, that I may take my measures accordingly. The Romans only answered, that when he had learnt to give audience to ambassadors in a serious manner, they would come to him again; and then Polib. 2.

Virg. & Vir.
B. 23, 30.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 5, 6.

then having rather admonished, than requested him, not rashly to violate the antient league, they departed and returned to the Prætor. Hieronymus, without delay, sent ambassadors to Carthage, to ratify a treaty he had already made with Hannibal; the substance of which was, that he and the Carthaginians should divide Sicily between them, when they had jointly conquered the whole island. But being afterwards persuaded to think that he had himself a title of inheritance to all Sicily, by being descended from Nereis, the daughter of Pyrrhus (who had been declared King of it) he sent a new embassy, with instructions to lay before the Senate of Carthage his pretended rights, and to conclude only a treaty of mutual assistance with them. The Carthaginians were glad at any rate to draw off Syracuse from the Roman interest, and readily yielded to the proposals.

Y. R. 538.
Ref. Chr.
214.
237 Conf.

Not long after, this foolish King being at Leontini, a town situate on the frontiers of his dominions, was there assassinated in the presence of his guards, by some conspirators among his own subjects; an event which promised no great benefit to the Romans: for though the Syracusians, fond of liberty, seemed much inclined to change the monarchy into a commonwealth, they seemed no less inclined to side with the Carthaginian Republic.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 7.

C H A P. XXIV.

FIFTH YEAR of the WAR.

The wise and public spirited conduct of the Romans in several instances. They gain some advantages over Hannibal in Italy, and over King Philip in Greece.

IN Italy, the campaign of this year being ended, Fabius took the road to Rome, to hold the comitia by centuries for the new elections. The prudent Consul did not enter the city, but appeared at the assembly in the Campus Martius, on the day appointed, in his military habit, and attended by his Liëtor with their axes as well as fasces. It fell by lot to the tribe of the Anio, to vote first, and of this tribe to a century which consisted of the younger men; and the majority of this prerogative^r century named to the Consulship, T. Otacilius (a relation of the president) and

^r After the thirty-five tribes were completed, the Centuries, which formed the comitia centuriate, were divided among the tribes, and became parts of them; and then in these assemblies it was decided by lot which of the tribes should vote first, and the tribe upon which the lot fell was called the prerogative tribe. Then lots were again cast among the centuries of this prerogative tribe, to determine which of those should vote before the rest; and the Century upon which the lot fell was called the prerogative century. Resin. p. 406.

Y. R. 538.
 Best. Chr.
 214.
 237 Cons.

Liv. B. 24.
 c. 8.

M. Æmilius Regillus, men, neither of them, of such abilities as the present exigency required. Fabius therefore thought fit to interrupt the election, and harangue the assembly. He first excused the irregularity of his proceeding, by the present dangers which threatened the state. He then represented to them the importance of chusing Consuls qualified to enter the lists with Hannibal; that Otacilius had given no cause to think him equal to that enterprize, not having performed any one thing for which the command of the fleet had, this year, been intrusted to him; and that Æmilius, as high-priest of Quirinus, could not be absent from Rome. Romans (he added) do you name such Consuls as you would wish to be conducted by, if you were this moment to give Hannibal battle. I pronounce, That the prerogative century give their suffrages again. Herald, proclaim my orders. Otacilius at first made some opposition to this; but the Lictors with their axes surrounded him, and soon forced him to silence. Then the prerogative century returned to the voting place, and gave their suffrages for the president himself, *Q. Fabius Verrucius (surnamed Cunctator, or the Lingerer) and Claudius Marcellus†, who was absent; and the other Centuries unanimously followed the example of this. Rome had never seen two greater men together at the head of her affairs. And though Fabius, by an irregular proceeding, had procured his own continuance in the Consular dignity, against law and custom, yet no one accused him of ambition or tyranny, or of being actuated by any motive but a zeal for his country. The Romans were convinced of the necessity of continuing the commanders of their armies more than one year in office; and they now therefore made little alteration in the disposition of military employments.

Y. R. 539.
 Best. Chr.
 215.
 238 Cons.

c. 9.
 * 4th time.
 † 3d time.

Liv. B. 34.
 c. 1.

As a law had been made the last year (at the motion of Oppius, a tribune of the people) to restrain the luxury of women, forbidding them to wear above half an ounce of gold in toys, and to ride in a chariot within a mile of Rome, except to a public sacrifice; so now the Censors, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus, made a strict enquiry into offences committed by the men, to the detriment of the public. Cæcilius Metellus and the other young nobles who with him would in despair have left Italy after the battle of Cannæ, those of the ten deputies from the prisoners taken at that battle, who had not returned to Hannibal according to their oath, and about 2000 young men of military age who had neglected, without just cause, to enrol themselves for the service, were all degraded. The Senate also decreed that all who were stigmatized by the Censors, should be sent into Sicily, and there be obliged to serve on foot, amongst the runaways from the battle of Cannæ, till the war should be at an end. The Romans never exerted their virtue and disinterested zeal for their country in a greater degree than in this second Punic war; private men voluntarily advanced money for the public works; the masters who had sold their slaves to the Republic, would not accept of payment till the war was ended; scarce a centurion or trooper demanded his

• Liv. B.
 24 c. 18.

his pay, and if any one had so little generosity as to receive it from the Quæstor, he became the jest of his legion. Nay the money of the widow and the orphan was freely brought into the treasury, so great was the confidence in the public faith.

Y. R. 539
Bef. Chr.
213.
238 Conf.

Such being the dispositions of the people, the new levies were soon compleated. Six legions were added to the twelve already on foot. The Sicilian expedition seemed to require the most dispatch: and Otacilius was therefore ordered to embark with all diligence for that island, with one legion. And in order to man and equip the fleet, the Consuls, by authority from the Senate, laid a tax upon the rich. Each head of a family, who by the Censor's register was found worth from 50,000 to a 100,000 asses, was obliged to maintain a rower or a sailor, at his own expence, for six months; and the more wealthy three, five, seven, in proportion to their riches. The Senators were obliged each to maintain eight sailors for a whole year.

Liv. B. 24.
C. 11.

What remained now, was to march the land forces, and begin the campaign in Italy. Hannibal, who had spent the winter in Apulia, returned to his camp on the Tifata, at the request of the Capuans, who thought their city threatened. He had ordered Hanno, with an army of 17,000 foot, and 1200 Numidian horse, to come from the country of the Bruttians and seize Beneventum; but Sempronius, with his army of Volones, prevented him, and possessed himself of that defenceless city. From thence he marched to give Hanno battle: and to engage his Volones to exert themselves, he promised every man his liberty, who should bring off the head of an enemy. The Senate had given him power to enfranchise whom he pleased. But this promise had like to have ruined his affairs. For though his troops fought bravely at first, they lost much time in cutting off the heads of the enemies they had slain, and the ardour of those who had performed the condition of obtaining their freedom, was immediately abated: so that he was forced to publish a new declaration through all the ranks of his army, That none should obtain their liberty, unless the Carthaginians were routed. Hereupon the Volones renewed the fight with impetuosity, and gained so compleat a victory, that scarce 2000 of the enemy escaped*. We are told however that 4000 of those legionary slaves did not behave themselves in the battle so well as the rest, and were afraid to pursue the enemy to their camp; and that apprehending punishment for their cowardice, they retired after the action to a hill. Sempronius had compassion for their weakness, and sent a Tribune to invite them back: and then, to perform his promise, he pronounced all, without exception, free. Nevertheless, that some distinction might be made between the brave and the cowards, he forbade the latter to eat sitting or lying down, all the time of their service, unless they were sick.

c. 12.
c. 14.

c. 15, 16.

* The reader has been already cautioned concerning Livy's tales of Roman victories in this war.

Y. R. 522.
E. C. 17.
213.
235 C. 17.

L. B. 24.
C. 17.

In the mean while, Hannibal endeavoured to surprize Puteoli. Failing in this attempt, he went and pillaged the country about Naples. From thence he moved towards Noia, whither the populace (who were still in his interest, in opposition to the Senate) had invited him. Marcellus being joined by the army from Syracusa (now under Q. Pomponius) attacked and killed 2000 of his men, with the loss only of 400; and would have entirely ruined him, had Claudius Nero, whom the Consul had ordered with some squadrons out of Noia to make a tour, and fall upon the Carthaginians in the rear during the action, come up in time. Marcellus offered Hannibal battle again the next day, but the latter declined it, decamped the night following, and marched towards Tarentum.

c. 20.

He had entertained strong hopes that this city would open her gates to him, upon his first appearance before it. Some Tarentine prisoners, whom he had formerly released without ransom, had engaged a great number of the young men of that place in his interest, and these invited him thither. But M. Livius, who commanded in the place, took such effectual measures to prevent the designs of the factious, that Hannibal was again disappointed. He quitted the enterprize, and marched towards Salapia in Apulia, where he resolved to spend the winter. Thither he ordered corn to be brought from Lucania; and his foragers having found in Apulia about 4000 colts, Hannibal ordered them to be broke; and with them he remounted his African horsemen. These were all his exploits during the whole campaign.

c. 19.

But whilst the Carthaginian was on his march to Tarentum, Fabius besieged Casilinum, and sent to Marcellus to come with some legions and cover the siege, apprehending an attack from the Capuans. The garrison in the place consisted of 2000 Campanians and 700 Carthaginians; and they made so vigorous a defence, that Fabius, by the daily slaughter of his men, was much discouraged. He would have raised the siege, if Marcellus had not represented to him, That a wise General should well consider all the difficulties of an enterprize before he undertakes it; but that when it is once undertaken, he ought to go through with it: and that to desist now from the siege, would much lessen the credit of the Republic among her allies. Upon this Fabius renews his attacks with more ardour than ever; and the Campanians were so intimidated by it, that they sent to him an offer to quit the place, if they might retire in safety to Capua. Fabius consented; but Marcellus taking his opportunity, before fifty of them were come out of the city, seized the gate, entered the place, and put all who opposed him to the sword, without distinction. The prisoners he sent to Rome. After the taking of Casilinum,

Plot. life of Fabius.

* This story ill agrees with the character given by the historians of Marcellus, but well with his after behaviour at the siege of Syracuse.

Marcellus,

Marcellus returned to Nola, and Fabius marched into Samnium, laid waste the country, and took several towns.

Hannibal still depended upon his alliance with the king of Macedon, and indeed Philip began to draw towards Italy. He first besieged Apollonia; but not succeeding in this enterprize, he turned his arms against Oricum, and took it. The inhabitants sent notice of their misfortune to Lævinus at Brundisium, who in two days after the news, arrived before the place. The king had left a small garrison in it, and was returned to the siege of Apollonia. Lævinus easily took Oricum, and, while he was there, deputies came to him from the people of Apollonia, begging assistance against the Macedonians. He sent thither 2000 foot under the command of Q. Nævius Crissa, who got into the town without being perceived by the enemy. Nævius soon after understanding that the Macedonian camp was very negligently guarded, broke into it in the night, and, if his soldiers had abstained from slaughter, might have taken Philip prisoner; but the groans of the dying waked others, who carried off the King half naked to his ships. He returned into Macedon, and the Roman fleet wintered at Oricum.

V. R. 539.
Bef. Chr.

213.
238 Conf.

Liv. 3. 24.
c. 40.

C H A P. XXV.

Transactions in Sicily. The Carthaginian interest prevails in Syracuse. Marcellus besieges it, but soon turns the siege into a blockade.

HANNIBAL made himself some amends for his disappointment on the side of Macedon, by the troubles he found means to raise in Sicily. Hippocrates, and Epicyles, two brothers of Syracusan extraction, whom he had sent to conclude the treaty with Hieronymus, had worked themselves into that Prince's favour, and, at the time of his death, commanded a body of 2000 Syracusians. Upon the news of the King's assassination, these Generals, being abandoned by their soldiers, repaired to Syracuse, as thinking this the safest place for them in the present conjuncture. At their arrival they found that the heads of the conspiracy, who were favoured by the people, had come to an accommodation with Andronodorus, the late King's uncle-in-law, and chief of the royalist party, and that he, Themistius, and those leaders, had been chosen Prætors to govern the state with the assistance of a Senate. The two Hannibalists, doubtless believing that this change of government had changed the dispositions of the Syracusians with respect to Hannibal, to prevent all suspicion of their designing to raise disturbances, applied themselves to the Prætors, and by their means obtained an audience of the Senate. They spoke to this effect. "We came hither on the part " of Hannibal to treat with his friend Hieronymus. We have only " obeyed the commands of our General, and desire now to return to " him; but as our journey is not like to be with safety to our persons,

Liv. 7
c. 23.
seq.

Y. R. 339.
 Dec. 10.
 213.
 238 Cons.

“ the Roman forces so much infesting Sicily, we request that we may “ have a convoy as far as Locri in Italy.” Their suit was easily obtained; for the assembly had no unwillingness to be rid of these Generals of the late King, men extremely bold and enterprising, of great ability in war, and of narrow fortunes. The Senate however were too dilatory in executing their own desires; and the brothers took advantage of the delay. Sometimes to the soldiers, with whom they were very intimate and familiar, sometimes to the deserters from the Roman fleet, and occasionally to the meanest of the populace, they whispered calumnies against the Senators and other principal men of the city, accusing them, that under colour of renewing the league with Rome, they designed to betray Syracuse to her, in the view, that their own faction, having the sole merit of the pretended new alliance, might lord it over the rest.

These rumours being spread and believed, and drawing every day crowds of people to Syracuse, gave not only Hippocrates and Epycides, but also Andranodorus, who at the pressing instances of his ambitious wife Demerata, the daughter of Hiero, aimed at the royalty, good hopes of changing the government, and effecting their several designs. Andranodorus having concerted his scheme with Themistus, the husband of Harmonia, Hieronymus's sister, unadvisedly imparted the secret to Aristo, a tragedian, who discovered it to the Prætors. Aristo's profession was not dishonourable among the Greeks: He was a man well descended, and of a good estate, and the Prætors therefore had no reason to reject his testimony; and it being confirmed by several corroborating circumstances, they, in concert with some of the oldest senators, placed guards at the door of the senate-house, who slew Andranodorus and Themistus as soon as they entered. This extraordinary action, most of the senators being ignorant of the cause of it, raised a great commotion and terror in the assembly. Aristo put an end to their fears. Being introduced by the Prætors, he informed the Senate, “ That a plot had been laid to “ cut off all the chiefs of the republic, and to seize ^b Ortygia in the “ name of Andranodorus, and that this was to have been executed by “ the help of the Spanish and African mercenaries, who had served “ under Hieronymus.” He then entered into the particulars of the conspiracy, declaring the names of all the conspirators, and the several parts they were to have acted. His evidence obtained full belief, and the assembly passed a decree, pronouncing the death of Andranodorus and Themistus no less just than that of Hieronymus. In the mean time the people without doors had taken the alarm at this proceeding; and it was necessary to quiet them. The Senate therefore deputed Sopater, one of the Prætors, to harangue the multitude.

This orator began with invectives against Andranodorus and Themistus, as if he had been accusing them at the bar, charging them, as the tutors and counsellors of Hieronymus, with all the injustices, oppressions,

^b A well fortified island to the South of Syracuse, and joined to the town by a bridge.

and

and cruelties, committed by the order or authority of that King, and with many other atrocious crimes perpetrated since his death. In the conclusion of his speech he intimated that they had been spirited up by their wives, the ambitious daughter and granddaughter of Hiero, to aspire to royalty by the destruction of the people's liberty. At this the whole multitude cried out, that neither of those women ought to live, nor any one of the royal race be suffered to remain on the earth. The Prætors, taking advantage of the people's present fury, immediately put it to the vote, and it was no sooner proposed than carried, that all who were of the royal family should be destroyed. In pursuance of this decree certain officers, commissioned by the Prætors, quickly dispatched Demarata and Harmonia. There was another daughter of Hiero, named Hieraclea, the wife of Zoippus, who had been sent ambassador by Hieronymus to King Ptolemy, and had chosen to continue at the Egyptian court in a voluntary exile from his country, rather than be a spectator of its miseries. This lady with her two daughters the same executioners inhumanly murdered, and with so much expedition, that an express from the magistrates (who on second thoughts relented) came too late to save them. But now the people also began to repent of their own precipitation, and to pity the fate of the dead. Their pity soon turned into rage against the first authors of the cruelty. They furiously called out for an election of Prætors in the room of Andranodorus and Themistus; an election that was not like to be to the satisfaction of those already in power.

Y. R. 539.
Def. Cl. r.
213.
238 Conf.

When, on the day appointed, the assembly was formed, it happened beyond all expectation, that somebody from the farther end of the crowd named Epicydes, and another a little after named Hippocrates, and straight almost the whole multitude joined their suffrages for these two agents of Hannibal. The Republic, being very young, no method was yet settled for voting; all were indifferently admitted into the voting place, citizens, strangers, and Roman deserters. The magistrates in vain opposed the people's choice. Fearing a sedition they gave way to numbers, and Hippocrates and Epicydes were declared Prætors.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 27. &
seq.

The two Hannibalists did not immediately discover their intentions. They were much dissatisfied, that deputies had been sent to Appius Claudius to renew the ancient alliance between Rome and Syracuse, yet they thought it best to conceal their dissatisfaction till a more favourable opportunity should present to embroil affairs. Appius was then at Murgantia with a fleet of a hundred ships, waiting to see what the revolutions among the Syracusians would produce.

At Rome it had been resolved, from the apprehension that a dangerous war might arise in Sicily, to send the Consul Marcellus to take upon him the direction of affairs in that island. He was just arrived in his province; and Appius referred the Syracusan deputies to him for a final answer. The Consul approving the conditions, dispatched ambassadors

V. R. 539.
 Bef. Chr.
 213.
 238 Conf.

to conclude the treaty with the Prætors at Syracuse. But those ambassadors found the state of things there very different from what they had expected. A Carthaginian fleet had appeared off Cape Pachynum, and Hippocrates and Epicydes had laid hold of this advantage to attempt something in favour of Carthage, by infusing anew into the minds of the people a jealousy of the Partisans of Rome, a suspicion of their intending to betray Syracuse to the Romans. This jealousy was the more readily entertained, as Appius to encourage the Roman party in the town was come with his fleet to the mouth of the port. The populace ran tumultuously to hinder the Romans from landing in case they should attempt it.

In the perplexity occasioned by these commotions, the magistrates thought it proper to call an assembly of the people. The multitude were for some time divided in opinion. At length Apollonides, one of the chief citizens, with great calmness, and as a man unbiassed by any private or party views, represented to them “the necessity of unanimously adhering to the one or the other of the rival Republics. “The choice, he said, was of much less importance than unanimity in “choosing: yet in his opinion, they had more encouragement to follow “the example of Hiero than of Hieronymus, and to prefer a treaty with “Rome, whose friendship they had happily experienced for 50 years, “to the uncertain advantages of an alliance with Carthage, who, in “times past, had not proved very faithful to her engagements. Nor “was it a consideration of small moment, that they must have immediate “peace with the Romans, or immediate war with them; whereas “should they reject the friendship of the Carthaginians, a war with them “might yet be at a great distance.” The more dispassionate Apollonides appeared, the greater weight his advice had with the people; and as they were in no condition to support a war with Rome, it was in conclusion agreed, that the treaty with that Republic should be renewed, and a deputation sent to Marcellus for that purpose.

A few days after, the Leontines having demanded of the Syracusians a body of troops to defend their frontiers, the government thought this a favourable opportunity to get rid of a multitude of soldiers and officers, who were very turbulent in the city; and it was determined that Hippocrates should march to the assistance of the Leontines at the head of 4000 men, most of them deserters or mercenaries. This Prætor, glad of an opportunity to create disturbances, readily accepted the commission, and, soon after his arrival among the Leontines, began to make stolen incursions into the Roman province, laying waste the country. Appius, informed of these hostilities, sent a body of soldiers to protect his allies. Those troops Hippocrates openly attacked, and put most of them to the sword. Hereupon Marcellus ordered deputies to Syracuse to complain of the infraction of the treaty, and to remonstrate, that a firm and lasting peace between Rome and Syracuse, was not to be hoped for so long as

Hippocrates

Hippocrates and Epicyles continued in Sicily. The latter, fearing to be accused in the absence of his brother, and desirous of having some share in exciting a war, repaired in all haste to Leontini. There, in conjunction with Hippocrates, he represented to the inhabitants, "that Syracuse, while she provided for her own liberty, had expressly covenanted with the Romans, that she should have dominion over all the cities formerly subject to Hieronymus: But that the Leontines had as good a right to liberty as Syracuse; and that they ought therefore to refuse acceding to her treaty with Rome, unless that covenant were taken out of it." The multitude was easily persuaded; so that when deputies from Syracuse complained of the slaughter made of the Roman troops, and desired the Leontines would concur with the Syracusians, to banish Hippocrates and Epicyles out of the island, the citizens haughtily answered, "that they had given no commission to the Syracusians to make a peace for them with Rome, nor were they bound by a treaty concluded without their participation." The Syracusians acquainted Marcellus with this answer, and at the same time declared, that they would not only adhere steadily to their engagements with the Romans, but would join with them in besieging Leontini, on condition that this city after its reduction, were restored to the dominion of Syracuse. Marcellus agreed to the proposal, assembled all his forces, sent for the Prætor Appius to come to his assistance, and prepared to attack Leontini.

V. R. 539.
Bef. Chr.
213.
238 Cons.

About this time, a great company of those Roman soldiers who had fled from the battle of Cannæ, and who had been condemned, by a decree of the Senate, to serve in a separate corps in Sicily as long as the war should last in Italy, came, with the permission of their commander Lentulus, and earnestly begged of the Consul to be incorporated in his legions. Marcellus wrote to Rome in their favour: The Conscrip Fathers returned answer, that it was their opinion, the Republic ought not to put any confidence in the courage of soldiers who had deserted their companions at the battle of Cannæ; yet if Marcellus thought otherwise, he might act in this matter as he pleased, provided none of them ever received any military rewards, or were suffered to return to Italy before the end of the war.

Plut. life
of Marcellus.
Liv. B. 25.
c. 5, 6, 7.

Leontini was taken upon the first assault, but Hippocrates and Epicyles made their escape to Erbessus. A body of 8000 Men from Syracuse, under the command of Sosis and Dinomenes, two of the Prætors, marching to join Marcellus, were met at the river Mylas, by a man who told them, that Leontini had been sacked, and all, without distinction, able to bear arms, put to the sword. This false story (occasioned by the execution of 2000 deserters, whom Marcellus had taken in the place) made such an impression on the soldiers, that their officers could not prevail with them to proceed to Leontini, but were forced to turn aside and lead them to Megara. From this place the Prætors marched them soon,

Liv. B. 24.
c. 30. &
seq. Plut.
life of Marcellus.

Y. R. 539
Det. C. 57
215
217 C. 57

soon after towards Erbessus, believing, that the seditious spirit among them would be easily quelled, if Hippocrates and Epicydes, the true authors of all the late disturbances, were destroyed, or driven out of the country.

The brothers found themselves now reduced to extremities; yet having some hope in the goodwill of the soldiers, with whom they were well acquainted, and this hope being favoured by the recent report of the massacre at Leontini, they left Erbessus, in the resolution to yield themselves up to the soldiers at discretion. It happened luckily for them, that a body of Cretans, which had formerly served the Romans as auxiliaries, and, being taken prisoners at the battle of Ibraxymen, had been set at liberty by Hannibal, and had since served under Hippocrates and Epicydes in the reign of Hieronymus, was marching in the van of the army. To these they addressed themselves in a suppliant manner, presenting them olive branches, and imploring their protection, "That they might not be lost at the mercy of the Syracusians, who would quickly deliver them up to be slain by the Romans." The Cretans immediately cried out to them, to take courage, and promised to defend them: So that when Sisy and Dinomachus, informed of what passed, came in haste and ordered the Hannibalists to be seized, they found no obedience from their troops, but rather a disposition to revolt. In this perplexity, they gave orders for returning to Megara, and sent an account to Syracuse of what had happened. During the march of the army, a letter forged by Hippocrates, but pretended to be written by the Prætors at Syracuse to Marcellus, and intercepted, was produced and read to the soldiers by the contriver of it. It was to this effect. "The Prætors of Syracuse to the Consul of Marcellus, health. You have done justly and prudently in sparing none at Leontini. All the mercenaries deserve the same fate. Nor will Syracuse ever be in peace while any foreign soldiers remain either in the city, or the army. Turn then your arms against those who are with our Prætors at Megara, and by their destruction restore us to perfect liberty." This letter kindled such a flame among the soldiers, and their sudden loud clamours so terrified Sisy and Dinomachus, that they galloped away in all haste to Syracuse. Their flight did not quiet the commotion. The mercenaries fell upon the Syracusan soldiers that were in the army, and would have put them all to the sword, if the Hannibalists had not interposed in their defence, desiring to make use of them as hostages, and also hoping by their means to gain friends in Syracuse. Thither they instantly sent a soldier, who had been in Leontini when it was taken, to spread the false story of the massacre of its inhabitants. The artifice had the desired effect, even upon the Senate and the chief men in the Republic. They thought it necessary to shut the gates and guard the city against the Romans, as against an enemy whose avarice and cruelty would spare nothing. Scarce was this done, when Hippocrates and Epicydes appeared before the walls at the head of the mercenaries, and, by the assistance of the multitude within (who would not be restrained by their magistrate,) broke open one of the gates and entered the city. The Prætors retired with the Syracusan soldiery into that quarter of the town, which was called Acbradina, hoping to defend themselves there; but the Hannibals being joined by the mercenaries, the deserters and all the soldiers of the late King, took it at the first assault. Those of the Prætors who could not escape in the first confusion of the conflict were massacred, together with many of the citizens; and the next day, liberty being granted to all slaves and prisoners, the mixed multitude declared Hippocrates and Epicydes their Prætors.

Marcellus, upon the news of this revolution, advanced with his army to Syracuse. Before he began hostilities, he sent deputies to the Syracusans, to assure them, he did not come to make war upon them, but assist those of their fellow-citizens who, having escaped the slaughter in Acbradina, had taken refuge in his camp, and those who suffered yet greater wrongs in the city, from tyranny and oppression: That what he therefore insisted upon was, that the refugees under his protection should be restored to their possessions and privileges, the authors of the disturbances given up, and Syracuse put in a condition to enjoy peaceably her laws and liberty: And he threatened war against whoever should oppose these demands. The brothers, not thinking it safe to let the deputies enter the town, gave them audience without the walls; and when the latter had made their demands, Epicydes spoke to this effect: "If you had brought any message to us, we would have returned an answer. - You may now go back; and when the government of Syracuse is in the hands of those to whom you have orders to address yourselves, you may come again. If Marcellus is for war, he will find the siege of Syracuse an enterprise somewhat different from the siege of Leontini." The Consul, upon the return of his deputies, invested the place by sea and land.

Syracuse stood on the south-east side of Sicily, and was properly five cities in one; Ortygia, Acbradina, Tyche, Neapolis and Epipolæ. Ortygia was a small island, very near the continent, and might be called the citadel of Syracuse; it was joined to Acbradina by a bridge. All the attempts of Marcellus to carry the town by assault were frustrated by the surprising inventions of Archimedes. This great man is said to have once told King Miero, that he could move the globe of the earth, provided he had another earth to send upon. And he now contrived machines which cast stones of so prodigious a weight, as to break in pieces all the battering engines of the Romans. Nay, he invented a sort of iron crows fastened to chains, which being let fall upon the Roman gallees (that were brought close to the wall of the town) stuck fast in the prows of them, and then, by means of a counterpoise on that part of the machine which was within the rampart, and let them on one end, or over-

M. P. 539.
vel. Chr.
213.
213. 214.

Y. R. 539.
 Bef. Chr.
 213.
 238 Cons.

overturned them: Infomuch that the Romans were utterly discouraged, and Marcellus obliged to remove to a further distance. It was resolved in a council of war, to attack the place no more, but shut up all the avenues of it, in order to reduce it by famine.

C H A P. XXVI.

SIXTH YEAR of the War.

The Roman arms prosper in Italy. Syphax a Numidian King is gained by the Scipios to make war upon the Carthaginians in Africa. The blockade of Syracuse is continued, while Marcellus reduces some other towns in Sicily.

Y. R. 540.
 Bef. Chr.
 212.
 239 Cons.

AT Rome, Q. Fabius Maximus, the son of Fabius Cunctator, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, were chosen Consuls for the new year, and appointed, in concert with the Prætorian armies in Italy, to conduct the war against Hannibal. Marcellus continued in Sicily, and had the government of the country formerly subject to Hiero. Lentulus, with the title of Pro-Prætor, commanded the Roman province in that island, and T. Otacilius Crassus guarded the coast with his fleet. The two Scipios, Lævinus and Sævola managed the affairs of Rome in the respective countries of Spain, Greece and Sardinia. And the Republic employed this year, in her several armies, twenty-one Roman legions, besides the troops of her allies.

All the regulations necessary for beginning the campaign being dispatched, young Fabius set out from Rome, and took upon him the command of the army at Suessula. His father served under him.

Liv. B. 24.
 c. 45.

While the Fabii continued here, Dafius Altinius, one of the chief men of Arpi, who had engaged that city to revolt to Hannibal, came and offered, for a reward, to restore it into the hands of its former masters. The affair being brought before a council, some were for treating the villain as Cemillus had treated the school-master of Falerii; but old Fabius represented to them, that though such traitors ought never to be trusted as friends, yet in the present circumstances of the Republic, no discouragement should be given to those of the rebels who were disposed to return to their former obedience; and he advised that Altinius should only be kept in an easy confinement till the end of the war, when it would be time enough to judge whether he had made sufficient amends for his revolt. This advice was followed, and the traitor sent to Cales, where in the day-time he was suffered to walk abroad with a guard, but confined close prisoner at night. As soon as he was missed at Arpi, the inhabitants sent notice of it to Hannibal. The Carthaginian was in no manner of pain at the news; he had long considered Altinius, as a man man in whom he could place no confidence, and was glad of this pretext to seize his riches, which were very great. But that he might appear to act rather from the motive of revenge than avarice, he sent for the wife and children of Altimus, and having put them to the torture, partly to discover the traitor's designs, but chiefly to learn what money he had left behind him, he ordered them to be burnt alive.

Y. R. 540.
Bef. Chr.
212.
239 Conf.

The Fabii opened the campaign with an assault upon Arpi, in which was a garrison of 5000 men. The Romans in a dark rainy night surprised and entered the place on the strongest side, where it was least guarded. Nevertheless the garrison, assisted by 3000 of the townsmen, whom, through suspicion of them, they placed in the front, made a stout defence. At length the citizens, and, after their example, 1000 Spaniards, went over to the Romans. The Spaniards, according to Livy, bargained that the rest of the garrison should have leave to depart in safety, which they accordingly did, and joined Hannibal at Salapia.

In the mean time 112 of the chief men of Capua having, under the pretext of pillaging the enemy's lands, got permission to leave the town, went to the Roman camp above Suessula, and yielded themselves to the Prætor Fulvius, upon a promise of being restored to their estates, when Capua should be reduced to the obedience of the Republic.

Nothing further of great moment happened in Italy this campaign. The Prætor Sempronius Tuditanus took Aternum by assault, and in it 7000 prisoners, and a good deal of money. Sempronius the Consul had several slight skirmishes with the enemy in Lucania, and reduced a few towns, but none of any note. Two petty nations of Bruttium returned to their former obedience. Hanno the Carthaginian defeated a Præfect of the Roman allies in that country, and cut off almost all his army, which consisted of raw undisciplined men. Hannibal marched from Salapia to Tarentum, in hopes of having that city betrayed to him. He spent the summer near it to very little purpose, only some inconsiderable towns of the Salentini revolted to him.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 47.
Liv. B. 25.
c. 1.

In Spain, the two Scipios not only made considerable progress there, but extended their views even to Africa. They engaged Syphax King of Masæsyliæ (the western part of Numidia) to take arms against Carthage: And Statcrius, one of the three officers, whom the Scipios had sent upon the negotiation, continued with the Numidian King at his request, to discipline his troops. On the other hand, the Carthaginians, alarmed at the motions of the Masæsylian, prevailed with Gala King of Masyliæ (the eastern part of Numidia, and the nearest to their territory) to join with them, to divert the threatened storm. Gala gave the command of his forces to his son Masiniſſa, a youth of about 17 years of age, who, in conjunction with the Carthaginian army, defeated Syphax in a great battle, and slew 30,000 of his men. The vanquished King retired into Mauritania, and made new levies there, intending to pass the streights, and join the Scipios in Spain: But Masiniſſa following him close,

Liv. B. 24.
c. 48.

Y. R. 440.
Bef. Chr.
212.
219 Cons.

Lib. B. 24.
c. 35.

kept him so employed in Africa, that he had not leisure to cross the seas.

In the mean while the blockade of Syracuse continued. Marcellus, not thinking all his forces necessary for that purpose, left two thirds of the army before the place under the command of Appius Claudius, and marched with the remainder, to reduce some towns of Sicily which had gone over to the Carthaginians. Pelorus and Erbessus surrendered to him, and Megara he took by force and plundered. About this time Himilco arrived from Africa, with an army of 25,000 foot, 3000 horse, and 12 elephants, and soon made himself master of Heraclea and Agri-gentum. Upon this news, Hippocrates left his brother Epiycles to command in Syracuse, and sallying out of the town with 10,000 foot and 500 horse, broke through the Roman lines in the night, and marched to join Himilco. This detachment Marcellus surprized, as they were pitching their camp near Arius, and he cut in pieces the infantry: But Hippocrates escaped with the cavalry, and, joining Himilco, turned against the Pro-Consul, in hopes of overtaking him before he could reach his camp at Syracuse. Disappointed in this expectation, and not daring to attack Marcellus in his entrenchments, the Carthaginian Generals employed their forces to reduce the Sicilian cities that were in the interest of Rome. Murgantia opened her gates to them, and betrayed the Roman garrison into their hands. L. Pinarus, the Governor of Enna, dreading the like fate, massacred all the inhabitants of that town, and pillaged it. Marcellus approved the fact, and granted the plunder of Enna to the soldiers of the garrison. The news of this barbarity, committed in a city held in great veneration all over the island, and sacred to Proserpine (whom Pluto was said to have carried off from that neighbourhood) alienated the minds of the Sicilians from Rome; and many of their towns embraced the party of the Carthaginians. Winter approaching, Marcellus, having dismissed Appius Claudius, who had a mind to stand for the Consulship, gave the command both of the fleet and the army before Syracuse to Quintilius Crippinus, and took up his own quarters about five miles from the town.

Lib. B. 25.
c. 1.

During these transactions in Sicily, all was peaceable at Rome: Only religion suffered by the introduction of foreign Gods and foreign rites, which the superstition of a multitude of people from the country, driven by poverty and fear to shelter themselves in Rome, had, in this uncertain state of things, made them prone to receive. Foreign priests and diviners had dispersed among them books, containing prophecies, forms of prayer, and particular methods of sacrificing. The ancient worship was almost forgot. It seemed, says Livy, as if a new set of Gods were, on a sudden, come into being; or that a new species of men was risen. The evil became at length so general, that the *Conscrip*t Fathers were forced to interpose. The Prætor having assembled the people, read to them a decree of the Senate, and, in conformity thereto, his own edict; which which commanded all persons, who had books of divination or prayers, or containing instructions about the rites of sacrifices, to bring them to him before the first of April; and forbade all persons to offer sacrifice in public, or in any sacred place whatsoever, according to any new or foreign ceremonies. Thus were the innovations suppressed, and religion settled again upon the ancient footing.

V. R. 540.
P. 1. 1. 1.
2. 1. 1.

C H A P. XXVII.

SEVENTH and EIGHTH YEARS of the War.

*The city of Tarentum betrayed to Hannibal. He besieges the citadel.
Capua besieged by the Romans.
Syracuse taken by Marcellus.
Hannibal marches into the neighbourhood of Rome; retires thence; defeats a Roman army; and marches to Rhegium.
Capua surrenders to the Romans.
They gain some advantages over King Philip in Greece.*

THE time for the elections drawing on, and the present Consuls being both engaged abroad in the war, one of them nominated C. Claudius Centho Dictator, to hold the Comitia. And there Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, were chosen Consuls for the new year. It was thought fit to add two legions to the twenty-one already on foot; a surprising multitude of soldiers, to be all raised out of the citizens of Rome, and exclusive of the troops of the allies, which were at least as numerous as the Roman legionaries! But the making these new levies was interrupted, and the departure of the Consuls delayed for some time, by an incident, which revived the hatred of the people to the publicans.

V. R. 541.
Bef. Chr.
211.
240 Cons.

It has been observed before, that the publicans undertook to supply the Roman armies in Spain with provisions; and the Senate had agreed to indemnify them, in case of losses at sea. Posthumius, an avaricious wretch, took advantage of this condition to practise rogueries, and impose upon the public. He placed to their account many shipwrecks which had never happened; he also put small quantities of goods of little value on board old shattered vessels; which, after he had brought off the seamen in boats ready for that purpose, he sunk; and then pretended the cargoes had been extremely rich. By this means he made his losses run very high, and demanded great sums in consideration of them. But his knavery was at length discovered, and two Tribunes of the people threatened to have him fined 200,000 asses of brass: in order to which they cited him to appear and take his trial before the Comitia by

Liv. B. 25.
C. 3.

645l. 16s.
8d. Arbutnot.

Y. R. 443.
Ecl. Crv.
211.
240. C. 10.

L. P.
25. C. 3.

Tribes. Hereupon the friends of the accused applied themselves to Servilius Cæcia, a relation of Posthumius, and one of the Tribunes: But Cæcia not daring, through shame and fear of the people, to protest against the proceedings of his colleagues, the publicans, who were all interested in the affair, had recourse to violence, and insulted both the people and their magistrates. And they were just ready to come to blows, when the Consul Fulvius said to the Tribunes of the commons, You see how little respect is shewn to your persons. If you do not dissolve the assembly, the affair will end in sedition; the Tribunes followed his advice; and, being afterwards authorised by the Senate, changed the nature of the process, and made the affair capital. Posthumius, and the other publicans who assisted him in the riot, were cited to appear as criminals before the Comitia by Centuries. Some were dragged to prison, for want of the sureties required of them; others went into a voluntary banishment; Posthumius left his bail and fled; and Rome was delivered from a gang of bold and avaricious villains.

Pol. B. 2.
C. 19.
L. V. B. 25.
C. 2.

In the end of the winter Hannibal had surprized Tarentum. The inhabitants of this place had long been disaffected to the Republic, and lately provoked by the cruel execution of some hostages, they had sent to Rome, and who had attempted to make their escape. Thirteen of the principal citizens entered into a plot to deliver up the city to the Carthaginian. Nico and Philomenus were at the head of them. They made hunting their pretence for night-excursions. The game they brought home, and with which they furnished the table of Livius, the commander of the Roman garrison, pleased him so much, that without the least suspicion he allowed them the liberty of going out and coming in at pleasure. By this means the conspirators had frequent conferences with Hannibal, and having engaged him to promise, That when he should become master of Tarentum, the inhabitants should enjoy their laws, liberties, and estates, without infringement; that they should not be subject to pay any tribute, or to receive a Carthaginian garrison, without their own consent; and that the effects of the Romans only should be given up as free booty to his troops, they undertook to bring him into the town. Hannibal was at the distance of three days march from Tarentum, and feigned himself sick in his camp, that his long stay there might not occasion suspicion. At length Philomenus gave him notice, that a favourable opportunity offered to put their project in execution. The Carthaginian came away with a detachment of 10,000 men, and concealed himself in a valley fifteen miles from the city. Hither Philomenus brought him word, that the next night the Roman Governor was to be at an entertainment, and would probably drink to excess; and that when he was fast asleep, it would be the proper time for the attempt.

Pol. B.
2. C. 24.

All preparations being made by the conspirators, both within and without the city, Hannibal, conducted by Philomenus, approached the walls about midnight. The Carthaginian, then giving a part of his forces forces to the Tarentine, silently drew near with the rest to the gate Temenides, and gave the appointed signal to Nico, who at the head of his party in the town, without much noise made himself master of the gate, slew the guard, and admitted the Carthaginians. The General, for the greater security in case of accidents, left 2000 horse without the gate, and advancing with the rest of his troops into the Forum, took possession of it. In the mean time, Philomenus had marched with 1000 Africans to another gate, at which he used to be admitted when he returned from hunting. He was followed by two young men carrying a wild boar of an enormous size, and when the wicket was opened, and the centinel upon guard stood examining the beast, Philomenus ran him through with a hunting spear. Then 30 Carthaginians entered in an instant, broke down the gate, and let in their companions, who, as had been agreed upon, joined Hannibal in the Forum. After this the general seized the principal posts in the town, sent parties of men into the different quarters, and with each of them several of the conspirators. His view in this was, that the inhabitants might be distinguished and preserved, while all the Romans were put to the sword. To draw these out the more effectually, some men, prepared on purpose, sounded a charge in the theatre with Roman trumpets, and after the Roman manner. The slaughter continued all that night and part of the next day; but Livius with his domestics, in the beginning of the tumult, escaped in a bark to the citadel, which was strongly fortified, and where all that remained of the garrison took refuge.

In order to secure the Tarentines against all attacks from the Romans, Hannibal proposed to cast up a rampart over-against the wall of the citadel, and as he knew the enemy would endeavour to hinder the work, he prepared to receive them. The rampart was no sooner begun, than the Romans made a vigorous sally. Hannibal defended himself but faintly till he observed that the greatest part of the garrison was got over their ditch: then falling furiously upon them, he drove them with such slaughter within their walls that they did not think proper to attack him a second time; and he had leisure to carry on his works. Besides the rampart abovementioned, he ordered a ditch to be drawn, and another rampart to be raised upon the brink of it, and within that a wall, so that the inhabitants might, without the assistance of the Carthaginians, easily defend their town against all attempts from the citadel. Having left a part of his troops to finish and guard the works, in conjunction with the Tarentines, he encamped with the rest of his army on the banks of the Eurotas (otherwise called Galefus) five miles from the city. When the fortifications were completed, he returned and besieged the citadel in form; but the garrison having received a reinforcement from Metapontus, a Roman city on the gulph of Tarentum, sallied out, burned his machines in the night, and made him lay aside the thoughts of reducing the place by assault.

However;

Y. R. 541.
Bef. Chr.
211.
240 Conf.

Y. R. 521.
Ecl. Cl.
211.
220 Cons.

However, it was necessary to secure the Tarentines a free passage to the sea, which was at present cut off by the citadel, that stood at the entrance of the port. No vessel could safely go out, or come in; and this made the Tarentines apprehend a scarcity of provisions. Hannibal, who was not to be discouraged by difficulties, formed a scheme which the ancients have much admired, to remedy this evil. There were a good number of ships in the haven of Tarentum; and he caused them to be transported to the sea by land, on carriages made for that purpose. These vessels anchored before the mouth of the haven; so that the citadel, which before commanded the sea, could now receive no provisions that way; and the city was supplied. After this, Hannibal returned to his winter quarters, leaving the citadel blocked up by sea and land.

L. E. 25.
C. 13.

The Consuls Fulvius and Appius, when their affairs at Rome were dispatched, took the field, and marched with joint forces into Samnium. As the Capuans expected to be besieged by them, and began already to feel the miseries of famine (for the Roman armies had not permitted them to sow their lands) they sent a deputation to Hannibal, then near Tarentum, to beg he would order them a supply of corn from the towns in their neighbourhood, while the roads were yet open. The Carthaginian sent Hanno with an army from Bruttium to their relief. Hanno having pitched his camp near Beneventum, gave notice to the Capuans, to send their waggons to fetch the corn, which he had collected for them in vast quantities. So indolent and lazy were these effeminate wretches, that they sent but four hundred carts, and a few mules. The Carthaginian could not forbear expressing his indignation at such intolerable negligence, and fixed a day when a greater number of carriages should come to remove the rest of the corn. In the mean time the Consuls had notice of what was doing, from the people of Beneventum; and Fulvius with his troops marched thither with all expedition. He entered the town in the night, and the next morning appeared by break of day before the enemy's camp, while Hanno was absent foraging with a part of his army. Two thousand Capuan carts were arrived there, and the carters and peasants mixing with the soldiers caused a good deal of disorder. Nevertheless, as the camp was situated upon an ascent, it was very difficult to take it by assault: The Roman soldiers signalized their bravery on this occasion, beyond the expectation of their General, who was for quitting the enterprize, or at least suspending it, till his colleague should come to his assistance. One Vibius, who commanded a cohort of the Peligni, and, after his example, Pedanius a Centurion of the third Roman legion, threw each a standard over the enemy's rampart, to excite the soldiers to recover them. The stratagem succeeded, the Carthaginian entrenchments were forced, and the slaughter was great. As for Hanno, having lost his camp, he was forced to return to Bruttium with the remainder of his army; and the Capuans sent a new deputation to Hannibal, to press him to come to their assistance, being now more

C. 14.

more than ever apprehensive of a siege. The Carthaginian answered, that he would take care of Capua; and for the present sent them 2000 horse to defend their territory from the enemy's incursions. He had still hopes of reducing the citadel of Tarentum by famine; but a convoy of provisions having forced its way through the Tarentine galleys, entered the place, and disappointed his expectations. His design upon Tarrium succeeded better. Hannö and Mago defeated the Prætor Atinius, who sallied out of the place; after which the inhabitants opened their gates to the conquerors. The Metapontines also, when left by the Roman garrison, which went to the relief of the citadel of Tarentum, submitted to the Carthaginians.

V. R. 541.
Ecl. Chr.
212.
240 C. 1. 6.

During these things, the Consuls entered the territory of Capua with a design to besiege the city in form; and believing undoubtedly, that Hannibal would come to its relief, they ordered Sempronius Gracchus to leave Lucania, and draw near to Capua, with his horse and light armed infantry, that they might be the better able to withstand the enemy's cavalry. Sempronius having left his legions under the command of Cn. Cornelius, his Quæstor, was preparing for his march, when one Flavius, a Lucanian, and hitherto zealous in the Roman interest, changed his inclinations on a sudden, and in order to recommend himself to the Carthaginians, betrayed the Pro-Consul to them. He pretended to Sempronius, that the heads of the Carthaginian faction in Lucania were disposed to a reconciliation with the Republic, and only desired a private conference with him. The Roman, not suspecting any deceit, suffered himself, attended only by his lictors and a troop of horse, to be led by the traitor into an ambush, where Mago with a body of Carthaginians surrounded them; and then Flavius went over to the enemy. The Pro-Consul, seeing himself betrayed, dismounted, and wrapping his left arm in his paludamentum, for want of a buckler, rushed sword in hand to the place where he saw Flavius, in hopes to kill the traitor before he fell himself; but he perished in the attempt, though the Carthaginians endeavoured to take him alive. The body of this brave Pro-Consul was carried to Hannibal's camp, who erected a funeral pile for him, and did honour to his memory.

Livy, B. 25,
c. 16.

While the Consuls were pillaging the country about Capua, Mago with his cavalry and some of the Capuans fell upon the Romans, of whom he slew 1500. Upon this news Hannibal advanced towards the city and offered battle to the enemy. Appius and Fulvius accepted the challenge, and the engagement was begun, to the disadvantage of the Romans, when Cn. Cornelius appeared with the Volones which had been commanded by Sempronius. Each side apprehending, that assistance was coming to the other, immediately sounded a retreat. The Consuls, to draw Hannibal from Capua, decamped in the night, divided their armies, and marched the one into Lucania and the other towards Cumæ. The Carthaginian next day set out for Lucania in pursuit of Appius, who had.

c. 18.

Y. R. 441.
 Def. Cbr.
 211.
 220 Cons.

had taken that road, but the latter, fetching a compass, returned by another way to the neighbourhood of Capua. There happened to be at this time in Lucania one M. Centenius Pennula, who by the credit of the Prætor Cornelius Scylla, and by promising great things, had obtained of the Senate the command of a body of 8000 men, which he had increased to near double that number. Hannibal, missing the Consul Appius, turned his arms against Centenius, entirely defeated him, and cut off almost all his whole army. The Carthaginian then marched into Apulia, and attacked the Prætor Fulvius, who commanded 18,000 men in that country. The victory was complete, 16,000 of the Romans being slain, and their camp taken. And to add to the misfortunes of the present campaign, the Volones disbanded themselves. Notwithstanding these discouragements the Consuls were busy at Casilinum, preparing all things necessary for the siege of Capua. They sent for the Prætor Claudius Nero, with the forces he commanded at Suessula; and the three Generals with their united armies besieged Capua in form.

Liv. B. 26.
 4. 23. & seq.

During this siege, Marcellus made himself master of Syracuse. He took the opportunity of a festival, when the soldiers and citizens had drunk plentifully, to make a detachment scale the walls of Tyche, in that part of it which was nearest to Epipolæ, and which was ill guarded*. He presently after possessed himself of Epipolæ; whereupon the inhabitants of Neapolis, as well as Tyche, sent deputies to him, and submitted. Marcellus granted life and liberty to all of free condition, but gave up those quarters of the city to be plundered.

Notwithstanding this, there was a great deal yet to do. Acbradina and Ortygia, which were strongly fortified, still held out; Hippocrates and Himilco arrived with their troops to the relief of the besieged; and the Romans were forced to exert all their bravery and skill to maintain the advantages they had gained.

But now a plague made terrible havock in both armies. At the first breaking out of the pestilence, the Sicilians, who served under Hippocrates and Himilco, disbanded themselves, and returned to their respective homes; but all the Carthaginian soldiers perished, together with those two Generals. The Romans suffered less by the infection, because, having been a long time before Syracuse, they were seasoned to the air and water of the country.

About this time Bomilcar arrived on the coast of Sicily from Carthage with a fleet of 130 galleys and 700 ships of burthen, but was long hindered by contrary winds from doubling the cape of Pachynum. Epicides, fearing the Carthaginian might sail back to Africa, left the command of Acbradina to the Generals of the mercenaries, and went to Bomilcar, in order to persuade him to fight the Roman fleet. The Admiral would not engage, but sailed away to Tarentum with all his gallies, ordering his ships of burden to return to Africa. Epycides, thus frustrated of his hopes, and knowing himself unable to defend a city already half taken, retired to Agrigentum; whereupon the Syracusians massacred the commanders appointed by him, chose new Prætors to govern in the town, and sent deputies to Marcellus to treat of peace. In the mean time the deserters, fearing to be given up to the vengeance of the Romans, persuaded the mercenaries that they also would have the same fate. Instantly the soldiers ran to arms, put to death the new Prætors, together with many of the Syracusians, and plundered part of the city. After this slaughter, they chose six Generals, three to command in Acradina, and three in Ortygia. Upon the return of the deputies from Marcellus, the mercenaries finding that their case was different from that of the deserters, and that there was no design against their lives, became perfectly satisfied, and the negotiation went on. During the course of the treaty, Marcellus found means to corrupt Mericus, a Spaniard, one of the six Generals chosen by the soldiers, and engaged him to admit the Romans into that part of the city where he commanded. Mericus, the better to accomplish this design, feigned an extraordinary zeal for the preservation of the place; pretended not to like, that deputies should have leave to go out and in at pleasure; and proposed, that for the greater security of the town, each General should have a distinct quarter assigned him, and be responsible for any neglect of duty in it. The motion was agreed to, and, upon the division, that district of Ortygia, which extended from the fountain of Arethusa to the mouth of the great port, fell to his care. Marcellus, informed of what was done, took his measures accordingly. He sent a body of troops to that side where Mericus commanded, and the Spaniard admitted them at the gate of Arethusa. At the same time the Pro-consul ordered a false attack to be made on Acradina, which drawing almost all the soldiers of the garrison thither, Ortygia was in a manner left defenceless. Foreseeing this, he had detached another party of soldiers to take advantage of it. These entered Ortygia almost without fighting; upon which the deserters made their escape, the Romans giving them way; and the Syracusians in Acradina, thus delivered from the fear of the deserters, immediately opened their gates to Marcellus, who thereby became master of the whole city.

* Though this account be taken from cellus into Syracuse by night. Liv. B. 26. Livy, yet he afterward tells us, in two or c. 21, 30 and 31. three places, that Sofus a Brasier let Mar-

And now the conqueror, who is said to have wept, during the siege, with compassion for the inhabitants, gave up both Ortygia, and Acradina, to be plundered by his army, after he had secured the late king's treasures for the use of his Republic, and the statues, paintings, and principal ornaments of Syracuse to illustrate his triumph. The soldiers had orders to spare the lives of the citizens; but they were cruel in their avarice, slew many of them, and, among the rest, the incomparable Archimedes.

Y. R. 427.
E. C. 211.
220 C. 211.

3. M. 211.
4. 211.

He was very intent on a demonstration in geometry, and calmly drawing his lines, when a soldier entered the room and clapped a sword to his throat. "Hold!" said Archimedes, one moment, and my demonstration "will be finished." But the soldier, equally regardless of his prayer and his demonstration, killed him instantly. There are different accounts of the manner of his death; but all agree, that Archimedes regretted it extremely, and shewed singular favour to his relations for his sake.

Y. R. 428.
E. C. 212.
220 C. 212.

The consular year being ready to expire, the Senate ordered, that one of the Consuls should come from Capua to hold the comitia for the consular elections. M. Claudius repaired to Rome, and presided in the assembly, which transferred the places to P. Valerius Galba, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. Spain was to be their province; while the late Consuls were in quality of Pro-Consuls to continue the siege of Capua. But as these proposed to reduce the place rather by famine than force, they turned the siege into a blockade.

Y. R. 429.
E. C. 213.
220 C. 213.

At Rome, Cn. Fulvius, the late Prætor, was called to account for the defeat he had suffered in Spain. One of the Tribunes of the people cited him to appear before the comitia, purposing only to get him fined for his cowardice and ill-conduct. When the witnesses came to be examined, the charge appeared so heavy, that all the people cried out, The prætor's eagle to be made capital; and a day was appointed for the trial. Fulvius sent to his brother, the Pro-Consul before Capua, urging him to come to Rome and employ all his credit to avert the impending storm. The Pro-Consul would willingly have complied; but the tribunes thinking it a case wherein the publick interest was greatly concerned, absolutely refused him leave to come: so that the accused, having no hope, went into exile without waiting for his sentence; and the comitia, after his departure, condemned him to banishment.

t. 4

Y. R. 430.
E. C. 214.

In the mean time the Capuans, greatly distressed for want of provisions, sent a messenger to acquaint Hannibal with their present situation. A Numidian horseman had the address to pass undiscovered through the Romans in the night, and carried the message to the Carthaginian General. Upon this advice, leaving the greatest part of his baggage behind him, he marched away with all expedition, arrived before Capua, and pitched his camp near the Roman entrenchments. At first he endeavoured by skirmishes to provoke the enemy to a battle, but this not succeeding, he almost beleagued them in their camp, frequently assailing it with bodies of infantry, which relieved one another, while his troops of horse covered them, and threw darts upon the enemy. In his attempts to draw the Romans to a battle, or to break into the town, proved ineffectual: nor was it possible for him to stay long in the neighbourhood of Capua for want of forage; because the enemy, foreseeing his coming, had ruined the country all around. Add to this, that there being several armies in the field against him, he

he feared lest they should join and attack him, or cut off his provisions, and so reduce him to extremities. Convinced that it was impracticable to raise the siege by force, he formed a design, much extolled by the ancient writers. He resolved to leave his camp silently, march with all expedition, and appear before the walls of Rome. By this means, he hoped the alarm of the citizens might produce some accident in his favour, perhaps might give him an opportunity of surprizing the town: If that should not happen, the Pro-Consuls, he thought, would either quit the blockade of Capua, or at least divide their army, and send a part of it to the defence of the capital. In this last case he did not doubt but he should have an easy victory, both over those that staid before Capua, and those that marched away. Before he put this scheme in execution, he took care to acquaint the besieged with his intention, lest upon his departure they should in despair surrender the town. Every thing being ready for his expedition, he set out in the night, and, to deceive the enemy, left fires burning in his camp. Having marched through Scamium, he crossed the Anio, and pitched his camp within five miles of Rome, designing to attack the city next day, if practicable. The Romans, terrified at his approach, for he had never been so near their walls before, at first imagined he had made his way thither by the slaughter of their army at Capua. Their fears however did not lessen their resolution; and it happened luckily for them that the Consuls had already raised one legion, which was to rendezvous at Rome that very day, and had also called together the citizens in order to select from amongst them another legion: By which means there was very reasonably a great concourse of men in the town. Sulpicius and Laetius, the Consuls, marched out with an army, and encamped before the walls. Hannibal seeing the Romans prepared to make a stout defence, lost all hopes of being able to take the town^a, and therefore fell to pillaging the country. The Consuls boldly advanced, and encamped within ten furlongs of him. The Carthaginian, to secure his booty and execute the remaining part of his scheme, decamped in the night, and passed the Anio at a ford, the bridges being all broken down. In his passage he was attacked by the Romans, and though the Numidians, and the rest of his cavalry, covered his retreat, so that he suffered no great loss, yet the enemy regained a part of the spoil, and took about three hundred prisoners. Sulpicius and Laetius, thinking that Hannibal fled before them, followed him, but kept to the hills, for fear of a surprize. He, on the other hand, marched at first in great haste, to intercept any forces, that, on occasion of his march to Rome, might have been sent from Capua, or in their absence to attack the Roman entrenchments before that city.

^a Livy says, that when Hannibal was before the walls of Rome, the ground on which his camp stood was sold at the full price; which so provoked the Carthaginians, that he put up to sale the bankers shops that were round the Roman Forum. The account which the Latin historian gives of this expedition differs in many particulars from that of Polybius, which is followed in the text.

Y. P. 542.
 Sc. C. 27.
 216.
 271 C. 27.

Finding that none of the besiegers had stirred, he turned against the Consuls that were pursuing him, fell upon their camp in the night, and took it with great slaughter. Next morning he saw those that had escaped posted upon a hill, which was very difficult of access; and he would not lose time in attacking them, having formed a project of greater moment. Despairing to raise the siege of Capua, he hoped to surprize Rhegium. And though it was situated in the remotest corner of Italy, he marched with such rapidity through Apulia, Lucania, and Bruttium, and appeared so unexpectedly before the place, that he took prisoners many of the inhabitants who were walking securely without the walls; and was very near getting possession of the town.

L. 3. 26.
 217.

Hannibal's departure left Capua without hope of relief. The Pro-Consuls signified to the inhabitants, that they would spare the lives of all those of them who would repair to the Roman camp; but not one Capuan accepted the offer. The commanders of the Carthaginian garrison wrote letters to Hannibal full of reproaches, and pressing him not to abandon them to the cruelty of the Romans. These letters were committed to the care of some Numidians, who pretended to desert, and then sought an opportunity to escape to Rhegium. One of them being followed to the Roman camp by his mistress, to whom he had disclosed the secret, she betrayed it; and above seventy of the Numidians were seized, whipped, had their hands cut off, and were driven back to Capua.

The sight of these maimed wretches threw the city into the utmost consternation. The people forced the chief of the Senators, who had for some time withdrawn themselves from public affairs, to assemble with the rest in the Senate-house; where the greatest part were for sending a deputation to the Pro-Consuls to capitulate: But Vibius Virius, one of the authors of the revolt, opposed this motion, and made a speech, the whole strain of which was rage and despair. Having represented the implacable hatred of the Romans to Capua, and exposed the folly of hoping for any favour from them, he thus concluded. Death is our only refuge. I have prepared an entertainment at my house. When we have finished our repast, a cup shall go round, that will end our days and our misfortunes together. Let all those who are weary of life, or despise it, or despair of preserving it, follow me. Funeral piles are already prepared to burn our bodies. A glorious death will gain us esteem from our enemies; and the persidious Hannibal will lament the loss of allies, who did not deserve to be thus deserted and betrayed. Twenty-seven of the assembly followed Virius, accepted the entertainment to which they were invited, and closed all with a cup of poison.

As to the terms of the treaty, which the rest of the Capuans made with the Romans, we can only guess at them by what followed. As soon as the latter were in possession of the place, they seized the soldiers of the garrison and the Capuan Senators. These they conveyed to their camp to be tried by the Pro-Consuls. They were first made to discover all their treasures, which amounted to seventy pounds weight of gold, and three thousand two hundred pounds weight of silver; and then fifty-three of them were sent in custody to two Roman cities in separate companies; and it was resolved to determine their fate before any thing was decreed concerning the rest of the inhabitants. Appius inclined to clemency, Fulvius to severity; and the dispute grew warm between them. The former, to put an end to it, wrote to the Senate, and referred the matter to them; but his colleague, without waiting for the Senate's decree, went with two thousand horse, first to Teanum, whither twenty-eight of the Capuan Senators had been transported, and he caused them to be beaten with rods, and then beheaded by the Lictors. Thence he hastened to Cales, and treated with the same rigour the twenty-five Senators who had been conveyed thither, though he might well have spared them, having just before the execution received letters from Rome, with orders to suspend it; but he put the letters in his bosom, and would not read them till all was over. Nor did the Republic ever blame him for this instance of severity, being doubtless pleased to have revenge, without incurring the odium of inhumanity among her allies. This charge fell only upon Fulvius.

Y. R. 542.
P. C. Chr.
210.
241 Conf

And the impression of this Pro-Consul's cruelty became yet stronger in the minds of the people, by the following incident. One Jubellius Taurea, a man, among his own party, reputed brave, had come from Capua, and had been present at the late massacre of the Senators. Pierced with compassion, and full of indignation, he thus addressed himself to the Pro-Consul, just as he was going to dismiss the assembly: Stay one moment, Fulvius, and command me to be murdered; and then thou mayest boast of having killed a braver man than thyself. Fulvius (who had published the Senate's decree) replied, You come too late to be punished, and are mad with rage. What! said Jubellius, have I lived to see my country reduced to slavery? Have I stabbed my wife and children to preserve them from insults and dishonour; and when I am come hither, to have my blood mixed with that of my friends and countrymen, do my enemies, after all, deny me death? My own arm shall put an end to this hated life: As he ended these words he stabbed himself with a dagger he had brought under his robe, and fell dead at the foot of the Tribunal.

Liv. B. 26
c. 15.

In Greece, the Pro-Prætor Laevinus had, in order to keep Philip of Macedon employed at home, endeavoured (with the approbation of the Senate) to draw some of the Greek States into the interest of Rome. He began with the Ætolians, who were much discontented, because Acarnania had been by Philip dismembered from the body of their state, and he assured them that he would reduce it again under its antient government and jurisdiction. These promises of the Roman General, were confirmed to the people by Scopas their chief magistrate, and by Dorimachus a noble Ætolian, who with less modesty,

c. 24.

N. R. 422.
E. C. 11.
112.
113.

P. 113.
114.

modesty, and stronger asseverations, magnified the grandeur, power, and majesty of the people of Rome. The main motive however with the Ætolians was the hope of recovering Acarnania. Articles were therefore drawn up and agreed to, expressing the conditions on which these Grecians entered into an alliance with the Romans; and a clause was added, That the Eleans, the Lacedæmonians, Attalus, King of Pergamus in Asia Minor, Pleuratus, a King of Thrace, or perhaps of a part of Illyricum, Scerdilædus, King of the east part of the last mentioned country, should if they pleased be comprised and included in the treaty. Polæmus tells us, that the Ætolians sent ambassadors to these several States and Princes, to solicit them to join in a confederacy against Philip; and he has transmitted to us the speeches made in the Senate of Lacedæmon, by Columas an Ætolian, and Lyctas an Acarnanian, two orators, the first an advocate for the Ætolians, the second for Philip. Columas's harangue consisted chiefly of invectives, displaying the tyranny, oppression, and usurpations exercised in Greece by the Kings of Macedonia, from the time of Philip the father of Alexander, to the present King; and in the close of his speech he urged the Ætolians and Lacedæmonians would find in joining themselves with a powerful confederacy as that formed against Philip. Lyctas on the other hand endeavored to clear the Macedonian Kings from the charge brought against them; mentioned several of their laudable actions; loaded the Ætolians with the guilt of many violences, outrages, and sacrilegious abominations; and in conclusion represents the danger of making alliances with Barbarians, that these dependents of the Ætolians would become their conquerors, and, in time, of all Greece. These apprehensions were not unreasonable; but the Lacedæmonians did not at this time look so far forward: it seemed instant for them at present, to come into the alliance proposed by the Ætolians; and they declared for that side.

The articles of confederacy between the Ætolians and Romans ran thus. *The Ætolians shall permit their enter into a war with King Philip of Macedon, and the Romans shall assist them by sea with a fleet of twenty gallies, and by land with a force of twenty thousand men, as to the cities that shall be conquered between the coasts of Ætolia and Corcyra shall, as to the wells, herds, and lands belonging to them, be possessed by the Ætolians; but the Romans shall have the more advantage and plunder. The Romans shall use their endeavours that the Ætolians may recover Acarnania. If at any time the Ætolians make a peace with Philip, they shall insert a clause, that the same shall be of no force until such time as Philip shall have withdrawn his force employed against the Romans, or any of their allies. And on the same manner if the Romans make with the Macedonian King, they shall make the like provision for the security of the Ætolians and their allies. Though these articles were not signed till two years after, the confederates immediately began hostilities against Philip. Lyctas took the island of Zagyrus, and also two cities of Acarnania, which he reduced under the dominion of the Ætolians; and having thus* thus kindled a war in Greece against the King, and found him sufficient employment at home, to hinder his assisting the Carthaginians, he retired with his fleet to Corcyra, and there wintered.

Y. R. 52.
Ber. Chr.
210.
241 C. nt.

The news, that the Ætolians were in motion, was brought to Philip as he lay in his winter quarters at Pella. Resolving to invade Greece in the spring, he first turned his arms against Illyricum, that by the desolation and destruction he should cause there, he might intimidate the rest of his neighbours from attacking Macedon in his absence. From thence he marched his troops into Thrace against the Mædi. In the mean time the Ætolian army entered Acarnania, where they found that the people of the country were come to the most desperate resolutions for their defence: For, sending away their wives and children, and all who were above sixty years old, into Epirus, the rest engaged themselves by a solemn oath never to return from the field but with victory: And they laid the heaviest curses on those of their own nation, who should harbour or relieve any who were vanquished and fled. These desperate measures, together with the approach of Philip, whom the Acarnanians had earnestly pressed to come from Thrace to their assistance, so terrified the Ætolians, that they retired into their own territories, and there continued quiet, till Leænus, coming in the spring with his fleet to Naupactus, put them again in motion. In conjunction with the Pro-Prætor, they besieged Anticyra, (a city of the Locrenses, in the neighbourhood of Attila) by sea and land, and reduced it. But Leænus, after this, by reason of a dangerous sickness, was obliged to continue there a great while unactive.

Winter now approached, and Marcellus returned from Sicily to Rome, for the first time since the taking of Syracuse. He demanded a triumph at his arrival: But having, pursuant to orders, left his army in Sicily, and it not being the custom for Generals to triumph when their army was not present to give testimony to their exploits, he was granted only an ovation by the Senate. To do himself justice therefore in the best manner he could, he decreed himself a triumph on The Hill of Alba, for which there were some precedents in such cases. Next day he had a very magnificent ovation. A plan of Syracuse, statues and paintings of an exquisite taste, costly vases, and immense quantities of gold, silver, and brass, were carried on biers before him. Eight elephants, and all sorts of military engines, used in sieges, made a part of the show. It was at this time that Marcellus introduced among the Romans a refined taste for paintings, and sculptures; which made some of the old Romans uneasy. They feared it would gradually destroy the people's love of husbandry and war, and would be a means to soften and enervate them.

Liv. B. 26.
C. 21.

Plot. life
of Marcellus.
Author of the lives of illutrious
men.

C H A P. XXVIII.

The NINTH YEAR of the War.

Marcellus's conduct complained of before the Senate, by the Sicilians.

Fulvius accused of cruelty by the Capuans. The fate of their city is determined.

The fortune of the campaign in Italy various.

The reduction of Sicily completed.

T. R. 223.
B.C. 212.
242 C. 212.

L. V. B. 26.
C. 22.

THE time for electing new magistrates drawing on, Fulvius Centumalus was recalled to Rome, to preside in the Comitia. The first Century that voted, named T. Manlius Torquatus, and T. Otacilius, for Consuls. It was not doubted but the rest of the Centuries would join in the nomination; and a multitude of people flocked round Manlius, to congratulate him upon his election. But he approaching the Consul's tribunal, begged that he would call back the Century that had just given their votes, and allow him to speak a few words. While all were in expectation of what he would ask, he excused himself, on account of a weakness in his eyes, from accepting the dignity offered him. "A man, said he, must be very shameless to desire to be a pilot or a general, and to have the lives and fortunes of multitudes committed to his care, when he knows that in every thing he does, he must make use of other men's eyes." He therefore entreated the president of the assembly to order the prerogative Century to give their votes anew, and desired of them, that in their choice they would have regard to the circumstances of the Republic, remember that the war was still in Italy, and that Rome was scarce recovered from the terror caused by the late insult of the enemy at her gates. Notwithstanding this remonstrance, the Century, with repeated cries, insisted upon the choice they had made. "No, said Manlius, neither can I bear your manners, nor you my government. Return into the voting place, and consider that Carthage is making war in Italy, and that Hannibal is her General." The Century finding these words applauded by all who stood round Manlius, and having a real respect for him, made no longer any difficulty to comply with his desire; and Marcellus the fourth time, and Levinus the second time, were raised to the consular dignity.

Levinus was still lying sick at Anticyra in Greece. Marcellus entered upon his office on the Ides of March, and according to custom assembled the Senate that day, but declared he would bring no matters relating to the Republic before the Fathers till the arrival of his colleague. He complained that there were numbers of Syracusians in Rome, who spread reports reports about the city to his disadvantage; that M. Cornelius Cethegus, the Prætor of Sicily, had not only sent over many of these to accuse him, but had also asserted in his letters, that the war was far from being finished in the island [no untruth, as will appear by and by] that he might have the greater glory, in putting an end to it. The Consul added, that he himself would immediately give his enemies an opportunity of laying their accusations before the Senate, were it not that he understood, they affected to be afraid of accusing him in the absence of his colleague; and that, as soon as Lævinus should arrive, he would take care they should be heard.

V. R. 543.
Bef. Chr.
209.
242d Conf.

As Lævinus passed through Campania, in his return to Rome, the inhabitants of that country crowded about him, and implored his protection against the tyranny and cruelty of the Pro-Consul Fulvius Flaccus. Lævinus ordered them to follow him to Rome; which when he drew near, the company of Sicilians, who were to accuse Marcellus, joined him likewise; and he suffered them to enter the city with him. However, before he procured them an audience from the Senate, he gave the Censorial Fathers an account of his own conduct, and the state of affairs in Greece. And the next thing to be done, was to assign the Consuls, and the rest of the Generals of the Roman armies, their respective provinces, for the ensuing campaign. Italy fell by lot to Lævinus, and Sicily to Marcellus. This was no sooner declared, than the Sicilians, who were present at the ceremony, made a horrible outcry, and expressed as much terror and consternation as they had done at Syracuse when Marcellus surprized it. They dressed themselves in mourning, ran to the houses of the Senators, and there declared, they would never return home, rather than be again subject to Marcellus: And that it would be better for Sicily to perish in the flames of Ætna, than to be given up as a prey to her implacable enemy. The affair was mentioned in the Senate, and the Consuls were asked to consult the Fathers about an exchange of provinces. Marcellus answered, that, had the Sicilians been already heard, perhaps he should not think that motion so equitable; but now, lest it should be said, that fear restrained them from accusing a man who must shortly be their Governor, he was very willing to exchange provinces with his colleague, provided he agreed to it; but begged the Senate would not give him the mortification of interposing a judgment of theirs in the matter; for, said he, if it would have been unjust to give my colleague his option, without casting lots, how much more unjust, nay, what an indignity would it be to me, to transfer my lot to him? The Senate did not interpose their authority, and the exchange was made by the Consuls themselves. Then the Sicilians were admitted to bring their complaints against Marcellus. Their accusation turned upon his pretended cruelty at Leontini, his having sacked Syracuse, and his having stripped the citizens of every thing, though

Liv. B. 26.
c. 27.

Fast. Cap.
Livy, B. 26.
c. 28.

Y. R. 443.
L. C. 11.

1. 1. 1. 1.

1. 1. 1. 1.

1. 1. 1. 1.

1. 1. 1. 1.

As the accusers protested it had been by compulsion, that the Syracusans had sided with the Carthaginians; and they prayed, that what had been taken from them, and could be recovered, might be restored.

When the accusers had done speaking, Marcellus left the Comitia, and went to the place where persons accused were wont to make their defence. He laid before the house the matters of fact (as they have been related), and then withdrew, to give the Senators more freedom in their debates. A great many of the Fathers, and among the rest T. Manius Torquatus, were of opinion, that the war ought to be considered as having been carried on against the tyrants Hippocrates and Agathocles, equally the enemies of the Romans and Syracusans. After a long debate, the majority voted the proceedings of Marcellus to have been regular; but added to their decree, that the Senate would take care of the Syracusans, and recommended it to the Consul Lævinus, to consult their interest, as far as it was consistent with that of the Republic.

When the Citizens, being called in, had heard the decree read, they threw themselves at the feet of Marcellus, and begged he would forgive whatever, with a view to set forth their miseries and move compassion, they had said against him; and would receive them into his protection. The Consul granted their request; and, in gratitude to him, the people of Syracuse ordered, that whenever he or any of his family set foot in Sicily, the people should crown themselves with garlands, and celebrate the day with sacrifices; and Syracuse was, ever after, under the patronage of the Marcelli.

L. C. 11.
1. 1. 1. 1.

The cause of the Campanians came on next. Their pleading consisted wholly of a pathetic representation of their miseries. When they had finished their complaint, they were ordered to withdraw. And then M. Attilius Regulus, who had served in the army at the taking of Capua, was examined, as to the facts. This Senator could say little to the advantage of the Capuans; but he moved that the Senate might not determine the affair, till it had obtained the consent of the Tribes; because the Capuans, being Roman citizens, could not legally be judged by the Senate, without the approbation of the people. Accordingly, a Tribune of the commons was desired to summon the Comitia by tribes; and request them, to empower the Senate to pronounce sentence on the Capuans. He complied. The Comitia answered in that authoritative stile which shewed their sovereignty: What the majority of the Senate now sitting, after being sworn, shall determine, that we will and command. The Senate, thus authorised, pronounced judgment: and when the sentence came to be executed, Campania was stripped of all the monuments of its grandeur; Capua was no longer a city; it had neither Senate, Comitia, nor Magistrates of its own; Rome sent a Præfect thither annually, to preserve order in the place, and to hear causes. Its former slothful stethful and effeminate inhabitants were transplanted elsewhere, and succeeded by Roman colonies of laborious and industrious husbandmen.

And now the Consuls applied themselves wholly to the preparations for the approaching campaign. As the navy wanted great repairs, and the public treasury was exhausted, they published an edict, ordering every man, according to his census, to furnish pay and provisions for thirty days to a certain number of sailors and rowers, agreeably to a precedent on the like occasion. This falling heavy on the poorer citizens, already drained by taxes, since Hannibal's invasion, it had like to have caused an insurrection. The people threatened to do themselves justice, if the edict was not revoked in three days. In that time the Consuls, to make matters easy, proposed in the Senate a method which gained them great applause. They moved, that all the dignified persons in the state, and the Senators, should give a good example of zeal for the Republic, by voluntarily carrying into the treasury their superfluous gold, silver, and brass. All present approved the motion; and the Knights and common citizens so readily followed the example of the Consuls and Senators, that there was an emulation who should first enter their names in the register of the contributors. Thus were the Roman fleets recruited; and Rome put into a condition to support the war on all sides.

When Marcellus and Lævinus set out for their provinces, there were in the town of Scapia in Apulia two men of great authority, Dafus and Blafus; the latter was in the Roman interest, and had entered into a negotiation with the Consul to betray the town to him. As this could not be done without Dafus's consent, the traitor ventured to open his mind to him, and solicit his assistance, though he knew him to be a zealous Hannibalist. Dafus immediately informed the Carthaginian of the affair, who thereupon cited both to appear before him. But the accuser not being able to bring any proof to support his charge, Hannibal imagined the accusation to have proceeded entirely from jealousy and hatred; and would take no farther cognizance of it. After this, Blafus gained over his colleague, and they took measures together for the surrendry of the place. Marcellus on a sudden appeared before it, and was admitted into the town; and then the Carthaginian garrison, which consisted of 500 brave Numidian horse, finding themselves betrayed, resolved to sell their lives dear. They quitted their horses, which were of no use to them, and fought on foot, till they were all killed except fifty, who yielded themselves prisoners. This, if we may credit Livy, was so great a loss to Hannibal, that in all the battles he afterwards fought in Italy, his cavalry never gained the superiority over the enemy, as in former engagements.

The Carthaginian had still hopes of taking the citadel of Tarentum, which he kept blocked up. On the other hand, the Romans sent a squadron of ships to supply the garrison with provisions: But this fleet,

Y. R. 445.
Bel. Car.
209.
243d Cons.

before it could enter the port, being obliged to come to an engagement with the Tarentine fleet, was utterly defeated, and the Admiral of it killed in the action.

Plut. Life of Marcellus.
Liv. B. 27.
c. 1.

Marcellus took two more cities in Sannium, and in them about 3000 Carthaginian prisoners, together with a great quantity of grain. Fulvius Centumalus, who commanded as Pro-Consul in Apulia, being ambitious of imitating the Consul, without his abilities, drew near to a city called Herdonea, in hopes to reduce it by force, or by treaty, but was surprized by Hannibal; and though the Romans behaved themselves bravely, they were totally defeated, their camp taken, and the General, with eleven Legionary Tribunes, slain in the engagement.

Plut. Life of Marcellus.
Liv. B. 27.
c. 2.

So complete a victory recovered the affairs and credit of Hannibal for some time, and greatly discouraged the people at Rome, whose only hopes were now in Marcellus. This Consul, knowing how much the people were terrified, wrote to the Senate, in these terms. I am the same man that I was after the battle of Cannæ. I am going to meet the same conqueror, and have reason to expect the same success. The joy that now swells the mind of the Carthaginian will not be of long duration. He then marched towards Hannibal, and came up with him near Numistro, in Bruttium. The Carthaginian did not decline a battle. The engagement was bloody; and the night alone put an end to it. At sunrise Marcellus offered him battle again; but Hannibal would not accept the challenge. He decamped; and the Consul followed him from place to place. So that these two great Generals spent the rest of the campaign, the one in seeking for an opportunity to come to a general action, the other in endeavouring to avoid it, and to draw his enemy into an ambush.

• 3.

In the mean time Fulvius Flaccus was busy in managing the affairs of the Republic in Campania. And the Senate ordered a great quantity of corn to be bought up in Ettruria, and carried to the citadel of Tarentum. Two thousand men were likewise commanded to the relief of the garrison; and this convoy had a happier passage thither than the last.

From the Consul Lælius the Senate received news of the total reduction of Sicily. Agrirentum had long held out for the Carthaginians. Hanno had commanded there a numerous garrison; but having through jealousy disobliged, and even broke, a brave Numidian officer, named Mutines, much esteemed among his countrymen, and who having been sent by Hannibal into Sicily, to supply the place of Hippocrates, had done the Carthaginians signal service in that island, the proud African could not brook the affront. To revenge himself, he entered into a correspondence with the Consul; and having engaged a body of the Numidians in the conspiracy, they opened one of the gates to the Roman troops. Hanno, with Epides, and a few more officers, escaped in a small vessel; but the rest of the garrison were all cut in pieces. After this, twenty towns were betrayed into the hands of the Romans, six taken by force, and the rest, rest, to the number of forty, surrendered voluntarily. Lævinus, having settled all affairs in the island, (which from this time became the granary of Rome) received an order from the Senate, to return home, to hold the Comitia by centuries: For though Marcellus was nearer, it was dangerous to interrupt his pursuit of Hannibal. However, Lævinus was hardly arrived, when he found himself obliged to go back again, to take care of his province, an express coming from Valerius Messala (who commanded a fleet in Sicily, and had been ravaging the coast of Africa) with an account, that the Carthaginians were preparing a naval armament, to re-conquer Sicily.

Y. R. 543.
Bef. Chr.
200.
2423 Conf.
Liv. B. 22.
c. 4.

The Senate hastened the departure of Lævinus, and ordered him to name a Dictator to hold the Comitia for the new elections. The Consul did not refuse to obey; but that he might continue the longer in the supreme dignity, insisted upon deferring the nomination till he should arrive in Sicily; and he promised that he would then name Messala. But it being contrary to antient custom, for a Dictator to be named elsewhere than in Italy, the Conscrip Fathers passed a decree, requiring Lævinus before he left the city to petition the people to recommend a proper person for the Dictatorship, and enjoining the Consul to name that person; and the decree provided also, that in case the Consul refused to petition, as before mentioned, the Prætor of Rome should do it; and if he likewise refused, the Tribunes of the Commons should bring the matter before the Comitia. Lævinus was obstinate, and forbade the Prætor to offer any petition to the people. Upon this the Tribunes assembled them; and it was determined, that Q. Fulvius Flaccus, then at Capua, should be nominated Dictator. But Lævinus, the night before the holding of the Comitia, had set out for Sicily, so that the Fathers were obliged to write to Marcellus to name the Dictator the people had recommended. Q. Fulvius, being thus raised to the Dictatorship, named P. Licinius Crassus, the Pontifex Maximus, to be his General of horse.

C H A P. XXIX.

TENTH YEAR of the War.

Some of the Roman colonies refuse to contribute to the expences of the war.

Marcellus is vanquished by Hannibal; - but the day following gains a victory over him. Fabius Cunctator gets possession of Tarentum.

THE Dictator Fulvius, having artfully carried on his intrigues to promote his own election to the Consulship, called together the Comitia, and was there named Consul, with Fabius Maximus Cunctator, by

c. 6.

by the first Century which was, and the rest of the Centuries followed adhered to the same custom. But two of the Tribunes, in opposition, thought, That it was not expedient to allow a Consul the privilege of being present and voting in the Assemblies of the Comitia to elect Consuls, as the Tribunes were forbidden to do so, and they declared, that they would oppose the election if the Dictator did not curb their intemperance. Paculus however settled the proceedings of the Comitia by a Law made just after the battle of Clusium, allowing the people to choose the same men to the consulship as often as they pleased, while the war should last in Italy; and by the examples of Publius Valerius, and Publius Albius, who at different times being Presidents of the Comitia, had been elected Consul by the assemblies in which they presided. After some time spent in these disputes, it was at length agreed, that the matter should be referred to the Senate. The Conscript Fathers, pleased with the choice that had been made of two such able Generals, declared, that neither the Dictatorship, nor Presidentship of Paculus disqualified him for being chosen Consul.

It was necessary at this time to raise recruits, and to send some forces into Italy in the place of two legions drawn from thence to serve in Italy; but this affair had like to have occasioned a rebellion. The Latins and allies of Rome murmured at the continuation of a war, which drained their countries of their people and their wealth. Nay twelve out of thirty Roman colonies that had been planted in the provinces conquered by the Republic, absolutely refused to furnish their contingents, either of men or money; alledging that they really were not in a condition to do it. But the other eighteen complied, and declared themselves ready to enlarge their quotas, if necessary. The agents of these faithful and affectionate colonies received the thanks of the Senate, and of the people in full Comitia. As for the twelve, it was thought proper, at this juncture, to shew a contempt of them, and to neglect their contributions, rather than extort them by violence, which would probably throw these colonies into the Carthaginian interest. To supply the deficiency occasioned by their refusal, recourse was had to a treasure which had been long hoarded up in the exchequer. From the year 356 the Republic had reserved to herself the twentieth part of the purchase-money of every slave's freedom. The produce had been kept against a day of necessity, and was now first applied to the public use. It amounted to four thousand pounds weight of gold, which was all distributed among the Generals for the expences of the war. The Censors also requested of the Senate, that the territory of Campania, from which the old possessors had been driven, should be disposed of in the best manner, for the benefit of the public. Their petition being referred to the people; the latter decreed, that those vast plains, plains, and fruitful hills, should be farmed out, and the rents paid into the public treasury.

And now, the season of the year, and the motions of Hannibal, drew the Consuls from Rome. Fabius undertook to besiege Tarentum, whilst Pulvius and Marcellus were to oppose the enterprizes of the Carthaginian. Marcellus thinking himself, of all the Roman Generals, the fittest match for Hannibal, marched out of his winter quarters as soon as there was grass in the fields, and came up with the enemy near Cannusum in Apulia. The Carthaginian retired, because the country was open and unfit for ambushes. Marcellus followed him, pitched his camp near him, and offered battle. Hannibal would have avoided a general action, but was at length forced to it. The Roman attacked him as he was encamping; and the engagement lasted till night, without any advantage on either side. Next morning, as soon as it was light, Marcellus again drew out his forces; nor did Hannibal decline the challenge. He harangued his men, putting them in mind of Thrasymenus and Cannæ, and exhorting them to repress the audacious temerity of their enemies, who would not permit them either to march or to encamp in quiet, or give them time to breathe or look about them. The rising sun, said he, and the Roman army daily appear to us at the same instant. Shall we bear this? One single victory will free us from an importunate enemy that is more rash than formidable. The Carthaginian soldiers thus animated by their General, and vexed at being continually harrassed by the Romans, behaved themselves with uncommon resolution in the battle. Marcellus was now vanquished, his whole army routed; he lost two thousand seven hundred men. Not being used to suffer these indignities he shewed his resentment, by bitterly reproaching his troops with cowardice. They readily owned their fault, asked pardon, and protested that they would expose themselves to any danger he should think fit, with a resolution either to die or conquer. Prepare then, replied the General, to perform your promises to-morrow, and to merit the forgiveness you desire. Next morning the legionaries were ready to march by break of day; Marcellus declared that he would place in the first line those manipuli which had behaved themselves dishonourably; and he urged them all to exert themselves in such a manner as to wipe off their shame; Let not Rome, said he, be informed of yesterday's defeat before she hears of this day's victory. He then ordered them to refresh themselves well with food, that their strength might not fail, in case the battle should prove long, which done, he marched them out of the camp, and formed them as usual. Hannibal surprized at this unexpected challenge from the Roman General, What! cried he, we have to do then with a man that can bear neither good nor bad fortune. When victorious he gives his enemy no repose, nor takes any himself when he is vanquished. Which said, he gave orders for the trumpets to sound, and.

Y. R. 544.
B. f. Chr.
2c 2.
245d Conf.

Plutarch's
life of Marcellus.
Liv. B. 27.
c. 12, 13.

Plutarch's
Life of Fabius
Maximus.

Plutarch's
Life of Fabius
Maximus.

and drew his men out into the field. This battle was more sharp than that of the day before. At length the Romans prevailed by driving the elephants, which Hannibal brought against them, back upon his own troops. For by this means the Cartaginians were thrown into the utmost confusion; and two of those great beasts falling down just in the gate of their camp, stopped up the entrance of it; so that the runaways were forced to make their way with difficulty over the ditch and rampart, which occasioned a great slaughter of them. Hannibal lost eight thousand men. However, Marcellus bought his victory dear. Three thousand of his legionaries were killed upon the spot, and almost all the rest wounded; he led his scattered forces to Venusia, and could not take the field again that campaign*. Hannibal decamped the night after his defeat, retired into Bruttium, raised the siege of Caulonia, and took the besiegers prisoners. They consisted of 8000 men besides Bruttian deserters, and had been sent by Fabius upon that enterprize, under the conduct of the governor of Rhegium. About this time the Hirpini, the Lucani, and the Velentines submitted to the Consul Fulvius. Some of the Bruttians also sent deputies to him, who were well received: But this negotiation had little success, probably because of the presence of Hannibal.

As for Fabius, who had undertaken the reduction of Tarentum, (in which Hannibal had placed a garrison, consisting partly of his old troops, and partly of new levies raised among the Bruttians) while he was with all prudence making his preparations for the siege, a young Tarentine, who served in his army, came and discovered to him a secret, which he thought might be of use in the present enterprize. He told the General, That he had a sister in Tarentum, whose beauty had captivated the commander of the Bruttian troops there; that he believed he could gain over his sister to the Roman interest; and that, if so, she could undoubtedly engage her lover in the same cause. Fabius thinking the project feasible, suffered the young man to return to his native city, as a deserter. The Tarentine conducted himself with so much art, that he soon gained his point. The sixth night after the attacks began, he returned to the Consul, and informed him of his success, and when and where the Bruttian officer

Plutarch's
Life of Fabius
Maximus.

* These battles of Marcellus, as they are told by Livy, and nearly copied by Plutarch, have very much the air of a romance. Three general battles are fought in three days time. In the first, victory inclines to neither side, in the second, Hannibal is conqueror, and, in the third, Marcellus. And what is as strange, Marcellus when conqueror, was less able to keep the field than when he was vanquished. He lay idle all the summer, (for which he was afterwards impeached at Venusia) while Hannibal, master of the open country, continued his ravages in Italy. Vagante per Italiam Annibale, media estate, Venusiam, in tecto, milites abduxisset. Liv. B. 27. c. 20. It is also to be observed, that Polybius knew nothing of these Roman victories, for he expressly tells us, that Hannibal was never vanquished in any battle or engagement till that of Zama. Polyb. B. 15. c. 11. and 16.

would

would be ready to let the Romans into the place. The plot was happily executed; and when the Romans had surprized the town, they spared neither Carthaginians, Tarentines nor even Bruttians. Some authors lay the blame of this odious massacre on Fabius himself, who, they say, gave these cruel orders, lest, if he spared the Bruttians, so important a conquest should be imputed more to treachery, than to his prudence and bravery; a conduct not suitable to his general character.

Y. R. 344.
Liv. B. 27.
c. 16.
240 C. 16.

The riches found in this maritime city were, according to Livy, immense: The Quæstors received, for the public treasury, eighty-seven thousand pounds weight of gold; but Plutarch with more probability reckons the sum at only three thousand talents*. As to the pictures and statues, Fabius had not the taste of Marcellus; and therefore, when he was asked what he would have done with those master-pieces of painting and sculpture, he answered, Let us leave to the Tarentines their angry Gods; alluding to the attitudes, in which the Gods of Tarentum were represented: For, after the Lacedæmonian manner, they had generally swords in their hands, and were in fighting postures. Nevertheless he carried to Rome a brazen colossus of Hercules, which had been cast by the famous Lysippus; and it was placed in the Capitol, with an equestrian statue of Fabius near it.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 16.

* 881 5cl.
Arbuth.

Strabo, p.
278. Plin.
B. 34. c. 7.
Plutarch's
life of Fabius.

The unexpected news of the siege of Tarentum drew Hannibal from Bruttium. He marched night and day, and doubted not to come time enough to relieve it; and it was with the greatest astonishment he received the account, when within five miles of the city, of its being taken: Nay then, said he, the Romans have their Hannibal too: We have lost Tarentum by the same art that we took it. However, that he might not seem to fly before the enemy, he did not immediately turn back, but encamped on the place where he heard the news. At length he marched to Metapontus, a city in his interest, and there invented a stratagem, which had like to have fatally deceived the cautious Fabius. He sent two of the inhabitants with letters to the Consul, from the chief men of the city, offering to deliver up the place, and the Carthaginian garrison into his hands, if he would promise an oblivion for what was past. Fabius, not suspecting the cheat, fixed the day for his march, and would have fallen into an ambush prepared for him, if the Augurs and Haruspices, who had probably better intelligence than the General, had not detained him in the camp, by declaring that the presages were all unfortunate. Hannibal, impatient of Fabius's delays, sent new emissaries; but these being arrested, and terrified by threatenings of severe punishment, confessed the secret.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 16.

C H A P. XXX.

The ELEVENTH YEAR of the WAR.

The Consul Marcellus slain, and his colleague at the same time mortally wounded.

Favourable accounts from Sicily and from Greece.

Y. R. 445.
Bel. Chr.
257.
242 Cons.

MARCELLUS had been accused, before the comitia, for inaction the last campaign; nevertheless he was chosen Consul for the new year, with T. Quinctius Crispinus. When they had taken the field, the latter, ambitious of signalizing himself by the conquest of some important place, cast his eyes on Locri, a maritime city of that part of South Italy, now called Farther Calabria: But being afraid to engage with Hannibal, who advanced towards him, he postponed his expedition, and hastened to join his colleague Marcellus. The two Consuls, having conferred together, determined not to drop the enterprize upon Locri. They commanded Cincius, Admiral of the fleet appointed to guard the coasts of Italy and Sicily, to invest the place by sea, and at the same time ordered a body of troops, then in garrison at Tarentum, to go and besiege it by land: But these latter were surprized by Hannibal in their march, two thousand of them killed, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. The Carthaginian, however, declined a battle with the united forces of the Consuls; and watched for an opportunity to deceive his enemies by artifice.

Plutarch's
Life of Marcellus.
Liv. B. 27.
c. 27, 28.

Between his entrenchments, and those of the Romans, was a little hill, from which either camp might be annoyed; and the Roman soldiers were equally surprized at Hannibal's neglect of it, and impatient to take possession of it themselves. They even murmured at their Generals not being so quick as they would have them, to seize such an advantageous post: Hereupon Marcellus and his colleague, with a guard of two hundred and twenty horse, went to view the eminence. Hannibal had hid a detachment of Numidians in the cavities of the hill, and under the bushes, which covered it. His design was to intercept those of the Romans that should straggle from their camp. The Numidians coming out of their ambush, surprized and surrounded the two Consuls and their guard; and Marcellus, in the attempt to retreat, was killed. His son and the other Consul were wounded.

Hannibal, informed of Marcellus's death, went immediately to the place where the body lay, and, at the sight of it, shewed no marks of joy, but seemed rather to pity the misfortune of so great a man, who had fallen in a manner unworthy of him. Yet his first care was to take off the ring, which the dead Consul had on his finger, and with which he used to seal his dispatches. He then caused the body to be laid on a funeral pile, and burnt; and, having gathered the ashes into a silver urn, sent them to young Marcellus the son.

Y. R. 545.
B. f. Chr.
207.
244 Conf.

The surviving Consul decamped the following night, retired to the nearest mountains, and posted himself on a steep ascent. And fearing lest Hannibal should make a mischievous use of the ring he had taken from Marcellus, he dispatched couriers to all the neighbouring cities in the interest of Rome, to prevent their being deceived by letters, which might be sent to them in Marcellus's name. By this prudent step Salapia in Apulia was preserved: Nay, the inhabitants turned the artifice of the Cartaginian upon himself. He had sent a Roman deserter with letters, as from Marcellus, to give them notice that he would be there the next night, and that they should prepare to receive him. The Salapians seemed to suffer themselves to be cheated, and admitted into the town six hundred of Hannibal's men (chosen out of the Roman deserters, that their language might not betray the design;) but then on a sudden, the inhabitants letting fall the portcullis, surprized and slew those who had entered, and with a shower of darts from the ramparts drove back the rest.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 28.

This unsuccessful expedition did not so far discourage Hannibal, as to hinder him from marching to the relief of Locri, now invested by sea and land. And upon the first appearance of his Numidian horse, the besiegers were so terrified, that Cincius, the Admiral of the Roman fleet, embarked the land forces on board his galleys, left all his machines behind him, and sailed away for Rome.

In the mean time Quintius, whose wounds were mortal, and who, having left his post in the mountains, was now with his army at Capua, sent letters to the Senate, acquainting them with the death of his colleague, and that he himself was drawing near his end; and desiring that the Fathers would send some persons to him, of prudence and integrity, with whom he might entrust the affairs of the Republic. Accordingly three Senators were commissioned to receive his last advices; and, at their request, he nominated a Dictator to hold the Comitia for the new elections. He named T. Manlius Torquatus.

c. 29.

The Romans, during this unfortunate campaign, received the agreeable news from Sicily, that Valerius Lævinus, who commanded an hundred sail of ships, had made a descent on Africa, brought thence much booty, and afterwards defeated a Cartaginian fleet off Cyree. And the advices from the Pro-Consul Sulpicius of the state of affairs in Greece, were not unfavourable. The Ætolians had received assistance from Attalus King of Pergamus, and being also joined by a thousand Romans, had ventured to march against Philip; and though he defeated them in two battles, he could not prevail with them to desert the interest of Rome. He had also

Y. R. 545.
Bef. Chr.
207.
244 Cons.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 32.

Isid. c. 32.

Isid. c. 32.

attacked the Roman army, while they were pillaging the country about Corinth, and forced them aboard their ships with loss. But Sulpicius being joined by the Ætolians and Eleans, surprized the King near Elis, and gained some advantage over him. Next day Philip hearing that the country people were gathered together at a fortress called Pyrgus, (in order to defend their cattle, which they had driven thither as to a place of safety) he set upon them, took 4000 prisoners, and 20,000 cattle of all kinds. After this he was obliged to return into his own country, to put a stop to the irruptions of the Dardæans, which a report of his death had occasioned; so that Rome had no reason to fear the Macedonian's coming suddenly to join Hannibal.

C H A P. XXXI.

The Romans are alarmed by the approach of Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, with an army from Spain.

A history account of the Roman affairs in that country, from the first landing of the Scipios there, to the time of Asdrubal's leaving it.

BUT now the chief care of the Senate was to fill up the vacant Consulship, with two men who would be equal to that important charge, at a time when, beside the difficulties they had already to struggle with, a new and dreadful storm was driving towards Rome from the Alps. For Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, had left Spain with an army of 60,000 men, and was crossing those mountains, in order to join him in the heart of Italy; a danger, than which none could have a more gloomy, a more threatening aspect to the Republic.

Vit. p. 155.
156, 157.

The Roman affairs in Spain have been hitherto but lightly touched. And indeed a credible and consistent account of what passed in that country, while the Scipios commanded there, to the departure of Asdrubal, is not easy to be formed out of the Historians and Geographers. Let the collection and observations, made by a judicious and able writer, supply the defect of the present work, in this particular.

cf. Walter Reliquiæ
Hist. de l'Esp.
V. 2. p. 117.

“ The acts of these two brethren [L. Ælius and Cn. Scipio] in their “ province, were very great, and, as they are reported, somewhat “ marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain against the “ Carthaginians, whom they vanquished in so many battles, and with“ drew from their alliance so many of the Spaniards their confederates, “ that we have cause to wonder how the enemy could so often find “ means to repair his forces, and return strong into the field. But as the “ Romans, by pretending to deliver the country from the tyranny of “ Carthage, might easily win unto their confederacy as many as were “ galled

“ galled with the African yoke, and durst adventure to break it; so
 “ the ancient reputation of the first conquerors might serve to arm
 “ the natives against these invaders, and to reclaim those that had re“ volted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill “ success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto
 “ may be added, the Carthaginian treasure, which easily raised soldiers “ amongst those valiant, but (in that age) poor and gold-thirsty na“ tions. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spa- “ niards had their children, kinsmen and friends abroad with Hannibal in “ his Italian wars, or serving the Carthaginians in Africa. And per“ adventure, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipios
 “ were neither so many nor so great as they are set out by Livy.
 “ This we may be bold to say, that the great captain Fabius, or Livy in “ his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, “ nor Livy for him, doth answer; that if Asdrubal were vanquished;
 “ as Scipio would say, by him in Spain, strange it was, and as little to “ his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the “ same vanquished man should invade Italy. And indeed it is an in“ credible narration, that Asdrubal, being inclosed on all sides, and not “ knowing how to escape out of battle, save only by the steep descent “ of rocks, over a great river, that lay at his back, ran away with all “ his money, elephants and broken troops, over Tagus, directly towards “ the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more “ than threescore thousand armed soldiers. Neither do I see how it “ hangs well together, that he chose a piece of ground very defensible, “ but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be “ vanquished; and yet that he sent all his money and elephants away “ before him, as not intending to abide the enemy; or how it could “ be true, that these his elephants being so sent before, could hinder
 “ the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the last battle “ between him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherefore
 “ we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this “ war, and Spanish (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can “ know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell “ us; unto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. In this “ regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipios in Spain;
 “ not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great cer“ tainty.

“ Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, a haven town, not far within the “ Pyrenees, retaining still the name with little inflection *. That by the “ fame of his clemency he allured many nations to become subject unto “ Rome, as the story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I under“ stood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to “ give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and hav“ ing no jurisdiction in the country. Yet it is certain that he was a “ man.

Liv. B. 21.
c. 60.

Y. R. 535.

* Ampurias, a town in Catalonia.

“ man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into “ the love of the Barbarians; among whom his dexterity in practice had “ the better success, for that he seemed to have none other errand than “ setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some; others were “ to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yield by force or “ fear; especially when he had won a battle against Hanno. Into all “ treaties of accord made with these people, likely it is that he remem“ bered to insert this article, which the Romans in their alliances never “ forgot unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Cartha- “ ginians, or their superiors, Majestatem Populi Romani comiter conservent, “ which is, as Tully interprets it, that they should gently (or kindly) uphold
 “ the majesty of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing trou“ ble some, yet implied in it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection.
 “ And in this respect it may be true, that the Spaniards became ditionis “ Romanæ, of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say,
 “ they had no such meaning. That part of the country wherein Scipio “ landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage towards Italy, “ and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience: particularly “ the Bargusians. Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, “ such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect,
 “ that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians.
 “ Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governor over them, as over
 “ the rest of the province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but “ made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it, for I don’t “ think he gave the principality of their country to Hanno and his heirs)
 “ he made him not only Lieutenant General over them, in matters of “ war, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage, “ but took from them all inferior officers of their own, leaving them “ to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had “ good cause to rejoice at the coming of Scipio, with whom others also,
 “ no doubt, found reasons to join: it being the custom of all conquered “ nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves in“ discreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse “ than the former. This bad affection of this province would not suf“ fer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot and a thousand horse “ Hannibal had left unto him; besides which, it is like, that some “ forces he was able to raise out of his province. Therefore he ad-“ ventured a battle with Scipio; wherein he was overthrown and taken.
 “ Following this victory, Scipio besieged Cissa, a town hard by, and “ won it. But Ajdrubal, having passed Iberus, and coming too late “ to the relief of Hanno, with 8000 foot and 1000 horse, fell upon the “ Roman sea forces, that lay not far from Tarracon, whom he found “ careless as after a victory, roving abroad in the country; and with “ great slaughter drove them aboard their ships. This done, he ran “ up

Liv. B. 21.
 c. 62.
 P. B. 3.
 c. 12.

“ up into the country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes * from the Roman “ party, though they had given hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean Liv. B. 21.
c. 61.
 “ season was gone to visit and aid his fleet: where having set things in “ order, he returned back, and made towards Asdrubal, who durst not “ abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over the Iberus.
 “ So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia, their “ chief city, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of “ their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, confederates of the Carthaginians, “ were besieged in their chief town, which they defended thirty “ days; hoping, in vain, that the sharp winter, and great abundance “ of snow that fell, would have made the Romans dislodge. But they “ were fain at length to yield, and for this their obstinacy they were “ amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came “ to help their distressed neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, “ leaving 12,000 of their company dead behind them. I cannot but “ wonder how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which em“ braced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remem-“ bred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next news we hear “ of them. As also it is strange, that all the sea coast northward of “ Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subject “ unto Rome, should, in continuance of the story, after a few lines, hold “ war against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Nei“ ther can I believe, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charm, stirred up
 “ the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their hostages, and “ take arms in his quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand “ against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond the Iberus.
 “ Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian writer, would have told it “ thus: that Scipio adventuring too far into the country, was beaten
 “ by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir until winter “ came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned to the heart of his “ province, leaving some few garrisons to defend those places, that “ after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for, through a “ deep snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may “ reasonably think, that they sought their own benefit; helping them“ selves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians, and con“ trariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more “ grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these “ new masters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promises of those “ that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under “ their own country laws, and not under governors sent from Rome or “ Carthage, their demeanour in all ages following may testify; even from “ henceforth unto the days of Augustus Cæsar, till when they were never “ thoroughly conquered.

* Polybius says nothing of the rebellion of the Ilergetes, Ausetani, or Lacetani. The Historian follows Livy.

Y. R. 136.

P. B. 3.

L. B. 22.

c. 20.

“ The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships that ran not too far on ground he took; and thereby grew master of the whole coast, landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended: After this victory above a hundred and twenty nations, or petty estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to fly into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himself in Lusitania. Yet it follows, that the Ibergetes did again rebel, that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ibergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him hostages. These took from the Carthaginian three towns, and vanquished him in two battles, wherein they slew 15,000 of his men, and took 4000 prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio with a supply [of 8000 men and a fleet of thirty galleys;] and henceforward the two brethren jointly administered the business in Spain.

“ The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian war; the two Scipios did bead curiaster, without loss fear or doubt, pass over Iberus, and besieged ^o Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cneius had already subdued many nations beyond it, and among many others the same Celtiberians, who with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself [as has been before related, p. 156.] to be persuaded by one Abelox, a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the country, was by freely restoring unto them their hostages, as resting without any pledge assured of their faith: But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message, and restitution of the hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals, persuading them, as he had done Belar, to make the liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this, we find, that all the Spanish hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can believe so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content ourselves with these.

“ The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipios divide their forces: Cneius makes war by

^o Neither Livy nor Polybius say that Saguntum was besieged. The Romans seem to have designed it, but winter coming on, hindered them. Saguntum pergitur ire:— Asdrubalem oritur [Hispani] dare, armisque circumplecti, ut hinc—intervenisset.

Livy. B. 22. c. 22. Saguntinorum urbi appropinquarent, 5 milia ab oppido—castra facerent.—Qua autem instabat hyems, utrique [Rom. & Hispani] in hyberna, juco exercitus dimiserunt. Polyb. L. 3. c. 97, 99. Cajaub. trad.

“ land,

“ land, Publius by sea. Asdrubal with much labour and entreaty hath “ gotten 4000 foot and 500 horse out of Afric. He repairs his fleet, “ and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief seamen “ and masters of his ships revolt unto the Romans, because they had “ been chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed
 “ the navy. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion
 “ the Carpestians or Carpetani, an in-land people, about Toledo, in the “ very center of Spain. These do much mischief, so that Asdrubal is “ fain to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some “ of them that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they “ making head, so valiantly assail him, that they drive him, for very “ fear, to encamp himself strongly on a high piece of ground, whence “ he dares not come forth to give them battle. So they take a town by “ force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions, and shortly make “ themselves masters of the country round about. This good success “ breeds negligence, for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon “ them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, “ and disperseth the rest; so that the whole nation yieldeth to him the “ next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should “ lead his army forth into Italy; which we may wonder why the Car- “ thaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his “ letters in what hard case he was, and had so weakly supplied him, “ as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported, and that upon the “ very rumour of his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the “ Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, that “ this must not be so; or if they will needs have it so, that then they “ must send him a successor, and well attended with a strong army, “ which to employ they should find work more than enough, such “ notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage “ is not much moved with this excuse. Asdrubal must needs be “ gone: Himilco with such forces as are thought expedient for that “ service, both by land and sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain.
 “ Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself “ with store of money, that he might have wherewithal to win the “ friendship of the Gauls, through whose countries he must pass, as “ Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to “ blame for not remembring to ease him of his care. But since it can “ be no better, he lays great impositions upon all the Spaniards his sub“ jects; and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, “ onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipios, hearing these “ news, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so “ called of the river's name running by it) the richest town in all “ those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal, who thereupon “ steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battle “ with him, which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, Vol. II. H h “ his

Y. R. 537.

Y. R. 537. " his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory,
 " and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slain, and few
 " should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battles " were fully joined. Their camp the Romans take and spoil, whereby " 'questionless, they are marvelously enriched; all the money that " could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian
 " expedition. This day's event joins all Spain to the Romans, if any " part of the country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far " from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small Liv. B. 29. " hope of keeping himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertise-
 C. 23. " ment is sent to Rome, and letters to the Senate from P. and Cn. Scipio, Sen. p. 157. " whereof the contents are, that they have neither money, apparel, nor
 " bread, wherewith to sustain their army and fleet; that all is wanting;
 " so as unless they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold " their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the province. These " letters come to Rome in an evil season, the state being scarcely able, Sen. p. 158. " after the loss at Cannæ, to help itself at home. Yet relief is sent.
 Y. R. 538. " At the coming of this supply, the two Scipios pursue Asdrubal, and " hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think, that " remember the last news of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his " own safety? They find him, and Mago and Hamilcar, the son of " Bernicar, with an army of threescore thousand men, besieging * Illiturgi,
 " (which the learned Ortelius and others probably conjecture to " have stood where Carinena is now in the kingdom of Aragon; for
 " there was Illiturgi *, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way)
 " a town of the Ilergetes, their nearest neighbours, for having revolted " to the Romans. The town is greatly distressed; but most of all for " want of victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the " enemy's camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them; and " having victualled the place, encourage the townsmen to defend their " walls as stoutly as they should anon behold them fighting manfully
 " with the besiegers in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen " thousand against threescore thousand, and killing more of the enemies
 " than themselves were in number, drove all the three Carthaginian com" manders every one out of his quarter, and took that day, besides pri" soners and other booty, fifty and eight ensigns.
 " The Carthaginian army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon
 " Ircibis, that stood a little southward from the mouth of Ilerus.
 " The Spaniards are blamed as too greedy of earning money by war,
 " for thus reinforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be won" dered whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them; since As-

* Father Reuillé (B. 29. p. 203. Note 6.) and Cælius (Vol. I. p. 69.) seem rightly to have placed Illiturgi on the river Betis, near Cádiz. But that the Carthaginians should, after being beaten from thence, go and lay siege to Ircibis, which stood where Sir H. Raleigh places it, is not easy to be credited.

“ drubal was lately driven to poll the country, wanting money of his “ own; and being beaten in his journey, had lost his wealthy carriages,
 “ when his camp was taken after the battle by Ibera. Howsoever it “ happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again
 “ at Incibili, where there were of them above 13,000 slain, and above “ 3000 taken, besides two and forty ensigns, and nine elephants. After “ this (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Ro- “ mans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other historian, to “ whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year^a, by win“ ning famous victories, whereof these good Captains P. and Cn. Scipio “ perhaps were not aware.

Y. R. 539.

“ The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of dominion, win“ ter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, “ great armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal, and are over“ thrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make “ great haste over the river. At^b Castrum Altum, a place in the mid“ way between new Carthage and Saguntum, Publius Scipio encampeth; “ and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as in“ tending to make it his seat for a while. But the country round about “ is too full of enemies: The Carthaginian horse having charged the “ Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon “ some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march,
 “ they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought “ behoveful to retire unto some place more assured. So Publius with“ draws himself unto^c Mons Victorie, that rising somewhat eastward “ from Incibili, overlooketh the southern outlet of Iberus. Thi“ ther the Carthaginians pursue him. His brother Cneius repairs unto “ him; and Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, with a full army arrives to “ help his companions. As they lye thus near encamped together, P.
 “ Scipio, with some light armed, going closely to view the places “ thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies, who are like to take him, “ but that he withdraws himself to a high piece of ground; where “ they besiege him, until his brother Cneius fetched him off. After “ this (but I know not why)^d Castulo, a great city of Spain, whence “ Hannibal had taken him a wife, joineth with the Romans, though “ being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the river “ Bætis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus to be“ siege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to

*Livy, B. 24.
 C. 12.
 Y. R. 539.*

^a Not twice in the same year according to Livy.

^b Rouillé (note 54. p. 238. B. 29.) says it is the same with Valeria, which he and Cellarius, V. 1. p. 103. place at the head of the Sucro.

^c According to Rouillé, loc. cit. note 56.

this hill was part of mount Orospeida, between the Sucro and the Anas. But then Publius instead of retiring was advancing farther into the country.

^d Castulo is upon the Bætis, not far from Orospeida.

Y. R. 539.

“ take it by famine. We may justly wonder what should move them
 “ to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman army lying so “ close by them, and to seek adventures farther off, in that very place, “ wherein they had been so grievously bearen the year before. But “ thither they go; and thither follows them Cneius Scipio with one le“ gion; who enters the town by force, breaks out upon them the next “ day, and in two battles, kills above twelve thousand, and takes more “ than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty ensigns. This “ victory (doubtless) is remarkable, considering that the greatest Roman “ legion at this time consisted of no more than 5000 men. The “ vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigerra, but that siege is also “ raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Munda, “ where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battle “ fought, that lasteth four hours, wherein the Romans got a notable “ victory, and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio “ been wounded. Thirty-nine elephants are killed, and twelve thou“ sand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty en-“ signs. The Carthaginians fly to Auringes[†], and the Romans pursue “ them. Cn. Scipio in a litter is carried into the field, and vanquishes
 “ the Carthaginians again, but kills not half so many of them as before;
 “ good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Not“ withstanding all these overthrows, the Spaniards, a people framed “ even by nature to set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troops
 “ of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures “ once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten “ again, and loseth eight thousand of his men, besides prisoners, ele“ phants, ensigns, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, “ the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the “ Carthaginians, since, in behalf of that city, they had at first entered “ into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had “ not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that, long “ before this, they had won all the country once and again. But it “ must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum;
 “ and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: So as that they “ need not to blush for having so long forbore to do that, which ere “ now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the pre“ sent they win Saguntum, and restore the possession thereof unto “ such of the poor dispersed citizens as they can find out. They also “ waste and destroy the country of the Turdetani, that had ministered “ unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last [†] Bigerra, according to Rouillé (who follows Ptolemy) and Cellarius, V. 1. p. 103.

 fixed in the country of the Baſſetani, a people in the east part of Bætica.

[‡] Munda, Cellarius, p. 73. places near the sea, not far from the Straits of Gibraltar.

[§] According to Cellarius, Aurinx, or O-ringi, is not far from Iliturgi on the Bætis, but nearer the sea. Cellar. V. 1. p. 75.

“ action (questionless) was much to their honour; and wherein we may “ be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they “ had been able. Y. R. 59.

“ But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, “ which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all “ their brave exploits we can perceive none, than this recovery of Sa- “ guntum, excepting the stopping of Asdrubal's journey, which was in“ deed of the greatest importance, but appertaining to their own de“ fence. For they have landed at Emporiæ, an haven town, built and “ peopled by a colony of the Phocæans, kin to the Massilians, friends “ to the Romans. They have easily won to their party, lost, recover“ ed, and lost again some petty bordering nations of the Spaniards, “ that are carried one while by persuasion, other-whiles by force, and “ sometimes by their own unsettled passions; and now finally they have “ won a town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who “ had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily be“ lieve, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprize;
 “ which is to be suspected, since in this action we find no particulars “ remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they “ had gotten the better of their enemies in some notable fight. In like “ sort also must we think, that all those battles lately remembered, after “ every one of which Asdrubal sat down before some place that had “ rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Car- “ thaginians. For it is not the custom of armies vanquished, to carry “ the war from town to town, and beleaguer cities of their enemies;
 “ but to fortify themselves within their own places of strength, and “ therein to attend the levy and arrival of new supplies. And surely “ if the Romans had been absolute masters of the field, when they “ won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year follow“ ing in practising only with the Celtiberians, the next adjoining peo“ ple. Yet made they this little less than two years business. Of these “ Celtiberians we hear before, that they have yielded up themselves “ unto the Romans; for security of their faith given hostages to Scipio;
 “ and, at his appointment, made war, against the Carthaginians, with “ their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus “ hardly wrought, and not without express condition of a great sum, “ hired to serve in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I “ cannot perceive, unless perhaps in those days it were the Roman “ custom, or rather the custom of some bad author, whom Livy fol“ lows, to call every messenger or straggler, that entered their camp, “ an hostage of that people from whom he came.

“ The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an army “ of thirty thousand men to help the Romans, out of which three “ hundred^b, the fittest, are chosen and carried into Italy, there to deal.

^b Livy does not say these 300 were Celtiberians, nobilissimos Hispanos 300, l. 24. c. 49.

“ with

Y. R. 540.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 49.

Y. R. 541.

Liv. B. 25.
c. 32. &
seq.

Y. R. 1. 1. " with their countrymen, that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any " of these three hundred^c return back into Spain, it is to be feared that " he brings with him such news of the riches and welfare of Hannibal's
 " men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow
 " Asdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy.
 " Therefore we find more than probability when these mercenary Cel-
 " tiberians meet the Carthaginian army in the field. The two Scipios, " presuming on this access of strength, divide their forces, and seek " out the enemies, who lie not far off with three armies. Asdrubal
 " the son of Hamilcar is nearest at hand, even among the Celtiberians,
 " at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order:
 " But the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being " destroyed, Mago and the son of Gisco, hearing the news, will make use " of their distance, which is five days march, and, by running into the " farthest parts of the country, save themselves from being overtaken.
 " Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the " better soldiers, that is two parts of the old Roman army; leaving the " third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath " the longer journey to make comes somewhat the sooner to his life's " end. Mago and Aidrubal the son of Gisco are not studying how to " run away: They find no such necessity. They join their forces to" gether, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay at him so hardly, that he " is driven to keep himself close within his trenches, wherein he thinks " himself not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masniſſa, Prince " of the Massylii, Numidians bordering upon Mauritania, in the re" gion now called Tremizen; to whom the chief honour of this service " is ascribed, for that he becomes afterwards confederate with the " Romans. In this dangerous case, Publius Scipio gets intelligence that " Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is coming with 7500 of the Suessetani^e to " join with his enemies. Fearing therefore to be strait shut up, and " besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the " way; leaving T. Forteus his lieutenant, with a small company to de" fend the camp. He meets with Indibilis, but is not able, according " to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues
 " so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to have " been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all " sides: Neither are the Carthaginians far behind, but come so fast

^c These 300 were sent into Italy the year before the siege of Capua, and three years after the battle of Canna. It may therefore be questioned, whether Hannibal's soldiers were so rich as Sir Walter represents.

^d It is not agreed where Anitorgis stood. Rozellé places it near the Anas (n. 24. p. 286. B. 31.) Cellarius, V. 1. p. 77. seems to think it the same with Cuxisbergis, which Strabo calls a town of the Celticæ, but which Appian places in Lusitania. The Anitorgis here mentioned by Livy, must have been near the Iberus; for according to him, Publius Scipio's camp, which Forteus and Marcus possessed after the General's death, was near that river.

^e The Suessetani were a people on the north side of the Iberus.

" upon

“ upon him in rear, that Publius Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, “ yet fighting and animating his men, where need most requireth, is “ struck through with a lance, and slain; very few of his army escap“ ing the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like “ end hath Cælius Scipio within nine and twenty days after. At his “ meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian mercenaries all forsake him, “ pretending that they had war in their own country. If Antiochus, “ where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it,
 “ a Celtiberian town, this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth.
 “ But we may justly believe that they were won by Asdrubal, and easily “ persuaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should have “ had for hazarding their lives. Cneius Scipio therefore being unable to “ stay them, and no less unable without their help, either to resist the ene“ my, or to join with his brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein “ only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. As- “ drubal presseth hard upon him; and Mago, with Asdrubal the son of “ Gisco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother “ after him. Scipio steals from them all by night; but is overtaken the “ next day by their horse, and arrested in an open place, of hard stony “ ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of “ his legions against such enemies. Yet a little hill he finds of easy “ ascent on every side, which he takes for want of a more commo“ dious place, and fortifies it with pack-saddles, for default of a better “ palisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in “ sunder, and breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive,
 “ that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods ad“ joining, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, “ as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which “ no man escapes. Yet how they that were thus hemmed in on every “ side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, “ could break out and shroud themselves within woods adjoining, I “ should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away “ mine attention. T. Fonteius is in Publius Scipio’s camp on the “ north side of Iberus, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life, “ since his General, with two parts of the Roman army, had little “ hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Marcus, a “ young Roman gentleman of a notable spirit; who having gathered “ together the scattered soldiers, and drawn some companies out of “ their garrisons, makes a pretty army. The soldiers being to choose a “ General by most voices, prefer this L. Marcus before Fonteius the “ lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal the son of Gisco “ coming upon them, this L. Marcus so encourageth his men (fondly “ weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more

‘ Livy says it cost them a great deal of trouble, and they were a long while about it.
 B. 25. c. 36.

T. R. 341. "honourable Generals lately slain) and admonished them of their present necessity, that he beats the Cartbaginians into their trenches.
 "A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely
 "sounds the retreat, reserving the fury of his soldiers to a greater oc"casion. The Cartbaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence
 "this boldness grows, in enemies lately vanquished, and now again
 "little better than taken. But when they see that the Roman dares "not follow his advantage, they return to their former security, and "utterly despising him, let neither corps de garde nor sentinel, but "rest secure, as if no enemy were near. Marcus therefore animates
 "his soldiers with lively words, and tells them that there is no adven"ture more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being "undertaken. They are soon persuaded to follow him in any desperate "piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steals upon
 "the camp of Asdrubal; where finding no guard, but the enemies fast "asleep, or very drowsy, he enters without resistance, fires their ca"bins, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted the Cartbagi-
 "nians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way.
 "All passages out of their camp Marcus hath prepossessed; so that "there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the rampart; which
 "as many do as can think upon it, and run away towards the camp
 "of Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, that lay six miles off. But Mar- "cius hath way-laid them. In a valley between their two camps he "hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of "horse; so that into this ambush they fall every one, and are cut in "pieces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the "alarm before his coming, Marcus hastens to be there as soon as they.
 "By which diligent speed he comes early in the morning upon this fur"ther camp, which with no difficulty he enters, and partly by "apprehension of danger which the enemies conceived, when they be"held the Roman shields foul and bloodied with their former execu"tion, he drives headlong into flight all that can save themselves from "the fury of the sword. Thirty-seven thousand of the enemies perish
 "in this night's work, besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty "taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias adds, that the camp of "Mago was also taken, and 7000 slain, and that in another battle
 "with Asdrubal, there were slain 10,000 more, besides 4330 taken "prisoners. Such is the power of some historians. Livy therefore "hath elsewhere well observed, that there is none so intemperate as "Valerius Antias in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battles.
 "That whilst Marcus was making an oration to his soldiers, a flame
 "of fire shone about his head, Livy reporteth as a common tale, not "giving thereto any credit; and temperately concludeth, that this
 "Captain Marcus got a great name; which he might well do, if
 "with so small forces, and in such distress, he could clearly get off
 "from

“ from the enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far “ less than that which is here set down. Y. R. 542.

“ Of these occurrents L. Marcius sent word to Rome, not forgetting “ his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise
“ as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their “ vicegerent in Spain, which the better to intimate unto them, he “ stiled himself Pro-Prætor. The Fathers were no less moved with “ the tidings than the case required, and therefore took such careful “ order for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came “ to the gates of Rome, ere the companies levied to serve that province “ could be sent away, yet could they not stay a tide for defence of “ the city itself, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the Liv. B. 26.
“ title of Pro-Prætor which Marcius had assumed, they thought it too c. 11.
“ great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it; “ foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the “ soldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should “ command armies and provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was c. 17.
“ dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain, carrying with “ him about 6000 of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, “ with 300 Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

“ It happened well that about these times the affairs of Rome be“ gan to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such “ a strong supply, otherwise the victories of Marcius would ill have “ served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian “ armies from marching towards the Alps. For when Claudius, landing “ with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the army, “ which was under Marcius and Fonteius, he found surer tokens of the “ overthrows received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof “ Marcius had made his vaunts to the Senate. The Roman party was “ forsaken by most of the Spanish friends, whom how to reclaim, it “ would not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards “ Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, whom he found among the Au- “ *setani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri, “ out of which there was no issue, but only through a straight, whereon “ the Roman seized at his first coming. What should have tempted any “ man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find; and “ as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said that

* The Ausetani were indeed near enough at hand. Pliny mentions a people of that name near Emperia. Livy, as quoted by Cellarius, V. 1. p. 116. places them near the Iberus. But the Lapides atri (the black rocks) according to the same Cellarius, p. 99. were between Illiturgi and Mentisa, or Mentissa, on the Bætis. Livy also says the Lapides atri were between Illiturgi and Mentissa, but then he places these towns in the country of the Ausetani, which agrees to the situation Sir Walter Raleigh gives to Illiturgi. Asdrubal ad Lapides atri Castra habebat in Ausetanis, is locus est inter oppida Illiturgim & Mentissam. Liv. L. 26. c. 17. Reuillé (N. 33, 34. p. 320. B. 32.) agrees with Cellarius.

Y. R. 521.

“ Aidrubal, seeing himself thus locked up, made offer to depart forth“ with out of all Spain, and quit the province to the Romans, upon “ condition that he and his army might be thence dismissed; that he “ spent many days in entertaining parly with Claudius about this busi“ ness, that night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) “ through very difficult passages out of the danger, and that finally “ taking advantage of a misty day, he stole away with all his horse “ and elephants, leaving his camp empty. If we consider, that there “ were at the same time, besides this Aidrubal, two other Carthaginian “ Generals in Spain, we shall find no less cause to wonder at the sim“ plicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a “ country, with one of these three chieftains, than at the strange nature “ of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep
 “ out by night, the horse and elephants easily following them in a “ dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is “ needful that we suppose both the danger wherein the Carthaginians “ were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have “ been of far less value. Howsoever it was, neither this nor ought “ else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in “ Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it “ is, that the old soldiers, which had chosen Marcus their Pro-Prætor, “ took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts,
 “ had repealed their election, and sent a Pro-Prætor whom they fancied “ not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a “ Pro-Consul, and, perhaps, young Scipio by name, as if a title of “ greater dignity were needful to work regard in the Barbarians, and “ the beloved memory of Cælius and Publius likely to do good, were “ it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these or upon “ other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the province, and Publius
 “ the son of P. Scipio sent Pro-Consul into Spain.

“ This is that Scipio, who afterwards transferred the war into Afric, “ where he happily ended it to the great honour and benefit of his “ country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well “ conditioned, especially he excelled in temperance, continency, bounty, “ and other virtues that purchase love; of which qualities what “ great use he made shall appear in the tenor of his actions following.
 “ As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too “ much of the great Alexander's vanity: How he used to walk alone “ in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter:
 “ How a dragon (which must have been one of the Gods, and in “ likelihood Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his “ mother, entering her chamber often, and vanishing away at the “ coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the “ rumour by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than fables, “ devised by historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of “ Rome;

“ Rome; that this noble city might seem not only to have surpassed “ other nations in virtue of the generality, but also in great worth of “ one single man. To this end nothing is left out that might serve “ to adorn this Roman champion. For it is confidently written as mat“ ter of unquestionable truth, that when a Pro-Consul was to be chosen “ for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal citizens offer “ himself as petitioner for that honourable but dangerous charge; that “ the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; that when the “ day of election came, all the princes of the city stood looking one “ another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure “ himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this Publius “ Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age^r, “ getting up upon an high place, where he might be seen of all the “ multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred “ upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L.
 “ Marcus no better than dreams; and either very unreasonable was the “ fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero,
 “ that not long before was gone into Spain Pro-Prætor, or very bad “ intelligence they had out of the province, which Asdrubal the Cartha- “ ginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these “ incoherences, which I find in the too partial Roman historians, I do not “ willingly insist.

“ P. Scipio was sent Pro-Consul into Spain, and with him was joined “ M. Junius Silanus as Pro-Prætor and his Coadjutor. They carried with “ them 10,000 foot and 1000 horse in thirty quinquere gallies. With “ these they landed at Emperia, and marched from thence to Tarracon “ along the sea coast. At the fame of Scipio’s arrival, it is said, that “ embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the province, “ which he entertained with such a majesty, as bred a wonderful “ opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him, “ and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the less they “ could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we “ needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be; for very “ little cause there was to be terrified with the fame of so young a man “ which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or,
 “ as some think, all the next year) he did nothing, but spent the time “ perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His “ first enterprise was against new Cartbage, upon which he came unex“ pected, with 25,000 foot and 2500 horse; his sea forces coasting “ him and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived “ there together with him. He assailed the town by land and sea, and

Polyb. B. 10.
c. 6. & seq.
& Liv. B.
26. c. 19.

Liv. B. 26.
c. 20.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 7.
Y. R. 544.

Polyb. loc.
cit. &—
Liv. B. 26.
c. 42. & seq.

^r Polyb. B. 10. c. 3. says upon the authority of C. Lælius, from whom he heard it, that Scipio was seventeen years of age at the battle of the Ticin, and (c. 6.) twenty seven when he went into Spain. But if he was seventeen at the battle of the Ticin, and went to Spain this year (as Livy and Pigebius say) he was now only twenty-four.

Y. R. 334

“ won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it by their too “ much confidence upon the strength of it, which caused them to man-
 “ it more slenderly than was requisite. Yet it might have been well “ enough defended, if some fishermen of Tarracœ had not discovered “ unto Scipio a secret passage unto the walls, whereof the townsmen “ themselves were either ignorant, or thought, at least, that their “ enemies could have no notice. This city of new Carthage resembled
 “ the old and great Carthage in situation, standing upon a demi-island, “ between a haven and a great lake. All the western side of the walls “ and somewhat of the north was fenced with this lake, which the “ fishermen of Tarracœ had sounded, and finding some part thereof a “ shelf, whereon at low water men might pass knee deep, or, at most, “ wading up to the middle, Scipio thrust therein to some companies of “ men, who recovered the top of the walls without resistance, the “ place being left without guard, as able to defend itself by the natural “ strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians “ within the city, easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the “ Roman army. What booty was found within the town⁹, Livy him“ self cannot certainly affirm, but is fain to say, that some Roman histo“ rians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that “ small proportion of riches, which was afterwards carried by Scipio
 “ into the Roman treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity
 “ it was to say, that all the wealth of Afric and Spain was heaped up
 “ in that one town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish hostages¹, “ or at least of the adjoining provinces, whom Scipio intreated with sin“ gular courtesy, restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such “ gracious manner as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit.”

Polyb. B.
 10. c. 15.
 Liv. B. 26.
 49.

A procedure so generous encouraged a woman of a majestick mein, to come and throw herself at his feet. (She was the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes.) With tears in her eyes she besought him, that he would order his Romans to be more civil to their captives than the Carthaginians had been. Her modesty hindered her from expressing herself more clearly; and Scipio misunderstood her meaning. Imagining that she and her companions had been hardly treated with respect to the necessities of life, he gave her an assurance, that, for the future, they should want nothing. That, returned the noble matron, has no part in my concern. Cares of another kind disturb my thoughts, when I consider the age of these about me. Scipio casting his eyes upon her nieces (the daughters of Indibilis) and other beautiful captives of like quality, who were with her, and seemed to ⁹ Polyb. B. 10. c. 19. says, Scipio found in the town 600 talents of the public money; and that he had brought with him 400 talents from Rome, for the expence of the war.

¹ Scipio promised to send home the hostages, provided their friends would enter into an alliance with Rome. Polyb. Lib. 10. c. 18.

regard regard her as a mother, understood the nature of her petition. Moved with compassion for young Princesses, whose honour had been exposed to so much danger, tears dropped from his eyes; and, reaching out his hand to raise the suppliant, he replied, "For my own sake, and for the " sake of the Roman people, I would suffer nothing, that is any where " esteemed sacred, to be violated amongst us. But that virtue and dignity, " which you have preserved under all your misfortunes, oblige me to be

" more particularly attentive to your protection." He then appointed men of known probity to have the charge of the fair captives and their conductress, and commanded, that they should be respected as his sisters and daughters.

A second adventure made it believed, that it was not mere policy, but virtue, which moved Scipio to such generous actions. His officers, knowing that he loved women, brought to him a young virgin of surprising beauty. Wherever she appeared she charmed the eyes of all; and Scipio was struck at the sight of her. Nevertheless he gave this answer to the officers. "Were I in a private station, you could " not make me a more agreeable present; nor, in the post I now fill,
" a present less acceptable." Then, having asked the lady concerning her birth, country, and circumstances; and finding, that she was contracted to a Prince of the Celtiberians, named Allucius, he sent for her father, and for the Prince. When they came into his presence, he thus addressed himself to the lover of the captive. "Allucius, we are both " young, and may therefore speak freely to one another of our sentiments. My soldiers have brought me hither a virgin, who, I hear " is your mistress, and that you passionately love her. Her beauty
" makes me easily believe it; and would the business with which I am
" entrusted by our Republic allow me to think of such pleasures, I " should be glad to be indulged in them, while they did not exceed the " bounds of justice and honour. Your love I can favour, and am " pleased with an opportunity to do it. Your mistress has been with us,
" as if she had been with her own parents, or yours, that I might " make you a present worthy of me and of you. The only return
" I ask, is this: Be a friend to the Roman people. If you believe me to " be an honest man, such as my father and uncle were esteemed in these " countries, Know, that Rome has many citizens like us; and that there " is not at this day, in the world, a nation, whom you and your country-
" men would think a more terrible enemy, or a more desirable friend." At these words he put the fair captive into the hands of the Celtiberian Prince; and, as her parents had brought a rich present of money for the Pro-Consul, he gave that likewise to Allucius, as an addition to his wife's portion. This action did the Roman Republic great service in Spain. Allucius published in Celtiberia, That there was come among them a young hero, terrible and beneficent as the immortals, all conquering by his benignity as by his sword.

The

V. R. 544

S. J. W. R. 1.

B. J. C. 3.

§ 11.

L. J. B. 11.

L. J. B. 11.

The grateful Prince soon after brought to Scipio a reinforcement of one thousand four hundred horse; “ and two petty Kings of the “ Iergetes and Lacitanis, nearest neighbours to Terracœn, and dwelling “ on the north side of the Larus, forsook the Carthaginian party, “ and joined with the Romans. The speech of Indiöilis, King of “ the Iergetes, is much commended for that he did not vaunt “ himself, as commonly fugitives use, of the pleasure which he did “ unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather ex- “ cused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by the “ injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing “ of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship “ was indeed no unsure token that it should be long lasting. But if the “ Iergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Car- “ thaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio, “ then could nothing have been devised more vain than this oration of “ Indiöilis, their King, excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, “ when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, “ formerly contracted with the father and the uncle. Most likely “ therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipios had gotten some “ few places among these their neighbours, and held them by strength; “ yet were the Romans never masters of the country, till this worthy “ commander, by recovering their hostages from the Carthaginians, “ and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himself “ the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian “ Generals, when they heard of this loss, were very sorry, yet never- “ theless they set a good face on the matter, saying, that a young man, “ having stolen a town by surprize, was too far transported and over- “ joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in “ mind of his father and uncle, which would alter his mood, and bring “ him to a more convenient temper.

“ Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture, I should be “ bold to say, that the Carthaginians were at this time busy in setting “ forth towards Italy, and that Scipio to divert them, undertook new “ Carthage, as his father and uncle, upon the like occasion, sat down “ before Ileræ. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not “ been much amiss, if the passage over the lake had been undiscovered, “ and the town held out some longer while. For howsoever that par- “ ticular action was the more fortunate in coming to such good issue “ upon the first day, yet in the generality of the business between Rome “ and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be “ stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken “ from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do that should “ hinder his journey, Mago and Asdrubal the son of Gisco, were “ thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering war of taking “ and retaking towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian forces, “ under.

“ under Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, went to a greater enterprize, even “ to fight in trial of the empire.

“ But the Roman historians tell this after another fashion, and say, Y. R. 545.
“ that Asdrubal was beaten into Italy, whither he ran for fear, as “ thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might “ but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal, “ his vant-currers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horie, that they “ drave them into their trenches, and made it apparent, even by that “ small piece of service, how full of spirit the Roman army was, and “ how dejected the enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out
“ of that even ground, and occupied a hill, compassed on three sides “ with the river, very steep of ascent, and not easy of access on the “ foreside, by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the “ Romans. On the top of it there was a plain, whereon he strongly en“ camped himself, and in the midway, between the top and the root “ of the hill, was also another plain, into which he descended, more “ upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within the “ trenches, than for that he durst adventure his army to the hazard of “ a battle, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage “ of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the “ hill to him, they recovered even footing with him, drove him out “ of this lower plain up into his camp on the hill top, whither although “ the ascent were very difficult, and his elephants bestowed in the “ smoothest places to hinder their approach, yet compassing about,
“ and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found, but much “ more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got “ up before them, they drave both men and elephants headlong, I “ know not whither, for it is said, that there was no way to fly. Out “ of such a battle, wherein he had lost 8000 men, Asdrubal is said to “ have escaped, and gathering together his dispersed troops, to have “ marched towards the Pyrenees, having sent away his elephants ere the “ fight began^a. Nevertheless Mago and Asdrubal the son of Gisco, Liv. B. 47.
c. 20.
“ are reported after this to have consulted with him about this war,
“ and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to “ carry all the Spaniards, as far as might be, from the name of Scipio.
“ How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming “ into Italy, whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have “ too long detained us.”

^a Polybius, B. 10. c. 35, 36. relates this battle somewhat different from Livy, whom Sir W. Raleigh follows.

C H A P. XXXII.

The TWELFTH and THIRTEENTH YEARS of the WAR.

Asdrubal vanquished in the battle of the Metaurus. Hannibal is forced to confine himself within Bruttium.

Y. R. 545.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 33.

634

THE approach of Asdrubal (as was before observed) made it incumbent on the Romans to be very careful in their choice of Consuls to succeed Marcellus and Quinctius. The Conscrip̄t Fathers cast their eyes on C. Claudius Nero, who had formerly served in Spain; a man of approved courage and ability: But where to find him a proper colleague was the difficulty; for Nero being somewhat hasty, and extremely enterprising, it seemed necessary to join with him, in the command, some person whose slegm may temper his vivacity. It happened about this time, that the reputation of one M. Livius Macatus was attacked in the Senate. His kinsman M. Livius Salinator spoke in his defence. Salinator had discharged the office of Consul with great prudence twelve years before; yet was afterwards unjustly censured by the people for a pretended unequal distribution of the spoils of Illyricum. Piqued at the affront, he retired from all public business to his country farm; and though Marcellus and Lævinus obliged him to return to the city, he lived there like a man in disgrace, his beard long, his hair neglected, and his dress slovenly, till the Censors forced him to shave himself and take his place in the Senate: and even then he continued to shew his resentment of the affront he had received, giving his opinion only by an Aye or a No, or by moving from one side of the house to the other. The cause of his friend now engaged him to speak; this drew upon him the attention of the fathers. They called to mind his merit and his past services, were surprized at themselves for having so long neglected a man of his worth and abilities, and judged him a proper person to be joined with Nero in the Consulship. But, when the Comit̄ia met, Livius himself opposed his own election: If I am worthy, said he, to be chosen Consul a second time, why was I condemned? Or if my condemnation was just, why should I be placed again at the helm? However, he was at length prevailed upon to accept of the dignity offered him. It fell to his lot to march against Asdrubal, and to Nero's to oppose Hannibal in Bruttium: But the rest of the winter was spent in the celebration of games, processions, and other religious ceremonies, to render the Gods propitious.

When the spring came, the Consuls began to make new levies with extraordinary vigour. Five out of seven maritime colonies, which had been

been hitherto exempted, by treaty, from furnishing their contingents of troops, were deprived of that immunity, which was confirmed only to Ojia and Antium. The Volones were enrolled in the legions, and Sipont sent from Spain to Livius two thousand legionaries, eight thousand Spaniards and Gauls, and eighteen hundred horse, partly Numidian, and partly Spanish.

Asdrubal had come from Spain to Italy in a much shorter time than Hannibal. He had found means to gain the good will of the Gauls. A great number of the Arverni had lifted themselves in his service; and even the mountaineers of the Alps, being by this time sensible, that there was no design upon their cottages and possessions, and that their hills were only a road by which one powerful state marched its armies to attack another, at a great distance from them, had been so far from opposing his march, that many of them had joined his army. The Carthaginian, after passing the Alps, laid siege to Placentia. While he was before the town, the Consuls in great haste set out for their respective provinces. Nero found, as Livy would have us believe, that the Prætor Hostilius (who met him at Venusia, and there resigned the command of the troops to him) had, with some light armed cohorts, attacked all Hannibal's army on a march, killed 4000 of his men, and taken nine standards. The same author adds, that Nero obtained a victory over Hannibal, by means of an ambush he placed behind the Carthaginian army, slew 8000 of them and four elephants, and took 700 prisoners, with the loss only of 500 men; and in a second engagement cut in pieces 2000 of the enemy. Soon after this, four Gallie and two Numidian troopers, who had been dispatched with letters to the Carthaginian General from Asdrubal, missing their way, fell into the hands of some Roman soldiers, in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, who carried them before Q. Claudius, the Pro-Prætor; and when dread of torture had made these messengers confess their errand, Claudius sent them under a guard, with the letters unopened, to the Consul Nero at Canusium. Nero having caused these letters to be interpreted, and finding the import of them to be, That Asdrubal was repairing to Umbria, and desired his brother to join him there, he sent them straight to the Senate, signifying to them by the same express, that he was resolved to march with 6000 foot and 1000 horse of his choicest troops to reinforce his colleague, and give Asdrubal battle, before Hannibal could come to his assistance. This step was contrary to the laws, which forbade Generals to make war out of their own provinces, or to enter those of their colleagues: But the Consul imagined, that the present perilous circumstances would justify his conduct.

The messenger dispatched, Nero sent orders to the people of the several provinces through which he was to march, to have provisions, horses, carts, and all other accommodations, in readiness. Then having caused a report to be spread, that he was going to force a Car-

Y. R. 246.
Bef. Chr.
206.
245 Conf.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 45.

thaginian garrison in a neighbouring city of Lucania, he left the command of the body of his army with one of his Lieutenants, and in the night took the road to Picenum. When he was got to a considerable distance from his camp, he discovered his intention to the detachment he had taken with him, and encouraged them to the enterprize by the prospect of the glory they would acquire by a victory over Asdrubal, in which, notwithstanding the smallness of their number, they would be undoubtedly thought to have had the greatest share.

c. 44.

Nero's design, when known at Rome, threw the people into a consternation; some thought, that to leave an army without its General, and deprived of its bravest soldiers, in the neighbourhood of Hannibal, was too bold a step; others approved the enterprize; and the least equitable suspended their judgment, till they should see the success.

c. 45.

In the mean time the Consul drew near his colleague's camp, by whose advice he entered it in the night, to conceal his arrival from the enemy. A council of war was immediately held, in which many were for giving Nero's troops time to refresh themselves after so long a march; but the General himself opposed this motion, being in hopes to defeat Asdrubal, and return to his camp at Canusium, before Hannibal should discover his absence, or be able to take any advantage of it.

Zen. B. 9.

Liv. B. 27.
c. 47.

Notwithstanding the precautions used by the Romans to conceal from the enemy the arrival of Nero, Asdrubal the next morning perceived that Livius had got a reinforcement; and imagining that Hannibal had been defeated, and that the victorious army was come against him, he declined a battle, though he had already drawn out his men in order to engage; and the next night, under favour of the darkness, he decamped and took the road to Insubria, resolving to wait there for an answer from his brother, with certain intelligence of his situation. The two guides whom the Carthaginian chose to conduct him, proved unfaithful, and on a sudden disappeared: So that the army was bewildered, and knew not what rout to take. They marched all night along the banks of the Meturus, a river in Umbria, Asdrubal designing to pass it as soon as it was light: And while he pursued his tedious march along the winding stream, the Romans had time to come up with him. He was forced to give battle in a disadvantageous situation, and when his men were faint with thirst, hunger, and want of rest. Nay, he had lost a great number of his soldiers in the night, especially of the Gauls, who, not able, or not willing to endure the fatigue of so painful a march, had laid themselves down to sleep. He ranged his elephants, which, according to Papianus were ten in number, in the front of his battle, before the center, which consisted of his Ligurians. His Gauls he posted in the left, on an eminence near the river; and, in the right, his Africans and Spaniards, which were the strength of his army; and the whole was drawn up very deep in file. The main body of the Romans was led by L. Percius, the Prætor, of Gaul, who with his forces had joined Livius before

Polab. B.
11. c. 1.
and Liv.
B. 27. c. 45.

before the arrival of Nero : This last took upon him the command of the right wing, and Livius of the left. Asdrubal, knowing that his Gauls were secured by the advantage of their situation, made his greatest efforts against the left of the enemy. There the battle continued obstinate a long time. At length Nero, unable to mount the eminence to attack the Gauls, and impatient of inaction, chose out the stoutest of his soldiers, and having led them round the rear of their own army, fell upon the Africans and Spaniards in flank and rear. Victory then declared for the Romans; and Asdrubal (after having performed all the duties of a great General) seeing the entire rout of his troops, and unwilling to survive their defeat, threw himself into the midst of a Roman battalion, and was slain. There were more elephants killed by the Carthaginians than by the enemy: for when the beasts grew unruly, their riders drove a sharp iron into the joint, where the head is set on to the neck. This (says Livy) was found to be the quickest method of dispatching those animals, a method invented by Asdrubal. According to the Latin Historian, the Carthaginians had 56,000 men killed in the battle, and 5400 taken prisoners; above 4000 Roman captives were found in the enemy's camp; the Romans lost, in the action, 8000 men. But Polybius says, that of the Carthaginians there died only 10,000 men, and of the Romans 2000. Livy reports that the conquerors were so fatigued with slaughtering their enemies, that the next day, when advice was brought to Livius, that a large body of Ligurians and Cisalpine Gauls (who either had not been in the battle or had escaped from it) were going off in great disorder, without leaders and without ensigns, and that it would be very easy to put them all to the sword; No matter, said he, let some remain to carry the news of their own defeat, and of our bravery. Nero set out from the camp of his colleague the night after the battle, and in six days time reached his own camp at Canusium.

The joy of the people at Rome, on the news of this success, was equal to the fears they had been in, on account of Nero's march. It quite changed the face of the city: from this time the citizens ventured to make contracts, to buy and sell, lend money, and pay debts, as securely as in a time of peace. Nero, at his return to his camp, ordered Asdrubal's head, which he had brought with him, to be thrown before the advanced guards of the enemy, and some African prisoners to be exposed in chains to their view. Two of these prisoners he set at liberty, and sent them to Hannibal's camp, to give him an account of the victory. The Carthaginian, struck with a blow so fatal to his Republic and his family, is said to have cried out, It is like the fortune of Carthage. He immediately decamped, and retired into Bruttium with all his forces. Thither he transplanted the Metapontines and all those of the Lucanians who still adhered to him; preparing to defend this corner of Italy, since he was obliged to abandon the rest of it.

Y. R. 546.
Bef. Chr.
206.
245 Conf.

Polyb. B.
11. c. 3.
Orosius, B.
4. Liv. B.
27. c. 50,
51.

Y. R. 226.
 Bef. Chr.
 226.
 225 Cons.

To add to the good fortune of the Republic this year, the Pro-Consul Sulpicius, in conjunction with Attalus King of Pergamus and the other allies, had kept Philip employed in Greece, and thereby secured Italy from an invasion from that quarter. And Latinus had gained a victory over the Carthaginians at sea, and sent a large supply of corn from Sicily to Rome.

From some motive not known, the Romans were desirous of having a Dictator to preside at the approaching elections. Nero named his Colleague Livius to that dignity. Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and L. Veturius Maximus, who had both distinguished themselves by their valour in the last campaign under Livius, were chosen Consul.

Y. R. 227.
 227.
 227 Cons.

These new Generals had orders to carry on the war jointly in Italy against Hannibal. And now, strange as it may appear, the Carthaginian made himself feared, even in the low condition to which the defeat and death of his brother had reduced him: He gained some advantages over the Consuls, in the plains of Consentia; and they durst not attack him in his camp. Hannibal never appeared greater than in his adversity. Who, (says Polybius) that considers attentively Hannibal's conduct, how many great battles he fought, how many lesser actions he was engaged in, the prodigious number of towns he took, the various turns of fortune he experienced, and the difficult situations in which he often found himself, during the course of a sixteen years war, which he alone supported against the most powerful state in the world: Who that considers these things can help admiring his extraordinary talents as a General? And though, during all that time, he kept the field with his army, and that army was a mixture of Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks, differing in their laws, customs and languages, and having no other bond of union but his command; and though they were often in want of necessaries, [especially, adds Livy, when confined to Bruttium, a country little able to sustain them in its prosperity, much less when exhausted by so long a war, and when its inhabitants were forced to leave tilling their lands, to enlist as soldiers] such was the excellence of Hannibal's discipline, that no sedition ever happened amongst his troops, no mutiny against the General.

Polyb. B.
 11. c. 17.

Livy. B. 23.
 c. 12.

Polybius adds, that had the Carthaginian invaded the other parts of the world first, and reserved Italy for his last attempt, it is not to be doubted, but he would have succeeded in all his undertakings: But having begun where he should have ended, his illustrious actions found their period on the same theatre, where they had their commencement.

* According to Appian [in Syr. c. 91.] he took no less than 200 in Italy.

^b Polyb. de Virt. & Viti. Excerpt. ex Lib. 9. tells us, that Hannibal was the sole spring and director of the second Punic war.

“ He carried it on in Italy by himself; in Spain by his brother, Hannibal, then Mago; in Sicily by Hippocrates, and afterwards by Mago [Mutines]; and in Greece by King Philip.”

C H A P. XXXIII.

The continuation of the events of the war in Spain, after the departure of Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, from that country.

THE next day after the battle in which Scipio is said * to have defeated Asdrubal, and driven him over the Pyrenees, he assembled the prisoners, amounting to 10,000 foot and 2000 horse: He ordered the Africans to be sold, but the Spaniards he dismissed, without ransom. This act of generosity had such an effect upon the Spaniards in general, that they with one voice saluted him King. The Roman answered, that “to him the greatest title was that of Imperator, which his soldiers gave him; that the name of King, so much respected in other places, was intolerable at Rome: That, if to have a royal soul was in their estimation the highest character among men, they might silently think of him as they pleased, but he desired they would forbear the appellation.”

Y. R. 545.

— See p.
229, and
247.

There seems to have been no more action this year in Spain. The Carthaginians had two Generals in that country, Mago, the brother of Hannibal, and Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, each with an army. Mago resigned his troops to Asdrubal, and went into the Baleares to make new levies there, while the latter posted himself in Lusitania near the Straights of Gades. Scipio wintered at Tarraco.

The year following, Silanus, the Pro-Prætor under Scipio, with a detachment of 10,000 foot and 500 horse, routed the united forces of Mago and Hanno, which latter had been sent from Africa with an army to supply the place of Hannibal's brother Asdrubal. Hanno was taken prisoner in the action, but Mago escaped with his broken troops to Asdrubal (the son of Gisco.) These with their united strength, marched from Gades into Bætica, in order to protect their allies in that country, but at the approach of Scipio, were obliged to return to the place from whence they came. Upon their departure, the Pro-Consul sent his brother Lucius to besiege Oringi, a city of importance at the head of the Bætis, and after the reduction of that town, retired to Tarraco for the winter.

Y. R. 546.

Mago, having employed himself for some time in making levies among the Spaniards, brought such recruits to Asdrubal, that the army consisted of 54,000, some say 74,000 men. With these forces the two Generals, in conjunction with Masiniſſa, marched the following spring in quest of the Romans, and encamped in a vast plain near a town called Silpia, on the confines of Bætica. Scipio, upon the news of the enemy's surprizing preparations, thought it necessary for him also to arm the Spaniards; but remembering the misfortune that befel his father

Y. R. 547.

Y. R. 547.
Ber. Chr.
225.
246 C. 256.

father and uncle, by relying on them too much, he resolved to be cautious of employing them on critical occasions. Having swelled his army to 45,000 foot and 3000 horse, he moved from Tarraco, marched towards the Carthaginians, and pitched his camp in the same plain with them.

P. 55. L.
21. C. 22.

The two armies were frequently drawn up before their entrenchments; and as Scipio observed, that Asdrubal always placed his best troops, which were his Africans, in the center, and his Spaniards in the two wings, he constantly posted his Spaniards in the wings, and his Romans in the center. But this he did to deceive the enemy. For when the day came, on which he resolved to give battle, he changed this disposition, and placed his legionaries in the two wings, and the Spaniards in the middle. In this order he marched out of his camp very early in the morning, and sent his cavalry and the light armed foot to provoke the enemy; insomuch that Asdrubal was obliged to draw out his men before they had taken their usual refreshment. In the mean time Scipio advanced with his infantry. At his approach, his cavalry and Velites, pursuant to orders, ceased the fight, and retired through the intervals of the foot. He then directed his center to move on slowly, but his wings to advance very fast, the cavalry and light armed men at the same time moving from the rear, and extending themselves to fall upon the enemy in flank. Thus the bravest of his troops came to an engagement with the weakest of the opposite army, and defeated them before the two centers could join battle. And the great prudence of the Roman General, in this conduct, was visible, when after he had routed the enemies wings, he came to attack their center; for the Africans made so stout a resistance, as almost quite disheartened the Romans; insomuch that Scipio (as one author relates) was forced to dismount, and throw himself, sword in hand, into the midst of the enemy's battalions, before he could engage his men to make the necessary efforts to complete the victory. But then the Africans gave ground, and the slaughter was terrible. Asdrubal, with the run-aways, gained the camp; but the Spaniards deserted him so fast, that he laid aside the thought of fortifying himself there, and retired in the night towards the shore of the ocean. Scipio pursued, and came up with him; and, after a second slaughter, the three chiefs, Asdrubal, Mago, and Masiniissa, had no more than six thousand men left about them, and these for the most part disarmed. With all expedition they gained the summit of a steep hill, and there entrenched themselves as well as they could. Asdrubal perceiving that these remains of his army continually lessened, abandoned them in the night. The sea was near, he found ships ready to sail, and embarked for Gades. Scipio being informed of Asdrubal's flight, left Silanus with ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to besiege the enemy's camp, and he himself with the rest of his forces marched back to Tarraco. After his departure, Masiniissa had had private conferences with Silanus, and entered into engagements to favour the Roman cause. Mago escaped to Gades with some ships which Asdrubal had sent him; and the soldiers abandoned by their Generals, either went over to the enemy, or dispersed themselves up and down the country.

Appian in Judea.

V. R. 54.
Esf. Cl. 1.
2. c.
2:6 Cl. 11.

The Carthaginian power in Spain was now almost totally reduced; but the Pro-Consul did not confine his views to Spain alone. He began to think of paving his way to Africa. Syphax, King of Masæsyliæ, was now in alliance with the Carthaginians; and, as Scipio knew that the Numidian's friendship to them would not be more constant than their good fortune, he sent his friend Lælius to persuade him to break the treaty. Lælius's arguments wrought conviction; but he being only a subaltern in Scipio's army, the King insisted, for his greater security, upon having a personal conference with the Pro-Consul himself; and he protested, that if Scipio would come into Numidia, he should be received there with honour, and dismissed with satisfaction. The Roman considered the hazard of such an enterprize; but being above the fear of danger, when he had the interest of his Republic in view, (leaving Marcus at Tarraco, with a part of his troops, and ordering Silanus with the rest to New Carthage,) embarked with Lælius for Africa, and arrived at the capital of King Syphax. Asdrubal happened to arrive there the same day from Spain; and nothing could be more agreeable to the Numidian Prince, than to see two Generals of the two most powerful nations in the world, at his court, at the same time; and both come to seek his alliance. He first put on the person of a mediator, and would have had Scipio enter into a conference with the Carthaginian, in order to an amicable accommodation. But Scipio excused himself, as not having received any commission from his Republic to treat of peace. However, he accepted of an invitation to dine at the King's table with Asdrubal. And then not only Syphax, a stranger to the Roman manners, but even Asdrubal a Carthaginian, a mortal enemy, was charmed with his conversation. The latter is reported to have said, "That he did not question but Syphax and his kingdom " would soon be at the devotion of the Romans, such an art had Scipio " of conciliating to him the hearts of men: That the Carthaginians " need not enquire how Spain was lost, but how Africa might be pre- " served: That Scipio's voyages were not voyages of pleasure; that " he would not have crossed the sea with only two vessels, nor put " himself in the power of a King whose honour he had never tried, " but with a view to gain all Africa." Asdrubal judged rightly. Syphax entered into a treaty with Scipio; and, lest the Roman, in his return to Spain, should be attacked at sea by Asdrubal's galleys, kept the Carthaginians with him, and amused them till the Pro-Consul was safely arrived at New Carthage.

Liv. B. 28.
c. 17.

Livy, B. 28.
c. 18.

Appian in Ibericis.

His

Y. R. 47.
B. C. 187.
225.
226 C. 187.
L. P. 23.
C. 12.

His chief business now was to punish the nations and cities which had signalized themselves against the Romans, and to keep the Spaniards in awe by examples of severity. He marched in person to besiege Illiturgi, and sent Marcus to invest Cástulo. The former, which, Livy says, had revolted to the enemy after the death of the two Scipios, was taken by assault, sacked and burnt; and men, women, and children, put to the sword. The latter capitulated, and was more favourably treated. From Cástulo, Marcus went and appeared before Astapa, a city obstinately devoted to the Carthaginians. The inhabitants, being desperate, brought all their moveables, and threw them in a heap in the market-place; and then putting their wives and children on the top of the pile, and encompassing it with faggots, they chose out fifty of the most steady of the citizens, to guard this dear depositum; and spoke to them in the following manner: Be assured, we will either repay the Romans, or die in the attempt. If we are overcome, do you, upon the first news of the enemy's approach, save the honour and liberty of our wives and children. First make use of your swords, and then of fire, to preserve the remains of an unfortunate people from captivity and insult. After this they did not wait to be attacked, but marched out at one of the gates, in good order, to give battle; and all died fighting. And the news of this slaughter produced another in the heart of the city: The fifty Astapans discharged their trust, and then threw themselves into the flames.

L. B. 23.
C. 22.

L. B. 23.
C. 22.

Whilst Marcus was executing vengeance on these cities, Scipio returned to New Carthage, where he entertained his army with a fight of gladiators, in honour to the manes of his father and uncle, pursuant to a vow he had made. On this occasion two Spanish Princes are said to have fought in duel with each other for a principality. During these diversions, some deserters arrived from Gades, the only city of Spain in the Carthaginian interest; and upon their report of a conspiracy, among the Gallians, to put the Romans into possession of the place, Scipio dispatched Marcus, with some troops by land, and Lælius by sea, with eight ships, to carry on the enterprize. But Lælius, in his passage, having met and defeated eight Carthaginian triremes, learnt from the prisoners, that the conspirators at Gades had been discovered, and sent in chains to Carthage to be tried there. Whereupon he gave Marcus notice of it, advising him to lead back his troops; and he himself likewise returned to New Carthage.

L. P. 23.
C. 22.

And now it appeared, how necessary Scipio's presence was, both to preserve his conquests in Spain, and to maintain discipline in the army. He happened to fall dangerously sick; and Fame made his case worse than it was; nay, a report prevailed that he was dead; and this had such an effect, that not only Indibilis (a petty King before mentioned), and his brother Mandonius, who had not been rewarded suitably to their expectations, immediately revolted from the Romans, and stirred up the Carthaginians

Celtiberians against them; but eight thousand Roman legionaries, who were incamped on the banks of the Sucro, to keep that part of Spain in awe, mutinied, cast off their leaders, (who would not enter into their measures) and chose two insolent common soldiers, Atrius and Albius, to conduct them. And the madness of these two fellows rose to such a height, that they usurped the consular dignity, and ordered Lictors to walk before them. The pretence for the mutiny was want of pay, which they had not received for six months. They also demanded to be led against the enemy, or if Spain was already reduced, to be permitted to return to Italy.

Y. R. 547.
Bef. Ch.
23.
246 Conf.

The Pro-Consul recovered his health; but was much embarrassed how to manage the mutineers, so as not to push them to extremities, and yet to make such examples as should keep his troops in their duty. He at length decoyed them to New Carthage, by promising to pay them their arrears there, and by giving such orders as deceived them into a belief, that the troops with him were immediately to go, under the command of Silanus, upon an expedition against Indibilis and Mandonius; which would leave the Pro-Consul absolutely at the mercy of the malcontents. Full of these hopes, they entered the city. Scipio had before sent seven Tribunes to them, to supply the place of those whom they had driven away. And these, who had by an artful conduct gained the confidence of the rebels, were ordered each of them to invite five of the most guilty to his house, make them drink plentifully, then bind them, and give the general notice of the success. Thirty-five of the mutineers were thus secured, without the knowledge of the rest. The next morning, by break of day, Silanus, who was to lead away the faithful troops, pretended to make preparation for his march, and drew up his manipuli near the gates: But he had secret orders to return into the heart of the city, upon a signal agreed on. Scipio, at a proper time, gave the usual notice for his soldiers to assemble in the market-place; and upon the first sound of the trumpet, the seditious all ran thither without their arms, as the laws required. Silanus, at the same time, brought back his armed troops, and surrounded the assembly. The Pro-Consul, in a long harangue, expostulated with the mutineers on the baseness and folly of their late proceeding, when the sum of their grievances could amount to no more than this: That their General, being sick, had neglected to pay them at the usual time. As soon as he had ended his speech, the names of the thirty-five chiefs of the revolt who had been already condemned by a council of war, were called over; they appeared before the Tribunal half naked, were whipped, and afterwards beheaded by the Lictors. Then the Herald called over the names of all the rest of the mutineers; the General took the military oath of them anew; and thus ended the sedition.

Liv. B. 28.
C. 25.
Polyb. B.
11. c. 23.
---25.

Liv. B. 28.
C. 27.

Y. R. 547.
Bef. Chr.
205.
246 Cons.
L. v. B. 28.
c. 32.

Pol. B.
21. c. 29.

Li. B. 28.
c. 34.

c. 35.

Scipio was yet at New Carthage, when he received an account that Indibilis and Mandonius had raised an army among their subjects and allies, of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, and were living upon free quarter, in the territories of the friends of Rome. It was necessary to put a stop to the progress of these faithless Princes, and to employ the seditious troops (who were now quiet, and had received their pay) jointly with the rest, in the expedition. Scipio therefore having assembled all in the market-place, spoke to this effect: The resolution I have taken to punish the perfidious Spaniards, gives me much less uneasiness than the vengeance I was forced to execute on the late mutineers. Among these, I found none but citizens of Rome, or Latines, old soldiers who had been attached to my father, and the companions of my victories. I could not do justice upon them without tears. But among those I am going to punish, I shall find none but strangers and ingrates, robbers and their leaders, who lay waste the fields of our allies, and burn their houses. Let us go then and clear the plains of these Banditti; nor let it be said, that in this province so happily subdued, we left in arms one single enemy of the Roman name. Whilst the Pro-Consul was speaking, he saw alacrity and joy painted on every face; and taking advantage of the present disposition of his soldiers, he immediately began his march. In fourteen days he came up with the enemy in the country of the Sedetani, and there gained a complete victory. The Spaniards lost about two thirds of their army, the rest escaped with Indibilis and Mandonius. These brothers had now no resource but in the clemency of the conqueror. Mandonius came and fell at the Pro-Consul's feet, begging pardon for the King, and for himself. He laid the blame of their revolt on the misfortunes of the times, and the unaccountable effect which the report of Scipio's death had caused in the minds of men, even of the Romans themselves. The Pro-Consul gave him the following answer: Both Indibilis and you have deserved to die; live nevertheless, and owe your lives to my favour, and the favour of the Roman people. I shall not disarm you: That would look as if I feared you. Neither will I take vengeance upon your blameless hostages, should you again rebel, but upon yourselves. Consider therefore whether you shall like better to feel the effects of our clemency in peace, or to experience the severity of our revenge. Scipio carried his resentments no farther; only he obliged the two Princes to furnish him with a large sum of money. Then he divided his army into two parts; gave one to Silanus, to conduct it to Tarraco; and ordered Marcus to lead the other to the shores of the ocean. He himself joined the latter soon after near Gades.

The Pro-Consul's chief design in this journey was to fix Masiniſſa in the interest of Rome: The Numidian, who was then at Gades with Mago, delayed concluding an alliance with the Republic, till he should confer with Scipio in person, and have his sanction to the treaty. Upon the approach of the Roman General, Masiniſſa representing ing to Mago, that the cavalry were not only a burthen to the island, but would be ruined by inaction and want of forage, obtained leave to transport them to the continent. He was no sooner landed, but he sent three Numidian chiefs to the Pro-Consul; who, with them, fixed the time and place for an interview. Masiniſſa had already conceived a high opinion of Scipio, and was confirmed in that opinion by the first sight of him. The Pro-Consul had an equal mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance; he was in his full strength, and in the bloom of manly beauty. His hair flowed down his back to a great length. There was nothing affected, or too negligent about him; his habit plain, but neat, and such as became a soldier, who despised the studied elegancies of dress. The Numidian began with a compliment of thanks for Scipio's having formerly sent him back his nephew, taken prisoner in battle; assuring him, that ever since that time he had been seeking the opportunity which now presented itself, and desired nothing more earnestly than a strict union with Scipio and Rome. He added, that if the Republic would send the Pro-Consul into Africa at the head of an army, he did not doubt but the domination of Carthage would soon be at an end. Scipio returned these advances with dignity and politeness; and was extremely pleased to engage in his interest a prince, who, in every battle, had been the soul of the enemy's cavalry; and whose very aspect promised a man of spirit. The treaty concluded, Scipio set out for Tarraco. The Numidian concealed the true design of his excursion, by pillaging some part of the continent, before he went back to Gades; and Mago soon after abandoned the place, having received orders to go to the assistance of his brother Hannibal in Italy.

Y. R. 547.
Bel. Chr.
209.
246 Conf.

Liv. B. 24.
c. 36, 37.

The Carthaginian signalized his departure from Gades, by cruel exactions and oppressions. He stripped the temples, plundered the public treasury, and forced private persons to give him their gold and silver. His view was, with this money to raise new levies among the Ligurians in Cisalpine Gaul. But as he coasted along Spain in his way thither, he formed a rash design of surprizing New Carthage, and in the attempt lost eight hundred men. After this misfortune he returned to Gades, where finding the gates shut against him, he retired to Cimbis, a neighbouring city. From thence he sent deputies to the Gaditani, (who were themselves a colony of Phœnicians, as well as the Carthaginians) to complain of their proceedings. The chief magistrate and the treasurer of the city went out to him, and assured him, that the refusal he had met with was owing wholly to the populace, whom the Carthaginian soldiers had plundered at their departure. This civility Mago returned with cruelty, causing the deputies to be inhumanly scourged, and afterwards crucified. He then steered his course towards the Baleares, landed at the island now called Minorca, forced two thousand of the inhabitants into the service of his Republic, and sent them to Carthage. Winter approaching, he did not sail for Italy till the spring.

V. R. 547.
Esf. Chr.
205.
246 Conf.

Zon. B. 9.
c. 11.
Liv. B. 28.
c. 38.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 1.

As soon as Mago had left Spain, the Gaditani submitted to the Romans; and Scipio's conquest was complete. Before he got back to Tarraco, two new Pro-Consuls, Cornelius Lentulus and Manlius Acidinus, arrived in the port with commissions from the Senate, one to govern Hisber Spain, the other Further Spain. Scipio surrendered up the fasces; and attended by his brother Lucius, and his friend Lælius, immediately set sail with ten ships for Italy.

Scarce was Scipio gone, when Indibilis and Mandonius, despising the new Pro-Consuls, revolted, and engaged several of the Spanish nations to take arms to recover their independence. They got together 30,000 foot, and about 4000 horse. Lentulus and Acidinus endeavoured to bring them back to obedience by negotiations. These proving ineffectual, a battle ensued; Indibilis was slain, the confederate army totally routed, 13,000 of them killed, and 800 taken prisoners.

The Spaniards, to preserve their countries from the ravages of the enemy, seized Mandonius with the other heads of the revolt, and sent them in custody to the camp of the Pro-Consuls, who had insisted on this as a condition of their shewing mercy to the vanquished. Thus was the confederacy broken; and Spain continued for some years in tranquillity.

C H A P. XXXIV.

FOURTEENTH YEAR of the War.

Scipio chosen Consul, goes into Sicily to prepare for invading Africa. He surprises Locri. The cruelties exercised by the Pro-Prætor Pleminius in that city. The Romans send for the Goddess Cybele from Pessinus in Phrygia. A miracle wrought at her landing.

Liv. B. 28.
c. 38.

WHEN Scipio arrived from Spain, he did not immediately enter within the walls of Rome, but according to the established custom of Generals, continued in the suburbs, till the Senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona, had heard the relation of his expeditions. He gave them a detail of his exploits, told them how many battles he had fought, how many towns he had taken, and what nations he had subdued, adding, that though he had found in Spain four Carthaginian Generals at the head of four flourishing armies, yet he had not left in the country one Carthaginian in arms. But though Scipio deserved a triumph, he demanded it but faintly, as knowing that the laws were against his having that honour: His appointment to the Pro-

Pro-Consulship had been extraordinary, and out of rule: He had not passed to it from the Consulship, nor had he taken the command of an army under the sanction of the Greater Auspices, like the Consuls. However, he adorned his entry into Rome by a great quantity of silver, which he had brought from Spain for the public treasury, and which was carried before him in the procession.

V. R. 648.
B.C. Cnr.
264.
217 Cons.

And now the Comitia being held for electing new Consuls, it is not to be expressed with what zeal the Centuries gave their suffrages in favour of Scipio, though he had not yet attained to the years customarily required for that dignity, being only between twenty-eight and twenty-nine years of age. The Collegue appointed him was P. Licinius Crassus, surnamed Dives, who being at this time Pontifex Maximus, an office which confined him to Italy, the province of Sicily was given to Scipio without drawing lots. But Scipio could not be satisfied, unless he had also a commission to go immediately with an army into Africa. The matter was debated in the Senate. Scipio depending upon the favour of the people, had not scrupled openly to give out, that he had been appointed Consul, Not only to carry on the war, but to finish it; that this could be done no other way than by his transporting an army into Africa, and that if the Senate should oppose this design, he would have recourse to the people, and put it in execution by their authority. These unguarded words had given great offence to the Fathers. Old Fabius, now president of the Senate, declared loudly against the pretensions of the young Consul, and employed all his eloquence to hinder his being sent into Africa. In a long and studied harangue he set forth the difficulties of such an enterprize, the fatal consequences which might attend it, and the necessity of driving Hannibal out of Italy, before the war could safely be carried into the neighbourhood of Carthage. He said it would be endless to enumerate all the instances of Kings and Generals, who, by rash invasions of foreign countries, had ruined themselves and their armies. He mentioned the irreparable mischief which had happened to the Athenians, by their descent upon Sicily, in pursuance of the advice of Alcibiades, a noble youth, and an expert General. But he insisted especially on the more recent and interesting example of Atilius Regulus, the catastrophe of whose fortune, fair in its beginning, ought to be a useful lesson to them. And Fabius took great pains to guard against the suspicion of his being actuated by emulation or jealousy of another's glory in this opposition to Scipio's desires. "I, said he, am grown old in the possession of honours. Two Dictatorships, five Consulships, the success of my counsels, many victories raise me above any rivalry with a young General, not yet come to the years of my son. When I was Dictator, and in the full career of glory, and when my General of the horse, a man incessantly declaiming against me, was put upon an equality with me in the command, (an unprecedented hardship) no one heard me, either in the Senate or

Liv. B. 28.
c. 40. &
seq.

Plut. life
of Fabius

" in.

Y. R. 228.
 B.C. 187.
 24th C. 21.

“ in the assemblies of the people, refuse to acquiesce. And is it likely “ that now, in my old age, when weary of public affairs, weary of “ the world, and even of life itself, I should enter into an emulation “ with a youth, a general in the prime of life, full of vigour and “ activity; or that I expect to have the province of Africa assigned “ to me, if it should be denied to him? No, I am content with the glory
 “ I have acquired. It is enough for me to have hindered Hannibal “ from completing his conquest, that by younger Captains, you that “ are in the flower of your age and strength, he might be after“ wards entirely overcome. But you will pardon me, P. Cornelius, if “ I, who, for the sake of the commonwealth, always neglected popular “ applause, and my own private advantage, cannot now to the real “ welfare of the Republic prefer the imaginary interests of your glory.
 “ I say, imaginary interests. For no sooner will you have a view of “ that coast, whither you are so eager to sail, than you will be sensible “ that your exploits in Spain were but sport and play, in comparison of “ what you will have to do in Africa. In Spain you landed at Emporie, “ a confederate port; and, through countries in alliance with Rome, or “ guarded by Roman troops, you marched safe and undisturbed to “ New Carthage, which you had opportunity to besiege, without fear “ of molestation from any one of the Carthaginian Generals, who were “ then all at a great distance. In Africa, no friendly port to receive “ your fleet, no ally to add strength to your army—unless you trust to “ Syphax and the Numidians. You trusted them once; let that suf“ fice: Rashness is not always fortunate. The fraudulent sometimes “ procure themselves credit by fidelity in small things, that they may “ afterwards the more easily deceive in matters of moment, and “ when it can serve a weighty interest. Syphax and Masiniissa, it is not “ to be doubted, would gladly be more powerful in Africa than the “ Carthaginians; but it is as little to be questioned, they had rather “ Carthage should have the superiority there than strangers. Emula“ tion prevails amongst those powers, while the fear of foreign arms is “ yet remote: Let them but once see the Roman banners displayed in “ Africa, and they will all run together as to extinguish a fire, that “ threatens the general destruction. What if Carthage, confiding in “ the strength of her walls, the fidelity of her allies, and the unani-“ mity of all the States around her, should resolve, when she sees Italy
 “ no longer guarded by you and your troops, to pour in upon us a “ new army from Africa? Or order Mago, who is even now with a “ fleet on the coast of Liguria, to join his brother Hannibal? We “ should then be in the same terror as when Asdrubal invaded Italy, “ that Asdrubal, whom you, who, with your army, are to invest not “ only Carthage, but all Africa, suffered to slip through your hands into “ this country. You will say, you vanquished him. Be it so. But I “ could

“ could wish then, for your own sake, as well as for the sake of the “ Republic, that you had not opened a passage for the same van“ quished man to come into Italy. However, let us ascribe to your “ wise conduct every enterprize of yours that prospered, and all your “ ill success to fortune and the chance of war. The more brave and “ the more worthy you are, the more it concerns your country and all “ Italy to retain such a protector. That where-ever Hannibal is, there “ is the principal seat of this war, you yourself allow, since to draw him “ into Africa is your sole pretence for passing thither. With Hannibal “ therefore you purpose to contend, whether here or there. And will “ you be stronger in that country, and alone, than here, when joined by “ your Collegue and his army? Will Hannibal be weaker in the neigh“ bourhood of Carthage, and supported by all Africa, than now, when “ he is confined to a corner of Bruttium, and in want of supplies, which “ he has long, but in vain, demanded from his country? Would a “ prudent man chuse to fight where the enemy is double his number,
 “ when he may with two armies attack one, and this one already fatigued “ and exhausted by many battles and a distressful war. Consider how “ different your conduct is from your father’s. He, though on his “ way to carry the war into Spain, returned to meet Hannibal at the “ foot of the Alps: You, while Hannibal is in Italy, are preparing to “ leave the country, not because it is advantageous to the Republic,
 “ but because you think it for your glory; as when, being General “ for the Roman people, you, against law, and without authority from “ the Senate, left your province and your army, and with only two “ ships sailed to Africa, hazarding in your person the interest of the “ public, and the majesty of the empire. My opinion, Conscript “ Fathers, is, that P. Cornelius was created Consul, not for himself, “ but for us and for the Republic; and that the armies were raised for “ the defence of Rome and Italy, and not that the Consuls might, out “ of pride, like Kings, transport them into whatever countries they “ pleased.”

Y. R. 548.
 Bcl. Chr.
 254.
 247 Conf.

Notwithstanding what Fabius had said of his own integrity, and his unmixed zeal for his country’s good on the present occasion, Scipio did not fail to observe, that while the old man was proving himself free from all jealousy or emulation, he had taken particular care to extol his own actions, and to depreciate those of a young man, with whom, nevertheless, it was impossible he should have any competition for glory. He then proceeded to justify his design of going into Africa. “ Fabius tells us, that it is “ an inaccessible coast, that there is no port open to receive us. He “ reminds us of Atilius Regulus, taken captive in Africa; as if Regulus “ had failed in attempting a descent on that country. He forgets, that “ this unfortunate Commander found the Carthaginian havens open, “ performed many noble actions the first year, and, to the last, remained “ unconquerable by any Carthaginian General. But, it seems, we are “ to.”

Y. R. 223.
 B. C. 207.
 223.
 227. C. 207.
 * See p. 11.

“ to take warning from the example of the Athenians. If we have “ leisure, Conscrip Fathers, to hearken to Grecian tales, why does he “ not rather speak of Agathocles, King of Syracuse, who, when Sicily “ was distressed by the Carthaginians, transferred * the war from that “ island to the very gates of Carthage?” He then asserted that no method could be so effectual to force Hannibal out of Italy as to carry the war into Africa, whither Carthage would undoubtedly recal him in so pressing a danger. He argued, that since the allies of Rome had deserted her after the battle of Cannæ, and this in greater numbers than Hannibal himself could have expected, certainly the Carthaginian Republic, imperious and oppressive to her subjects, and faithless to her allies, had little reason to depend on the constancy of the Africans. That as she had no inherent strength, and was obliged to trust absolutely to mercenaries, or to allies, whose very character was inconstancy, she would not be able to support the war like Rome, potent by her own strength, and whose citizens were all soldiers. He concluded with these words, “It “ would be tedious, and what no way concerns you, Conscrip Fathers, “ if, as Q. Fabius has made light of my actions in Spain, I should at“ tempt to lessen his merit, and extol my own. I shall therefore do “ neither: In moderation at least, and in continence of speech, if in “ nothing else, young as I am, I will surpass this old General. Such “ has been the constant tenor of my life and actions, both in public “ and private, that I can be silent on this subject, and easily rest con“ tented with the opinion which you have formed of me.”

Scipio’s discourse was not favourably received by the Senate. The report that he intended to have recourse to the people, had prejudiced the assembly against him. Fulvius, who had been twice Consul and once Censor, desired him to declare frankly, whether he would refer the affair of the provinces to the deliberation of the Fathers, and acquiesce in their decree, or, in case he should not like it, appeal from it to the people. Scipio answered, that he would do what he thought most conducive to the public welfare. To which Fulvius replied:
 “ When I asked you these questions, I was not ignorant either of what “ you would answer, or of what you would do; for it is plain your de“ sign is rather to sound than consult the Senate; and unless we im“ mediately decree you the province you desire, you are prepared to lay “ the matter before the people.” Then turning towards the Tribunes of the Commons, “I refuse, said he, to declare my opinion; because, “ should it be approved by the Senate, the Consul would not submit
 “ to their determination: And I desire you, Tribunes, to support me “ in this refusal.” Scipio contended, that it was not equitable for the Tribunes to obstruct a Consul in his demanding the opinion of any Senator. They nevertheless pronounced, That, if the Consul would refer the matter in question to the Senate, the Senate’s decree should stand; nor would they suffer an appeal from it to the people; but if he would not refer

refer the matter to the Senate, they would support all those who should refuse to declare their opinions. Scipio desired one day's time to consult with his Collegue. To this they consented. The day following the assembly met again, and then, the Consul submitting the affair to the determination of the Conscript Fathers, without appeal, they decreed, That Scipio should have Sicily, and the fleet of thirty ships of war, now commanded by the Prætor of that island; and that if he thought it for the advantage of the Republic, he might sail to Africa. As for Licinius, he was directed to carry on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium.

S. R. 548.
Bef. Chr.
204.
247 Cons.

Though Africa was not assigned to Scipio as his province, nor any levies granted him for the enterprize which he had in view; nevertheless, he obtained leave to take with him into Sicily as many volunteers as he could assemble; and also permission to ask of the allies all necessaries for building and equipping a new fleet. Many of the provinces and cities voluntarily taxed themselves, in order to furnish him, not only with materials for the ships, but with arms and provisions for the marines. So that in five and forty days time after bringing the timber from the forest, he was in a condition to set sail with a fleet of thirty new galleys, and about seven thousand volunteers^b.

Liv. B. 28.
c. 45.

About this time Mago (the brother of Hannibal) with twelve thousand foot and near two thousand horse, landed at Genoa and took it: And finding two nations of Liguria, the Ingaunians and Intemelians, at war, he joined the former, his army increasing daily by the great number of Gauls that flocked to him from all parts. These advices from Spurius Lucretius, who commanded in Cisalpine Gaul, caused a general alarm in the Senate: They ordered M. Livius to march his army, of Volones, then in Ætulia, to Ariminum; and Levinus, to lead the legions appointed for the defence of Rome, to Arretium. Other advices came, that Octavius the Prætor of Sardinia had taken fourscore ships of burden belonging to the Carthaginians. In Bruttium no remarkable action happened between the armies this campaign. The plague raged in Licinius's camp; and Hannibal's troops were afflicted with pestilence and famine at the same time.

c. 46.

^a From this decree, and the after conduct of the Senate, it is not improbable what Livy hints, [speaking of the transactions of the next year] that their design was to make preparations for carrying the war into Africa, without doing it by public authority; and to lull the Carthaginians into security, by making them believe, that these preparations were only the effect of Scipio's ambition, which the Senate would not fail to oppose. Quoniam nondum aperte Africa provincia decreta erat (occultantibus id, credo, Patribus, ne præsciscerent Carthaginenses) tamen in eam sperem creta civitas erat, in Africa eo anno debellatum iri, finemque bello Punico adesse. Liv. L. 29. c. 14.

^b According to Plutarch, Fabius would have engaged the Consul Licinius, to obstruct Scipio's measures: Not succeeding herein, he dissuaded the Roman youth from following him into Sicily, as volunteers; and he had before, by his influence in the Senate, hindered any funds being assigned to Scipio, for the expence of his armament.

Y. R. 548.
Bef. Chr.
204.
247. Conf.

Scipio was busy in Sicily, forming an army for his African expedition. In his choice of men, he preferred, before all others, the veterans who had served under Marcellus at the siege of Syracuse. He refitted the old galleys he found in the island, gave the command of them to Lelius, and commissioned him to make a descent on Africa, and pillage the country.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 4.

Lelius landed near Hippo, and laid the territory about it waste; which threw the people of Cartbage into a great consternation: For they falsely imagined, that Scipio was come with a formidable army. When their fright, upon better information, was over, they sent ambassadors to Sypbax, and other princes of Africa, to renew their treaties with them; and also to King Philip of Macedon, offering him two hundred talents of silver, if he would invade either Italy or Sicily. Messengers were dispatched to Hannibal and Mago with instructions to these two brothers, to hinder, if possible, the departure of any troops which Scipio expected from Italy; and a reinforcement of six thousand foot and eight hundred horse was sent to Mago in Liguria, with large sums for hiring troops in Cisalpine Gaul.

Masiniſſa having learnt the arrival of Lelius in Africa, came to confer with him. He assured him, that there could not be a more favourable opportunity to attack Cartbage; and expressed his surprize that Scipio had lingered so long in Sicily. The King added, that though he was by violence dispossessed of the throne of his ancestors, yet he could still bring some troops into the field, and would join the Consul at his landing. He also told Lelius, that he believed a Cartbaginian fleet was already sailed out of the port to intercept him; and advised him to hasten his departure. Lelius took the Prince's counsel, weighed anchor the next day, and arrived safe in Sicily with his booty.

c. 5.

In the mean time, Mago received the reinforcement from Cartbage, with orders to raise as numerous an army as possible, and hasten to join his brother: Upon which he called a council of the chiefs of Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul, and endeavoured to persuade them to declare openly against Rome; and furnish him with troops. The Ligurians complied; but the Gauls durst not follow their example; because there were actually two Roman armies (under Livius and Lucretius) in their neighbourhood. However, they consented to his levying men privately in their country; and supplied him with provisions and forage. Livius led his army from Hebruria into Gaul, intending, if Mago approached Rome, to march in conjunction with Lucretius, and give him battle; but to post himself near Ariminum, in case the Cartbaginian should continue in Liguria; which it is probable he did, since we hear of no action in that part of Italy this campaign.

While Scipio was at Messina, he received information, that a plot was formed by some Locrians, then in exile at Rhegium, to surprize their native native city (which stood on the sea coast in Bruttium) and put it again into the hands of the Romans. He sent Pleminius with two Tribunes, and three thousand men, to assist in the enterprize. There were two citadels belonging to the place; and, when the Romans had made themselves masters of one, the Carthaginians retired into the other, leaving the inhabitants in sole possession of the city. These favoured the Romans; so that when Hannibal came to invest the place, they let in Scipio (who had hastened to their relief) privately in the night: The next morning he made a vigorous sally, and repulsed the assailants. Hannibal having learnt, that Scipio was in person at the head of his troops, immediately retired to his camp near the Alex, sending orders to the Carthaginians in the citadel to provide for their safety as well as they could. Hereupon, setting fire to the houses, they escaped amidst the confusion, and joined their general before night.

Y. R. 548.
Bef. Chr.
204.
247 Cons.

Scipio left the government of Locri to Pleminius, who treated the inhabitants more cruelly than if their city had been taken by assault: He rifled the temples of their Gods, and seized the treasure in the sanctuary of Proserpine. The two Tribunes were no less rapacious. Their soldiers, in a scuffle with those of the Pro-Prætor, about plunder, happened to wound some of them; of which these having made their complaint to him, he ordered the Tribunes to be whipt. But the Tribunes were rescued by their followers, who not only mauled the Lictors, but pulled Pleminius himself from off his tribunal, dragged him into a private place, beat him severely, cut off his nose and ears, and left him weltring in his blood. This accident made it necessary for Scipio to return to Locri. He took the part of the Pro-Prætor, put the Tribunes in chains, and ordered them to be carried to Rome to be judged. But this did not satisfy Pleminius: As soon as the Consul was gone, he of his own authority condemned the Tribunes to die by the most cruel torments, and their bodies to be left unburied; and, not yet content, he exercised the same cruelty towards those of the inhabitants who had complained to Scipio of his rapines and brutalities. The odium of these horrible actions fell in some measure upon the Consul: He had indeed been too indulgent to the guilty Governor; for which (as we shall see hereafter) his enemies, in the Senate, did not fail to inveigh against him, when occasion offered.

The time for the elections drew near: The Consul Licinius being sick of the plague, in his camp, could not go to Rome, to preside in the Comitia. He therefore, with the approbation of the Senate, named a Dictator for that purpose; and his choice fell upon Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who, in the quality of Pro-Consul, was commanding a second army in Bruttium. In this army also the plague so raged, that Licinius pressed the Senate to recall the troops, assuring them, that otherwise there would not be a soldier left alive.

Y. R. 548.
Bef. Chr.

204.
247 Conf.

Liv. B. 29.

C. 10.

App. in

Annib.

Ovid. Fast.

Liv. B. 29.

C. 11.

Liv. B. 29.

C. 14.

App. in

Annib.

345.

Many prodigies happening this year, and the Sybilline books being consulted for the proper expiations, the Decemvirs found it written in those oracles, That if a foreign enemy invaded Italy, he might be vanquished and driven out of it, if the Goddess Cybele were brought to Rome from Pessinus in Phrygia. This same Cybele (stiled the Mother of the Gods) was nothing more than a shapeless stone, which, as was pretended, had fallen down from Heaven upon Mount Ida. The Consul Fathers sent five ambassadors, men of distinction, to obtain by negotiation this powerful protectress. And, because the Romans had little commerce with the Asiatics, the ambassadors were to engage Attalus King of Pergamus in their interest. They went by the way of Delphi, and there consulted the Oracle; from which they received this answer, That by the help of Attalus they should infallibly obtain what they desired; but that, when they had carried the Goddess to Rome, they should put her into no hands, but of the most virtuous man in the Republic. King Attalus was so obliging as to conduct the ambassadors himself to Pessinus, where the inhabitants, with equal complaisance, granted them the stone they so earnestly desired. One of them sailed away before the rest, to give notice at Rome, that the Goddess was coming; and to report the answer of the Delphic Oracle. And now the great difficulty was, to find out that man of superior probity, who alone was worthy to receive the sacred and important stone, at its landing. History has not told us the remarkable virtues which gained P. Cornelius Scipio, surnamed Nasica, the preference before all others: but this young man, cousin-german to the great Scipio, and son to Cneius Scipio, (who lost his life in Spain) was the person who obtained the honourable distinction. Attended by such of the ladies of Rome, as were in the highest veneration for their virtue, he went to meet the Goddess. Some of the Vestals likewise accompanied him, and particularly Quinta Claudia; of whom it is related, that when the vessel, on which the Goddess was imported, unfortunately stuck upon a bank of sand near the mouth of the Tyber, and neither the mariners, nor several yoke of oxen, were able to move it, she, pulling it only by her girdle tied to it, easily set it afloat. Claudia is said to have been suspected of incontinence; and it is added, that this miracle was wrought in answer of her prayer to the Goddess, to give a testimony of her innocence. There are not wanting Fathers of the church, who allow the fact, but they piously impute it to good angels, sent by God, to destroy the unjust aspersion cast upon the Vestal. The day on which Cybele arrived at Rome became a solemn annual festival, distinguished by games, called Megaleses. She was deposited in the temple of VICTORY.

C H A P. XXXV.

FIFTEENTH YEAR of the War.

Scipio is continued in his command in Sicily.

He is accused in the Senate, by his Quæstor, Cato, of profuseness and idleness.

He is also accused of partiality to the cruel Pleminius.

Commissioners are appointed to enquire into his conduct. Their report favourable to him.

Syphax declares for the Carthaginians.

Scipio makes a descent on Africa. Masinissa joins him.

A remarkable quarrel between the Censors at Rome.

BEFORE the arrival of the Goddess, the Dictator Q. Cæcilius Metellus had held the Comitia by Centuries, where M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, were chosen Consuls. Sempronius was then Pro-Consul in Greece. The Romans having, for two years past, (i. e. from the year 546,) neglected their affairs in Greece, Philip had forced the Ætolians to conclude a peace with him upon his own terms. Soon after this, Sempronius arrived at Dyrrachium with 10,000 foot, 1000 horse, and 35 ships of war. He was very angry with the Ætolians, for having, contrary to the league, made peace without consent of the Romans. Yet, not daring to venture a battle with Philip, he was easily prevailed upon to come to an agreement with him, by the mediation of the Epirots. The treaty was confirmed by the people of Rome. In this treaty were included, on Philip's side, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bæotians, Thessalians, Arcarnanians and Epirots; and, on the side of the Romans, the Ilienses, King Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedæmon, the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. Sempronius returned to Rome, after which the following distribution of offices was agreed upon. The Consul Cornelius had the command of the forces in He-truria; his Collegue Sempronius was ordered into Bruttium with new levies, to act against Hannibal; and Licinius continued at the head of two legions, in that country, in quality of Pro-Consul. Pomponius Matbo had the Prætorship of Sicily; Scipio, the army and fleet he before commanded; and M. Livius and Sp. Lucretius remained in Gaul to oppose Mago. There were also two other armies in Italy, one at Tarentum, under T. Quintius Flaminius, the other at Capua, under Hostilius Tubulus.

About this time, young Marcellus dedicated a temple to Virtue. His father had formerly vowed one to Honour and Virtue, intending to place the statues of both under one roof. But the Pontifices opposed this, declaring, that it was not lawful to worship more than one God in one temple; and they likewise urged, that if lightning fell upon the

Y. R. 549.
Bef. Chr.
203.
248 Conf.
Liv. B. 29.
c. 12.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 11. & B.
27. c. 25.

V. R. 149.
Ecl. Chr.
203.
248 Conf.

the building, or any prodigy should happen in it, it would be impossible to discover to which of the two divinities expiatory duties should be paid. The temple therefore, which Marcellus had designed for both divinities, was dedicated only to Honour, and another built in all haste to VIRTUE.

L. B. 29.
C. 16.

And now the Republic being to recruit her armies, she thought proper to call to account the twelve Roman colonies, who, about six years before, had with impunity refused their contingents of men and money. The Senate determined, that each colony should furnish double the number of foot it had done in any year of the war, and a hundred and twenty horse. If any of them could not raise the number of horse required, they were to send three foot soldiers in the room of each horseman wanting. The Fathers also imposed a new yearly tax upon each colony, and ordered its census to be taken according to the form used at Rome. This decree was put in execution with rigour. It was followed by another in favour of those private persons, who, in the Consulship of Levinus, had lent the Republic the sums requisite to supply her pressing wants. At the motion of Levinus, the Senate ordered these debts to be discharged at three payments; the first to be made immediately, and the last within five years.

C. 13.

Such instances of equity in the Conscrip't Fathers embolden all, who were oppressed; to demand justice; and particularly the Locrians, who the last year had been so ill treated by Pleminius. From this people, ten deputies, in a neglected and sordid dress, (the mark of grief and distress among the ancients) and with olive branches in their hands, came to Rome, and laid before the Senate, in a long and pathetic harangue, the grievances and miseries they had suffered under the tyranny of the Pro-Prætor. When the Locrians had done speaking, Fabius asked them, whether they had made their complaint to Scipio; to which they answered, that deputies had been sent to him for that purpose, but that he was then busy about his preparations for war, and that now he was either gone for Africa, or intended to sail in a few days; that they had seen, in the quarrel between the Tribunes and Pleminius, how much Scipio favoured the latter, whom, though equally criminal, if not more so, he had continued in his government, while he ordered the Tribunes to be laid in irons. After the deputies had withdrawn, some of the chief Senators not only inveighed against Pleminius, but began to take Scipio's character to pieces. Among these was M. Porcius Cato, the first of his family who distinguished himself at Rome. He had been Quæstor to Scipio in Sicily, and had reproved him for his profuseness to his soldiers, to which the General had answered, "that he did not want " an exact Quæstor; that he would make war at what expence he " pleased, nor was he to give an account to the Roman people of the " money he spent, but of his enterprizes and the execution of them." Cato, provoked at this answer, had left Sicily, and returned to Rome.

Plin. in Cato. Maj.

He

He now declaimed against Scipio, accusing him of making great and useless expences, of passing his time boyishly at the Theatre and the Gymnasia, as if he had been commissioned, not to make war, but to celebrate games. Others of the Senators added, that the Pro-Consul had laid aside the Roman habit, publicly appeared in the Greek cloak and sandals, and that the reading of Greek books, and the pleasures of Syracuse, had made him intirely forget Hannibal and Carthage, while his army, grown as effeminate as their general, was become more terrible to their allies, than their enemies. Fabius called Scipio, a man born to be the corrupter of military discipline. "He acted, said the old man, the like part in Spain, where we lost not much less by sedition than we did by the war. One while he indulges his soldiers in all licentiousness, and then cruelly tyrannizes over them; as if he were a King and a foreigner." Fabius's sentence was as harsh as his invective. "That Scipio should be recalled home, for having quitted his province without orders from the Senate; and that the Tribunes should be desired to move the Comitia, to depose him from the Pro-Consulate. That Pleminius should be brought to Rome in chains, and, in case the crimes laid to his charge were proved, be executed in prison, and his goods confiscated. And lastly, that the Senate should disavow the ill-treatment of the Locrians, and give them all the satisfaction possible for the wrongs they had suffered."

Y. R. 549.
Bef. Chr.
203.
248 Conf.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 19.

The debate was carried to such a length, that the opinions of all the Senators could not be taken that day. In the next assembly, the Fathers concurred in opinion with Q. Metellus. He approved the proposals of Fabius, with regard to Pleminius and the Locrians, but urged, that it was unreasonable, upon dubious accusations, to recall a general, whom Rome had chosen Consul, in the expectation of being by him delivered from Hannibal, and of becoming mistress of Africa: And he moved, that two Tribunes of the people, one Ædile, and ten other commissioners, out of the Senate, should be sent into Sicily with Pomponius the Prætor of that island, to take cognizance of Scipio's conduct in the affair of Pleminius; and, if they found him an accomplice in that Pro-Prætor's crimes, to send him to Rome; but in case Scipio had already sailed for Africa, the Tribunes, the Ædile, and two of the commissioners should follow him thither, the last to assume the command of the army, if the Pro-Consul should be ordered home. The Commissioners, who were to embark at Rhegium, went first to Locri.

c. 20.

^b Externo & regio more, & indulgere licentiæ militum, & jœvire in eos. Liv. B. 29. c. 19.

^c Perhaps this pompous embassy was rather designed to enquire into the state of Scipio's army, and to see whether it was yet a proper time for the Senate to give him openly a commission to carry the war into Africa. This conjecture seems confirmed by the conduct of the Commissioners, who even after the Locrians had cleared Scipio, or dropt the accusation, went nevertheless into Sicily; though the decree of the Senate, as it is in Livy, had confined their commission to the affair of Pleminius.

There

Y. R. 438
Bef. Chr.
201.
248 C. 101.

There they seized the guilty Governor, and thirty two of his accomplices, put them in irons, and sent them to Rome. They also made reparation to the Lacrians for their losses, and having examined them concerning Scipio's conduct, received answer, "That though the Pro-Consul had not shewn great concern at the miseries of their city, yet he was a man they had much rather have for a friend than an enemy: That they persuaded themselves so many heinous crimes had not been committed by his command, or with his approbation; that he had only given too much credit to Pleminius, and too little to them; and that such was the disposition of some men, they were more willing to believe people innocent, than disposed to punish them when guilty." This declaration pleased the Commissioners, as it freed them from the invidious office of beginning a criminal process against a man so much in favour with the people of Rome. And, when they came into Sicily, they were thoroughly convinced, by the vast preparations Scipio had made for his intended expedition, and the fine appearance both of his army and fleet, that the General had not spent his time wholly at the theatre, and in amusements. Go, said they, into Africa, and the Gods give you that success which the Roman people promised themselves from your virtue and abilities, when they chose you Consul. Such a General and such an army will conquer the Carthaginians, or they are invincible.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 22.

The report of the Commissioners at their return to Rome, raised the glory of Scipio. The Senate passed a decree, that he should immediately go into Africa, and take with him such of the Roman troops in Sicily as he thought fit for his enterprize. And, as for the people, the favour in which he stood with them, made them tender even to the guilty Pleminius, for whom they imagined the Pro-Consul had some regard. Their compassion for the criminal was likewise raised, by seeing the miserable figure he made, without his nose and ears; so that, though he was often produced before them, he was never condemned. He died in prison, or, as some say, was, long after this, executed for attempting to set fire to Rome.

c. 23.

Appian. in
Punic. 6.

It has been before observed, that Scipio, in order to pave his way to Carthage, had gained over to the Roman interest the two Numidian Kings, Sypbar and Mafiniffa. The African Republic endeavoured to destroy the engagements which those Princes had entered into with her enemy: And Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, by the means of his daughter Sophonisba, drew off Sypbar. The Historians represent her as a woman of excellent beauty, accompanied

^a According to Appian (in Punic. c. 6.) Asdrubal had promised his daughter in marriage to Mafiniffa: But, Sypbar being in love with her, the Carthaginians, to bring him off from the alliance of Rome, gave him Sophonisba, without the knowledge of her father, who was then in Spain. Mafiniffa, in revenge, privately entered into a league with Scipio. Upon hearing this, Asdrubal (says the same Historian) was indeed accompanied with graces and a manner irresistibly winning; love for her country, the ruling passion of her soul, with a courage to execute whatever that love could dictate. This lady being given in marriage to Syphax, his passion for her made him forget his engagements with Rome; and he readily entered into an alliance offensive and defensive with Carthage. Prompted by Asdrubal, he wrote a letter to Scipio, to dissuade him from making a descent upon Africa, acquainting him at the same time with his marriage, the new alliance he had made with the Carthaginians, and the necessity he should be under of taking part with them, in case they were attacked.

Y. R. 549.
Bef. Chr.
203.
248 Conf.

The Pro-Consul received this letter at Syracuse with some surprize; and, to conceal the contents of it from his army, sent back the messenger immediately, with a short answer to the Numidian Prince, advising him to beware how he offended both Gods and men, by a violation of public faith: After which, assembling his troops, he bid them prepare for a voyage to Africa: Formerly, said he, Masiniſſa complained to Lælius of my dilatoriness; and now Syphax presses me to hasten my departure; and desires, that if I have changed my resolution, I will let him know it, that he may provide for his own safety. He then ordered his ships of war and transports to Lilybæum; and thither he, in person, marched the land forces, purposing to set sail with the first favourable wind. All the troops shewed an incredible ardour to follow him in this expedition, especially those legionaries, who had run away at the battle of Cannæ, and had therefore been condemned to stay in Sicily, for the whole time that Hannibal should continue in Italy. As they were old soldiers, and had been in many battles and sieges, the Pro-Consul, notwithstanding their disgrace, took with him as many of them as were fit for service.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 24.

Lælius commanded the fleet. It is uncertain what number of men were embarked; but never was embarkation made with more order and solemnity; and the concourse of people, who came from all parts to see it, and to wish the Pro-Consul a prosperous voyage, was incredibly great. Just before he weighed anchor, he appeared on the poop of his galley, and after a herald had proclaimed silence, addressed this prayer to Heaven: O all ye Gods and Goddeſſes of earth and sea, I intreat and implore you to make whatever I have done, am doing, or ſhall do, in my command, prosperous to me, to the people and commons of Rome, to the allies and the Latine name, to all thoſe who eſpouſe the cauſe of the people of Rome and

c. 25.

c. 27.

indeed sorry for the injury done to the young prince, but resolved to have him murdered, because it was for the interest of Carthage. Accordingly he sent guards with him under pretence of conveying him into his dominions, but gave them secret instructions to kill him. Masiniſſa having discovered the design, found means to escape. Zenaræ tells us, that Asdrubal promised his daughter to Masiniſſa, but afterwards broke his word, and gave her to Syphax; thinking it of greater consequence to gain this Prince to the interest of Carthage than the other.

Y. R. 542.
Bef. Chr.
248 C.

L. E. 29.
C. 29.

mine, and follow my command and auspices by land, by sea, and on rivers: to favour all these enterprizes, and increase them with good success: Bring us all home safe and unhurt, victorious over our enemies, adorned with spoils, loaded with booty, and triumphant: And enable us to execute upon Carthage all that we designed against Rome. When he had ended this prayer, he caused a victim to be slain, and the entrails to be thrown into the sea; and then the trumpets sounding, he weighed anchor, and with fifty galleys and four hundred ships of burden, set sail, with a favourable wind, for Africa. As he drew towards the coast, he asked the name of the nearest land then in view, and being told it was called the Fair Promontory, he liked the omen, ordered his pilots to direct their course thither, and safely landed his army. Soon after, Masiniſſa, the only African Prince in the interest of Rome, came and joined him. The Historians have left us the following relation of the adventures of this young King.

Gala, King of *Massyliæ, and father of Masiniſſa, had, according to the laws of Numidia, been succeeded by his younger brother Oesalces. And when the latter died, his son, Capuſa, had mounted the throne. Capuſa was slain in a battle against his rebellious subjects, headed by one Mezetulus, a factious man of the blood royal, and a constant rival and competitor of the Kings of Numidia. The Conqueror, though he durst not assume the title of King, made himself tutor to Lacumaces the younger brother of Capuſa, and seized the government, as in right of his ward. And, to secure himself in his usurped authority, he not only entered into an alliance with king Syphax, but married his pupil's mother, who was niece to Hannibal; hoping thereby to gain the Cartaginians to his interest.

C. 32-33.
32, 33.

Masiniſſa was then in Spain; where hearing of Capuſa's death, he passed into Africa, and asked assistance of Bocchar, King of Mauritania. Bocchar lent him 4000 men to convoy him to the frontiers of Massyliæ. There, being joined by a small body of Numidians, and having advice, that Lacumaces was marching into Massyliæ†, to ask succours of King Syphax, he surprized the young prince near Tbapsus, routed his forces, and took the town; but Lacumaces escaped to Syphax. This success engaged many of the Numidians to side with Masiniſſa; and particularly the soldiers who had served under his father Gala. Encouraged by these veterans, he ventured, though inferior in number, to attack Mezetulus, who was now in the field with a great army, Lacumaces having brought him a reinforcement of 15000 foot from Syphax. Masiniſſa's superior skill in war, and the bravery of his troops, gave him the victory. Lacumaces, with his tutor, and the small remains of their forces, fled for refuge into the territories of Carthage; and the conqueror took possession of the vacant throne. But now, apprehending he should have a much more difficult war to sustain against Syphax, he thought it advisable to come to an accommodation with his kinsman. He offered to place him in the same rank Oxalces had held at Gala's court, pardon Mzetulus, and restore to him all his effects. The Princes preferring a moderate, but certain fortune, in their own country, to uncertain hopes, in exile, accepted the proposals, notwithstanding all the industry of the Carthaginians to hinder it.

* A part of Numidia.

† A part of Numidia.

At this time Madrual, happening to be at Syphax's court, insinuated to him, that Masinissa was an ambitious enterprizing youth, who would not be contented, like his father Gala, or his uncle Oxalces, with the dominion of Massyliæ, and if not crushed in the beginning, might one day prove a dangerous neighbour, both to him and the Carthaginians. Syphax, instigated by these suggestions, marched an army against Masinissa: A pitched battle was fought, in which the Massylians were totally vanquished; the king himself narrowly escaped, with only a small guard of horse, to Mount Balbus. Thither some families of his own subjects followed him, with all their cattle, (wherein the riches of the Numidians chiefly consisted,) and there being plenty of pasture and water round the mountain, he lived on the milk and flesh of their flocks. The rest of the Massylians submitted to the conqueror.

Masinissa having, in this retreat, got some troops together, began to make nocturnal incursions upon the frontiers of the Carthaginians; and, in a short time, his forces augmenting, he ventured in open day to penetrate farther into their country, destroyed their inhabitants, and brought thence a considerable booty. Carthage, to put a stop to his devastations, had recourse to Syphax. The King disdaining to go in person to reduce a band of robbers, dispatched away Bocchar, one of his officers, with four thousand foot and two thousand horse. These surrounded the mountain, where Masinissa was lodged, hindered the return of the detachments he had sent out, and forced him to the top of the hill.

Bocchar, thinking that he had his enemy secure, sent back all his troops, except five hundred foot and two hundred horse. Soon after, he surprized Masinissa in a narrow pass, attempting to get away by stealth. The Prince, with only fifty horse, escaped by flight. Bocchar, and his two hundred horse, pursued him, came up with him near Clypea, and cut in pieces all his guard, except four. With these Masinissa, though wounded, fled full speed; and finding a river in their way, they leaped horse and man into it. Two of them were drowned in crossing the stream; but the Prince, and the other two, gained the opposite bank, and hid themselves among some bushes. Bocchar, who pursued them to the river, imagined they had all perished, and went no farther; and from that time it was reported at Carthage, and the court of Syphax, that Masinissa was dead. In the mean while, he hid himself in a cave, dressed his wound with herbs, and lived on the prey which his two companions brought him.

V. R. 223
B. C. 223
223 C. 1.

Dethroned Princes, who have any spirit, do not easily relinquish the hopes of a restoration. Mafiniffa, as soon as his wound would suffer him to mount on horseback, left his cave, and took the road to his own country. In a few days after his appearance there, some of his people, to the number of six thousand foot and four thousand horse, gathering about him, he not only possessed himself of Maffylia, but made dreadful ravages in the territories of the Carthaginian allies, and King Sypbax. The latter thinking the affair serious, came in person with an army to stop the enemy's progress. During the battle which followed, Vermina, the son of Sypbax, having with a large detachment fetched a compass, fell upon the Maffylians in the rear. By this means Mafiniffa was again defeated*. With only sixty horse he fled to the sea coast near the lesser Syrtis; and there he continued, for the most part, till the arrival of Scipio; by which time he had augmented his troop; for he joined the Pro-Consul with two hundred, some say, two thousand horse.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 28.

The alarm and terror which Scipio's descent caused among the Carthaginians, made them think it necessary to strengthen the fortifications of their capital. They had no general in any degree qualified to oppose him in the field. Asdrubal (the son of Gisco) the best they had, is spoken of by Livy, as a man of great quality and wealth, but as excelling in no military talent, except that of saving himself by a swift retreat*; nor were they provided with disciplined and experienced soldiers.

c. 34.

Scipio, having ordered his fleet towards Utica, encamped on certain eminences, not far from the sea coast. Next day, a body of five hundred Carthaginian horse, commanded by Hanno, a young warrior, who had been sent to watch the motions of the enemy, fell in with the advanced guards of the Roman camp, who routed them, and slew their commander.

Appian. in
Punic. 9.

This first success was a good Augury; and Scipio drew near to Locha, a city which seemed to promise his soldiers a rich booty. He had no sooner planted his ladders for the assault, than the inhabitants being terrified, sent a herald to ask their lives, with liberty to retire. Hereupon the General sounded a retreat; but the soldiers, greedy of plunder, would not

* Appian makes no mention of this second battle. According to him, after Mafiniffa was once driven from his kingdom, he continued dispossessed of it, till Scipio's arrival in Africa; at which time Sypbax and the Carthaginians, to draw him off from the Romans, pretended to be reconciled to him, and restored him to his kingdom. Though Mafiniffa was sensible, that they were not sincere, yet he pretended to come into their measures, and joined Asdrubal with his cavalry. However he held secret intelligence with Scipio, and only waited a favourable opportunity to go over to him, which he did soon after, betraying at the same time, a party of Carthaginian horse into the hands of the Romans. Le Punic. §. 7. & seq.

* — Asdrubale, fugacissimo Duce. Liv. B. 30. c. 28.

obey: They forced the town, and put all, even women and children, to the sword. It was necessary to punish so signal a disobedience; and the centurions being the most guilty, as having encouraged the soldiers to it, the Pro-Consul decreed that three of them should die as lots should determine. The soldiers were deprived of the booty they had taken. After some few expeditions of small moment, Scipio undertook the siege of Utica with all his army. But Asdrubal, who commanded 30,000 foot, and 3000 horse, being joined by Sypbax with 50,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, obliged the Roman to dislodge, after he had been before the place forty days. He retreated to a promontory, under which his fleet rode at anchor, entrenched himself there, and waited the return of the spring to renew the war. Asdrubal lay encamped near him, and Sypbax at a little distance from the Carthaginian. We shall leave them here a while, and return to the affairs of Italy.

Y. R. 549.
Bef. Chr.
203.
248 Conf.

THE Consul Sempronius, who marched into Bruttium against Hannibal, was worsted in his first engagement with him, and lost, 1200 men: But, in a second, being assisted by the forces of the Pro-Consul Licinius, it is said, he defeated the enemy, left four thousand of them dead upon the spot, and retook several towns after the victory.

Liv. B. 29.
c. 36.

On the other hand, the Consul Cetbegus, who was to act against Mago, kept Hetruria in awe. By commencing legal processes against those who had entered into a correspondence with the enemy, he prevented the insurrections which the Carthaginian endeavoured to raise in that country. The guilty would not appear upon the summons, but went into a voluntary banishment; and their estates were confiscated.

While the Consuls were thus employed abroad, the two Censors at Rome, Livius Salinator, and Claudius Nero, drew a contempt on themselves by a most ridiculous behaviour. Though their quarrels with each other had formerly been very great, yet the distress of the Republic, during their Consulship, had reconciled them in appearance for some time; but now their mutual hatred broke out afresh. It was customary for the Censors, just before leaving their office, to draw up a list of the Senators, review the Roman Knights, assemble the Tribes, and set a mark of infamy on such persons as deserved it. As to the first, Livius and Nero were equitable in their proceedings; but when they came to review the Knights, of which body they both were, Nero ordered his Colleague's name to be struck out of the list, on pretence that he had been formerly condemned by the people for a misdemeanor. And Livius, when Nero's name was called over, passed the like sentence against him: My reasons, said he, are, that he has borne false witness against me; and that his reconciliation with me was not sincere. Their passion and folly appeared yet more extravagant, when they came to take an account of the Tribes. Nero ranked his Colleague among those whom he declared ÆRARIJ, i. e. Persons deprived of the rights

c. 37.

Y. R. 449.
B. C. 229.
249 C. 229.

rights of Roman Citizenship, but still obliged to pay the public taxes. And Livius not only did as much for Nero, but disfranchised all the thirty five Tribes, except the Mecien; (which was the only one that had formerly voted for him upon his trial) for, said he, it must be owned they acted unjustly either once when they condemned me, or twice, when they conferred upon me the Consulship and Censorship. Among the effects of Livius's anger against the People, may be reckoned a tax he laid, during his Censorship, upon salt; ordering that it should be sold dearer in some places than others. It was hence that he got the name of Salinator. These Censors however were very exact in taking an account of the number of Roman Citizens, and sent to the most distant of the camps abroad, for that purpose. The number appeared to be two hundred and fourteen thousand fit to bear arms.

C H A P. XXXVI.

SIXTEENTH YEAR of the WAR.

Scipio attacks the two camps of Syphax and Asdrubal.

The Carthaginians attempt to burn the Roman fleet.

Syphax taken prisoner, Masinissa's conduct towards Sophonisba; and Scipio's censure of it. Her unhappy fate. Hannibal recalled from Italy. He arrives with his army in Africa.

Y. R. 450.
B. C. 228.
249 C. 228.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 1.

WHEN the Comitia had elected Cn. Servilius Cæpio and C. Servilius Geminus Consuls for the new year, and came to appoint the Pro-Consuls, they nominated Scipio for Africa, directing that he should continue there, in that capacity, till the end of the war.

Polyb. B.
14. c. 1.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 3.

Early in the spring, Scipio, knowing the levity of the Numidian, and hoping (says Polybius) that he might by this time be tired both of his wife, and of the Carthaginians, employed some persons to sound his inclinations. Finding that the King insisted on the Romans leaving Africa, and Hannibal's returning from Italy, as the conditions of a treaty, the Pro-Consul formed a new design. He pretended to be very desirous of a peace; and, to carry on the negotiation, frequently sent deputies to the Numidian. These deputies were attended by officers, who understood the art of war, and who, in the habit of servants, acted the part of spies, and observed exactly the state and disposition of both the enemies camps. The Romans seemed so fond of an accommodation, that Syphax and Asdrubal (for Scipio had desired the King to consult with the Carthaginian) started new pretensions; and the discussion of these demands gave the spies all the time they could desire, to make their observations. They at length returned, and made their report report to Scipio: who thereupon sent the Numidian this answer: "That he himself was earnest for the treaty, but that none of his council approved the conditions. That the King must therefore come over to the Romans, or expect no peace." This declaration put an end to the truce, and Scipio was at liberty to execute his project.

In order thereto, he first sent a detachment to take possession of the ground where he had posted himself the last autumn, when he besieged Utica. This he did to secure his camp from being attacked, in his absence, by the garrison of Utica; and to make Asdrubal and Syphax believe, that he intended to renew his enterprize upon that town. He then assembled the ablest and most faithful of his officers, and told them, that his design was to set fire to the two camps of the enemy the following night, an enterprize which might be easily effected, the barracks in which the Carthaginians had wintered being made of wood, and those of the Numidians of reeds. The project was universally applauded. Whereupon Scipio divided his troops, and gave the command of one part to Masinissa, and of another to Lælius, with orders to assail the camp of Syphax on different sides. He himself with the rest of his forces marched towards Asdrubal, but resolving not to begin the attack on his camp till he saw that of the Numidian actually in flames. The whole scheme was happily executed. The Romans surprised and burnt both camps, and destroyed forty thousand of the enemy by fire or sword. Syphax fled to Abba; Asdrubal to a city named Abda; whither being pursued by Scipio, and finding the inhabitants wavering in their resolutions, he would not venture to stand a siege. He retired to Carthage with two thousand foot and five hundred horse.

Great was the consternation of the people in that city, when they saw him arrive there with those poor remains of his routed army. The Suffetes (whose office in the Carthaginian Republic, resembled that of the Consuls at Rome) convened the Senators. Divided in opinion, some were for sending immediately for Hannibal; others for proposing a truce with the enemy: But the Barchine faction insisted upon continuing the war, and would hearken to no expedient which tended to the recalling Hannibal from Italy; and these prevailed. The Senate ordered levies to be made both in the city and in the country, and dispatched ambassadors to Syphax, pressing him to steadiness in the cause of the Republic. Syphax, still at Abba, was greatly at a loss what measures to follow. The ambassadors assured him, that ^b Asdrubal would speedily take the field with a considerable army, and that a large body of Celtiberians from Spain, hired into the service, were already landed,

Y. R. 550.
E. C. Chr.
202.
249 C. C.

Appian in Punic.
Liv. B. 30.
Polyb. B. 1.
14. C. 2.

Liv. B. 30.
C. 5.

^b Appian differs widely from Polybius and Livy. He tells us, that the Carthaginians condemned Asdrubal to death for his misconduct, and appointed Hanno, the son of Bemilcar,

V. R. 3:2
Esf. Chr.
202
849 Conf.

Polyb. B.
14. c. 7.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 8.

Polyb. B.
14. c. 9.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 9.

Liv. B. 30.
c. 10.

landed, and on their march to Abba. By these assurances, but chiefly by the tears and intreaties of his wife Sophonisba, he was fixed in the interest of Carthage.

Scipio was busy in the siege of Utica, when he received intelligence that the enemy, having got together near thirty thousand men, were encamped in a place called The Great Plain, about five days march from him. He immediately turned the siege into a blockade, and hastened to attack them. After some slight skirmishes, the two armies came to a general battle, in which the Romans obtained a complete victory. However, the stout resistance, made by the Celtiberians, gave the Africans the better opportunity to escape by flight. Asdrubal, with the remains of his army, retired to Carthage, and Sypbax, with the best part of his cavalry, into his own country.

The Pro-Consul having called a council of war, it was there agreed, that Lælius and Masimissa should pursue Sypbax, and not give him time to recruit his forces; and that Scipio should apply himself to reduce the towns in the neighbourhood of Carthage. Tunis, from whence the capital could be seen, opened her gates to him; the garrison, upon his approach, having deserted the place.

And now Carthage herself, expecting to be besieged, prepared for a long defence; and the Senate dispatched messengers into Liguria and Bruttium, with orders for Hannibal and Mago to return home with all possible expedition. In the mean time the Cartbaginians formed a design to burn the Roman fleet, which lay in shelter under the promontory near Utica. Hamilcar, with an hundred galleys, equipped in a few days, sailed away to execute this enterprize. The course which the Cartbaginian steered was perceived by Scipio from Tunis: He made all haste to his fleet, and got thither by land before the enemy arrived. To preserve his galleys, he drew them up as near to the shore as he could, and made a triple or quadruple defence before them of his ships of burden moored together, but with spaces between, for small vessels to launch out against the enemy. Over these spaces he laid bridges, for the conveniency of sending assistance from one row of ships to another; and in the ships he placed a thousand chosen men, with great quantities of missive weapons. Had Hamilcar been expeditious, he might have destroyed all the Roman fleet, but, it being night before he came up, he was obliged to lie by; so that Scipio had time sufficient to prepare for his reception. Next day the attack began: The Cartbaginian broke the chain of ships in the first line, and took six of them: But he had not courage to pursue his advantage; he returned with his small prize to Carthage.

Hamilcar, to command the army in his room; and that the former being then at Arde, got together a body of 8000 foot, and 3000 horse, and carried on the war against the Romans, as an independent General. App. in Punic. l. 13.

In

In the mean time, Masiniſſa and Lælius, with a third part of the Roman legions, were in purſuit of Syphax. In fifteen days they arrived in the heart of Numidia; and, when Masiniſſa had taken poſſeſſion of his own kingdom, he carried the war into the dominions of his enemy. Syphax, with a numerous army, advanced confidently to meet him; but, in a general action which enſued, was defeated and made priſoner together with one of his ſons.

After this, the victorious Numidian, with the approbation of Lælius, who was to follow by eaſy marches, haſtened to appear before Cyrtba, the capital of Syphax's dominions, whom he took with him. On the appearance of their King in chains, thoſe of the inhabitants who were upon the walls deſerted them in a fright; others, to gain the favour of the Conqueror, opened the gates to him. Quickning his horſe, he rode directly to the palace to take poſſeſſion of it. In the entrance of the portico ſtood Sophonisba the wife of Syphax. When ſhe ſaw Masiniſſa, judging by the richneſs of his armour, and other marks of diſtinction, that he was the King, ſhe fell down at his feet, and ſaid: “ The Gods, your valour, and your good fortune, have given you all power over us. But, if a captive woman may be allowed to ſupplie cate the arbiter of her life and death, if ſhe may be permitted to touch your knees and this victorious right hand, I beg and implore you by the regal Maſteſty—with which we alſo, it is not long ſince, were inveſted;—by the name of Numidian, common to you with Syphax; by the Gods of this palace (may they receive you more auſpiciously than they have ſent Syphax hence!) to grant me this favour, that you yourſelf will determine my fate, and not abandon me to the pride and cruelty of any Roman. Were it only that I am the wife of Syphax, I would rather be at the mercy of a Numidian, a native of Africa, as I am, than of an alien and a ſtranger. I need not ſay what a Carthaginian, what a daughter of Aſdrubal has to fear from Roman enmity. If you can no other way ſave me from falling into their hands, do it by my death, I beſeech you, I conjure you.” Surpaſſingly beautiful was the ſuppliant, and in the richeſt bloom of life: She claſped the Prince's hand, ſhe embraced his knees; and her pleading, when ſhe ſued to him for a promiſe, that he would not give her up to the Romans, was more like the blandiſhments of love, than the prayer of wretchedneſs. The victor, melting not only to pity, but to love, gave her his right-hand, the pledge of aſſured protection. Masiniſſa promiſed, without weighing the difficulty of performing; and, had he weighed it, he would ſtill have promiſed. For, when he began to conſider, by what means he might be able to keep his word, Sophonisba being truly Scipio's captive, he took counſel only of his paſſion. He married her that very day; flattering himſelf, that neither Lælius nor Scipio could think of treating, as a captive, the

V. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
202.
249 Conf.
Appear in Punic.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 11. &
ſeq.

Y. R. 550.
Bef. Chr.
202.
249 Conf.

the wife of Masiniſſa. The ceremony was hardly over when Lælius arrived. Far from diſſembling the diſpleaſure this marriage gave him, he was, at firſt, going to ſnatch the Queen from the arms of her husband, and ſend her away with the reſt of the priſoners to Scipio; but being overcome at length by the King's entreaties, who begged him to refer the matter to the judgment of the Pro-Conſul, he forbore that violence, and took Masiniſſa with him to aſſiſt in the reduction of ſome towns, which adhered to Syphax; while this unfortunate King, mad with rage at the ſucceſs of his rival, was ſent under a guard to Scipio's camp.

The whole army were much affected with the ſpectacle of King Syphax in chains, a Prince, whoſe alliance had been ſo lately courted by two powerful Republics. The General remembered the hoſpitable entertainment the Numidian had formerly given him at his court: And the ſame remembrance encouraged Syphax to ſpeak with the more freedom to his conqueror. When Scipio asked him, what it was that could induce him, not only to reject the alliance of Rome, but, without provocation, to begin a war againſt her; “Madneſs, answered Syphax. “But this madneſs did not then commence, when I took up arms againſt “the Roman people; that was the end of it, not the beginning. Then “it began, then I forgot all private ties and public leagues, when I “married a Carthaginian woman. It was the nuptial torch that ſet my “palace on fire. Sophoniſſa was the ſorcererſs, who by her enchantments “deprived me of my reaſon; nor did ſhe ever reſt till with her own “hands ſhe had armed me with thoſe impious arms I have employed “againſt my gueſt and my friend. But, in the miſt of my adverſity “and ruin, I have this conſolation left, that I ſee the peſt, the fury “gone into the houſe of my moſt implacable enemy. Masiniſſa will “not be more prudent or more ſteady than Syphax: Nay, he will be “leſs upon his guard; for he is younger. This at leaſt is ſure; his “marriage ſpeaks more of folly and intemperance of paſſion than mine. “Sophoniſſa will have all power over him; and it is in vain to hope “ſhe will ever be brought to favour the Roman cauſe; ſo deeply rooted, “ſo immoveable is her affection to her country.”

App. de Bell. Pu-
lic. c. 35.

Though theſe words were dictated by the hatred of an enemy, and the rage of jealous love, yet they made a ſtrong impreſſion in the mind of the Pro-Conſul. Masiniſſa's precipitate marriage in the miſt of arms, without conſulting, or even waiting for Lælius, made the King's prediction but too crecible: And ſuch fallies of paſſion, ſays Livy, ſeemed the more inexcusable to Scipio, as he, during his command in Spain, had never ſuffered himſelf, though young, to be transported by the charms of any of his fair captives. While he was revolving in his thoughts this ſtrange event, Lælius and Masiniſſa arrived. The Pro-Conſul received them both with equal marks of kindneſs; and having in a crowded aſſembly of his officers, expatiated in their praiſe, he took Masiniſſa aſide, aside, and spoke to him in the following manner. “ It was doubtless, “ Masiniſſa, ſome good qualities you ſaw in me, which inclined you, in “ Spain, to enter into friendship with me; and afterwards, in Africa, to “ commit yourſelf and your fortunes to my protection. Of all the “ virtues for which you think my friendship deſirable, there is none in “ which I pride myſelf more than continence: And I wiſh, Masiniſſa, “ that You, to your other eminent virtues, would add this alſo. There “ is not, believe me, there is not ſo much danger, to our years, from “ armed enemies, as from the pleaſures that on all ſides ſurround us.

 “ He who has acquired the maſtery over his appetites and paſſions, has “ made a nobler conqueſt, and gained greater glory, than we by our “ vanquiſhing King Syphax. The exploits of bravery which you have “ performed in my abſence, I have juſt now publickly acknow“ ledged, and ſhall remember: The reſt I had rather you yourſelf “ ſhould reflect upon, than that I, by the mention of it, ſhould put “ you to the bluſh. Syphax was conquered and made priſoner, under “ the auſpices of the people of Rome. He, therefore, his wife, his “ kingdom, his lands, his towns, all who inhabit them, all that be“ longed to Syphax, are become the property of the Roman people.
 “ Sophoniſſa, if ſhe were not a Carthaginian, if her father did not “ command the army of our enemies, muſt, as well as her huſband, “ be ſent to Rome: It is the prerogative of the Senate and people “ there to determine the fate of a woman, who is charged with having “ ſeduced a King from our alliance, and hurried him to take arms “ againſt us. Masiniſſa, get the better of your ſelf. Beware of tar“ niſhing by one vice, the luſtre of many virtues. Do not loſe the merit “ of ſo many ſervices, by a ſingle fault, to which the cauſe of it bears no “ proportion^b.”

Livy tells us, that this diſcourſe brought bluſhes into the Prince’s cheeks, and drew tears from his eyes. When he had promiſed an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the General’s pleaſure, and had begged, that he might be permitted, as far as the ſituation of things would allow, to perform the raſh promiſe he had given Sophoniſſa, of not delivering her into the power of any other perſon, he left Scipio’s tent in confuſion, and retired to his own. There ſhutting himſelf up, he ſpent ſome time

^b It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that Livy ſhould make his divine Scipio preach ſuch a grave lecture upon continence, when he had nothing in his heart but murder. The ma- niſeſt aim of his Ethics, as appears by the ſequel, was to perſuade the Prince either to murder the woman he had juſt mar- ried, or to give her up to be murdered by the Romans. Had the Numidian married half the women of Cyrtba, he would pro- bably have eſcaped the lecture, provided Sophoniſſa had not been of the number. But Scipio dreaded the power of the beautiful Carthaginian dame over her new Huſband.

Appian (differing from Livy) tells us that Scipio at firſt only deſired Masiniſſa to deliver up Syphax’s wife; that the Prince reſuſing to comply, the General ſharply forbade him to think of keeping by force what of right belonged to the Roman people; and hav- ing commanded him to give up the prey, added, that then, if he pleaſed, he might petition for it. App. in Punic. l. 15.

Y. R. 550.
P. C. C.
229 C. C.

alone in sighs and groans, so loud as to be heard by the soldiers without the pavilion. At length he called a trusty slave, who had charge of the poison, which (after the manner of Kings) was kept ready against unforeseen adversities; and bid him, when he had prepared a potion, carry it to Sophonista, with this message. "Masiniſſa would gladly have fulfilled the marriage engagement, the obligation of a husband to a wife; but since to do this is denied him by those who have the power to hinder it, he now performs his other promise, that ſhe ſhould not be delivered up alive to the Romans. Sophonista, mindful of her father, her country, and the two Kings, whose wife ſhe has been, will conſult her own honour." When the miniſter of death came to the Queen, and with the meſſage preſented her the poiſon: "I accept, ſaid ſhe, this marriage-gift; nor is it unwelcome, if my husband could indeed do nothing kinder for his wife. This however tell him, That I ſhould have died with more honour, if I had not married at my funeral." She ſpoke theſe words with a reſolute countenance, took the cup with a ſteady hand, and drank it off. The news being brought to Scipio, he ſent for the Numidian Prince; and left his diſtempered mind ſhould carry him to ſome action yet more deſperate, diſcourſed to him in friendly manner; now endeavouring to conſole him; then gently reſtoring him, for having expiated one act of temerity by another, and given a more tragical concluſion to the affair than was neceſſary. Next day the Pro-Conſul aſſembled the ſoldiers, mounted his tribunal, and, before them all, addreſſing himſelf to Masiniſſa, ſtilled him King; and, when he had been laſh in his praiſe, preſented him with a crown and cup of gold, a curule chair, an ivory ſcepter, an embroidered robe, and a tunic wrought with palm-branches. And theſe preſents he enhanced, by ſaying, that, "in a TRIUMPH, than which nothing among the Romans was more magnificent, the triumphant victors had no ſtateſſier ornaments; and that Masiniſſa was the only foreigner the Roman people thought worthy of them." The King's affliction was ſoothed by theſe honours, and his mind raiſed from its depreſſion, to the hope of poſſeſſing all Numidia.

1. 7. 30.
2. 10.

The ſeaſon of the year being far advanced, Scipio, when he had ſent Lælius, with Syphax, and the reſt of the Numidian captives, to Rome, returned to his old poſt near Tunis. Carthage, greatly alarmed at the neighbourhood of the Roman army, and the loſs ſhe had ſuffered by the captivity of Syphax, began now to think of changing her meaſures, and of endeavouring to gain time, by a fraudulent treaty of peace, till Hannibal and Mago ſhould arrive from Italy. The Senate diſpatched to the Pro-Conſul thirty of its principal members; who caſt themſelves at his feet, threw the whole blame of the war upon the ambition of Hannibal, implored the clemency of the conqueror, and offered to accept any terms he ſhould impoſe. Scipio haughtily answered, That his intention in coming into Africa was not to make peace with the Carthaginians, but to conquer them, which he had now in a manner done. He added; Yet to convince the world that Rome can put an end to wars, as well as begin them, with justice, I shall not refuse you a peace on these conditions:

to

Y. R. 550.
Bef. Chr.
202.
249 Conf.

*You shall restore all prisoners, deserters, and fugitive slaves;
Withdraw your troops from Italy, and Cisalpine Gaul;
Make an absolute cession of Spain to us;
Yield up to us all the islands between Italy and Africa;
Give us all your long ships, except twenty;
Furnish my army with five hundred thousand modii of wheat, and three hundred thousand of barley;
And pay us 5000 talents.*

I allow you three days to consider of these conditions; and if in that time you agree to them, you shall have a truce, till the return of the ambassadors, whom you shall send to Rome, to conclude a peace there.

As the business of the Carthaginians was only to gain time, they made no great difficulty of consenting to Scipio's demands: And the better to impose upon him, they sent a small number of Roman captives, and deserters, to Rome, with their ambassadors.

In the mean time, Lælius arrived at Rome, with Syphax, and the Numidian nobles taken in war. The Conscript Fathers, upon his report of the wonderful success of the Roman arms, decreed a four days supplication to the Gods. As to Syphax, they ordered that he should be confined a prisoner at Alba, (in the country of the Marfi;) They confirmed to Masiniſſa the title of King, which Scipio had given him; and sent him new presents in the name of the Republic.

Livy, B. 30.
c. 17.

The campaign in Bruttium seems to have produced no remarkable action this summer. Several towns in that country surrendered to the Consul Servilius Cæpio, who is also said to have fought a battle with Hannibal, the success uncertain. The other Consul Servilius Geminus did nothing memorable either in Hetruria or Gaul, except that he recovered his father and uncle from the captivity in which they had been, for sixteen years, among the Boii. He entered Rome, with one of them on his right hand, and the other on his left. But he was forced to petition the people to grant a decree, indemnifying him for having, contrary to law, executed the offices of Tribune of the Commons and Plebeian Ædile, in the life-time of his father, who had been a curule magistrate. His plea was, That he then knew not whether his father were alive or dead; and the people allowed it to be good.

c. 18, 19.

Mago fell down upon Insubria, and fought a battle with two Roman armies, under the conduct of the Pro-Consul Corn. Cethegus, and the Prætor Quintus Iulus. The victory was obstinately disputed, till the Carthaginian General, by a wound which he received, was constrained to yield the day to the Romans. He decamped the night following, and retired into

Y. R. 510.
 Bef. Chr.
 202.
 249 Cons.

into Liguria. Hither came messengers from the Senate of Carthage with orders to him to return to Africa as soon as possible. Embarking all his troops, both Ligurian and Spanish, he set sail immediately. Scarce had he doubled the island of Sardinia when he died of his wound; and a storm dispersing the fleet, many of the ships were taken by the Romans.

When Hannibal received the same orders, as his brother, he was scarce able to restrain his tears. "Now, jud be, the Senate openly and expressly recal me; but they have been dragging me away ever since they refused to send me supplies of men and money. The Romans, whom I have so often routed, have not vanquished Hannibal. It is the Carthaginian Senate that, by detraction and envy, have overcome me. Nor will Scipio exult more at my leaving Italy, than Hanno; who since he can no other way destroy my family, is resolved to overwhelm it with the ruins of his country." However, as he had foreseen what now happened, he had prepared his fleet for a voyage. Sending away the useless part of his soldiery into the towns of Bruttium, under pretence of guarding them, he embarked all the strength of his army for Africa^b. No man ever went into banishment from his own country, with greater reluctance, than Hannibal left the country of his enemies. When he was out at sea, he often looked back on the coast, accusing Gods and men, and himself (says Livy) for being disappointed of his expected conquest.

The joy at Rome, on the news of his departure, was great, but not universal. Some of the Fathers thought it a dishonour to the Roman name, that Hannibal was suffered to leave Italy with all his army, as quietly as if he had been setting out from his own country. They also feared the difficulties which Scipio would have to struggle with; and Fabius increased their terror, by exclaiming, That the Republic was never in a more deplorable state. Others confided in the abilities of the Pro-Consul, and thought it the greatest of all advantages, to see Italy rid of her most dangerous and most implacable enemy: And the Senate coming into this sentiment, directed that public thanksgivings should be offered to the Gods during five days.

Laelius, whom the Republic had just chosen Quæstor to Scipio's army, in the room of Cato, was upon his way to re-embark for Africa, when he received an order to return to Rome: For the ambassadors from Carthage being arrived, the Conscrip't Fathers thought it proper to have him present at so important a negotiation. The Carthaginians had ^a Plutarch imputes this to the good fortune which constantly attended Rome. It was this good fortune (says he) which poured forth Hannibal like water, and waited him in Italy, while his countrymen, through envy and civil discord, refused to send him supplies.

Plut. de Fortun. Roman. S. 21.

^b Livy reports, that Hannibal massacred, in the temple of Juno Lacinia, some of the Italians, who had fled thither for refuge, after refusing to follow him into Africa.

their

Plut. Life
 of Fabius

their audience of the Senate in the temple of Bellona, without the walls of Rome. They spoke in much the same strain as before to Scipio, throwing all the blame of the war upon Hannibal; and, in conclusion, desired, That the articles agreed on between Rome and Carthage, in the time of C. Lutatius, (the close of the first Punic war) might continue in full force, and be the foundation of a lasting peace. Upon this, some of the elder Senators, who observed that these African ambassadors were young men, examined them concerning the expedients employed to put an end to that war: And the latter not being able to give any tolerable account of the times of Lutatius, the Fathers began to suspect that Carthage was not sincere in the present affair. When they came to vote (after the ambassadors had withdrawn) some were against coming to any determination without one of the Consuls, who were both absent; others advised the consulting Scipio, previously to any conclusion; and others, fully persuaded that Carthage was dissembling, were for commanding the ambassadors immediately out of Italy, as so many spies, and for directing Scipio to prosecute the war with vigour. Laelius joined in this opinion; and some writers say that it prevailed: But others, with more probability, affirm, that the peace was accepted on the foot upon which Scipio had proposed it in Africa.

Y. R. 552.
Euf. Chr.
202.
249 Conf.

Whilst this affair employed the Senate, Hannibal was making the best of his way to Carthage. The Consul Servilius Cæpio resolving to follow him, left his province, and went into Sicily, to prepare for an expedition into Africa; but his design did not please the Conscrip Fathers: They thought he intended to rob Scipio of the honour of concluding the peace. A Dictator was therefore created, merely that there might be a magistrate in the Republic, who should have an undisputed authority to recal Servilius. The Consul being recalled, obeyed, and returned to Rome.

Liv. B. 30.
C. 23.
Polyb. B.
15. c. 11.

About this time died in a very advanced ^a age the famous Q. Fabius Cunctator. He was certainly, says Livy, worthy of the name of Maximus which he bore; and his glory equalled that of any of his ancestors. Prudence and circumspection were what distinguished him; not remarkable activity or an enterprizing genius. But it is a question, whether his cunctation was the effect of his temper, or owing to the nature of the war he had to conduct. Be that as it will, his wise management, in a dangerous conjuncture, saved his country from ruin ^b: And the Roman people, sensible of their obligation to him, greatly honoured him while living; and, when he died, laid a tax upon themselves to defray the expences of his funeral.

Liv. B. 32.
C. 24.

^a According to Val. Max. (B. 8. c. 13. f. 3.) Fabius was near an hundred years old when he died. If this were true, he must have been about eighty-six, when he conducted the war against Hannibal, and about eighty-nine in his last Consulship.

^b Unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem.

While

Y. R. 550.
P. C. 1.
250. C. 156.

P. 1. P.
150. 1.
Liv. E. 30.
C. 23.

While the truce in Africa still subsisted, and before the ambassadors were yet returned, an accident discovered the fraudulent designs of the Carthaginians. Scipio had thought it necessary to have a strong sea-armament, in order to terrify the enemy, and to remove the necessity of protecting his fleet, as formerly, with his land army; and he had therefore sent for a reinforcement of ships, both from Sicily and Sardinia. The squadron from Sardinia arrived safe, but that from Sicily was dispersed by a tempest, and many of the vessels being driven near the port of Carthage, the Carthaginians seized and plundered them. Scipio, highly incensed at this proceeding, dispatched M. Bæbius, with two other officers, to Carthage, to complain of the injustice, and demand satisfaction. These envoys hardly escaped the fury of the populace: And even the Senate, being bent on war, agreed to send them back without an answer; such dependance they had on Hannibal, who was daily expected: Nay, they gave orders (as some say) that the two galleys, appointed by them to convoy the Quinqueremis, on which the envoys were embarked, should leave it at a certain time; and that some ships, kept in readiness for that purpose, should attack and sink it. The Quinqueremis was accordingly deserted by her convoy, near the mouth of the river Bagrada, and being soon after attacked by three Carthaginian galleys, was forced to run aground on the strand; but the envoys escaped to the Roman camp.

The General so impatiently expected by the African Republic, at length drew near the coast. To discover the country, he ordered a sailor to the mast-top; who being asked, what he saw, answered, The ruins of a tomb, upon an eminence. Hannibal, disliking the omen, sailed on; and landed his army at Litt's Leptis, a city between Susa and Adrumetum.

C H A P. XXXVII.

SEVENTEENTH YEAR of the War.

An interview between Hannibal and Scipio.

The battle of Zama.

Scipio enters into a treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, which is ratified the year following.

Y. R. 551.
P. C. 2.
250. C. 157.

Liv. E. 30.
C. 24.

TIB. Claudius Nero, and M. Servilius Pullex, being chosen Consuls at Rome, for the new year, it fell by lot to Servilius to conduct the army in Hetruria, and to Claudius, to command the fleet in Africa: But the latter, by a decree of both Senate and people, was to leave the direction of all affairs at land wholly to Scipio.

Hannibal

Hannibal, having learnt, soon after his landing, that hostilities were renewed, took measures to strengthen his army. Being in great want of horse, he sent to Tycheus, a friend of Syrphax, and reputed to have the best in Africa; and of him obtained a body of two thousand Numidian cavalry. On the other hand, Scipio pursued the war with an uncommon fury, kindled by the perfidiousness of the Carthaginians. He took towns, not by capitulation, but assault, put the garrisons to the sword, and made all the inhabitants pass under the yoke. However, in the midst of his resentment he did not forget the laws of nations. Babius, who had been so ill treated, when sent on an embassy to Carthage, had since arrested the Carthaginian ambassadors, on their arrival from Italy, in the port where the Roman fleet lay; and he thought that the injury he had suffered would be retaliated upon them by Scipio. But the Pro-Consul did not consider so much what Carthage deserved, as what became a Roman. He commanded that the ambassadors should be well treated, and dismissed. As he continued, nevertheless, to make dreadful havock in the Carthaginian territory, the Senate dispatched orders to their General to advance and give him battle. Hannibal answered, that he would take the first opportunity that offered; and soon after, leaving his post at Adrumetum, drew near to Zama, a town in Numidia Propria, five days journey south west of Carthage. From hence he sent out spies, to discover the situation and strength of the Romans. These spies were apprehended: But though it was then customary in all nations, to put such men to death, Scipio gave direction to lead one of them into all the quarters of the camp, and shew him every thing he came to learn; which done, dismissing both him and his companions, he bad them go to their General, and give him the account he expected from them. Hannibal is said to have been struck with this magnanimity and air of confidence, and to have been thereby induced to ask an interview with the Pro-Consul, in order to a peace. Scipio consented, and, to meet him, advanced as far as Nadagara, a town on the confines of Numidia. The Carthaginian came and encamped within four miles of the Romans, not far from Zama.*

There

* Appian tells us, that before this conference, Hannibal, being in great want of provisions, sent to Masinissa, desiring he would use his endeavours with Scipio to obtain a peace for the Carthaginians. Scipio consented to renew the former treaty, upon condition restitution was made of the ships, men and effects of his dispersed fleet, which had been seized, and that Carthage should pay a thousand talents as a fine. Hannibal accepted these terms, and the Senate of Carthage likewise agreed to them, but the populace would not give their consent. They were jealous of their General and the Nobles, who they thought were desirous of making a peace advantageous to Rome, that by her means they might govern the more despotically at home. And the people were so full of these imaginations, that having got notice at this time, that

Y. R. 551.
bet. Chr.
201.
250 Conf.

Polyb. B.
25. c. 3.
App. in Punic.
Polyb. B.
25. c. 3. 4.

Y. R. 551.
B.C. 201.
250 C. 16.

There was between the two camps a large plain, entirely open, and where no ambush could be laid. This place being therefore chosen for the conference, the two Generals rode thither, escorted by an equal number of guards; from whom separating, and each attended only by an interpreter, they met in the mid-way. Both remained for a while silent, viewing each other with mutual admiration. Hannibal at length spoke thus.

Liv. B. 20.
C. 57.
Polyb. B.
25. c. 6.

“ Since fate has so ordained it, that I, who began the war, and who have been so often on the point of ending it by a complete conquest, should now come, of my own motion, to ask a peace, I am glad that it is of you, Scipio, I have the fortune to ask it. Nor will this be among the least of your glories, That Hannibal, victorious over so many Roman Generals, submitted at last to you.

“ I could wish, that our fathers and we had confined our ambition within the limits which nature seemed to have prescribed to it; the shores of Africa, and the shores of Italy. The Gods did not give us that mind. On both sides we have been so eager after foreign possessions, as to put our own to the hazard of war. Rome and Carthage have had, each, in her turn, the enemy at her gates. But since errors past may be more easily blamed than corrected, let it now be the work of you and me, to put an end, if possible, to the obstinate contention. For my own part, my years, and the experience I have had of the instability of fortune, incline me to leave nothing to her determination which reason can decide. But much I fear, Scipio, that your youth, your want of the like experience, your uninterrupted success, may render you averse from the thoughts of peace. He whom fortune has never failed, rarely reflects upon her inconstancy. Yet without recurring to former examples, my own may perhaps suffice to teach you moderation. I am that same Hannibal who, after my victory at Cannæ, became master of the greatest part of your country, and deliberated with myself what fate I should decree to Italy and to Rome. And now—See the change! Here, in Africa, I am come to treat with a Roman, for my own preservation and my country's. Such are the sports of fortune. Is she then to be trusted, because she smiles? An advantageous peace is preferable to the hope of victory. The one is in your own power, the other at the pleasure of the Gods. Should you prove victorious, it would that Asdrubal, whom they had suspected of the same design, was returned to the city, they went in a tumultuous manner to seek him, in order to put him to death. He had fled to his father's tomb, and had there ended his days by poison. But the rage of the mutineers did not cease at the sight of his dead body. They dragged it out of the tomb, cut off the head, fixed it on a lance, and carried it through the streets of Carthage. App. Punic. c. 20.

Thus far Appian; but neither Livy nor Polyb. mention any thing of all this, and some parts of the story are inconsistent with what those authors relate.

“ add.

“ add little to your own glory, or the glory of your country ; if you “ quishet, you lose in one hour all the honour and reputation you “ have been so many years acquiring. But what is my aim in all this ?
 “ That you should content yourself with our cession of Spain, Sicily, “ Sardinia, and all the islands between Italy and Africa. A peace on “ these conditions will, in my opinion, not only secure the future “ tranquillity of Carthage, but be sufficiently glorious for you, and for “ the Roman name. And do not tell me, that some of our citizens “ dealt fraudulently with you in the late treaty. It is I, Hannibal, that “ now ask a peace : I ask it, because I think it expedient for my “ country ; and, thinking it expedient, I will inviolably maintain it.”

SCIPIO answered : “ I knew very well, Hannibal, that it was the “ hope of your return which emboldened the Carthaginians to break
 “ the truce with us, and to lay aside all thoughts of a peace, when it “ was just upon the point of being concluded ; and your present proposal “ is a proof of it. You retrench from their concessions every thing
 “ but what we are, and have been long possessed of. But as it “ is your care, that your fellow-citizens should have the obligation to “ you of being eased from a great part of their burden, so it ought to be “ mine, that they draw no advantage from their perfidiousness.

“ Nobody is more sensible than I am of the weakness of man, and “ the power of fortune, and that whatever we enterprise is subject to “ a thousand chances. If, before the Romans passed into Africa, you “ had, of your own accord, quitted Italy, and made the offers you now “ make, I believe they would not have been rejected. But as you have “ been forced out of Italy, and we are masters here of the open “ country, the situation of things is much altered. And, what is chiefly “ to be considered, the Carthaginians by the late treaty, which we en“ tered into at their request, were, over and above what you offer,
 “ to have delivered up their ships of war, restored to us our prisoners “ without ransom, paid us five thousand talents, and to have given “ hostages for the performance of all. The Senate accepted these con“ ditions, but Carthage failed on her part ; Carthage deceived us.
 “ What then is to be done ? Are the Carthaginians to be released from “ the most important articles of the treaty, as a reward of their breach “ of faith ? No, certainly. If to the conditions before agreed upon,
 “ you had added some new article to our advantage, there would have “ been matter of reference to the Roman people ; but when, instead of “ adding, you retrench, there is no room for deliberation. The Car- “ thaginians therefore must submit to us at discretion, or must vanquish “ us in battle.”

The

^b According to Livy, Scipio proposed to peace, provided the Carthaginians would, advise with his Council about granting besides fulfilling the conditions of the late P p 2 treaty,

Y. R. 551.
Bef. Chr.
207.
250 Conf.

Polyb. B.
35. c. 9. &
43.

The conference hereupon broke off, the two Generals returned each to his camp, and bid their soldiers prepare for battle; a battle wherein the Carthaginians were to fight for their own preservation and the dominion of Africa; and the Romans for the empire of the whole world.

Early next morning Scipio led his troops into the plain, and drew them up after the Roman manner, except that he placed the cohorts of the Principes directly behind those of the Hastati, so as to leave sufficient space for the enemy's elephants to pass through from front to rear. C. Laelius was posted on the left wing with the Italian horse, and Masiniſſa with his Numidians on the right. The intervals of the first line Scipio filled up with his Vestites, or light-armed troops, ordering them, upon a signal given, to begin the battle, and, in case they were repulsed, or broke by the elephants, to run back through the lanes before mentioned, and continue on their flight till they were got behind the Triarii. Those that were wounded, or in danger of being overtaken, were to turn off to the right and left, through the spaces between the lines, and that way escape to the rear.

The army thus drawn up, Scipio went from rank to rank, urging his soldiers to consider the consequences of a defeat, and the rewards of victory: on the one hand, certain death or slavery, (for they had no town in Africa strong enough to protect them) on the other, not only a lasting superiority over Carthage, but the empire of the rest of the world.

Hannibal ranged all his elephants, to the number of above eighty, in one front. Behind these he placed his mercenaries, consisting of twelve thousand men, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares and Mauritanians.

treary, agree to pay a fine for having seized the Roman ships, and violated their Embassadors, during the truce. The account in the text is taken from Polybius, who, being personally acquainted with Masiniſſa, and intimate with the younger Scipio, and his friend Laelius, is more to be depended on, than any other writer, on this subject.

Polybius adds [B. 15. c. 11.] that which ever party should prove victorious in this battle, would not only become masters of Africa and Europe, but of all the rest of the known world. Livy [B. 30. c. 32.] is of the same opinion. This however could hardly be true of the Carthaginians; for had they proved victorious at Zama, they would not have been in so flourishing a condition, as in the beginning of the war; nor have had so good a prospect of conquering the Romans as just after the battle of Cannæ, when Hannibal was master of the greater part of Italy. The Carthaginians were now driven out of Spain, had sustained infinite losses, and been at a vast expence during the course of a seventeen years war. On the other hand, Rome had recovered the possession of all Italy, had powerful armies on foot there, and strong fleets at sea; so that had Scipio been defeated, she could easily transport more forces into Africa. And this suggests a reason why Hannibal did not decline a battle with the Romans, and endeavour to consume their strength, without fighting. He doubtless foresaw, that they would daily grow stronger by continual supplies of men and money from Italy. Add to this, that the army which Hannibal now commanded seems to have been the last resource of Carthage. The greater part of it had been raised with difficulty, and it would be no easy matter to find pay and provisions for such numerous forces, during any considerable time, the treasury being exhausted, and the country ruined.

The

The new levies of Carthaginians and other Africans, together with four thousand Macedonians, under a General named Sopater, composed the second line. And in the rear of all, at the distance of about a furlong, he posted his Italian troops, in whom he chiefly confided. The Carthaginian horse formed his right wing, the Numidians his left.

Y. R. 551.
Bef. Chr.
201.
250. C. 350.

He ordered the several leaders to exhort their troops, not to be discouraged by their own weakness, but to place the hope of victory in him and his Italian army; and particularly directed the captains of the Carthaginians to represent to them what would be the fate of their wives and children, if the event of this battle should not prove successful. The General himself, walking through the ranks of his Italian troops, called upon them to be mindful of the seventeen campaigns in which they had been fellow soldiers with him; and of that constant series of victories, by which they had extinguished in the Romans all hope of ever being conquerors. He urged them to remember, above all, the battles of the Trebia, Tkrafymenus and Cannæ; with any of which the approaching battle was in no wise to be compared, either with respect to the bravery, or the number of the enemies. “The “ Romans were yet unfoiled, and in the height of their strength when “ you first met them in the field; nevertheless you vanquished them.
“ The soldiers now before us are either the children of the vanquished, “ or the remains of those whom you have often put to flight in Italy.
“ Maintain therefore your General’s glory and your own, and establish “ to yourselves the name of invincible, by which you are become famous “ throughout the world.”

When the Numidians of the two armies had skirmished a while, Hannibal ordered the managers of the elephants to drive them upon the enemy. Some of the beasts, frightened at the noise of the trumpets and other instruments of war, which sounded on all sides, immediately ran back amongst the Numidians of the Carthaginian left wing, and put them into confusion, which Masiniſſa taking advantage of, entirely routed them. Great destruction was made of the Velites, by the rest of the elephants, till these also being terrified, some of them ran through the void spaces of the Roman army, which Scipio had left for that purpose; others, falling in among the cavalry of the enemy’s right wing, gave Lælius the same opportunity against the Carthaginian horse, as had been given to Masiniſſa against the Numidian, and of which

^a Neither Polybius nor Livy mention the number of forces Hannibal and Scipio had at Zama. Appian [in Punic. c. 22.] tells us, that Hannibal had near fifty thousand men in the field, and Scipio twenty-three thousand foot, and fifteen hundred Italian horse, six hundred Numidian horse, under one Lacurnaces, and a great body of cavalry, commanded by Masiniſſa. But Appian gives a very romantic account of this battle, and differs widely from Polybius and Livy.

Y. B. 333.
Bell. C. 2.
201.
see C. 1.

the Romans did not fail to make the same use. After this the infantry of the foremost lines joined battle. Hannibal's mercenaries had the advantage in the beginning of the conflict: but the Roman Hastati, followed, and encouraged by the Principes, who exhorted them to fight manfully, and shewed themselves ready to assist them, bravely sustained the attack, and at length gained ground upon the enemy. The mercenaries, not being sensibly supported by their second line, and therefore thinking themselves betrayed, they, in their retreat, fell furiously upon the Africans, so that these, the Hastati coming up, were obliged to fight for some time both against their own mercenaries and the enemy. When the two Carthaginian lines had ceased their mutual rage, they joined their strength; and, though now but a mere throng of men, broke the Hastati: But then the Principes advancing to the assistance of the latter, restored the battle; and most of the Africans and mercenaries were here cut off. Hannibal did not advance to their relief, the Roman Triarii not having yet engaged, and the Principes being still in good order: And lest the routed Africans and mercenaries should break the ranks of his Italian soldiers, he commanded these to present their spears at those who fled to them for protection, which obliged the runaways to move off to the right and left.

The ground, over which the Romans must march before they could attack Hannibal, being strewed with heaps of dead bodies and weapons, and being slippery with blood, Scipio feared that the order of his battalions would be broke, should he pass it hastily. To avoid this mischief, he commanded the Hastati to give over the pursuit, and halt where they were, opposite to the enemies center: After which, having sent all his wounded to the rear, he advanced leisurely with the Principes and Triarii, and placed them on the wings of the Hastati. Then followed a sharp engagement, in which victory was long and eagerly disputed. It would seem, that the Romans, though superior in number, were once upon the point of losing the day; for Polybius tells us, that Masiniſſa and Laelius came very seasonably, and as if sent from Heaven, to their assistance. These Generals being returned from the pursuit of the cavalry, fell suddenly upon the rear of Hannibal's men, most of whom were cut off in their ranks; and of those that fled, very few escaped the horse, the country all around being a plain.

There died of the Carthaginians in the fight above twenty thousand, and almost the like number were taken prisoners. The loss on the side of the Romans amounted to about two thousand men. Hannibal escaped with a few horse to Syracumæ, having performed every thing in the engagement which could be expected from a great General. His army (says Polybius, could not have been more skilfully drawn up. For as the order of the Roman battalions makes it extremely difficult to break them, the Carthaginian wisely placed his elephants

Liv. D. 32.
P. 34.
Polyb. B.
15. c. 14.

elephants in the front, that they might put the enemy in confusion, before the armies should engage. In his first line he placed the mercenaries, men bold and active, but not well disciplined, that by their impetuosity he might give a check to the ardour of the Romans. The Africans, and Carthaginians, whose courage he doubted, he posted in the middle between the mercenaries and his Italian soldiers, that they might be forced to fight, or, at least, that the Romans, by slaughtering them, might fatigue themselves, and blunt their weapons. Last of all, he drew up the troops he had disciplined himself, and in whom he chiefly confided, at a good distance from his second line, that they might not be broken by the rout of the Africans and mercenaries; and kept them in reserve for a vigorous attack upon a tired and weakened enemy^e.

VI. R. 551.
B. L. Chr.
201.
250 Cont.

The Carthaginian General was soon called from Adrumetum to Carthage, to assist the tottering Republic with his Counsels. He declared, That she had no resource, but in a peace; and this, from the mouth of the warlike Hannibal, was decisive. The Carthaginians therefore prepared to make new supplications to the conqueror; whilst he, on the other hand, was considering how to make the best advantage of his victory. And having received a considerable reinforcement to his fleet, he went on board it, in order to appear before Carthage, giving instructions to Cn. Octavius to march their legions towards the same city. His intention was not to besiege it, but only to strike terror, and make the Carthaginians more eager for a peace; and the method he took had the desired effect. A galley adorned with olive-branches came out to him, with twelve deputies, who spared neither submissions, nor prostrations, nor promises. Scipio would give no answer, but that they should meet him at Tunis. He ordered his legions thither, sailed back with his fleet to Utica, and from thence went to Tunis by land. Thirty of the Carthaginian Nobles repaired to him, and humbly sued for peace. Scipio seemed at first to neglect their submissions; but at the bottom was as fond of concluding a treaty as they: For he knew that the Consul Nero was equipping a fleet, with all expedition, to come into Africa, and rob him of the glory of finishing the war. The conditions on which he insisted with the Carthaginians, were as follow.

Liv. B. 30.
c. 35.

^e Livy reports [B. 30. c. 36.] that a few days after the battle of Zama, Vermina the son of Siphax came to the assistance of the Carthaginians, with an army of more horse than foot: That Scipio sent a part of his infantry and all the cavalry to encounter the Numidian: And that Vermina was routed, fifteen thousand of his men slain, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. This story is not very probable, for Hanni- bal, who was weak in cavalry, would doubtless have deferred fighting, had he known any thing of this approaching reinforcement, which he could not well be ignorant of, if it was within a few days' march of him. Polybius, who, had there been any ground for this story, would probably have mentioned it, says nothing of Vermina.

Y. R. 551.
Ecl. C. 2.
250 Conf.

Polyb. B.
15. c. 13.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 37.

We permit the Carthaginians to live according to their own laws and customs; and grant them all the cities and provinces they had in Africa, before the War. The Romans shall immediately abstain from plundering them.

Carthage shall deliver up to the Romans, all their deserters, fugitive slaves, and prisoners of war;

Surrender to Scipio, all her ships of war, except ten Triremes, and all her Elephants trained up for war; and she shall not hereafter tame any more of these animals;

Enter into no war, either in Africa, or out of Africa, without the consent of the Roman people;

Restore to Masinissa all that she has usurped from him, or his ancestors, and shall make an alliance with him;

Supply the Roman Legions with corn, and pay their auxiliaries, till the return of the ambassadors whom she shall send to Rome, to have the peace ratified there;

*Pay to the Romans in the space of fifty years, ten thousand talents * of silver, at equal payments;*

Put into Scipio's hands, an hundred such hostages as he shall choose; the youngest of whom shall not be under fourteen, nor the oldest above thirty years of age.

Neither the peace, nor even a truce, shall take place, till the Carthaginians have restored to the Romans, the ships and effects taken from them during the former truce.

These were hard conditions; and upon the return and report of the ambassadors, Gisco, a man of distinction in the Republic, endeavoured in an assembly of the people, to dissuade them from complying. Hannibal, fearing the influence his harangue might have, mounted the Rostra, and drove the orator from it. And, perceiving that the people were angry at this his strange procedure, he thus addressed himself to them: I was but nine years old when I went from this place, and have now spent six and thirty years in arms. In that time I have learnt tolerably well the art of war. It is your business now to teach me the laws, customs, and civilities, which ought to be observed in your Assemblies. After this apology, he made a long discourse on the necessity of concluding the treaty, though the conditions of it were heavy. The assembly acquiesced in the opinion of a General whose inclination to arms, and whose hatred to Rome, they knew, would never have suffered him to think of peace, had he retained the least hope of success in war †.

* Some authors say, that the Carthaginian General fled from the battle of Zama to the Rhodians, who were going immediately on board a ship, he sailed into Asia to seek refuge. That he demanded him of the Carthaginians, and was answered, he had left Africa. But others, better informed, tell us, that he continued some time in his own country, and was afterwards honoured with the chief magistracy in his Republic.

In pursuance of his advice, deputies were sent to Scipio, who to the articles abovementioned added this, That, till the conclusion of the treaty, the Carthaginians should send no embassy to any state but the Roman; and that they should give him an account of all embassies that came to them from abroad. Every thing being agreed on, Carthage sent ambassadors to Rome, to get the peace confirmed there; and the Pro-Consul, to facilitate the negotiation, appointed three officers, of whom one was his brother Lucius Scipio, to accompany them.

Y. R. 551.
Bef. Chr.
201.
250 Conf.
Liv. B. 30.
c. 38.

The Consul Nero, who, on the renewal of hostilities in Africa, had, with the consent of the Senate, prepared a fleet in order to pass into that country, was long detained, by bad weather, on the coast of Italy, and about Corfica and Sardinia. Afterwards, a storm dispersed his ships near Sicily, and shattered many of them; and while they were refitting his Consulship expired.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Ælius Pætus being chosen Consuls, the Senate refused to determine any thing concerning their provinces, till the Carthaginian ambassadors (now arrived at Rome) were first heard. But Lentulus, ambitious of the honour of finishing the war with Carthage, declared that he would suffer no affair to be brought before the Conscrip Fathers till they had decreed Africa for his province: His Colleague (a wise and modest man) declined any competition with Scipio. After the matter had been warmly debated in the Comitia, the people referred it to the Conscrip Fathers; who decreed, that the Consul to whom the fleet should fall by lot, should sail with it to Sicily, and from thence, in case of war, to Africa; but that Scipio should have the sole conduct of the land-forces there: And, in case of peace, that the Roman People should determine whether the Consul or Scipio should conclude it, and who should lead back the victorious army.

Y. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Conf.

After this, the Senate gave audience to the Carthaginian ambassadors, who were all men of the first rank in their country: Asdrubal (surnamed Hædus) was the chief of them; and as he had always opposed the Barbine faction and the rupture with Rome, he was the more favourably heard. In his speech, he cast the blame of the late war on the family of Hamilcar: Some things laid to the charge of the Carthaginians he endeavoured to excuse; others he confessed, lest by denying what was evident, he should make it more difficult to obtain pardon: And when he had flattered the Romans on their wonted moderation in prosperity, he concluded with exhorting them to preserve this character by their lenity to Carthage. The speeches of his Colleagues turned chiefly on the deplorable condition to which their country was reduced. When they had ended, one of the Senators asked them, What Gods will you invoke to witness the sincerity of your Oaths? Asdrubal immediately answered, The same who have so severely punished us for the breach of Oaths.

Liv. B. 30.
c. 42.

V. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Conf.

Appian in Public.
P. 37, 38.

Liv. B. 30.
C. 43.

In the debate which followed, it was urged, in favour of the peace, that Scipio, who best knew the state of affairs in Africa, had given his opinion for it; that the Romans would have nothing to fear from Carthage for the future, since it would be easy to keep her low; that she would be left, by the articles of the treaty, unarmed amidst many nations greatly incensed against her on account of the slavery she had long kept them under; and would be narrowly watched by Masiniſſa; that to raze the city would bring upon the Romans the hatred of all the world; and to give up the dominions of Carthage to Masiniſſa would make him too powerful. P. Cornelius Lentulus, a relation of the Consul, opposed this opinion, and maintained, that such had been the cruelty and faithlessness of the Carthaginians, that to destroy them, would be to do an act agreeable both to Gods and men. The Senate however inclined to peace; but the Consul Lentulus interposed his authority, and forbade the decree to be passed. Hereupon two Tribunes of the commons laid the affair before the people. The Comitia empowered the Senate to grant a peace to Carthage, and appointed Scipio to negotiate the treaty, and bring home the troops. The Fathers approving the plan of the peace, sent, in company with the Carthaginian ambassadors, ten deputies to assist Scipio in settling affairs in Africa.

The Carthaginians first delivered up all the deserters, and prisoners of war (amounting to 4000 men) and elephants. The Latine deserters were, by Scipio's order, beheaded, the Roman, crucified. Some of the elephants he sent to Rome, and gave the rest to Masiniſſa. Then the Carthaginian galleys and small ships (except ten triremes) to the number of 500 sail, were given up to the Pro-Consul, who burnt them at sea, within sight of Carthage. The only thing which remained, was the first payment of the tribute that was to be annual during fifty years. And now the covetous temper of these trading men remarkably shewed itself. When a tax was proposed for raising the necessary sum, they all burst into tears, except Hannibal, who at their weeping burst into laughter. This gave great offence; and Asdrubal Hædus reproved him for it. What! Does it become you to laugh? You, to insult us on the miseries you have brought upon us? To which Hannibal made this answer: Could you look into my heart, you would see, that my laughter, far from being the effect of mirth, proceeds from a mind almost disordered with grief: Neither is it so unseasonable and absurd as your tears. Then you should have wept, when our arms were taken from us, our ships burnt, and war forbidden us, even in Africa. That was the wound by which we fell. Do not flatter yourselves, that the Romans have consulted your quiet. No great city can be long in tranquillity. If it has not war abroad it will find enemies at home. But it seems we are touched with public calamities only so far as they affect our private fortunes, and the loss of our money is the chief thing we regret. When you saw Carthage disarmed,

disarmed, and, amidst so many armed nations, exposed naked and defenceless, none of you dropt a tear; but when a little money is to be paid, you weep and mourn, as if our country was going to its burial. You may quickly find (I fear it much) that these tears have been shed for the least of your misfortunes.

Y. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Conf.

SCIPIO, before his departure from Africa, with the consent of the ten commissioners, settled Masiniſſa in the possession not only of his hereditary dominions, but of all the places conquered from Syphax; which possession was afterwards confirmed by the Senate.

On the Pro-Consul's return to Italy, both Senate and people unanimously concurred in decreeing him a triumph^a; and the show was more magnificent than any that had been yet seen at Rome.

He is said to have been the first Roman General, that, for having conquered a country, was called after its name: Through the esteem of his soldiers, the favour of the people, or the flattery of his friends (it is uncertain which) he acquired the surname of AFRICANUS.

Liv. B. 30
c. 45.

^a According to Polybius, Syphax led in chains, was one of the ornaments of Scipio's triumph; but Livy tells us, that the King died before Scipio made his triumphal procession.

T H E

Roman History.

F I F T H B O O K.

From the End of the SECOND PUNIC WAR, in the Year of Rome 552, to the End of the THIRD, in 607, when Carthage was destroyed.

C H A P. I.

*The occasion and commencement of the war with King Philip of Macedon.
Philip makes a fruitless attempt upon Athens: The Achæans reject his offers of assistance against the tyrant of Lacedæmon.*

Y. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Cons.

ROME, by her complete victory and triumph over the Carthaginians, was become terrible to all the nations around her; not one of her neighbours, then in peace with her, appears to have had any disposition to a rupture. Some pretence of justice, however, she must always have for extending her dominion, and must not fail to be injured, or menaced, or, at least, affronted by the King or the people of whatever country, in the Senate's plan of usurpation, stood next to be invaded. Excellent reasons would, doubtless, have been found for bending the main strength of Rome against those provinces of Gaul which lay between her Italian territories and Spain, had not the countries of the East presented to the Romans a more alluring prospect. Macedon, Greece, and Asia, would not only be richer prizes of victory, but, in all likelihood, of cheaper and easier acquisition. To make any considerable enlargement of empire to the west, many battles must be fought, many nations, brave and warlike, and independent of each other, be successively subdued, and Italy must bear almost the whole expence both of blood and treasure; and during so tedious a war, the powers of the East might perhaps take the alarm, suspend their mutual jealousies, and form a dangerous confederacy against an encroaching Republic, that seemed to set no bounds to her ambition. In attacking Macedon at this time, the Senate were sure to be assisted by their clients and allies the Greeks, who, they intended, should support the chief burden of the war, and who, they foresaw, would, after the ruin of that monarchy, naturally fall, from being auxiliaries and allies, to be subjects of Rome; and the Macedonian power, that only barrier, being demolished, the wealthy kingdoms of Asia would lie open open to her invasions at pleasure. The first step then towards compassing these vast designs was to find matter of quarrel with King Philip; and therefore, though it could not be well imagined, that he, who, even while Hannibal was in Italy, had gladly come to an accommodation with the Republic, would now, after she had totally subdued the only formidable rival of her power, entertain thoughts of invading her dominions; yet this design, as we shall presently see, must be confidently imputed to him; the ambitious views of the Macedonian must be timely prevented; and Rome, for her own security, must be obliged to act offensively against so dangerous an enemy.

PHILIP was the son of Demetrius (great-grandson of Antigonus, one of the Captains of Alexander the Great.) He succeeded, while under age, to the kingdom of Macedon, after the death of his uncle and tutor, Antigonus Doson. (This Antigonus, who assumed the power and title of King, having been called to the assistance of the Achæans, in their war with Cleomenes King of Sparta, had driven him out of Peloponnesus, and made himself the protector of Achaia and the arbiter of Greece. He died very soon after the defeat of Cleomenes.) Philip had no sooner mounted the throne of Macedon, than the *Ætoli*ans, despising his youth, invaded the territories of Messene without any just cause. The Messenians made their complaint to the Achæans, who readily undertook to assist them; and after finding themselves not strong enough, engaged Philip of Macedon in the same cause. On the other hand, the *Ætoli*ans entered into a league with the Lacedæmonians. In this war, which was called the social war, Philip and the Achæans had greatly the advantage; yet the Macedonian granted peace to the *Ætoli*ans and their allies, just after Hannibal had defeated the Romans at the lake Tbrasymenus. For upon the news of this battle, Demetrius of *Pharos, who, being expelled his dominions by the Romans, had taken refuge in Philip's court, persuaded the King to settle his affairs in Greece, and, seizing the opportunity given him by the weak condition of Rome, invade Italy: In consequence of which advice, the Macedonian soon after made a league with Hannibal†; but the Romans by engaging the * *Ætoli*ans, the Lacedæmonians and Attalus King of Pergamus, to join in a war against Philip, kept him employed in Greece, and hindered the execution of his designs upon Italy; as has been already related.

After the King had obtained a † peace with Rome, he turned his thoughts how to enlarge his dominions to the east, and secretly projected with Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, to share between them the kingdom of Egypt, where Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, had lately succeeded his father Ptolemy Philopator. Philip also made a league with Prusias King of Bitthynia, gave him his daughter in marriage, and at his desire laid siege to Cyus, a Greek city on the borders of Bitthynia, and which was then governed by an Ætolian, whom his countrymen had sent to the Cyanians, to be their General. The Rhodians and *Ætoli*ans interceded for the

Y. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Conf.

Polyb. B. 4.
c. 2. & seq.

Id. B. 2.
c. 69.

Id. B. 4.
c. 35.

Id. B. 5.
c. 101.
* See p. 99.
and 157.

† See p. 183.
* Polyb. 213.
27.
Id. B. 7. 26.
c. 24. and
B. 27. c. 30.
† p. 269.
Polyb. B.
15. c. 22.

Id. B. 15.
c. 21.

the town; and Philip, by his ambassadors, promised the former to spare Cyus for their sake. Nevertheless, while those ambassadors were making these assurances, the Rhodians received advice, that Philip had sacked the town, and then given it up to his son-in-law. This affront highly provoked them, and they persuaded Antiochus, King of Pergamus, then in fear for his own dominions, from the ambition of Philip, to unite his forces with theirs, and begin a war with the Macedonians. The confederates attacked his fleet near the island Chios, and defeated it: But they not pursuing the advantage of their victory, Philip gathered together his scattered ships, and made a descent upon Asia. There he took Lebeda, Bargylie and several other towns, and penetrating as far as the territory of Pergamus, laid it waste, not sparing even the temples of the Gods, or the Sacred Groves.

The Athenians also had at this time a quarrel subsisting with Philip, which began on the following occasion. Two Acarnanians happening to be at Athens, when the mysteries of Ceres were celebrated, had, through ignorance of the laws, entered the temple of the Goddess, without being initiated into those mysteries; and the Athenians, for this crime, had put them to death. The people of Acarnania made their complaint to the King, desiring his leave and assistance to make war upon Athens. Philip granted both, and the Acarnanians, in conjunction with some Macedonian auxiliaries, made an irruption into Attica, and carried off a great deal of booty.

After the sea-fight at Chios, the Athenians sent an embassy to the King of Pergamus, congratulating him upon his victory, and inviting him to their town. Attalus accepted the invitation, and having, together with some Rhodians, landed at *Piræus, the magistrates of Athens, the priests and the citizens, with their wives and children, went out to meet him, and paid him extraordinary honours: A new tribe being at this time added to the ten they had before, they called it Attalis, from his name: All the Rhodians they complimented with the freedom of the city; and at the King's persuasion and theirs, formally declared war against Philip. The confederates then sent deputies to Rome, to complain of the injuries done by the Macedonian, and of the progress he had made in Asia. Philip, on the other hand, dispatched ambassadors to the Senate, justifying himself, and accusing Aurelius, the Roman ambassador in Greece, of having raised soldiers in that country, and of having, contrary to the treaty of peace, committed hostilities against his lieutenants: He also desired, that Scopater and the Macedonians, who had served as mercenaries in the Carthaginian army, and been taken prisoners at the battle of Zama, might be set at liberty. M. Furius, whom Aurelius had dispatched from Greece to answer this charge, asserted, that the ambassador had not gone out of the territories of the Roman allies, and had only endeavoured to hinder them from being pillaged by the Macedonians. Furius also informed the Senate, that Scopater was one of the King's courtiers, and had been

1. B. 30.
2. C. 10.
3. C. 11.

1. B. 30.
2. C. 10.
3. C. 11.

1. B. 30.
2. C. 10.
3. C. 11.

1. B. 30.
2. C. 10.

* The port of Athens.

1. B. 30.
2. C. 42.

been sent by him into Africa, with money and four thousand men, to assist Carthage. The Conscrip Fathers approved of Aurelius's conduct, refused to deliver up Sopater and the Macedonians, and threatened the King with a speedy war if he proceeded in the course he had begun. Their answer to the deputies from Attalus and the Rhodians was, that the Senate would take care of the affairs of Asia.

Y. R. 552.
Bef. Chr.
200.
251 Conf.

In consequence of these several answers, they passed a decree, empowering the Consul Ælius to name a General to sail with a fleet of thirty-eight galleys for Macedon; and Lævinus being chosen for the expedition, he sailed thither without delay. On his arrival, Aurelius joined him; and, when they had consulted together, they agreed to write to the Senate, That Philip had made mighty preparations for war, and that it would be necessary to send a greater force into Greece than was there at present.

Liv. B. 31.
c. 3.

Their letters did not arrive at Rome till new Consuls had been chosen, P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aur. Cotta, who on the ides of March, the day they entered upon office, made a report to the Senate of the state of affairs in Greece and Macedon. The Conscrip Fathers suspended their determination, till sacrifices should be offered to the Gods, and their will consulted. After this they assembled: The letters from Greece were now arrived, and also a new deputation from the Athenians, demanding succours against the King of Macedon, who threatened them with a siege; the Consuls took this opportunity to declare, that the Gods accepted the sacrifices, and that, by the report of the Auruspices, the entrails of the victims portended to the Republic victories and triumphs and augmentation of dominion. The assembly passed a decree, That thanks be returned to the Athenians for their fidelity; That the Consuls immediately draw lots for their provinces, and that he to whom Macedon falls, shall ask the people's consent to a war with Philip.

Y. R. 553.
Bef. Chr.
199.
252 Conf.
Liv. B. 31.
c. 4.

Macedon fell to Sulpicius. He assembled the Comitia by centuries, and proposed the war: but the motion was there rejected by a plurality of voices. For the commons of Rome, already exhausted by the long and grievous war with Hannibal, had no inclination to begin a new one, that must, in all probability, be very burthenfome. And Bæbius, one of their Tribunes, revived the old complaint, That the Nobles, from views of ambition and private interest, were for adding war to war, that the people might never enjoy any repose. The Senate, nevertheless, did not desist from their project. Sulpicius once more convened the people. To engage their consent to the enterprize, he put them in mind of the fatal consequences which had followed upon their delaying to send succours to the Saguntines, when threatened by Hannibal, as the Athenians were now by Philip. That their negligence in the former case had encouraged the Carthaginian to pass the Alps, and invade Italy; that though he had been five months coming from Spain, five days would be sufficient.

Y. R. 493
B. C. 193
193
193 C. 193

sufficient to bring Philip upon their coasts; and, granting that the King and his Macedonians were not so much to be feared as Hannibal and the Carthaginians, yet certainly Philip was a more powerful Prince than Pyrrhus, who had led his victorious army almost to the walls of Rome. He further reminded them, That their present security was owing to Scipio's being suffered to transport his Legions into Africa; and, that it was undoubtedly good policy to keep hostilities at a distance, and make war only in an enemy's country. The arguments of the Consul prevailed, and the Centuries voted for war.

And now the chief concern of the Senate was to settle the several armies which were to act this year: No more than six Legions were raised in all. Sulpicius had leave to strengthen the two Legions assigned him for the Macedonian war, by as many volunteers as he could get from among the soldiers which Scipio had brought from Africa; but he was not to force any of them into the service. The Consul Aurelius also raised two Legions to march whithersoever the wavering nations of Italy made his presence necessary. And then the Prætorian armies were formed for the service in Cisalpine Gaul, Bruttium, Sicily, and Sardinia.

Justin. B.
193 C. 193
193 C. 193
193 C. 193
193 C. 193
193 C. 193

Embassadors arrived at this time from Ptolemy Epiphanes, King of Egypt, who, having escaped, in his minority, the wicked designs of his guardians, had (according to Justin) put himself under the protection of the Romans, and received from them M. Lepidus to be his guardian and defender against the threatened invasions of the Kings of Syria and Macedon. Ptolemy inclined to send succours to Athens, which Philip was marching to besiege; but he durst not undertake any thing till he had asked the consent of the Roman Republic. The Senate returned him thanks for the deference he had shewed them, and gave this answer to his embassadors, That Rome was resolved to support her allies; that she would give Ptolemy notice when she wanted his assistance; and that she knew his kingdom to be a faithful and firm support of the Republic.

The Consul Sulpicius was hindered from setting out for Macedon by ceremonies of religion. In the beginning of a new war, the Romans would have nothing customary of that kind neglected; the least omission of the usual formalities being thought to affect the success of the enterprize. It was judged proper on this occasion, that Sulpicius should vow games in honour of Jupiter, and make him a present. Nevertheless it met with some opposition: For the Republic had not the sum necessary for the expence of the games; and the Pontifex Maximus declared, that the Gods did not care to be at uncertainties, that they were always for ready money; and that the sum vowed must be set apart at the time of the vow. However this sentence of the Pontifex was over-ruled by the Pontifical College, before whom Sulpicius, by order, laid the affair. They decreed, that the Senate should be free to determine the expence of the games, and the value of the present; and this was the first time that ever a vow was made of an indeterminate sum; or, that the Gods gave credit.

Y. R. 550
Bef. Chr.
199.
252 Conf.

A sudden insurrection of the Gauls detained Sulpicius some time longer at Rome. Hamilcar, whom Mago had left in Italy, was at the head of them. He seized Placentia, burnt the town, put most of the inhabitants to death, and advanced towards Cremonia: The Cremonese shut their gates against him, stood a siege, and gave notice of their danger to Turcius Purpureo, the Roman Prætor, who, in the neighbourhood of Ariminum, commanded five thousand men of the allies. Furius not having strength sufficient to contend with the enemy, wrote to the Senate, desiring succours, and acquainting them that the Gauls were forty thousand strong. The Fathers decreed, that either the Consul Aurelius should, at the head of some Legions he had ordered to rendezvous in Hebruria, go to the relief of Cremona; or, in case he declined the commission, that those Legions should march to Ariminum without him, and be commanded in the expedition against the Gauls by Furius, who should send his five thousand men into Hebruria. Aurelius chose to continue at Rome.

The Senate appointed also an embassy to Carthage, to complain of Hamilcar; and to require that he should be recalled and given up to the Romans, together with some deserters, who, according to the treaty, ought to have been given up before. The same ambassadors had instructions to go into Numidia, with presents and a compliment to Masiniſſa, on the recovery and enlargement of his dominions; and they were to signify to him, that as Rome was entering upon a new war with Macedon, it would be very acceptable, if he would send the Republic some squadrons of Numidian horse.

Masiniſſa was now in possession of the capital, together with a great part of the kingdom of Syphax. Vermina, the son of that dethroned King, held the other part. In the low condition to which the victories of Scipio had reduced him, he could have no security against the ambition of Masiniſſa, but in the protection of Rome. To the Senate therefore he sent envoys to solicit a reconciliation. They endeavoured to excuse what part he had acted in the war against the Romans; laid the blame upon the Carthaginians; reminded the Senate that Masiniſſa had been the enemy of Rome, before he became her friend; assured them, that neither Masiniſſa nor any other would do more to deserve the favour of the Republic than Vermina, and, in conclusion, begged he might receive from the Senate the title of King, and be admitted into their alliance and friendship. The Fathers answered, That Syphax had, without any just cause, renounced their friendship, and become their enemy; that Vermina ought to ask a peace of the Roman people, before he aspired to be stiled King by them; an honour which they con-

Y. R. 333.
E. C. 127.
131.
252 C. 10.

ferred only upon those Princes, who had deserved it by important services. They added, that Vermina might have recourse to the Roman ambassadors who were going into Africa; that they would be empowered to declare the conditions upon which the Republic would enter into a treaty with him; and that if he would have any alteration made in the terms they offered, he might again have recourse to the Senate. Such was the haughtiness which the Romans assumed, after the reduction of Carthage.

L. B. 31.
C. 12.

At this time the public creditors, who had lent their money, on the promise of being reimbursed at three several payments, complained loudly for want of the last, which had been delayed beyond the time on account of the expences of the Macedonian war. The Senate, to do these creditors justice in the best manner they could, assigned over to them certain lands, which belonged to the public, and were within fifty miles of the city, at the rent of one As per acre, adding this condition, that when the state was able to pay, it should be in the option of the creditors to keep the lands, or receive their money.

C. 26.

Philip of Macedon began the campaign long before the Consul Sulpicius left Rome. The King dispatched Philocrates with 2000 foot and 200 horse to lay waste the lands of the Athenians; and, ordering Heraclides to Moronez with the fleet, he himself with the main of his army marched thither by land. Having easily made himself master of this town, afterwards of Ænus, and some other places, he over-ran the Chersonesus, and from thence crossed the Streights, and sat down before Abydos. Attalus and the Rhodians, instead of opposing Philip, wasted their time in negotiations to bring the Ætians and others of the Greeks into the new alliance. All the assistance they sent to Abydos was 300 Pergamenians and one Rhodian galley. The inhabitants made a stout defence; and when Philip, after he had beat down a part of the wall, refused them their lives and liberty, they took a solemn oath to massacre their wives and children, set fire to the town, burn their effects, and die themselves in the breach. Animated with this fury, they fought so desperately, on the next assault made by Philip, that he lost almost all hope of reducing them. But now the chiefs of the Abydenians, having time to reflect on their inhuman design, and thinking it a less evil to submit to the King, than to imbrue their hands in the blood of so many women and children, sent to him to beg mercy. Just at this time M. Æmilius arrived in Philip's camp. He was the youngest of three ambassadors whom the Romans had sent to Antiochus and Ptolemy, with orders to coast along Greece in their way to Asia, and to come, if possible, to a conference with the King of Macedon. The ambassadors hearing at Rhodes, that Philip was besieging Abydos, it was agreed amongst them, that Æmilius should go and confer with him. The Roman signified to the King, that the Senate required of him, not to make war with any nation in Greece, not to meddle in

P. H. B.
26. C. 25.

Ptolemy's

Perseus's affairs, and to give satisfaction for the injuries he had done to Rome and the Rhodians: Adding, that, if he complied with these demands, the peace might still continue between Rome and him; if he did not, he must expect war. Philip began to excuse himself, alledging, that the Rhodians had been the aggressors. But what have the Athenians done? (replied Æmilius interrupting him) Wherein have the Cyanians or the people of Abydos offended? Have any of these been the aggressors? To this the King answered, There are three reasons of your haughty behaviour, and for which I forgive it: You are a young man without experience, You are very handsome, and you are a Roman. I earnestly wish that Rome may not violate the treaty; but if she does, I shall, with the assistance of the Gods, defend myself. This conference put an end to all thoughts of peace, and Æmilius was dismissed. The chiefs of the Abydenians surrendered the city; but the multitude remembering the oath they had sworn, a fit of rage seized them, and they fell to massacring their wives, their children, and themselves. Philip, surprized at their madness, ordered proclamation to be made through the town, that all those, who had a mind to hang themselves, or cut their own throats, should have three days time to do it.

Philip repassed the Hellepont. Sulpicius was now wintering near Apollonia; he had come too late in the year to attempt any thing. Upon his arrival he sent Claudius Centho to Athens with twenty galleys and some Roman legionaries to cover the Athenian territories from the ravages of Philocrates. Centho not only put a stop to the hostilities of the Macedonians, but took revenge on the Chalcidian pirates for their robberies: He sailed with the best part of his squadron, surprized Chalcis in the night, pillaged it, beat down the statues of King Philip, burnt all his magazines, arsenals, and engines of war, and then returned with the spoil to Athens. The Macedonian, upon the first news of the taking of Chalcis, hastened to that town, thinking to surprize the Romans there: But they were gone. Thence he marched with great expedition to Athens, in the hope of finding it unprepared for resistance. The Athenians however had notice of his coming, and drew out their forces to fight him. Philip, pleased with an opportunity to shew his bravery before a multitude of people, who crowded on the walls to see the engagement, gave his men this short exhortation, Fix your eyes on me, and remember, that where the King is, there his troops ought to be. Then falling upon the Athenians with incredible fury, he drove them into the town, and pursued them to the very gates. Next day the besieged, strengthened by a reinforcement of Romans and Pergamenians, appeared in order of battle before the walls; Philip thought proper to remove to a greater distance, and posted himself at Eleusis. In that neighbourhood he signally vented his rage, sparing neither tombs nor temples, nor even the images of the Gods. After this, understanding that the diet of Achaia was assembled at Argos, to de-

V. R. 551.
Bel. Chm.
199.
252 Conf.

Liv. B. 31.
c. 22.

Y. R. 555.
Bef. Chr.
199.
252 Conf.

liberate upon a war with the tyrant Nabis, (who after the death of Machanidas had usurped the Lacedæmonian throne) he hastened thither, and offered his assistance to the Acheans, upon condition that they would furnish garrisons for the cities of Oreus, Chalcis, and Corinth: But they perceiving that his views were to embroil them with the Romans, declined his offers. Whereupon he returned into Attica, renewed his devastations there, and then marched into Boeotia.

C. 23.

In Italy, the Prætor Furius, at the head of the army which the Consul Aurelius should have commanded, (had he not chosen rather to continue at Rome) defeated the Gauls in a pitched battle, near Cremona. Of forty thousand of the enemy, scarce six thousand escaped. Aurelius's jealousy was awakened by this success. Vexed at having missed so favourable an opportunity of acquiring glory, he, to repair his loss in some measure, put himself now at the head of his troops: But Furius had left him little to do. The victorious Prætor returned to Rome, and in the absence of the Consul obtained a triumph, by a decree of the Senate, though contrary to the judgment of the oldest Senators; because the army, with which he had conquered, had not fought under his Auspices.

C. 48.

The ambassadors who had been sent to Carthage, and into Numidia, were now returned. They had found no reason to be dissatisfied with the Carthaginians, who, with regard to Hamilcar, had answered, that they would punish him the only way they could, which was by banishment and confiscation of his effects. All the Roman deserters they could find, they had delivered up; and had sent to Rome, by way of present, two hundred thousand modii of wheat, and as much to the Roman army in Macedon. Masiniſſa offered the Republic a reinforcement of two thousand horse: The Senate accepted only of one thousand; and these the King transported into Macedon at his own expence, sending with them two hundred thousand modii of wheat, and as many of barley. As for Vermina, he had submitted himself to the conditions of peace which the ambassadors proposed; and it is probable that he then assumed the title of King, over that part of Masæſylia which Masiniſſa had not conquered from Sypbax.

C H A P. II,

The Ætolians decline taking part in the war. Some slight engagements between the Romans and Macedonians. The Ætolians declare for the Romans. The ridiculous behaviour of the Athenians with regard to Philip. The Consul Flaminius lands in Greece; has a conference with Philip; forces his entrenchments; gains over the Achæans to the interest of Rome: Has another conference with Philip. The battle of Cynocephalæ. A peace concluded.

THE Consular Fasces were transferred to L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Scipio Africanus was chosen at the same time one of the Censors; and likewise declared Prince (or President) of the Senate. The conduct of the war in Italy fell to Lentulus, the war of Macedon to Villius: But these two heads of the Republic, after the example of their predecessors, continued long at Rome, and did not go to their provinces till it was very late. Sulpicius, who, from being Consul was now become Pro-Consul in Greece, came out of his winter-quarters, and encamped between Apollonia and Dirrhachium, on the banks of the Aspus a river of Illyricum. Apustius, whom he sent out with a detachment to ravage the borders of Macedon, took several places by assault. Upon his return from this expedition, some petty Kings in the neighbourhood, who had been formerly in alliance with the Romans, came to offer their services to the Pro-Consul; amongst these Pleuratus, King of the Dardani in Illyricum, Bato a sovereign (probably) of a country near Illyricum, and Amynander King of the Atbamanes, a people of Epirus.

The devastation made by the Romans in Macedon brought Philip from Æroia to the defence of his own country. He took all the measures for that purpose which became an able General. As a diet of the Ætolians was now actually assembled at Naupaëtus, he sent ambassadors to dissuade them from joining his enemies. Furius Purpureo went thither on the part of the Romans; and some envoys from Athens repaired to the same place. Damocritus, Prætor of the Ætolians, presided in the diet. The Macedonian ambassadors were first heard. Their speeches were full of invectives against the Romans, whom they treated as Barbarians, ambitious, perfidious and cruel; giving, as proofs of this charge, their proceedings at Rhegium, Capua, and Tarentum, their invasion of Sicily, first under pretence of assisting the people of Messina, afterwards of delivering Syracuse from the tyranny of Cartbage: “What “ has

Y. R. 554.
Ref. Chr.
198.
253 Conf.

Liv. B. 32.
c. 7. & B.
34. c. 44.
B. 31. c. 27.

c. 28.

It has been the consequence of Roman blood, and all the
 "of the people, and that the Roman people, who the world to
 "to conquer Philip; but in all this, which a young man would soon "become a prey to the Romans, and which the Romans are your
 "of the world, the object of the Roman people, and the object of the King "of the world." The orators continued with pressing the diet to continue firm to the treaty made only a few years before. The Romans, who spoke next, expatiated upon the inhumanity and unparalleled impiety of the Macedonians, who in his barbarous method of making war had violated even the sepulchres of the dead, and the industries of the Gods: And they exhorted the assembly to join in the common cause of the two most formidable powers, that of Heaven, and that of Rome. After this Lucius Pappus was heard. His speech turned chiefly on a justification of the Roman conduct, with regard to the cities mentioned by the Macedonians. He insisted on the moderation and lenity of the republic in her conduct towards Cortage, and returned the reproaches of cruelty upon Philip; and lastly, he advised the assembly to lay hold of the present opportunity of renewing their confederacy with Rome, unless they chose rather to perish with Philip than conquer with the Romans. The diet inclined to favour the Roman cause; but Demetrius suspended their determination, by declaring, that nothing which related to peace or war could legally be determined out of a general diet, which this was not. The artful Greek made a merit afterwards, with his countrymen, of his address in this affair, pretending that his design was only to gain time till by the progress of the war it should appear which side was the stronger.

The King was now at Demetrias in Thessaly. He gave the command of his fleet to Archedides, with orders to guard the coast; and he marched himself with the land-army to meet the Pro-Consul, who was advancing into the very heart of Macedon. Skirmishes soon happened between some flying squadrons. Philip, to encourage his troops, by shewing, that his regard for them extended beyond their death, would needs take particular care to have the slain brought to the camp, and funeral rites performed. But this had a quite contrary effect to what the King proposed; the soldiers were terrified when they beheld the large and dreadful wounds made by the Roman sabres in the bodies of their companions; for the swords, which the Greeks used, were chiefly for thrusting, and made but small wounds.

Philip having recalled a detachment he had sent under his son Perseus and his Governors, to guard the passes of Pelagonia, and hinder Pleuratus and the Dardani from entering Macedon; his army was now considerable, consisting of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; and he came and posted himself within two hundred paces of
 the

the Roman camp. The third day Sulpicius offered him battle; but the Macedonian judged it not proper to venture a decisive action, till he had studied the enemy, and their manner of fighting. To this end, he first detached a small party to skirmish, and these being worsted, the next day he sent out all his cavalry and light armed infantry, under Anaxagoras, and laid an ambush for the Romans, which they escaped, through the ill management of the Macedonians. In a third action, near Otolophum, whither Sulpicius had removed his camp, the King, pursuing too eagerly some advantage he gained in the beginning of the fight, had like to have lost his life, as he did the battle.

Y. R. 554.
Bef. Chr.
198.
253 Conf.

This ill success, and the intelligence Philip received, that Pleuratus King of the Dardani had entered Macedon, in order to join the Romans, made him leave his post; he decamped in the night, without the Pro-Consul's perceiving it. Sulpicius after a few days pursued him, and forced his way into Eordæa, through some narrow passes, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Macedonian to stop him. Having lived here a while upon free quarter, he returned to Apollonia, and there delivered up the army to the Consul Villius Tappulus, who was arrived from Rome.

Liv. B. 37.
c. 38, 39.

At this time the Veteran soldiers who had served under Scipio, and had entered the present service as volunteers, grew impatient to return to Italy, that they might enjoy some repose; and they demanded in a very mutinous manner to be dismissed. The Consul could not deny their request to be reasonable; but he reproved them for their manner of asking, bid them return to their colours, and promised to write to the Senate to procure their discharge. The season of the year, which was far advanced, would not suffer Villius to undertake any thing of moment this campaign.

B. 32. c. 3.

While Philip found that he was no longer pursued by the Romans, and that the Consul gave him time to breathe, he took advantage of the opportunity, and marched against the Ætolians, who at length had taken part with the Romans, and jointly with Amyntander King of the Atbamans, made an irruption into Macedon. He defeated them, and forced them to retire into their own countries. Anaxagoras, whom he had detached against the Dardani, had the like success.

B. 31. c. 40.

As to sea-affairs, Apollonius, to whom the Pro-Consul Sulpicius had given the command of the Roman fleet, had early in the year sailed from Corcyra, joined the naval force of King Attalus off the coast of Argolis, and sailed thence to the port Piræus; which so elevated the Athenians, that they behaved themselves in the most ridiculous manner. To express their resentments against the King of Macedon, they passed a decree to destroy the statues of him and his ancestors, which they had before worshipped, break down their altars, and abolish the festivals instituted to their honour; ordering that for the future, the priests should, as often as they prayed for the Athenians and their allies, pronounce.

c. 41.

Y. R. 554.
 B.C. 197.
 253 Cons.

pronounce curses against Philip, his children, his kingdom, his sea and land forces, and all the race and name of the Macedonians; and that the places where any thing had been written, or put up in honour of the King, should be looked upon as impure and detestable. They added, that whatever mark of ignominy any body should propose to lay upon Philip, the people of Athens should consent to it; and that it should be lawful to kill any man who should say or do any thing in honour of the King. Thus, says Livy, the Athenians made war upon Philip by words and writings, in which their only strength lay. The united fleets having spent the summer in expeditions of no great importance on the coasts of Macedon, Thessaly, and Eubœa, in some of which they were assisted by twenty Rhodian galleys under the command of Agelimbrotus, returned about the autumnal æquinox to Eyræus. Apustius left thirty of his ships there, and with the rest sailed to Corcyra, as Attalus did to Asia, after some stay in Attica to celebrate the feast of Ceres.

Liv. B. 32.
 c. 4

Philip continued to keep the field; but after a fruitless attempt to take Thaumacia in Thessaly, a strong town situated on a rock, he returned to Macedon, to make preparations for the next campaign; and the Consul Villius spent the winter in Apollonia.

The other Consul Lentulus, who should have led his army against the Gauls, did not stir from the city, until Bæbius the Prætor of Gaul, who had put himself at the head of the Consular army, was defeated by the Insubrians. He had rashly entered their country, where being surrounded by the enemy, he lost near seven thousand of his men. Upon this news the Consul hastened to the camp, and dismissed Bæbius with ignominy, but did nothing of moment in his province, being soon recalled to Rome to preside at the Comitia for the great elections.

It was not customary to raise any person to the Consulate till he had previously passed through the offices of Quæstor, curule Ædile, and Prætor. Great opposition was therefore made by two Tribunes of the people to the proceeding of the Comitia for the grand elections, which were now held by Lentulus. Two of the candidates were T. Quintius Flaminius, and Sext. Ælius Pætus, surnamed Cætas. They had neither of them been in the Prætorship; and the former, who was but thirty years of age, had never been so much as Ædile. The affair at length devolved upon the Senate: As the Tribunes had only custom and no law on their side, the Fathers decreed, that the centuries should be free to chuse the two candidates in question; and they were accordingly elected Consuls.

Y. R. 555.
 B.C. 196.
 254 Cons.

The first business of these new magistrates was to introduce into the Senate the ambassadors of King Attalus. They came to complain of Antiochus King of Syria, who had invaded the territories of their master; and they requested that the Romans would either send some troops to guard his dominions, or allow Attalus to carry back his own fleet to defend them. Antiochus was secretly in league with Philip, and the Senate were were not ignorant of it, but they thought it advisable in the present conjuncture to dissemble their resentment. They answered therefore, that they were obliged to Attalus for the assistance of his fleet and his troops; but did not desire to detain them longer than it was convenient for him: That the Roman Republic made use of what belonged to others, solely at the pleasure of the owners, whom she always considered as free to withdraw their aid, when they pleased: That she could not send him help against Antiochus her friend and ally; but would dispatch ambassadors to acquaint him, that as she employed Attalus's fleet and his troops against Philip their common enemy, it would be agreeable to her if Antiochus would put an end to the war with the King of Pergamus; and that it was but reasonable, the friends and allies of Rome should be at peace amongst themselves. Ambassadors were accordingly sent; and Antiochus complied.

The war of Macedon fell by lot to Flaminius; that with the Gauls to Ælius.

Flaminius did not imitate the dilatory conduct of his predecessors. With eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, most of them chosen out of the troops which had served under Scipio, he hastened to Brundisium, and from thence set sail for Corcyra. Philip was now in great perplexity; in danger from powerful enemies who attacked him by sea and land, while he had reason to fear the inconstancy of his allies, and the resentment of his subjects. The Macedonians hated his government on account of his minister Heraclides. This man (says Polybius) a Tarentine by birth, of the dregs of the people, and abandoned to all manner of debauchery, was excellently formed by nature for mischief. He had a ready invention, a great memory, and a wonderful talent for flattering the great. Banished his own country on account of some traitorous practices, he had taken refuge in the Macedonian court, and there, insinuating himself into the King's favour, had grown to such a height of power, and made so bad an use of it, as to be one of the chief causes of the ruin of the kingdom. Philip, at this time, to soothe his people, discarded and imprisoned his minister: What became of him afterwards history has not informed us. The Macedonian was obliged to give up some towns to the Achaëans, in order to bind them to his interest in this dangerous conjuncture. Having made great preparations for war during the winter, he advanced with his army in the spring, and encamped near Apollonia on the river Acus, where it runs through a very narrow valley between two mountains, the one of which he ordered Atbenagoras to take possession of with the light armed troops, and posted himself on the other with the remainder of his forces. The situation of his camp was so strong, both by art and nature, that Villius, who had brought his legions within five miles of it, going in person to take a view of it, was terrified at the appearance

Y. R. 555.
Polyb. C. 17.
107.
254 C. 1. 6.

Polyb. B. 13.
c. 2.

Y. R. 555.
Bef. Chr.
197.
254 Conl.

it made. He called a council of war to deliberate, whether it would not be better to march about and enter Macedon the same way that Sulpicius had gone last year, than to attempt forcing the King's entrenchments. The officers were divided in opinion; and during this indetermination Flaminius arrived and took upon him the command of the army.

Liv. B. 32.
c. 16.

And now a new council of war being held, it was resolved to attack the Macedonian camp, lest the Romans, by taking a long circuit, should happen to want provisions, and be forced to protract the war to a great length. But when the resolution of the council should have been put in execution, forty days were spent in fruitless contrivances how to surmount the difficulties; and this respite gave Pbilip hopes of procuring a treaty of peace. By the means of some chiefs of the Epirot nation he obtained an interview with the Consul. Flaminius demanded nothing in favour of the Romans: But he required that Pbilip should restore to the Greeks all the cities he possessed of theirs, and make satisfaction to all those whose territories he had plundered. The King did not refuse to surrender the cities which he himself had taken from the Greeks, but was unwilling to part with those which his ancestors had conquered; and he offered to submit himself to the arbitration of neutral powers, who should judge of the injuries the Greeks had suffered from him. The Consul briskly replied, That there was no need of such an arbitration; that as he was the aggressor, he ought to repair all damages. What cities then, said Pbilip, would you have me restore? All Thessaly, answered the Roman. The King in anger replied, What more, Consul, could you have demanded, if you had conquered me? This said, he immediately broke off the conference, and went away.

Plut. life of Flaminius.

The next morning hostilities began, but with little advantage to either side. After some days the Consul detached a party of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse, under the guidance of a shepherd, whom Charops, one of the chiefs of the Epirots, had sent to him for that purpose. This fellow knew all the paths and by-roads over the mountains; and he undertook to lead the detachment, (which was to march only by moon-light) in three nights time to the top of a mountain which over-looked the Macedonian camp. They had orders to give the signal by fires, when they had gained the post appointed them. The third day, Flaminius caused two thirds of his army to march up and assail the enemy's entrenchments. In the heat of the action, the detachment falling suddenly down, like a torrent from the mountain, on the Macedonians, put a speedy end to the conflict. Pbilip was one of the first that fled. About five miles from his camp he stopped, upon a little hill, the ways to which being narrow and difficult, he thought he might safely wait there for his troops; which when he had got together, he retired with them into Thessaly, having lost only two thousand men.

This

This defeat produced other ill consequences to Philip: The Ætolians and Athamanes encouraged by it, entered Thessaly on different sides, and made great havock and devastation in that unfortunate country.

Y. R. 555.
B.C. Chr.
197.
254 Conf.

Flamininus, with his victorious legions, marched through Epirus in pursuit of the King, entered Thessaly, and took several fortresses garrisoned by Macedonians. But Atrax, a town upon the river Peneus, ten miles from Larissa, held out against him, even after he had made a breach in the wall: The garrison drew themselves up in a phalanx behind the breach, and bravely repulsed the Romans. Flamininus thinking it of consequence not to have his army affronted by a handful of men, and having ordered the place, where the wall had fallen, to be cleared of the rubbish, and a tower of a great height filled with soldiers to be moved thither, advanced, in person, with his legions to the attack: But the breach being narrow, and the Macedonians standing firm, all his efforts to enter proved vain, and he was constrained to raise the siege. Philip had retired to the famous vale of Tempe, from whence he sent succours to the cities in his interest.

Lev. B. 32.
c. 13.
c. 15

Whilst the Consul was thus employed in the northern part of Thessaly, his brother L. Quinctius, whom he had made admiral of the fleet, being joined near the island of Andros by Attalus's fleet of twenty-four ships from Asia, and that of the Rhodians consisting of twenty, laid siege to Eretria and Carystus, maritime cities of Eubœa, and when he had carried these places, entered the Saronic gulph, and appeared before Cenchrea, one of the ports of Corinth.

It was now time for the Consul to think in what part of Greece he should pass the winter. Neither Ætolia nor Acarnania had any maritime city which could furnish quarters for his troops, and had at the same time a haven large enough to contain all the store-ships necessary to supply the army with provisions. He chose therefore to winter in Phocis, a country not far from Ætolia and Thessaly, and where the city of Anticyra on the gulph of Corinth would be commodious both for his soldiers and his ships. Having turned his arms that way, Anticyra surrendered, after a slight defence. He took likewise Ambrysas, Hyampolis and Daulis; and whilst he lay before Elatia, he learnt that the Acœans had banished Cycliades, the chief of the Macedonian faction among them, and chosen for their Prætor, Aristæus, a man well affected to Rome. The Consul therefore judged this a favourable opportunity to gain that nation to the interest of the Republic; in order to which he sent a deputation to them, with offers to put Corinth under the jurisdiction of Acœaia, as it had formerly been. This was a tempting proposal, and the diet assembled to deliberate upon it. Cleomedon appeared there as ambassador from Philip, and pressed them to a neutrality; L. Calpurnius spoke on the part of the Romans; the envoys from King Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians, were likewise heard. Next day the assembly met

c. 18.

Y. R. 553.
Def. C. 17.
137.
254 Cons.
L. B. 32.
c. 21, 22.

again to debate the matter without admitting the foreign ministers, but could not come to any resolution; they feared both the Romans and Philip, and were under obligations to the latter; they had not even the courage to declare their sentiments, though pressed to it by Aristæus the President: An universal silence reigned in the assembly. After some time Aristæus in a long harangue represented to them the situation of their affairs, and urged the necessity of their joining the Romans, who, he said, were in a condition to force them to the compliance they had condescended to request: But this discourse did not bring the Achaëans to any agreement among themselves. The disputes grew warm, even to mutual reproaches, and the ten ^a Demiurgi were equally divided. The diet sat but one day longer, and the most part of this they spent in contention. In the end, one of the Demiurgi of Philip's party, was brought over to the Roman interest, by the prayers and threatenings of his father: The deputies from Dymæ, Megalopolis, and some of those from Argos, seeing how the affair was like to be determined, rose up, and left the assembly, for these three cities were under particular obligations to Philip. The rest of Achaia made an alliance with the Athenians, Attalus and the Rhodians, but deferred concluding a treaty with Flaminius, till the return of some ambassadors sent to Rome to get it approved. Nevertheless, the Achaëans, for their own interest, immediately lent assistance to the Romans to reduce Corinth.

The city was attacked on the side of Cenchrea by Quintilius, at the gate of Sicyon by the Achaëans, and on the side of the port Lechaum by Attalus. It was at first hoped by the confederates that a difference would arise between the garrison and the inhabitants, and that they should thereby become masters of the place: But Androsthenes, who commanded the garrison for Philip, had gained the affections of the Corinthians, and being powerfully supported by some Roman deserters, who had served in Hannibal's army, and by a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men under Philocles, one of King Philip's generals, he obliged the besiegers to drop their enterprize.

4:5.

After this, Philocles marched to Argos, where the Achaean diet had placed a commander named Ænesidemus, a man faithful to his trust; but the inhabitants being in the interest of Philip, took arms, and obliged the Governor to capitulate. Ænesidemus obtained leave for the garrison, consisting of five hundred men, to depart in safety, but he continued there himself, with a few of his friends. Philocles sent to ask him, why he staid, and what he intended to do: To which he answered, To die in the place committed to my care. Hereupon Philocles ordered some Tetracians to let fly their arrows at the Achaean and his friends: They were all slain.

^a The ten Demiurgi seem to have been the chief magistrates of ten cities which, at this time, composed the Achaean state. Livy, B. 35. c. 30.

Flaminius,

Flamininus, after he had taken Elatia, retired for the winter to Anticyra.

The time of the elections at Rome now drew near, and Ælius, who had done no great matter in Cisalpine Gaul, was called home to assemble the Centuries. They chose C. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minucius Rufus Consuls. It was thought fit at this time to increase the number of Prætors to six, by creating two new ones for the government of Hisber Spain and Further Spain. The Consuls being both ambitious of conducting the war in Macedon, were in great haste to draw lots for that province: But this motion was opposed by two Tribunes of the Commons, who represented to the people the ill consequences which might attend the recalling Flamininus from Greece in the midst of his successes. Cornelius and Minucius at length consented to leave the matter to the determination of the Senate, if the Tribunes would do the same. Accordingly it was referred to the Conscrip Fathers, and they decreed, that Flamininus should continue in his command till the people thought fit to recall him; they granted him also a recruit of five thousand foot, three hundred horse, and three thousand seamen and rowers, and left him his brother Quintius to conduct the fleet under his direction; Sulpicius and Villius were to serve in his army as his Lieutenants. As for the two Consuls, they were both ordered into Cisalpine Gaul against Hamilcar, who still headed the revolt there.

Flamininus, who knew nothing of what was doing at Rome, and had some apprehension of being recalled, was very desirous of having it in his power, in that case, to conclude an honourable treaty with Philip, before any successor could arrive to rob him of the glory: And therefore, though he at first pretended an unwillingness to grant an interview which the King demanded, he at length consented to it, and it was agreed that the place of conference should be on the sea-coast, not far from Nicea, a city on the Maliac Gulph. Philip came to this place by sea, in one of his ships of war, attended by five small vessels; and he had on board with him his two secretaries. With Flamininus, who came on foot to the sea-shore, were Amynder King of the Atthamans, Dionysodorus ambassador from Attalus, Agessimbrotus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phæneas General of the Ætolians, and Aristæus and Xenophon, two deputies from the Acheans. Philip continued in the prow of his ship, which lay at anchor. Why don't you come ashore? said the Pro Consul, we shall hear one another better. Which of us do you fear? The Gods alone I fear, answered the King, but there are with you some men, whom I cannot trust, and least of all the Ætolians. The danger is equal on both sides, replied Flamininus, there is always some hazard in conferences with enemies. No, said Philip, the danger is not equal. Were Phæneas dead, the Ætolians might easily choose another Prætor, but were I killed, the Macedonians could not so readily find another King:

Then.

Y. R. 545.
B. C. Chr.

197.
254 C. 256.

Y. R. 556.
B. C. Chr.

196.
255 C. 256.

Polyb. B.

17. c. 1.
Liv. B. 32.
c. 32.

Vol. R. 1. 1. 1.
 Ed. C. 1. 1.
 196.
 233 C. 1. 1.

Then both parties remained silent for some time, the Pro-Consul expecting, that as Philip had asked the conference, he would speak first. The King said, it belonged to him who was to prescribe the terms of peace to speak first, not to him that was to accept them: To which Flamininus answered, "I shall tell you plainly the conditions, without which no peace is to be hoped for. Restore to the Romans all the places you have invaded in Illyricum since the last peace; surrender up our deserters, evacuate the cities you have taken from the Egyptians since the decease of King Ptolemy Philopator; satisfy all the just pretensions of our allies, and immediately leave Greece."

Then the ministers of the King of Pergamus, and of the other allies, by the order of the Pro-Consul, made severally their demands. Some required Philip to restore cities, others ships which he had taken; and others demanded of him to rebuild temples which he had demolished. The deputies of Acbaia would have Corinth and Argos reunited to the body of their state. Pbanceas and Alexander spoke on the part of the Ætolians. The former confidently insisted on the King's restoring all the places he had usurped from them, and his entirely evacuating Greece. But Alexander, who was esteemed a notable speaker, went farther, and, addressing himself to the King, reproached him with carrying on the war in an ungenerous manner, and not like the Kings of Macedon, his predecessors, who used to meet their enemies in the open field, and there decide their differences by battle, sparing the towns, that they might possess them as the reward of their victories. Whereas Philip's method was, to avoid fighting, over-reach his enemies in conferences, pillage and burn towns, even those of his allies, more of which he had destroyed in Thessaly, the last year, than an enemy would have done. The King bringing his ship nearer the shore, replied, That Alexander had made a very theatrical harangue, and like an Ætolian; that no man would willingly do an injury to his allies; but that the circumstances of affairs were sometimes such, as obliged those that had the management of them to do things very much against their inclinations. He was going on, when Pbanceas interrupted him, saying, That he trifled, and must either conquer in war, or submit to the strongest. Philip immediately answered, That's clear, indeed, even to a blind man. Pbanceas had weak eyes, and the King, who loved a jest, alluded to this infirmity. He then ridiculed the Ætolians, for assuming the airs of the Romans, and, like them, ordering the King of Macedon to quit Greece. He asked them what it was they meant by Greece; some of the Ætolian nations, he said, were not Greeks. Would they give up these to him? Next he answered the ambassadors from Pergamus and Rhodes, and offered to restore the ships he had taken from them; yet adding, That it would be more equitable if they were required to restore his ships, since every one knew, that they were were the aggressors in the war. He offered likewise to give up the country of Paræa to the Rhodians: And, as Attalus had insisted upon reparation of the damage he had done to the woods of Nicephorium and the grove of the temple of Venus, “ Since Kings, said he, must treat “ of such matters, I shall repair those damages, the only way they “ can be repaired; I shall send thither gardeners and trees, and be at “ the expence of planting.” In the end of the conference he desired the parties would deliver him their several pretensions in writing, and he promised to consider them: I am alone, said he, I have none to assist me with their counsels: To which the Pro-Consul answered, You deserve to be alone, for you have deprived yourself of all your friends. The King was stung with this reproach, but put on a forced smile. Mutual promises being given, that the conference should be continued the next day in the same place, Philip retired with his ships, and Flaminius returned to his camp.

Y. R. 556.
Euf. Chr.
196.
255 Conf.

Polyb. L. 17.
c. 7.

At the next meeting, the King desired, that in order to cut off a thousand frivolous disputes, the conference might be between him and Flaminius only. This was agreed to, and then Philip came ashore with two of his confidants, and went a little apart with the Pro-Consul. The King offered to give up all he possessed in Illyricum to the Romans, Pharsalus and Larissa to the Ætolians, but refused to restore Thebes to them; he offered likewise to restore Paræa to the Rhodians, but reserved Jassos and Bargilia; he promised to surrender Argos and Corinth to the Achaïans, and to restore to King Attalus the ships and prisoners he had taken from him. But when Flaminius, upon his return to the deputies, made this report, they all raised a great clamour. Philip, perceiving by the noise what opposition his proposals were like to meet with, desired a third interview the next day, at another place not far from Nicea. They met accordingly; and then the King exhorted the deputies of the nations not to be averse from a peace, and proposed to refer all differences to the arbitration of the Roman Senate: The deputies at first opposed this motion, but it was at length agreed to, and commissioners were sent to Rome from the King, the Pro-Consul, and the confederates.

The commissioners of the allies were first heard in the Senate, and they insisted chiefly on the necessity of obliging Philip to give up Demetrias in Thessaly, Corinth in Achaia, and Chalcis in Eubœa: These three places he had called, The Fetters of Greece. What was urged on this head raised such strong prejudices against Philip, that when one of his ambassadors was beginning a studied harangue, the Senators interrupted him, and said, Tell us, will the King of Macedon give up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias? The ambassadors, surprized at this question, answered, that their master had given them no instructions as to that matter: Whereupon they were dismissed, and a decree passed giving full powers

V. B. 33.
F. C. 1.
F. C. 1.

powers to Flaminius to pursue the war, or make peace, as he should think proper.

V. B. 33.
F. C. 1.

Philip, finding his hopes frustrated, turned his thoughts wholly to the war; and as it was of great importance to him to preserve Argos, and yet difficult to do it, because it was in the heart of Achaia, he put Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedemon, into possession of that city, upon condition of its being restored to him in case he came off conqueror in the war. But the tyrant was no sooner master of the place, than he plundered all the inhabitants, committed the most horrible cruelties, and, in order to preserve his new possession, entered into a treaty with Flaminius (who at his request came from Phecis for that purpose) and furnished the Pro-Consul with six hundred Cretans to act against Philip. After this, Nabis, having extorted all the money he could from the men of Argos, brought his wife Apega thither to practice robbery upon the women. When they came to court, she admired their jewels and rich clothes, and by using good words with some, and menaces with others, entirely stripped them of all their finery. Then the Tyrant leaving a garrison in the place, returned to Lacedemon. The Pro-Consul spent the winter at Antigra.

V. B. 33.
F. C. 1.
F. C. 1.

Early in the spring Flaminius, understanding that the general diet of Boetia was summoned to meet at Thebes, left his quarters, and, under a guard of only one Manipulus, advanced towards that city, accompanied by King Attalus. The Pro-Consul had ordered two thousand Hastati to follow him at some distance; these were hid by the hills about Thebes. Antiphanes, the Prætor of Boetia, seeing the Roman General approach with so small a guard, came out to meet him; and all the inhabitants, out of curiosity to see what past, ran either to the ramparts, or out of the gates, mostly without arms. When they saw the two thousand Hastati appear, they thought themselves betrayed, but dissembled their uneasiness. Flaminius caressed the Boetians, and gave them leave to hold the diet, which had been appointed to meet the next day. Attalus, who was present at the assembly, spoke first, and with great vehemence urged them to engage in an alliance with the Romans. In the midst of his harangue he was seized with an apoplectic fit, which took away his speech, and he presently after fell down; and though he was brought again to himself, he had lost the use of some of his limbs. [His attendants, a few days after, put him on board a galley, which carried him to Asia, where he died at seventy-one years of age, leaving his crown to his eldest son Eumenes.] This accident did not break up the assembly; and as there was no room for debate upon Attalus's motion, Flaminius being master of the town, the Thebans and all Boetia entered into a confederacy with the Republic.

V. B. 33.
C. 21.

The Pro-Consul having now no enemies behind him, marched into Theffaly, in quest of Philip, who had taken the field. In the neighbourhood hood of Pheræ, a city of Magnesia, the two armies encamped near each other. But as the country all around was thick set with trees, and full of gardens and ruined walls, neither of the Generals thought the ground proper for a pitched battle, and they decamped as it were by consent. Philip bent his march towards Scotussa, where he could have plenty of forage for his army; and Flaminius, suspecting his design, hastened towards the same town, in order to lay waste the fields round it. The roads by which the two armies marched, being divided by a ridge of hills, they advanced as far as Cynocephalæ * without knowing any thing of each other. Here they came to a decisive battle before either party was prepared for it. The day being foggy, some troops of Roman horse, that had been detached to discover the enemy, fell in unawares with a detachment of Macedonians. A skirmish ensued. On both sides, having sent advice to their respective Generals of what had happened, they received successive reinforcements. Various was the fortune of the conflict. Once the Romans would have been totally routed, if five hundred Ætolian horse had not sustained them, and gallantly opposed themselves to the enemy's impetuosity. Flaminius, the fog being at length dispersed, put his whole army into the best order he could; and, with his left, advanced against the right of the Macedonians, which Philip had, by this time, formed into a deep Phalanx, on the ascent of a hill. The Phalanx, by its weight, the excellency of its arms, and the advantage of the higher ground, entirely broke the Roman battalions that were before it. Flaminius, thinking all lost on this side, joined his right, which had already made an impression on the left of the enemy: For this left was not in the order of a Phalanx; the inequality of the ground would not suffer it: Nor, indeed, had the troops come up early enough to be put into any good order for battle: They were therefore soon routed. Among those who pursued them, was a Legionary Tribune, who observing that Philip, with his victorious Phalanx, was still pressing after the left of the Romans, turned from the flying enemy, and, with twenty companies, fell upon the Phalanx in the rear. Such being the order of a Phalanx, that it cannot face about, nor the Phalangites fight singly, the hindmost ranks were slaughtered without making resistance; others threw down their arms and fled: The foremost was charged in front, by the Roman Legionaries, whom they had routed; for these, having rallied, returned now to the fight. The King perceiving the day lost, gathered about him as many of his Macedonians and Thracians as he could, and fled to Tempe. His army, before the battle, consisted of about twenty-one thousand foot and two thousand horse, and that of the Romans was not much more numerous: Of the former, eight thousand men were killed and five thousand taken prisoners: The Romans lost only seven hundred. To add to the King's misfortune, his General Androstenes, whom he had left in Corinth with six thousand men, was

V. R. 556.
Bef. Chr.
106.
255 C. 10.

V. R. B.
17. C. 15.

* The Dogs
Head, hills
so called.

Liv. B. 33
c. 14.

Y. R. 556.
Eef. Chr.
106.
245 Cons.

Plut. Le-
gat. 6.

Liv. B. 33.
c. 12.

defeated just at the same time, in Acchaia, by Nicostratus Prætor of that nation.

The Ætolians by their vanity gave the Pro-Consul great uneasiness. They had indeed bore a good part in the late battle of Cynocephala, but in their songs which they dispersed over all Greece they assumed the chief glory of the success to themselves. *Flaminius*² took an opportunity to mortify their pride. Three envoys coming from Philip, under pretence of asking a truce to bury the dead, but in reality to ask a conference in order to a peace, the Pro-Consul gave them an answer without consulting the Chiefs of the Ætolians. Provoked at this affront, they spread a report, that he was bribed by the King, and was betraying the common cause; but in truth the Roman had very different motives for hearkening to Philip's proposals. Antiochus, stiled the Great, King of Syria, was preparing to come into Europe with an army, and Flaminius desired to conclude a treaty with the Macedonians before the arrival of the Syrian. Calling therefore a council of the allies, he asked them upon what terms they thought it might be proper to grant a peace to Philip. Amynder King of the Atthamans declared, that he should be pleased with any terms that would secure the liberty and tranquillity of Greece. But the Ætolians spoke with great warmth and haughtiness. They said, that the Roman General was doubtless very much in the right, when a peace was in question, to consult with those who had been his companions in the war; but that he greatly deceived himself, if he imagined, the Romans could have a durable peace, or the Greeks assured liberty, without either killing Philip or dethroning him. The Pro-Consul answered, that it was never the intention of the Romans, nor agreeable to their manners, to carry things to such extremity; nor was it for the interest of Greece to ruin Macedon, which stood as a barrier against the irruptions of the Thracians, Illyrians, and other barbarous nations; and concluded with saying, that he would grant a peace to the King, but upon such terms as should not leave him in a condition to renew the war.

Philip, the next day, appeared at the congress, and prudently declared: That he accepted the articles he had hitherto rejected, and referred all other matters to the arbitration of the Roman Senate. Upon this a truce was granted him for four months to negotiate a peace at Rome; but Flaminius

² Plutarch has transmitted to us some verses made by Alceus, on this occasion. They are in the form of an epitaph upon the Trojanians slain at the battle of Cynocephala, and to this effect. "Passenger, on this field lie, unpitied, and unburied, thirty thousand Trojanians, vanquished in battle by the Ætolians, and the Latins: whom Flaminius led from the plains of Italy. A mighty overthrow to the Troj- ans! and the bold boastful Philip "fed swifter than the swift winds." Flaminius is said to have been vexed at this epitaph, because it did not honour him enough; but Philip only laughed at it, and answered the poet in verse, imitating his two first lines. "Passenger, Upon this bleak hill stand, leafless and stripped of its bark, a very conspicuous gibbet for the poet Alceus."

demand

demanded his son Demetrius, and some other Lords of his court, for hostages, and also two hundred talents; on condition nevertheless, that both the money and the hostages should be restored if the peace did not take place. The Macedonian complied, dispatched ambassadors to Rome, and retired into his own dominions.

Y. R. 556.
Bef. Chr.
196.
255 Conf.

IN Italy, Cetegas, who had marched against the Insubrians and Carni, obtained a complete victory over them on the banks of the Mincius; thirty-five thousand of those Gauls were slain in the action, and five thousand seven hundred made prisoners, among these, Hamilcar the Carthaginian. Minucius the other Consul had no opportunity of coming to a pitched battle with the Ligurians and Boii, against whom he commanded, but he over-ran their country and laid it waste.

Liv. B. 32
c. 30.

From Spain, the accounts at this time were not so favourable. In the Hisiber Province the Prætor Sempronius Tuditanus had been defeated by the Spaniards, and lost his own life in the action; and in Further Spain several towns had been seized by two petty Kings. There was almost a general disposition to shake off the Roman yoke.

c. 25.

c. 22.

WHEN the ambassadors from the King of Macedon arrived at Rome the Republic had just chosen new Consuls, L. Turius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus. These magistrates, finding that the Senate was going to assign Italy for the province of both, moved that one of them might have Macedon. Marcellus contended that a peace with Philip would not be durable, should the army be withdrawn from Greece; and he made such a stir in the Senate that he would perhaps have gained his point, if the Tribunes had not carried the affair before the Comitia: The tribes unanimously voted for a peace, and appointed Flaminius to act as General in Macedon till the treaty with the King should be concluded, and for this last purpose ten commissioners were sent thither, accompanied by Philip's ambassadors.

Y. R. 557.
Bef. Chr.
195.
256 Conf.

The articles of the peace, between the Roman Republic and King Philip, as they were drawn up by the Senate, were as follow:

All the cities of the Greeks, both in Europe and in Asia, shall enjoy perfect liberty, and be governed only by their own laws.

c. 30.

Philip shall, before the celebration of the Isthmian games, evacuate all the Greek cities where he has garrisons; particularly Euromus, Padasia, Bargylæ, Jassos, Thassos, Myrina, Abydos and Perinthus.

As to Cius, the Pro-Consul shall notify the intentions of the Senate to King Prusias.

*Philip shall restore to the Romans all their deserters;
Deliver up all his ships that have decks, except five, and one Hexaremis;
Never have above five thousand men in pay; never make use of elephants in his armies; nor wage war out of Macedon, without the consent of the Romans*.*

He shall pay the republic a thousand talents, one half immediately, and the other half in ten years, at ten equal payments.

* So says Livy: But we do not find that this article was observed; and Polybius does not mention it.

Y. R. 557.
Bef. Chr.
195.
250 CORIN

These articles being communicated to all the states of Greece, were approved by all, except the Ætolians; who asked the other Greeks, Why they thought themselves so much obliged to Flamininus for taking the chains off their legs and putting them about their necks? For observing, that while other towns were particularly specified, no mention was made of Corinth, Chalcis and Demetrias, they insinuated that Rome had an intention to appropriate those places to herself, and thereby become mistress of Greece: A suspicion not ill founded: The Senate had purposely avoided mentioning them, in order to leave it in the breast of Flamininus and the Council of ten, to keep them, or set them free. Some of the council were for putting strong garrisons into those cities, to guard them against Antiochus: But Flamininus opposed this motion, remonstrating, that if the Romans would refute the calumnies of the Ætolians, and gain universal esteem, they must restore liberty to ALL GREECE. It was therefore finally resolved, that the Romans should have possession of Chalcis, Demetrias, and the citadel of Corinth, only till the apprehensions of Antiochus's coming into Europe were over.

Plat. Hist. of Flamininus.

LIBERTY to GREECE was soon after proclaimed by a herald in a vast assembly of the Greeks, met together from all parts to celebrate the Isthmian games. Their amazement and joy upon this occasion were inexpressibly great; they could never sufficiently admire the disinterestedness of the Romans, who had proposed to themselves no other fruit from the labours and expences of the war, than the pleasure of making other nations happy^a.

Liv. B. 33.
c. 34

The members of the council of ten, (now dissolved) took each his district, to put the decree in execution. They reinstated the allies of Rome in the possession of all those places which the Macedonian Kings had taken from them; so that Philip was confined within the ancient bounds of Macedon. The Ætolians were the only people, of the allies, dissatisfied; they had been refused some towns which they thought they had a right to. They frequently complained, "that the conduct of the Romans towards them was extremely changed since the victory over Philip," "though, without the help of the Ætolians, they could neither have obtained that victory, nor even have come into Greece;" and in the end had recourse to Antiochus the Great, King of Syria.

^a Had Rome seized upon Greece at this time, it is probable she could not have held it long. The Greeks always jealous of their liberty would have been easily stirred up to revolt by Philip; and a dangerous combination might soon have been formed against the Republic, by Greece and Macedon, in which the King of Syria, and several other Asiatic Provinces, would in all likelihood have joined, to put a stop to the encroachments of Rome. Besides, the Romans were now projecting a war with Antiochus, which the Syrian endeavoured to avoid; and the most plausible pretext they could find for it, (as appears by a speech of the Rhodian deputies in the Senate. Liv. B. 37. c. 54.) was the freedom of the Greek colonies under his dominion. It was necessary therefore for the Republic to keep her word with the Greeks in Europe, that she might be believed by those in Asia.

C H A P. III.

Antiochus the Great invades Thrace.

A conference between Antiochus and some Roman commissioners.

M. Porcius Cato chosen Consul. He opposes the repeal of the Oppian law.

He conducts the war in Spain.

Hannibal escapes from Carthage into Syria.

Flamininus makes war upon Nabis, Tyrant of Iacedæmon, Nabis submits.

Antiochus courts the friendship of Rome.

Hannibal endeavours to draw Carthage into a new war with Rome.

ANTIOCHUS the Great was one of those Princes called Seleucids; the founder of which family was Seleucus Nicator, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great. Seleucus was succeeded, in the throne of Syria, by his son Antiochus Soter, and he by his son Antiochus the God. This God being poisoned by his wife Laodice, was succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus, who left two sons, Antiochus Ceraunus, and the Antiochus who now engages our attention.

V. R. 557.
Bef. Chr. 195.
256 Conf.
Appian in Syriacis.
Justin. B. 27, c. 16.

He possessed all the countries of Asia from the Eastern borders of Mædia to Æolis and Ionis; also Cælo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judea, and all the coast of the Mediterranean quite to Egypt. His pretence for coming into Europe was to recover possession of Thrace, which Seleucus Nicator had conquered from Lyfimachus; and he purposed to rebuild Lyfimachia, formerly demolished by the Thracians, and make it the capital of a kingdom, for one of his sons.

Upon the news of the Syrian's arrival, and of the enterprize he had in view, some of the Roman council of ten, who had dispersed themselves in Greece, hastened to Lyfimachia, to dissuade him from attempting any conquest in Europe. He received them at first with great politeness; but the Romans soon provoked his pride by those airs which they assumed wherever they came. They told him, that his whole conduct since his leaving Syria displeased the Republic, that he ought to restore all the cities he had usurped from Ptolemy, and that it was not sufferable he should possess those he had taken from Philip during his war with Rome, and which the Romans, as conquerors, had the sole right to dispose of. What! said they, shall the Romans have been at the expence of the war, and shall Antiochus reap all the advantages of it? But should we connive at your conquests in Asia, shall we therefore suffer you to invade Europe? Is not this a declaration of war against the Roman Senate and people? You may indeed deny it; but you might as well come into Italy and deny that you have any design against the Republic. To this Antiochus answered, I have:

Polyb. B. 37, c. 32.
Liv. B. 33, c. 39.

Y. R. 557.
Bel. Chr.
195.
255 Cons.

I have long observed, That Rome is very attentive to the conquests I make, but never thinks of setting bounds to her own. Know, that you have as little right to examine what I do in Asia, as I have to concern myself about what you do in Italy. He then asserted the justice of his claim to Thrace, and to the towns he had taken from Ptolemy and Philip, alledging, that they had been all usurped from his ancestors. The conferences were interrupted by a report that Ptolemy Epiphanes was dead. Antiochus reckoning Egypt to be his own, hastened aboard his fleet to sail to that country and take possession of it. But putting in at Petara in Lycia, he was there informed that Ptolemy was still alive. After this, having narrowly escaped shipwreck near the mouth of the Sarus in Cilicia, he returned to Antioch, the capital of his dominions, and spent the winter there. He had left his son Seleucus at Lyfimackia with a land army to finish the rebuilding of the city, and defend it.

Valerius
Ant. apud
Liv.
Liv. B. 33.
C. 34. 42.
Y. R. 558.
Bel. Chr.
194.
254 Cons.

IN Italy the two Consuls Marcellus and Furius, had carried on the war with success against the Cisalpine Gauls, and had entirely destroyed two considerable armies of them^o.

AT the elections for the new year M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus were raised to the Consulship. As the affairs of Spain grew very urgent, the Senate resolved to send thither one of the Consuls with an army. The conduct of it fell by lot to Cato.

Liv. B. 34.
C. 1.

While preparations were making for his departure, the Roman ladies took a step, which was a perfect novelty in the Republic. About twenty years before, when Hannibal was ravaging Italy, and when the treasury was very low, a Tribune of the people named Oppius had got a law passed, That no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold in ornaments; or wear purple; or ride in a chariot, either at Rome, or within a mile of it, unless she were to assist at a public sacrifice. The ladies had conformed themselves to this law in a time of general distress; but they thought it intolerable to be under the restraint of it now, when the Republic abounded with riches; and they made a great stir to get it repealed. The Consulship of the austere Cato seemed a very improper time for moving this affair; but their passion for finery would brook no delay. They prevailed with Valerius and Laelanius, two of the Tribunes, to present their request to the Comitia; and, contrary to custom, ran thither themselves: Neither the orders of their husbands, nor the rules

^o The Pontifex and Augurs who had paid no taxes during the late war, were now obliged to pay for all the years they had been absent: But they were at the same time eased of one burdensome part of their functions; for the Romans erected a new sort of sacerdotal college, under the name of Epulones, whose office was confined wholly to the care of the religious feasts; the number of these priests in the beginning was only three, and all chosen out of Plæbian families. Porcius Laenas was one of the first three. This was he who when Tribune two years before got the famous Porcian law passed, which forbade, under very severe penalties, to whip or put to death a Roman citizen: But this privilege did not extend to the armies, where the Generals had an absolute power of life and death.

of decency, nor public authority, could keep them at home. They beset the ways which led to the Forum, and solicited the men as they passed, urging the justice of their pretensions: They offered their petitions even to the Consuls and Prætors. Cato was inexorable; he made a long harangue to the assembly in behalf of the law and against the women. “Romans, had each of us been careful to maintain over his own wife the rightful authority of a husband, we should not have had this trouble with the women in a body: But our prerogatives having, by female tyranny, been overturned at home, are now also contemned and trampled upon in the Forum. I thought it had been a fable, That, in a certain island, all the men were cut off by a conspiracy of the women. But there is no mischief of which that sex is not capable, if you allow them to hold, among themselves, assemblies, private parties, and gossipings.

“I cannot determine with myself, whether the thing they ask, or their manner of asking it, be the more pernicious. To us certainly it would be very shameful, to have laws imposed upon us by a secession of the women, as we had formerly by a secession of the commons. I could not help blushing when I came through such a crowd of women in my way to the Forum; and had it not been for the respect I bear to the individuals, and that it might not be said, they were publicly rebuked by a Consul, I would have asked them, What manners are these, to run mobbing about the streets, beset the highways, and solicit men that are not your husbands? Could not each of you have asked the very thing in question of your husband at home? Are you less coy, are you more free of your blandishments in public than in private? And to other womens husbands than to your own? Though even at home, if you desired modestly to confine your cares within your proper sphere, you would not think it decent for you to concern yourselves about what laws are here enacted or repealed. Our ancestors would not allow women to transact even private affairs without a director; they were under the authority of fathers, brothers, husbands: We are to suffer women (God deliver us!) to assume the government of the state, assemble in the Forum, and vote in the Comitia! A curb for an untractable nature, an untamed animal: Never imagine that women will of themselves set bounds to their liberty, if you do not. The restriction they are under by the Oppian law is the least of their grievances; they want a liberty in all things without controul. And what will they not attempt if they gain their present point? Recollect all the laws by which our ancestors have restrained the licentiousness of women, and subjected them to the men. By all these we can hardly keep them within tolerable bounds: What then will be the case, if, by the repeal of one law after another, you put them upon an equality with us? If once equal, they will soon become superior. But let us hear the reason why the matrons thus flock into the streets,

“and.

Y. R. 558.
Bel. Ch.
194.
257 Conf.

Y. R. 558.
Bef. Chr.
194
25th C. ml.

• See p.
172.

“ and scarce forbear mounting the rostra to harangue the people. Is it “ to redeem their fathers, their husbands, their children, or their bro“ thers, from Hannibal's chains? This evil is now far, and may it “ always be far from the Republic. But when it was present, you “ * forbad women's appearing in public, to offer you even pious “ petitions. Is it religion that has assembled them? Are they to re“ ceive the Goddess Cybele from Pbrygia? Can the women assign, for “ this sedition of theirs, any pretence that will bear being mentioned?
 “ We would shine, say they, in gold and purple: We would ride “ through the city in our chariots, triumphing over the conquered law “ and the suffrages of the citizens: We would have no bounds set to “ our expences; no controul upon our luxury.

“ You have often, Romans, heard me complaining of the profuse“ ness both of the women and the men, not only of private men, but “ even of the magistrates: And that the city is infected with two very “ different vices, covetousness and luxury; plagues which have been the “ ruin of all great empires. The Republic becomes daily more flou“ rishing: We have now passed into Greece and Asia, countries full of “ temptations to ungovernable appetites; and begin to handle the trea“ sures of Kings: I am much afraid lest these riches get a more abso“ lute power over us than we have obtained over them.

“ In the memory of our Fathers, Pyrrhus, by his ambassador Cyneas, “ attempted to corrupt with bribes not only the men but the women.
 “ There was then no Oppian law to restrain the luxury of women; yet “ none of them yielded to the temptation. And what do you think “ was the cause? The same which our ancestors had for not making “ any law relating to this matter: There was no luxury to be restrained.
 “ Should some Cyneas now go about the city with his bribes, he would “ find women enough standing in every street, to receive them openly.

“ There are some desires which I can by no means account for. A “ little shame or indignation may perhaps naturally arise at our being re“ strained from what others are indulged in; but why should it give “ you uneasiness to be dressed in the same manner as every body else “ must be dressed? It is indeed a very culpable shame to be ashamed of “ frugality or poverty: And, were it not, the law in the present case “ has secured you from all reproach. You are not so richly dressed as “ you could afford to be. Why? The law has forbid it. But, says a “ very fine lady, with a great deal of money at command, Truly I have “ no notion of a law that puts all people upon an equality. Why should “ not a woman of distinction be distinguished by wearing gold and purple?
 “ Must people of nothing have their beggary screened by a law?—Romans, “ would you have an emulation of this kind prevail among your wives?
 “ Would you see the richer coveting to have what none else can purchase?
 “ And the poorer, for fear of being despised, making efforts in expence, “ beyond their ability? She who once begins to blush for doing what
 “ the

“ she ought, will quickly come to do, without blushing, what she ought “ not. What she can purchase with her own money she will; what “ she cannot purchase, she will ask of her husband. Unhappy is the “ husband if he grants, more unhappy if he refuses; for another will “ give her what he denies.

M. R. & S.
 Ed. 1781.
 112.
 257. C. 6.

“ When your wives expences are no longer limited by law, you “ yourselves will never be able to set bounds to them. To imagine “ that things will be upon the same footing as before the law was enact“ ed, is a vain thought. A wicked man should never be accused, or “ not absolved; and luxury unmolested would have been more tolera“ ble than now, when, after being provoked, as a wild beast by chains, “ it is let loose again to range at pleasure.”

Two of the tribunes, both of the Junian family, and both bearing the name of Brutus, seconded Cato, and spoke against the repeal.
 Then Valerius, who had undertaken to be the ladies advocate, rose up.
 “ If, Romans, our petition had been opposed by private persons only,
 “ I should have waited in silence for your determination: But when “ the Consul, M. Porcius, a man, the dignity of whose office and “ character, had he said nothing, would alone be of great weight “ in the opposition, has in a long and elaborate speech inveighed against “ our motion, I think it incumbent on me to make some answer. And “ let me first of all observe: That the Consul has spent more time in “ bitterly reproving the women, than in giving reasons why our petition “ should not be granted. That the ladies have presumed publicly to “ solicit you to repeal, in a time of peace and prosperity, a law made against “ them during the war, and in a time of adversity, he is pleased to “ call a mobbing, a sedition, and sometimes a secession of the women:
 “ Hyperbolical words, merely to exaggerate the matter! for we know,
 “ that M. Cato, always a weighty speaker, is sometimes a severe one “ too; though doubtless a very good-natured man. What is there “ new in this proceeding of the women? Did they never appear in “ public before? Look, Marcus, into your own book de Originibus; “ you will there see that they have often appeared, and always for “ the public good: go back to the days of Romulus, to the bloody “ conflict between the Roman and Sabine armies in the middle of the “ Forum: Call to mind that critical period, when total destruction “ hung over Rome from Marcus Coriolanus at the head of the Volscian “ legions; and many other occasions where the women’s appearing in “ public has proved of public utility. What they have often done for “ the common interest, shall we wonder if they now do, in an affair “ which particularly concerns themselves?

“ As to the law in question; Is it one of the ancient laws of the Kings,
 “ or of the twelve tables; a law, without which our ancestors thought “ it impossible to preserve decency among the women? No such thing:
 “ It is a law of about twenty years standing, enacted in the Consulship of

Y. R. 558.
 B.C. Chr.
 154
 257 Conf.

“ Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius : And as, before it took place, the wo“ men behaved themselves irreproachably for many ages, why must we “ suppose, that upon the abrogation of it, they will abandon them“ selves to luxury ? That it was not made with a view to bridle “ their extravagance, the time when it was enacted is a sufficient “ proof. Hannibal had gained a great victory at Cannæ : He was in “ possession of Tarentum, Arpi, and Capua, and threatened even Rome “ with a siege : Our allies had revolted : We had no soldiers for the “ levies, no seamen for the fleet, no money in the treasury : We were “ obliged to buy slaves to recruit our troops, the price to be paid at the “ end of the war : The publicans, upon a promise of being reimbursed “ at the same time, furnished corn and other necessaries for the army :
 “ Private people, at their own expence, supplied the fleet with sailors “ and rowers : All orders of men lent their gold and silver to the pub“ lic : The widows and orphans brought their money into the treasury.
 “ Were the ladies at that time so taken up with dress and finery, that “ the Oppian law was wanted to restrain their luxury ? Were not the “ sacrifices to Ceres long deferred, because the women were all in mourn“ ing ? And did not the Senate, for that reason, confine the term of “ mourning to thirty days ? Who does not see that the want and mi“ sery of the city were the occasion of this law, and that it was design“ ed to continue no longer in force than the reason of it should continue ?
 “ The men of all ranks feel the effects of the happy change of public “ affairs ; and shall the women not participate of the fruits of peace “ and tranquillity ? Shall the men wear purple ? Shall the priests, the “ magistrates, both of Rome and of the colonies, shall even our children “ wear it ? Shall the dead be wrapt in purple ? And shall your wives not “ be permitted to have a purple cloak ? You are allowed to have purple
 “ in the furniture of your horses. Shall your horses be more sump“ tuously adorned than your wives ? And as to gold, why may not their “ trinkets be considered as a fund to supply the wants of the public on “ great emergencies ? They have formerly so proved.

“ Cato says, there will be no emulation, in point of dress, among the “ women of Rome, if they are all under the same restrictions. But what “ a spirit of envy and indignation will it raise in every Roman woman, “ when she sees those ornaments, which she is forbid to wear, allowed “ to the Latine women ? Sees them shining in gold and purple, and “ riding in chariots through the streets, while she is obliged to fol“ low on foot, as if the seat of the empire were in the cities of our allies, “ not in Rome ? Such a distinction might be felt even by men : How ex“ tremely mortifying then must it be to female minds, which very small “ matters are sufficient to disturb ! They can have no magistracies, no “ sacerdotal dignities, no triumphs, no spoils, nor trophies of war. Neat“ ness, ornaments, elegant dress, these are the triumphs of women : In “ these they delight, in these they place their glory : Our ancestors called “ these,

“ these, mundus muliebris, the world, the every thing of woman. Are wo“ men to be always in mourning? What is a woman’s mourning, but “ her not wearing gold and purple? And by what does she distinguish “ a day of public devotion and thanksgiving, from other days, but the “ finery of her dress? We are told, that if you repeal the Oppian “ law, you will not, by your private authority, be able to restrain the “ women from any thing which that law forbids them to have; and “ that your daughters, wives and sisters will be less under your com“ mand. While fathers or husbands are alive, the subjection of women “ can never cease; and they themselves detest that liberty which is “ only to be acquired by their becoming widows and orphans. They had “ rather have their dress regulated by you than by the law. And ought “ it not to be your choice to hold them under your guardianship and “ protection, rather than in slavery? To be stiled fathers and husbands, “ rather than masters?”

“ The Consul, as I before observed, made use of some invidious “ expressions; a sedition, a secession of the women: As if they were just “ going to seize the sacred Mount, or the Aventine Hill, as the commons “ heretofore did in their anger. No, Romans, their weakness must “ submit to whatever you are pleased to determine: But the greater your “ power, the more moderate you ought to be in the use of it.”

The debate lasted all the day, so that the putting the question was deferred to the next. Then the women, more impetuous than ever, besieged the houses of the two Brutus’s, the only Tribunes of the people in the opposition; and by irresistible importunity forced them to yield. The Comitia, being thus at full liberty, repealed the Oppian law.

AND now a nobler career presented itself to the austere Cato than a war with women. He set out for Spain with a Consular army, embarked at Luna in Hetruria, and landed at Rhoda [now Rosés] in Catalonia. From thence he marched by land to Emporiae, where he was met by the Pro-Consul Helvius, who had just obtained a victory over the Spaniards.

To the Consul came ambassadors from the King of the Ilergetes, a nation well affected to the Romans, praying, that five thousand men might be sent to protect his kingdom, that was threatned, by the enemy, with a general devastation. Cato, perplexed at this demand, because unwilling either to desert his allies, or to divide his army, after a whole night’s deliberation thought of this expedient. He told the ambassadors, he would risk his own safety for the interest of their master; and accordingly gave orders for equipping some galleys to transport the succours desired. The rumour of these preparations being spread far, the enemy were seized with terror, and hastily left the country of the Ilergetes. As for the detachment, it embarked, sailed a little way, and then, under pretence of contrary winds, returned to the port from whence it had set out.

Y. R. 557.
 Bell. C. 1.
 194.
 257 C. 1.

Frontin.
 Strat. B. 4.
 c. 7.

Y. R. 538.
Bel. Chr.
151.
257. C. 257.

Cato's troops consisting for the most part of raw soldiers, it was necessary to take some pains to discipline them; and the more, as they had to do with the Spaniards, naturally brave and resolute, and, by their wars with the Carthaginians and Romans, much improved in the military art. The Consul was just such a General as his army wanted; a pattern of vigilance, sobriety and indefatigable constancy in labour; his dress always plain, his provisions the same with those of the common soldiers.

When he had formed his army to his wishes, he took the field, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy. And in order to keep the Spaniards in obedience for the future, he made use of the following artifice. He wrote private letters to the Commanders of many of the fortified towns, ordering them to demolish their fortifications immediately, and threatening revenge, in case of disobedience. Each of those Commanders being ignorant of the orders sent to the rest, and dreading the Consul's resentments, they all, without delay, beat down their walls and towers; so that most of the towns in the hither province were dismantled in one day. In short, Cato settled Spain in such tranquillity and order, that the Senate did not think it necessary to send a new Consular army thither.

Lib. B. 13.
C. 257. &
258.

ABOUT the time that Cato left Rome to go into Spain, letters came from Carthage, giving advice, that Hannibal was in secret intelligence with the King of Syria, and forming designs against the Romans. These letters were sent by the enemies of the Barchine faction, whom Hannibal, lately Prætor or chief magistrate of Carthage, had highly provoked, by some acts, agreeable to the people, and beneficial to the commonwealth. It had been the custom for the judges to hold their offices for life. This gave them the chief sway in the Republic; and they were tyrannical in the exercise of their authority. As the Quæstors, after the expiration of their office, became judges of course, this prospect of future greatness had so raised the pride of a certain Quæstor (of the opposite faction) that he refused to appear on a summons sent him by the Prætor. Hannibal, resenting the affront, caused some officers to seize the Quæstor; and, bringing him before the assembly of the people, not only complained of his insolence, but of the mischief the State suffered by having perpetual judges; and he obtained a decree that the judges for the future should be chosen annually.

Not was this the only act for the public good, by which the Prætor increased the number of his enemies among the nobles. Those who had the management of the public money, had embezzled great part of it, so that there was not sufficient to pay the Romans the stipulated tribute; and a new tax was going to be laid for this purpose. Hannibal prevented the oppression: Making enquiry after the embezzled money, he found enough to pay the Romans, without the burden of a new imposition. Scipio, knowing these things, is said to have defended the Carthaginian in the Senate of Rome, urging that it was below the dignity of the Roman people to list themselves amongst Hannibal's personal enemies, and take part in the factions of Carthage. The Conscrip Fathers, notwithstanding Scipio's remonstrance, sent thither C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Calleo, to accuse Hannibal in the Senate, of holding correspondence with Antiochus. These ambassadors, by the advice of Hannibal's enemies, gave out, on their arrival, that they were come to adjust some differences between the Carthaginians and Messinissa. Hannibal, nevertheless, had too much penetration not to see into the real designs of the Romans. On the day when he purposed to make his escape, having appeared in public, as was his daily custom, he left Carthage about the dusk of the evening, in his town dress, accompanied by only two persons, both ignorant of his determination. He had appointed horses to be in readiness at a certain place, whence riding all night, he came to a tower of his own by the sea side. There he had a ship furnished with all things requisite, as having long foreseen the present necessity. Thus Hannibal took his leave of Africa, lamenting, says Livy, the misfortunes of his country more than his own. Passing over to the isle of Cercina, he found there in the haven some merchant ships of Carthage. The masters saluted him respectfully; and the chief among them enquiring whither he was bound, he answered, he was going ambassador to Tyre. He then invited all the merchants and masters of ships to a sacrifice; and it being hot weather, he would by all means hold his feast upon the shore; whither, because there wanted shade, he desired them to bring all their sails and yards to be used instead of tents. They did so, and feasted with him till it was late at night, and they fell asleep. He then left them, and, putting to sea, held on his course to Tyre. All the remainder of that night, and the day following, he was sure not to be pursued; for neither would the merchants be in haste to send news of him to Carthage, as thinking he was gone ambassador from the state; neither could they get away from Cercina, without some expence of time, in fitting their tackle. At Carthage the disappearing of so great a man raised various conjectures. Some guessed rightly, that he was fled; but the greater part believed, that the Romans had made away with him. At length news came, that he had been seen in Cercina. The Roman ambassadors, having now no other business, accused him (with an ill grace) as an enemy to peace. They said, it was well known, that he had heretofore stirred up King Philip to make war upon the Romans, and had lately by letters and emissaries been urging Antiochus to the like measures. They added, that if the Carthaginians would satisfy the people of Rome, they must make it appear, that these things were not done by their authority, or with their approbation. To this it was answered, that Carthage would do whatever the Romans should think equitable. [It is probable, she, at this time, passed sentence of banishment against the most illustrious citizen she could ever boast of.]

Carthaginian

V. R. 558.
B. f. Chr.
194.
257 Conf.

Hannibal.

Y. R. 558.
E. C. 194.
237 C. 55.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the mother city of Carthage, was received and entertained in a manner suitable to the dignity of his character. From thence he went to Antioch; but made no stay there, the King being just gone to Ephejus. Thither he followed him, and found him wavering between peace and war.

12. B. 33.
C. 43.

C. 45.

B. 34. C. 22.

UPON the report of the plenipotentiaries who had concluded the peace with Macedon, the Roman Senate had judged it necessary that Flamininus should continue Pro-Consul in Greece. They now began to make preparations for a war with Antiochus; and as there was reason to suspect, that Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, would side with the King, orders were sent to the Pro-Consul immediately to attack Nabis, if he thought it for the interest of the Republic. Flamininus, in execution of these orders, having convened a Diet at Corinth, at which deputies from all the Greek nations were present, proposed to them the recovering Argos out of the hands of Nabis. He represented to the assembly, that in the war with Philip, which the Romans and Greeks had jointly carried on, they had each their motives apart; but in the enterprize which he now suggested, the Romans had no other interest than the honour of perfecting the liberty of Greece, which must be deemed incomplete, so long as the noble and ancient city of Argos remained under the domination of a tyrant. "But (said he) it belongs to you to determine in this affair; and if neither a concern for that city, nor the danger of such an example (the contagion of which may spread) has any weight with you, we shall acquiesce." The Atbenian deputy hereto made a very eloquent answer, and in terms as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was past, and highly extolled the generosity of their present proposal, whereby, unrequested, they freely offered to continue that bounty which, at the earnest desire of their associates, they had lately extended to all Greece. To this he added, that great pity it was to hear such noble virtue and high deserts ill spoken of by some, who took upon them to foretel what harm those their benefactors meant to do hereafter, whereas gratitude would rather have required an acknowledgment of the benefits already received. Every one saw that these last words were directed against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander, the Prætor of that nation, rising up, reproached the Atbenians, that they, whose ancestors used to be the foremost in the defence of the general liberty, were now fallen so low, as to betray the common cause by flattery and base compliances. He then inveighed against the Acbeans, who, he said, had been soldiers to Philip till they deserted and ran away from his adversity: That they had got Corinth for themselves, and would now have a war undertaken for their sakes, that they might be lords also of Argos; while the Ætolians, who first engaged in the war with Philip, and had always been friends to the Romans, were defrauded of some places which anciently and of right belonged to them. Neither did Alexander stop here. He accused the Romans of fraud in keeping garrisons

garrisons in Chalcis, Demetrias and the citadel of Corinth, though they had always professed, that Greece could never be in liberty while those places were not free. “ And what else (said he) do they seek by a “ war with Nabis, but a pretext to continue their armies in this country? “ Let them withdraw their legions and evacuate Greece, which cannot in- “ deed be free till their departure; and as to Nabis, the Ætolians will “ undertake, if he do not voluntarily give up Argos, to compel him “ by force of arms to submit to the good pleasure of all Greece, now at “ unity.” This boasting of the Ætolians raised the indignation of the other Greeks, especially the Achæans, who called them robbers, a race worse than barbarian, that had nothing Greek but their language, as they had nothing human but their shape. Flamininus said, he would have answered the Ætolians if there had been any occasion for it; but that he was perfectly content with what he saw was the general opinion concerning the Romans and them.

In conclusion, the whole assembly, except the Ætolians, concurred in determining upon a war with Nabis, in case he refused to deliver up Argos to the Achæans.

When all things were ready for marching, ambassadors arrived from Antiochus, to propose a treaty of alliance with Rome. Flamininus answered, that they must address themselves to the Roman Senate; for the ten commissioners being absent, he could say nothing to the matter. He then advanced towards Argos, expecting, according to some assurances that had been given him, that, upon his near approach, there would be an insurrection in the town, by which he should easily become master of it. Finding these hopes disappointed, he resolved, instead of besieging that place, to march strait to Lacedæmon, and crush the Tyrant at once. All preparations were made for this attempt; and his brother Quintilius, the Admiral of the Roman fleet, appeared off the Lacedæmonian coasts with forty ships of war.

Nabis, struck with terror at the approach of these sea and land forces against him, augmented the number of his troops, fortified his capital, and massacred fourscore of the principal men in it, whom he suspected of disaffection to him. Flamininus marched to the banks of the Eurotas, and from thence ravaged the country to the walls of Lacedæmon, while his brother Quintilius, after having reduced some towns on the sea coast, laid siege to Gythium, a strong city which might be called the port of Lacedæmon, and the repository of all its riches. Here he met with so vigorous a resistance, that though he was joined by the Rhodians with eighteen galleys, and by King Eumenes with forty, he would have been forced to raise the siege, if the Pro-Consul had not seasonably come to his assistance with four thousand men: Upon their appearance the besieged immediately capitulated.

The surrendry of Gythium broke Nabis's measures; he sent to Flamininus, and asked a conference in order to a peace. They met in a plain.

V. R. 258.
Bet. Chr.
194.
257 Cons.

Y R 336.
F 1007.
174.
1007.

plain which lay between Lacedæmon and the Roman camp. The King spoke first, and desired to know “for what cause the Romans made war upon him; for he was quite ignorant of it. It could not be,” he said, on account of the tyranny and cruelty they charged him with, he being the very same man now as when he and they became friends and allies, and joined in the war against Philip: That Flamininus then called him King, not Tyrant. Neither could it be because he held Argos: for he was in possession of that city when he made a league with the Romans, and was left in possession of it by the treaty. In a word, he had done nothing since his alliance with Rome contrary to his engagements.” All this seems to have been very true: For the Pro-Consul was reduced, in his answer, to deny that he had made any league with Nabis; arguing, that it would have been quite improper and indecent for the Romans, when making war against Philip for the liberty of Greece, to contract a friendship with a Tyrant, the most outrageous that ever was; [from whence it followed, that no such friendship had been contracted.] Nothing was done the first day towards a peace. The next, Nabis offered to give up Argos, and restore all the allies their deserters; adding, that if the Romans had any other pretensions, they should be given him in writing, that he might consult with his friends. To this Flamininus agreed; and going back to his camp, assembled the chiefs of the confederates. The greater part of them were for pursuing Nabis to the last extremities; but the Pro-Consul wanted to finish matters with the Tyrant, that he might return to Rome with the glory of having completed the deliverance of all Greece; he was afraid lest a successor should arrive and rob him of some part of that honour. However, finding the chiefs of the allies very obstinate and importunate, he at length pretended to come into their opinion; but told them, that, as the siege would probably be long, great sums of money, great store of provisions, and materials for engines of war would be needful; and pressed them to send immediately to their respective cities for these necessities, before the roads grew bad. This cooled their ardour for the siege: Knowing the difficulty they should have to raise the sums proposed, without alienating the minds of their people from them by new taxes, they left the Pro-Consul at full liberty to settle the terms of peace. He then sent his demands in writing to Nabis. The Tyrant was not only to evacuate Argos, and give up all deserters, but to surrender immediately to the Romans all the places he held in Crete: He was to have no more than two galleys, of sixteen oars each, in his service; build no cities nor castles in the territories of others, nor even in his own; give the Pro-Consul five hostages, such as he should chuse, of whom the Tyrant’s own son should be one; and lastly, pay down a hundred talents, and thereafter fifty talents annually for eight years.

When

When the Tyrant had read the conditions to the Lacedæmonians assembled in the market-place, and asked them what answer he should give the Pro-Consul, the multitude cried out, Give him no answer at all: Pursue the war. These clamours were very agreeable to Nabis, and he prepared to sustain a siege. Lacedæmon was not entirely surrounded by a wall. Lycurgus would have no fortification to the city, but the bodies of the citizens. The Spartan tyrants afterwards raised walls, at certain distances, in those places where they were most wanted. The Romans attacked the town with fifty thousand men, and forced their way into it at the openings between the walls. Nabis was so terrified, that he thought only of making his escape: but his son-in-law Pythagoras, who had more presence of mind, causing the houses to be set on fire in all places where the Romans had entered, this obliged them to retire. Nevertheless, the Tyrant sent Pythagoras to the Pro-Consul, with an offer to submit to those conditions of peace which he had before rejected. Flaminius at first received the ambassador with scorn, and ordered him out of his tent; Pythagoras, however, throwing himself at his feet, obtained by many intreaties what the other was very desirous to grant. As for Argos, the cause of the war, it had already recovered it's liberty; the Argives had taken arms, and driven the garrison out of the town.

Y. R. 558.
Bef. Chr.
194.
257 Conf.

Notwithstanding that Greece was thus entirely quieted, the Pro-Consul continued there all the winter. He was honoured with the office of president at the Nemæan games, where, by his orders, a herald proclaimed liberty to Argos. The Achæans, though pleased to have that city reunited to their state, were yet somewhat dissatisfied to see Lacedæmon left in slavery. And as for the Ætolians, they (finding fault with the peace, as they had before found fault with the war) openly and loudly spoke of it in the harshest terms, that the Lacedæmonians were suffered to continue under the domination of Nabis, though their lawful King (Agessipolis) was in the Roman camp: and that while the noblest of their citizens, expelled by the Tyrant, must live in banishment, the Roman people made themselves his guards to support him in his tyranny.

AT Rome, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus and Ti. Sempronius Longus were raised to the Consulate. Scipio had hoped either to succeed Cato, and finish the Spanish war, or to be sent to the Levant against the King of Syria; but the Spaniards were already quelled, and the Senate did not yet think it a proper season to commence a war with Antiochus. Sempronius made a campaign in Gaul, against the Boii.

Y. R. 559.
Bef. Chr.
193.
258 Conf.
Liv. B. 34.
c. 46.

Flaminius, proposing to return this summer to Italy, assembled at Corinth the chiefs of the Greek cities, and there recounted to them all that the Generals his predecessors, and he himself had done in Greece, from the time that the Romans first entered that country. Every thing he said was highly applauded till he came to mention the affair of Nabis. And though he alledged, in justification of his conduct, that he could

Y. R. 559.
 Bef. Cons.
 193.
 258 Cons.

not destroy the Tyrant without ruining Lacedæmon, this did not satisfy the assembly. In conclusion he declared to them, that he was going to leave Greece, and would, before his departure, withdraw his garrisons from Corinth, Chalcis and Demetrias; by which it would be evident to all the world, that the Ætolians lied, when they said, the Greeks had only changed masters, and that the Romans had driven Philip out of the country, that they themselves might tyrannize there. He exhorted the several states to judge of their friends only by their actions; use their liberty with moderation; and preserve concord among themselves, as the best security against Kings and Tyrants. “When a state (said he) is divided, the weaker party, rather than submit to their own countrymen, will call in the assistance of foreigners. Be careful to maintain that liberty which strangers have procured you, and let not the Romans have cause to think that they have misplaced their benefits and their friendship.” This discourse (says Livy) which seemed to flow from a father-like affection, drew tears from the eyes of many of the assembly; and they exhorted one another to remember and regard Flaminius’s advice as the dictates of an oracle. In testimony of their gratitude, they sought for all the Romans who were reduced to slavery in Greece, and delivered them up to him, to the number of twelve hundred: The greatest part of these had been prisoners of war whom Hannibal had sold. After this Flaminius returned to Rome, and was honoured with a triumph which lasted three days.

Y. R. 560.
 Bef. Cons.
 192.
 259 Cons.

IN the beginning of the next year, when L. Cornelius Merula and Q. Minucius Thermus had the consular fasces, ambassadors came to Rome from Antiochus and several Kings and states of Asia and Greece. They were all favourably heard by the Senate, except those from the King of Syria. Upon a pretence, that the affair with him was intricate, his ministers were referred to Flaminius, and the ten commissioners, who together with him had settled the affairs of Greece. They came to a conference. Menippus, one of the two chiefs of the Syrian embassy, said, he wondered what intricacy there could be in their proposals, since all they asked was a treaty of amity and alliance with Rome. He added, that there were three kinds of leagues: one between the victorious and the vanquished; another between states that had made war upon each other with equal advantage; and a third between such as had never been enemies. That as a league with Antiochus must belong to this last kind, he was surprised the Romans would think of treating his master like a vanquished Prince; and prescribe to him what cities of Asia he should set at liberty, and from what cities he might exact tribute. To this Flaminius answered, that since Menippus went so distinctly to work, he would as distinctly tell him the conditions without which the Romans would have no treaty with the King of Syria. “Antiochus must either keep out of Europe, or be content that the Romans interest themselves in protecting the cities of Asia.” Hegefanex, the other chief of the embassy, bassly, replied, with indignation, that it was monstrous to think of expelling Antiochus from the cities of Thrace and the Chersonesus, which his ancestor Seleucus had with great glory conquered from Lyfimachus, and which the King himself had with no less glory recovered from the Thracians; that there was a wide difference, in point of justice, between the Romans despoiling him of his lawful possessions, and his requiring the Romans not to concern themselves with Asia, which had never been theirs: That Antiochus indeed desired an alliance with Rome, but upon honourable, not disgraceful conditions. To this Flamininus: “ Since in the present affair “ we are to consider what is glorious (as indeed it ought to be the first, “ if not the sole consideration with a people the most renowned of any in “ the world, and with so great a King) Tell me; Which is more glorious, “ to desire the liberty of all the Greek cities wheresoever they are; or to “ desire to keep them under tribute and in slavery? If Antiochus judges “ it for his glory, once more to enslave the towns which his ancestor conquered in war, but which neither his father nor his grandfather ever “ possessed; the Roman people think it becoming their honour and steadiness, not to desert the Greeks, whose patronage they have undertaken: “ and as they have already delivered the Greek cities that were under the “ domination of Philip, so they now intend to set at liberty those that are “ in subjection to Antiochus. Colonies were not sent into Æolis and Ionis “ to be held in slavery by Kings, but to propagate the race of the Greeks, “ and spread that ancient nation over the world.” The Syrian ambassadors answered, that they neither would nor could agree to any thing that tended to a diminution of their master’s dominions.

Next day, Flamininus having made a report of the affair to the Senate, in presence of the ambassadors from Greece and Asia, the Conscrip Fathers desired the Asiatics to tell their respective cities, that unless Antiochus quitted Europe, Rome would assert their liberty against him, with the same courage and the same fidelity, with which she had defended the European Greeks against Philip. Menippus begged the Senate would not be hasty to pass a decree which must set the whole world in arms; that they would take time themselves, and allow the King time to consider; that perhaps Antiochus might obtain some mitigation of the conditions, or yield some points for the sake of peace. The Fathers agreed to defer the matter; and sent to the King of Syria the same ambassadors who had been with him at Lyfimachia, P. Sulpicius, P. Villius, and P. Ælius.

Scarce had these set out from Rome, when deputies arrived from Carthage, with accounts, that the Syrian was certainly preparing for war,

° All the provinces of Asia from the eastern borders of Media to Æolis and Ionis were subject to Antiochus. He had lately made himself master of Cælo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa and Samarina, and in short of all the country quite to Egypt. In Europe he held Thrace, and the Chersonesus. He had three sons old enough to succeed him in the throne, and four daughters marriageable, by whom he might procure formidable alliances.

Y. R. 45.
E. C. 1.
192.
259 C. 1.

J. 1. 1.
12. 1. 1.
L. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1.
A. 1. 1.
S. 1. 1.

and that Hannibal excited him to it. The Carthaginian had indeed been very favourably received by Antiochus, who looked upon him as the ablest counsellor he could have in a war against the Romans.

AS to the method of carrying on this enterprize, Hannibal was always of one and the same opinion. He asserted, that the Romans were invincible every where but in Italy. To attack them in that country was, he said, like stopping a river at the fountain head. The arms of the Italians would then be turned against themselves, and they overcome by their own strength; which, were they left at liberty to employ abroad, no King nor nation would be a match for them. He added, that his own example furnished a proof of this; who, so long as he continued in Italy, was never vanquished by the Romans, but that his fortune changed with the scene of action. He therefore advised Antiochus to trust him with the command of an hundred galleys, ten thousand foot and a thousand horse. With this fleet he proposed to sail first to Africa, in hopes the Carthaginians might be prevailed on to enter into a confederacy with the King. If they refused, he would nevertheless make a descent in some part of Italy, and there rekindle a war against the Romans. Antiochus approving this advice, Hannibal, to sound his countrymen, sent one Aristo, a Tyrian, to Carthage; giving him private tokens to his friends, but no letters, lest his business should be discovered. The Tyrian however was suspected, on account of his frequent visits to those of the Barbantine faction; and was cited to appear before the Senate of Carthage. Some were for imprisoning him as a spy, but others represented the ill consequences of such a proceeding, when they had no evidence against the accused; it would be a discouragement to traders, the Tyrians might make reprisals, and all foreigners would take umbrage. These considerations suspended their resolution, and in the mean time Aristo made his escape. Before he went off, he used a policy to extricate Hannibal's friends. In the dusk of the evening he stole into the hall, where public audiences were given, and over the president's seat, affixed a writing which contained these words; Aristo had no orders to treat with private persons, but with the Senate of Carthage. The stratagem succeeded, for it prevented an enquiry after any particular men as corresponding with Hannibal. However the African Republic thought it proper to send an embassy to Rome, to inform the Consuls and Senate of what had happened, and at the same time to complain of some usurpations of Masinissa on the lands of Carthage. The King, taking advantage of Hannibal's absence, and of the new heats arisen on his account, had invaded the fine maritime country called Emporia, in which the city of Leptis yielded the Carthaginians the tribute of a * talent a day; and knowing that they had sent complaints of him to Rome, he dispatched ambassadors thither, to vindicate himself. The Senate were prejudiced against the Carthaginians, because they had neither put Aristo nor his ship under arrest, and had thereby afforded him means to escape. When their ambassadors came

Liv. B. 45.
c. 62.
* 10th. 15.
Arbuthnot.

came to be heard, they urged that Emporia was within the bounds set them by Scipio Africanus, and that Masiniſſa himself had lately acknowledged their title to that country, by asking their leave to pass through it, in pursuit of a rebel, who had fled out of his kingdom to Cyrene. The Numidian ambassadors confidently answered, that the Carthaginians lied, as to the bounds marked out by Scipio. “ If rights (said they) are narrowly enquired into, what title have the Carthaginians to any land in Africa? They are strangers in that country, who [about seven hundred years ago] had leave given them to build upon as much ground as they could compass with an ox hide. Whatever they hold beyond those bounds has been acquired by force and injustice. As to the territory in question, they cannot prove that they have continued possessed of it from the time that they first conquered it, or even for any considerable time together. It was held sometimes by the Kings of Numidia; sometimes by the Carthaginians; just as the fortune of the frequent wars between them happened to decide.” The ambassadors concluded with desiring, that Emporia might be left on the same footing as it was before the Carthaginians were enemies to Rome, or the King of Numidia her friend; and that the Romans would not interfere in the dispute. The Senate answered, that they would send commissioners into Africa to determine the affair on the spot. Scipio Africanus, Cornelius Cethegus and Minucius Rufus, being accordingly dispatched thither, heard the matter discussed, but made no decree in favour of either party. Whether they acted thus of their own head, or by order of the Senate, is not certain, says Livy, as it is, that they suited their conduct to the state of affairs at home; otherwise Scipio alone could have ended the dispute by a word. But Polybius tells us, that the Romans always gave sentence against the Carthaginians, not because these were always in the wrong, but because it was the interest of the judges to give such sentence. As to the present dispute, he says, Masiniſſa had seized upon the lands of Emporia, but could not take the fortified towns; and that after many embassies to Rome from both parties, the Carthaginians were not only deprived of the lands and towns in question, but obliged to pay 500 * talents for the profits they had received from thence, since the time that Masiniſſa made his claim.

Y. R. 56a.
Bef. Chr.
192.
259 ConL

Legat. 118.

* 96, 875 l.
Arbutnot.

The Roman arms prospered this year in Spain, under the Prætor Scipio Nasica; and in Gaul the Consul Merula obtained a complete victory over the Boii near Mutina.

THERE never was a stronger competition for the Consulship than now. Three Patricians and four Plebeians, all men of great note, professed themselves candidates. Of the former, Scipio Nasica, so famous for his virtue, and who had lately signalized himself in Spain, was supported by his cousin-german the Great Scipio; and Quintius, the late successful Admiral in Greece, recommended by his brother Flaminius: The Plebeians were, Lælius, the friend of Scipio Africanus, Cn. Domitius, Ænobarbus,

Y. R. 551.
B.C. 191.
250 C. 191.

Æmilius, C. Licinius, Sallustianus, and M. Acilius Glabrio. It was natural to suppose, that the greatest man in the Republic should gain the majority of suffrages in favour of those he espoused; yet, as it may appear, Flaminius had a better interest than Scipio. Scipio's glory was the greater, but it was therefore exposed to greater envy. As he had long resided at Rome, the people familiarized to the sight of him, had lost much of their first admiration. Besides, they had already rewarded him with the Consulship and Censorship, since his return from Africa. Flaminius, on the other hand, had of late been little seen at Rome; his victories and his triumph were recent; he solicited in behalf of a brother, his partner in the war, and had neither asked nor obtained any favour since his return from Greece. L. Quinctius was declared Consul with Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, and the Great Scipio had the double mortification of not succeeding either for his cousin or his friend.

C H A P. IV.

The Ætolians and Nabis raise commotions in Greece.

Antiochus determines on a war with Rome. He is jealous of Hannibal. Nabis assassinated.

Antiochus lands in Thessaly; Flaminius defeats his endeavour to bring the Achæans to a neutrality. Hannibal's advice to the King.

Y. R. 551.
B.C. 191.
250 C. 191.

EVER since the departure of Flaminius from Greece the Ætolians had been endeavouring to raise up new enemies against Rome; though true policy would have made them cautious of giving the Romans any pretence of returning into that country. Having chosen one Theas, a factious man, for their chief, they resolved in a general diet of the nation to shake off their alliance with the Republic, and form a confederacy against her. To this end they dispatched deputies to Philip, Nabis and Antiochus. The Macedonian and Syrian were not hasty in coming to a determination; but Nabis immediately took arms, and besieged Gythium.

Joseph. B.
12. c. 3.
App. 12.
Syll. 13.

The King of Syria about this time celebrated the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra with Ptolemy Epiphanes; he married his second daughter to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia; and offered his third to ^b Eumenes King

^b The founder of the kingdom of Per-gamus was one Philetærus an eunuch, who belonged to Docimus a Macedonian officer in the army of Antigonus the first. After the death of Antigonus, Philetærus accompanied his master, who went over to Lyfimachus King

King of Pergamus, in hopes to draw him thereby from the interest of Rome: But Eumenes rejected the proposal, and chose rather to adhere to the Romans, believing that, sooner or later, they would be the conquerors, and well knowing that he must become a vassal to the Syrian if the latter should prevail.

Early in the spring Antiochus marched from Ephesus to make war upon the Pisidians, and while he was engaged in this enterprize, Vilius, the Roman ambassador, arrived at Ephesus. His colleague Sulpicius had fallen sick by the way, and was left at Pergamus. Scipio Africanus accompanied Vilius, and, according to some authors, was in the embassy. Hannibal, being then at Ephesus, the civilities that passed between him and the Romans, and the frequent conversations he had with them, rendered him suspected by Antiochus. Vilius went to Apamea, and

Y. R. 562.
Ecl. Chr.
191.
260 Conf.

Claudius &
Acilius Ap.
Liv. B. 35.
C. 14. App.
in Syr. c.
90.

King of Thrace. Lyfimachus gave him the charge of his treasures, which he had laid up in the castle of Pergamus *. Philetærus was for some time faithful to his trust, but dreading the intrigues of Arfinoe (the wife of Lyfimachus) who hated him, he offered the castle and the treasures to Seleucus Nicator, then at war with Lyfimachus. The latter being slain in battle, and Seleucus dying soon after, Philetærus retained Pergamus, with the country round about it, and reigned there as king (though without the title) twenty years. He had two brothers, the eldest of whom had a son named Eumenes, and to him Philetærus left Pergamus. This Eumenes, by some victories he gained over the Kings of Syria, not only secured to himself the possession of what his uncle had left him, but also made several new acquisitions. When he had governed two and twenty years, he died of a debauch; leaving his dominions to Attalus, the son of Attalus, the youngest brother of Philetærus.

Attalus was greatly harrassed by Achæus, who setting himself up as King against Antiochus the Great, reigned in the lesser Asia †. Achæus invaded Pergamus, made himself master of the country, and besieged Attalus in his capital. But he was delivered by the Tectosagæ, a nation of the Gauls, whom he called out of Thrace, and recovered all he had lost. When these Gauls had once got footing in Asia, they laid the neighbouring countries under contribution, and at last would have forced Attalus to pay them tribute. Hereupon he took the field against them, defeated them in battle, and obliged them to confine themselves within that province which from them took the name of Galatia. After his victory, Attalus assumed the title of King, and joined with the Romans and other allies in the war against Philip of Macedonia, as has been before related. He was succeeded in the throne by his son the present Eumenes.

It is reported, that Scipio one day asked the Carthaginian, Whom he thought the greatest General? Hannibal immediately declared for Alexander, because with a small body of men he had defeated very numerous armies, and had overrun a great part of the world. And who do you think deserves the second place? continued the Roman. Pyrrhus, replied the other: He first taught the method of forming a camp to the best advantage. No body knew better how to chuse ground, or post guards more properly. Besides, he had the art of conciliating to him the affections of men; inasmuch, that the Italian nations chose rather to be subject to him, though a foreigner and a King, than to the Roman people, who had so long held the principality in that country. Thus Scipio was twice mortified; but still he went on, And whom do you place next to those? Hannibal named himself; at which Scipio smiled, and said, Where then would you have placed yourself if you had conquered me? To which the Carthaginian readily replied, Alexander.

Plutarch, in his life of Pyrrhus, makes Hannibal give Pyrrhus the first place, Scipio the second, and himself the third, without mentioning Alexander; but in his life of Flaminius, Hannibal gives Alexander the first place, Pyrrhus the second, and himself the third.

C. Acilius
ap.
B. 35.
C. 14.

* Strabo, B. 13. p. 626.

† Polyb. B. 4. c. 43.

Y. R. 567.
Bel. Chr.
191.
250 Cons.

Lit. B. 33.
L 13

and there had an audience of the King. The Roman insisted upon the same terms which Flaminius had prescribed to the Syrian ambassadors. The conference was warm, but not long; for the sudden news which the King received, at this time, of his son Antiochus's death put an end to it. A suspicion prevailed, that the father, jealous of the young Prince's rising merit, had caused him to be poisoned; and though this suspicion had no good foundation, it was necessary for the King to destroy it by the appearance of an extraordinary grief. He therefore, without concluding any thing, dismissed Villius, who returned to Pergamus.

Antiochus gave over all thoughts of the Pisidian war, and went to Ephesus; where, under pretence of desiring solitude in his affliction, he shut himself up in his palace with his favourite, Minio. This courtier, who knew little of foreign affairs, but had great confidence in his own abilities, pressed the King to send for the Roman ambassadors to Ephesus, and undertook so to manage the argument as to leave them nothing to say. Antiochus, wearied with fruitless conferences, and thinking that his mourning would be a good excuse for treating with the Romans by his minister, approved the motion, and sent for Villius and his Colleagues. The amount of Minio's logic was this: That his master had as good a title to the obedience of the Eastern Greeks, whom he or his ancestors had conquered, as the Romans had to that of the Western Greeks in Italy and Sicily. Sulpicius answered: That if the King had nothing better to offer for his cause, it was indeed but what modesty required, that he should chuse to have his cause pleaded by any body rather than himself. "What similitude (said he) is there between the two cases? Ever since our conquest of the Neapolitans, Tarentines, and other Italic Greeks, our tenure has been perpetual and uninterrupted; but can you say the same of Antiochus's dominion over the Asiatic Greeks? Why, at your rate of reasoning, we have been doing nothing in Greece: Philip's posterity may one day reclaim the possession of Corinth, Cbalcis and Demetrias. But what business have I to plead the cause of the Greek cities of Asia? their ambassadors are here; let us call them in." These ministers had been beforehand prepared and instructed by Eumenes, who was not without secret hopes, that he should get whatever was taken from Antiochus. There was great plenty of ambassadors; who being admitted, fell to making their complaints and demands, some right, some wrong; it was nothing but a scene of altercation and wrangling

It is also related, that while Hannibal was at Ephesus, he went, upon the invitation of some of his acquaintance, to hear the lectures of a celebrated peripatetic philosopher, named Phormus. The philosopher, who was a most copious speaker, entertained him, for several hours (knowing his profession and character) with a discourse on the duties of a General, and the whole extent of the military art. All the rest of the audience were beyond measure delighted; and some of them asked Hannibal, What he thought of their Philosopher? The Carthaginian frankly answered, that he had met with many a silly old fellow, but so very a dotard as this he had never seen before. Cicer. de Orat. l. 2. c. 18.

between

between them and Minio, neither party yielding any thing. The conference broke off; and the Romans returned home in all points as uncertain as they came. So writes Livy: But Appian reports, that the Syrian offered, as the price of an alliance with Rome, to restore all the Asiatic Greeks to their freedom, except the Ætolians and Ionians: A fruitless concession, because the Romans had not come with views of peace and amity, but only to inform themselves of the true state of affairs in Asia.

V. R. 561.
B. Chr.
191.
260 Cont.
In Syr. 5.
92.

Soon after the ambassadors were gone, Antiochus called a council of the chief Officers of his army, as well foreigners as Syrians, to give their opinions concerning a war with the Romans. Hannibal only was not consulted: His familiarity with Scipio and Villius had made the King jealous of him. In council every one declared vehemently for a war: Nay Alexander of Acarmania, who had formerly served Philip, and was now in great favour with Antiochus, confidently promised the King victory, if he would pass into Greece, and make that country the seat of the war. Nabis and the Ætolians, he said, were already in arms; and Philip would take the field on the first sounding of the Syrian trumpets. He added, that much depended upon expedition; and therefore begged the King would hasten his departure; and in the mean time send Hannibal into Africa, to cause a diversion.

THE little regard shewed to Hannibal, since his familiar intercourse with the Roman ambassadors, convinced him that the King had taken umbrage at that part of his conduct. At first the Carthaginian bore his disgrace in silence; but now, thinking it advisable to clear himself, he begged an audience of Antiochus. Being called into the Council, he directly asked the King the reason of his displeasure; and, when he had heard it, expressed himself in the following manner. "I was scarce nine years old, when Amilcar, my father, at the " time of a solemn sacrifice, led me to the altar, and made me
" swear, that, to my last breath, I would be an irreconcilable enemy " to the Roman nation. Under this Oath I carried arms for six and " thirty years; it was this which made me leave my country, when " my country was in peace with Rome; it was this which brought " me like a banished man into your dominions; and, under the con" duct of the same oath (if you disappoint my hopes) in whatever part " of the earth I can hear of strength, wherever I can hear of arms, " thither will I fly, in search of enemies to the Romans. If, therefore,
" any of your courtiers would raise their credit with you, by defam-
" ing me, they should invent some other crime, than my friendship
" to Rome. No; I hate the Romans, and am hated by them; and that " I speak truth, I call the Gods to witness, and the manes of Amilcar
" my father. Whensoever you are in earnest for a Roman war, reckon
" Hannibal among your surest friends; but if any thing constrain you
" to peace, in that affair you must seek some other counsellor." This

Liv. B. 35.
c. 19.

Polyb. B.
3. c. 11.

V. R. 461.
Be. C. 1.
101.
260 C. 1.

L. B. 35.
c. 101.

discourse reconciled the King to Hannibal, at least for a time. The Council unanimously determined for war.

Rome, upon the return of her ambassadors, sent a body of troops under the Prætor Babius to guard the eastern coast of Italy, and to be in readiness to embark for the Levant, if there should be occasion. She ordered two fleets to be fitted out, one for Sicily, the other for Greece; whither she also dispatched Flaminius and three other Senators, in quality of ambassadors. When they arrived in that country, Nabis was yet engaged in the siege of Gytium. He frequently detached parties to make incursions on the lands of the Acæans. These, fearing to begin a war without the approbation of Rome, wrote to Flaminius for his consent. He counselled them to wait for the arrival of the Roman fleet, before they took arms. Nevertheless they held a general diet at Sicyon upon the affair; and the assembly, being divided in their sentiments, desired to know the opinion of Philopæmen, their president. He answered, "It is a wise institution among us, that our Prætors should not declare their opinions when the assemblies are deliberating about war. It is your province to determine what shall be done; mine to execute your orders. And I will take all possible care, that you shall not repent of your choice, whether it be peace or war." These words more powerfully inclined the diet to war, than if the President had openly declared for it. War they decreed, and gave the conduct of it to Philopæmen.

The first enterprize of this brave man was to relieve Gytium: He set sail for that port with what galleys he could get together; but being (as Livy says) a land-officer, and not used to sea affairs, he failed in his attempt. He was defeated within sight of the place by the Lacedæmonian fleet. However, he soon retrieved his honour, by two victories, which his able conduct gave him over the tyrant at land.

Whilst the Acæans carried on the war against the Lacedæmonians, the ambassadors from the Roman Republic were busy in visiting the chief cities of Greece. The inhabitants of Demetrias had been informed, that Rome intended to restore to Philip his son Demetrius, and to put the King again into possession of their city, in order to prevent his joining with Antiochus; a rumour not altogether groundless. It was with some difficulty therefore, that Flaminius could pacify them. He went thence to the diet of Ætolia, where Menippus, ambassador from Antiochus, had been introduced by Thoas, one of the chief authors of the Ætolian defection. The Roman in vain endeavoured to dissuade the assembly from calling the Syrians into Europe: they passed a decree, in his presence, for inviting Antiochus to come and restore the liberty of Greece. Flaminius demanding a copy of the decree, was answered by Damocritus the Prætor, "We have affairs of greater moment to dispatch; we shall tell you the purport of it, on the banks of the Tiber."

After

A MAP of EPIRUS. THESSALY, AND ACHAIA.

After this the Ætolians took measures to seize three important cities; Demetrias in Thessaly, ^b Lacedæmon in Peloponnesus, and Chalcis in Eubœa. Diochus, Alexamenus and Thoas were the persons appointed for these expeditions. The first got possession of Demetrias, through the treachery of one of the principal citizens. To surprize Lacedæmon, Alexamenus, with a thousand foot, and some young horsemen, went thither, as carrying succours to Nabis. The Tyrant received them without suspicion: And their leader having insinuated to him, that it would be for his honour to have his troops well disciplined, and make a good appearance when Antiochus should arrive, he every day drew them out and exercised them in a plain near the city. At one of these reviews Alexamenus assassinated him.

Had the murderer harangued the Lacedæmonian soldiers during their first astonishment, it is probable they would have approved of the action; because the Tyrant was hated: but the Ætolians hastened to plunder the royal palace, and this giving the Lacedæmonians time to recover themselves, they entered the city, massacred all the pillagers they met, and, among the rest, the infamous Alexamenus. Philopæmen took advantage of this event, appeared with a body of troops before the town, and persuaded the inhabitants to resume their liberty. Accordingly, Lacedæmon from being a monarchy became a Republic, and a part of the Acbaian body.

As for Thoas, he failed in his attempt upon Chalcis; the Eubœans were upon their guard, and adhered steadily to Rome. He went therefore strait to Antiochus, and as by the false reports he had spread, in Greece, magnifying the King's strength, he had drawn over many to his party; so now he deceived the King by what he told him of the disposition of the Greeks. He assured him, that all Greece was in motion: that the people universally desired and intreated his coming among them; and that his fleet would no sooner appear on the coast, but the shore would be crowded with soldiers to offer him their service. He added, that Demetrias, a town of great consequence, being at present in the Ætolian interest, he might there commodiously land his troops. At the same time he endeavoured to dissuade the Syrian from dividing his naval force; "but " if a part of his fleet must be sent to Italy, the conduct of it,
" he said, ought to be given to any body, rather than to Hannibal.
" That he was an exile, and a Carthaginian, to whom fortune and " his own restless disposition would be daily suggesting new projects.
" The very glory he had acquired in war, and for which he was courted,
" was too great for a lieutenant in the King's army; the King ought to " be looked upon as the only General, the spring and director of all.
" Should Hannibal lose a fleet, or an army, the loss would be the same

^b The Ætolians, in this enterprize upon Lacedæmon, seem to have been actuated by the apprehension of its falling into the hands of the Acbaians, rather than enmity to Nabis, who was at this time engaged in the same cause with them. And Livy tells us, the Tyrant was so hated by the Lacedæmonians, that there was reason to think they would attach themselves to whoever should destroy him.

V. R. 801.
E. L. C. 11.
161.
260 C. 1.

Liv. B. 37.
C. 37.

Plut. life of Philopæ-
men.
Liv. B. 35.
C. 37.

C. 43.

Y. R. 561.
Bef. Chr.
101.
260 Cons.

“ as if any other had lost it: but if success attended his arms, Hannibal, “ not Antiochus, would have all the glory. The King might have the “ Carthaginian to attend him, and might hear his opinion: a cautious “ use of his talents would be safe and profitable; but to trust him with “ the supreme direction of affairs, would be dangerous both to Antio-
“ chus and to Hannibal.”

None are so prone to envy, says Livy, as those of high rank and fortune, with low, little minds. The King immediately dropt all thoughts of sending Hannibal into Italy, the only wise measure that had been proposed in relation to this war. It being concluded that Antiochus should pass into Greece, he, before he set sail, went with a frivolous pomp of ceremony to Ilium, and there sacrificed to Minerva. This done, he took shipping, and landed at Demetrias with ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants; an army hardly considerable enough to take possession of Greece, had it been wholly unprovided of troops; much less to oppose the power of Rome.

As soon as the Ætolians heard of the King's landing, they assembled a diet at Lamia, in order to invite him, in form, to come to their assistance. The Syrian, knowing their design, was already on his way, when he received their invitation; and being, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, introduced in the assembly, he began to excuse his coming into Greece with an army so much inferior to what they had expected. “ It was (he said) a strong evidence of his good will to them, “ that upon the call of their ambassadors, he had hastened to their aid, “ without waiting till any thing was ready, or even till the weather was “ fit for sailing. He assured them, he would in a short time satisfy their “ utmost expectations; that as soon as the season would permit, they “ should see Greece full of men, arms, and horses, and all the coast covered with his ships. Neither would he spare any expence or labour, “ or decline any danger, to remove the Roman yoke from their necks, “ give Greece real liberty, and make the Ætolians the most considerable “ of all her states. When his forces should arrive, all sorts of provisions “ he said, would arrive with them. In the mean time, he hoped the “ Ætolians would furnish him with corn and other necessaries for the “ troops he had brought.”

This discourse was heard with applause; and the diet passed a decree constituting Antiochus General of the Ætolians, and appointing him a council of thirty persons to whom he might have recourse on all occasions. The first attempt he made, by their advice, was to gain over Chalcis in Eubœa; and as they imagined that much depended upon expedition, he hastened away with a thousand Syrians and some Ætolians, crossed the Euripe, and appeared before the gates of Chalcis. The Ætolians, in an amicable conference with the Chalcidians, endeavoured to persuade them to enter into a treaty of friendship with Antiochus (without renouncing their alliance with Rome) and assured them, that the King was not come come to make war upon Greece, but to deliver her from slavery. Miltio, one of the chiefs of the Chalcidians answered, " That he " wondered what cities of Greece they were, to set which at liberty " Antiochus had left his kingdom, and come into Europe. For his part, " he knew of none that had either a Roman garrison, or paid tribute to " Rome, or was obliged to do any thing contrary to its own laws. The " Chalcidians therefore neither wanted a protector nor a garrison; since by " the favour of the Romans they enjoyed both peace and liberty. They " were indeed far from despising the friendship of the King, or even of " the Ætolians; but desired, the first instance of that friendship might be " their leaving the island immediately: For the Chalcidians were deter- " mined not only not to receive them within their walls, but to enter into " no alliance with them, without consent of the Romans." The King, hereupon, thought proper to return to Demetrias, for he had not with him a sufficient number of troops to take Chalcis by force.

Y. P. 561.
Bef. Chr.
151.
260 Conf.

Nor did he succeed better in his endeavours to bring the diet of Achaia, held at Ægium, to a neutrality. His minister there extravagantly magnified the Syrian power, and boasted much of an innumerable multitude of horsemen, that were coming over the Hellepont into Europe, some in complete armour, others so excellent archers that nothing was safe from their arrows, and who were surest of hitting an enemy when they turned their backs upon him. And though these horsemen were sufficient to trample down all the armies of Europe joined together in a body, yet the King would also bring into the field a numerous and terrible infantry; Dabæ, Medes, Elimæans, Cadusians, names scarce heard of before in Greece. He represented the fleet of Antiochus as so prodigiously great that all the ports of Greece could not contain it: " The squadrons of the right composed of Sidenians and Tyrians; those on " the left of Aradians and Sideta from Pamphylia; nations whose bravery " in naval engagements, and skill in maritime affairs had never been " equalled." He added, that " it would be superfluous to reckon up " the warlike stores, or the sum of money Antiochus had amassed: They " knew the kingdoms of Asia had always abounded with gold. The " Romans therefore would not have to do with Hannibal or Philip, the " former only one of the chiefs of a single city, and the latter con- " fined within the narrow limits of Macedon; but with the great King " of all Asia and a part of Europe. And that this King, though he " came from the extremity of the East to deliver Greece from slavery, " yet asked nothing of the Achaïans that was contrary to their treaty " with the Romans. He only desired they would stand neuter, and " be quiet spectators of the war between him and Rome."

Archidamus, the Ætolian minister, exhorted the assembly to comply with this motion; nor did he stop here, but proceeded to inveigh against the Romans in general, and Numinus in particular. He boasted that the victory over Philip was entirely owing to the courage of the Ætolians,

Y. R. 111.
 L. C. 111.
 111.
 111.

who alone were exposed to danger, while the noble Commander of the Romans employed himself wholly in making vows and sacrifices. To this Flamininus, who was present, answered, “Archidamus considers before whom, rather than to whom he speaks. The bravery of the Ætoliæ is well known, in Greece, to shew itself more in councils and assemblies, than in the field. They little value therefore what the Acbeans think, whom they cannot hope to impose upon; it is to the King’s ambassador, and by him to the absent King, that Archidamus makes his boasts. And now, if any one was ignorant before of what has made Antiochus and the Ætoliæ friends, he may learn it from the speeches of their ministers: By lying to each other, and bragging of that strength they never had, they have puffed up one another with vain hopes. While the Ætoliæ talk loudly, that Philip was overcome by them, and the Romans protected by their valour, and that you and the other states of Greece will undoubtedly join them; the King on the other hand boasts of his clouds of horse and foot, his Dabe, Cadusians, Aradians, and the rest; and covers the seas with his prodigious fleets. This puts me in mind of an entertainment we once had at Cbalcis at a friend’s house, an honest man, and who understood good eating. It was in the beginning of June; and we therefore much admired how in that season of the year, he had procured such variety of venison as we saw at his table: upon which my friend (not so vain as these orators) bid me not deceive myself; for that what I saw was nothing more than common pork: My cook, said he, has indeed disguised it, and given it different tastes and different names; but all this variety of dishes is made of one tame swine. ’Tis just so with regard to this pompous enumeration of the King’s forces: They are all Syrians, by whatever strange names they may be called; all one sort of men; and for their servile dispositions much fitter to be slaves than soldiers. And I wish, Acbeans, I could but picture to you the great King in all his mightiness and bustle. You would see something like two petty legions, incomplete, in his camp. You would behold him one while almost begging corn of the Ætoliæ, to be measured out scantily to his soldiers; then borrowing money at use to pay them. You would see him hurrying from Demetrias to Lamia; from Lamia to Cbalcis in Eubœa: Now standing at the gates of Cbalcis; and by and by, when denied entrance, and having only seen Aulis and the Euripus, returning to Demetrias. Indeed Antiochus did ill to believe the Ætoliæ; and the Ætoliæ were as much in the wrong to hearken to his vanity. Be not you therefore deceived, but rely on the faith of the Romans, which you have so often experienced. And as for the neutrality so much recommended to you, nothing can be more contrary to your interests; for without gaining any honour, or even thanks from either side, you would undoubtedly be the prize of the conqueror.” The Acbeans without hesitation declared for the Romans.

Antiochus and the Ætolians had sent an embassy to the Bæotians, to court their alliance. These returned answer: That when the King came into their country, they would consider of what was proper to be done.

Y. R. 561.
Bef. Chr.
191.
260 Conf.

The Athamanes were brought over to Antiochus by means of Philip the brother of Apamea, Amynter's wife. Philip deduced his pedigree from Alexander the Great, and pretended to be the true heir of Macedon: And the Syrian, encouraging his vanity, made him hope that he should one day possess that throne.

Liv. B. 35.
c. 47, 50.

After this, the King, hearing that Eumenes and the Achæans were sending a garrison into Chalcis, made what haste he could to prevent them. He instantly sent away Menippus with three thousand men: and followed in person with the rest of his army. Menippus intercepted and cut off a party of five hundred Romans that were marching to the defence of Chalcis; and though the Pergamenians and Achæans had entered the place, the inhabitants opened the gates to Antiochus: after which he soon reduced the whole island of Eubæa. Thence he passed into Bæotia; and this country also renounced her confederacy with Rome, and submitted to him.

Livy, B.
36. c. 6.

Upon his return to Chalcis (which he made his chief place of residence) he, by letters, invited his friends and allies to meet him in council at Demetrias, in order to determine, whether it were proper to make any attempt upon Thessaly. Some were for an expedition into that country immediately; some for deferring it till the spring; others advised only the sending ambassadors thither. When Hannibal's opinion came to be asked, addressing himself to the King, he spoke to this effect.

“ Had I ever been consulted since our arrival in Greece; had my opinion “ been asked, when you were considering how to act with regard to “ the Eubæans, Achæans and Bæotians, I should have said what I am “ now going to say, when the debate is concerning Thessaly. Our first, our “ principal object should be to gain over the King of Macedon. The “ Eubæans, the Bæotians, the Thessalians, who have no strength of “ their own, will always follow the dictates of their fears. Through “ fear they will now be on your side; and, as soon as the Romans come “ into Greece, turn again to them, pleading weakness as an excuse for “ having submitted to you. Of how much greater importance would “ it be to engage Philip in your cause, who, if he once espouses it, must “ of necessity be steady; and whose friendship will bring us an ac“ cession of real strength; a strength that, not long ago, was of itself “ sufficient to withstand the whole power of the Romans? If I am asked “ what reason I have to hope that Philip will join in the alliance, I an“ swer: In the first place, his interest requires him so to do: and in the “ next, you Ætolians have always asserted he would. Your ambassador “ here, this same Thoas, when he was pressing the King to sail into “ Greece, employed, as one of his strongest arguments, the raging anger “ of Philip, to find himself, under the colour of a peace, reduced to “ slavery.

Y. R. 571.
B.C. 191.
267 C. - 1.

“ slavery. I remember, he compared the King’s fury to that of a “ wild beast chained or shut up, and struggling to get loose. If this “ be true, let us break his chains and set him free, that he may turn “ against the common enemy all that wrath which has been so long re“ strained. But, if he will not be brought over to our cause, let us at “ least take care that he do not join our enemies. Your son Seleucus is at “ Lyfimachia with an army: If he attacks Macedon on the side of Thrace,
 “ this, by keeping Philip employed in the defence of his own dominions, “ will hinder him from assisting the Romans—Thus far with regard to “ Philip. What my opinion is, in relation to the general plan of the war, “ you have known from the beginning. Had I then been hearkened to,
 “ the news at Rome would not now be, that Chalcis in Eubœa is taken,
 “ and a castle upon the Euripus demolished; but that Ettruria, Liguria,
 “ and Cisalpine Gaul are in a flame; and, what perhaps would strike “ more terror, that Hannibal is in Italy. Be that as it will, our present “ situation, I think, requires, that you send immediately for all your sea “ and land forces, and provisions necessary to maintain them; for they “ cannot be supplied by this country. When your fleet arrives, it “ should be divided; one part of it stationed at Ceræra to prevent the “ Romans landing in Greece, and the other sent to that coast of Italy, “ which looks towards Sardinia and Africa. It will also be expedient “ that you in person march your land forces to the coast of Illyricum, “ near Epirus. There you may preside over all Greece, and keep the “ Romans in awe by the fear of an invasion: nay from thence may actually “ pass into Italy, if you should think it proper. This is my opinion;
 “ and if I should not be thought the most skilful in managing other wars, “ yet surely it will be granted, that I have learnt, both by good and “ bad fortune, how to manage a war against the Romans. In the execution “ of the advice I have given, I am ready to assist with faithfulness and “ alacrity. But whatever resolution you take, may the Gods grant you “ success.” Such was the substance of Hannibal’s discourse. His counsel was applauded, and not followed. Of all he had proposed, the King did nothing, except sending to Asia for his fleet and land forces.

As to Thessaly, it was determined to dispatch ambassadors to the Thessalian Diet held at Larissa: and the Syrian marched with his army to Pheræ in the same country. While he was there waiting to be joined by the Atbamanes and the Ætolians, he sent Philip, the brother in law of Anty-nander, with two thousand men to Cynocéphalæ, where the bones of the Macedonians slain in the battle when the King of Macedon was vanquished by the Romans, still lay unburied. Antiochus thought, that if this pretender procured them burial, he would thereby gain the affection of a people over whom he claimed the government. But this step served only to irritate the true King of Macedon. And he, who perhaps was hitherto undetermined, not only sent advice to the Roman Prætor M. Bæbius, of the irruption of the Syrians into Thessaly, but offered him the assistance of his forces.

The

The Syrian's embassy to the Thessalians having proved fruitless, he with the help of the Ætolians and Amynder, reduced by force of arms, Pheræ, Scotussa, Cypra, and the greatest part of Thessaly; and then laid siege to Larissa. Bæbius, now joined by Philip, sent Ap. Claudius with a detachment to reinforce the garrison. When Claudius came near the town, he posted himself upon a hill within view of the Syrians, made his camp larger than his forces required, and lighted up more fires than were necessary. Antiochus, thinking the whole Roman army and King Philip were coming to the relief of Larissa, immediately raised the siege, under pretence that winter was at hand, retired to Demetrias, and from thence to Chalcis. Here he became enamoured, though past fifty years old, of the daughter of a Chalcidian named Cleoptolemus, in whose house he lodged. The disproportion of her age and condition to those of the King, made the father very averse to the marriage, fearing she would soon repent her advancement to so glittering a station: But Antiochus at length obtained his consent; and the nuptials were celebrated with royal magnificence. The King spent the rest of the winter in feasting and diversions: His officers and soldiers, infected by his example, abandoned themselves to idleness and debauchery.

V. R. 561.
Bef. Chr.
191.
260 Conf.

CHAP. V.

The Romans declare war against Antiochus.

The Consul Acilius lands in Greece.

Antiochus routed at Thermopylæ. He returns into Asia.

The Ætolians ask a peace with Rome, but will not submit to the terms on which it is offered.

Flaminius takes the island of Zacynthus from the Achæans, and persuades them, he does it for their good.

The Syrians are vanquished at sea.

The conduct of the war against Antiochus being given to L. Scipio, his brother Africanus assists him in quality of his Lieutenant.

WHILST Antiochus lay asleep in pleasures, the Romans were very watchful of their affairs in the Levant. Some late successes of their arms had made all things quiet in Spain and Italy, which put them in a better condition to provide for a war in the East. They fitted out a hundred quinqueremes to scour the Eastern seas; and after the election of magistrates, and a regulation of the troops appointed to serve this year, formally declared war against Antiochus. The new Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, drew lots for their provinces. Greece fell to the latter. When every thing was ready for

V. R. 562.
Bef. Chr.
190.
261 Conf.
Liv. B. 36.
c. 2.

c. 4.

Y. R. 562.
 B. C. 190.
 261 C. 72.

his departure, ambassadors arrived from the Kings of Egypt and Macedon with offers of money, provisions and troops. Masniſſa likewise would have contributed to the expences of the war, which the Romans were going to undertake. And as for the Cartaginians, they not only proposed to make the Republic a present of wheat and barley, and to equip a ſtreet at their own expence for her ſervice, but offered, in ready money, the whole remainder of the tribute, which they were not obliged to pay but in the ſpace of nine years. Of all the offers made to the Romans at this time, they accepted only five hundred Numidian horſe and ſome elephants from Masniſſa: They would not receive any corn either from him or Cartage, without paying for it. Acilius ſet out for Greece in the month of May, accompanied by L. Quinctius, (the brother of Flamininus) whom the Republic had appointed to be his Lieutenant; and by the famous Cato, who now ſerved in no higher a ſtation than that of legionary Tribune.

Liv. B. 36.
 C. 14.
 A. 12.
 261 C. 72.

The Conſul landed his troops in Greece, to the number of ten thouſand foot *, two thouſand horſe, and fifteen elephants. He immediately ſent his infantry to Lariſſa; and with his cavalry marched to Limnæa, another city of Threſſaly, which the King of Macedon was beſieging. This place ſurrendered to the Conſul at diſcretion. Thence he proceeded to Perinæum, which Bacchus had inveſted; and this town alſo ſubmitted to him. Here was taken Philip the Pretender, whom the King of Macedon meeting, jeſtingly called him brother, and ordered him to be ſaluted King. Acilius ſent him in chains to Rome. Then the Romans and Macedonians ſeparated, to ſpread the terror of their arms in different parts. The King made himſelf maſter of all Atthamania; Amynander retiring thence with his wife and children into Epirus. And as for the Conſul, he ſoon ſubdued all Threſſaly.

WHEN Antiochus the Great conſidered, that, inſtead of all the mighty things which had been promiſed him, he had got nothing, in Greece, but an agreeable winter-ſtaying, and his landlord's daughter to wife, he began to accuſe Theas and the Ætolians of having deceived him; and to look upon Hieronymus as a wife man and a prophet. He was now ſenſible of the raſineſs of his enterprize: However, that it's failure of ſucceſs might not be imputed to any further negligence on his part, he ſent to the Ætolians to collect their whole ſtrength, and marched all his forces into their country in order to join them. The Ætolian chiefs had not been able to raiſe above four thouſand men; and theſe were moſtly their clients and vaffals. Diſappointed of his expected aids from his allies, Antiochus ſeized the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, to hinder the Romans from entering Ætolia by the way of Locris. At this paſs, three hundred Lacedæmonians, under the command of Leonidas, had, for three whole days, ſtopped a million of men in the time of Xerxes. It was not above ſixty paces broad, and bounded on one ſide by the ſea, and a moraiſ of deep mud, and on the other by mount Oeta, the extremity

mity of a chain of hills that divide Greece in two parts, almost in the same manner as the Appennines divide Italy. And as the King was not ignorant that, when Xerxes made his passage, it was by means of some troops that climbed the mountains and fell down from thence upon the enemy, he, to prevent the Romans, detached two thousand Ætolics to seize the summit of Oeta, called Callidromos, which overlooked his camp. Acilius nevertheless forced the King in his entrenchments: for Cato being sent with a detachment up the mountain in the night, dislodged the Ætolics; and then pouring down upon the Syrians, while the Consul attacked them below, put a speedy end to the dispute: An exploit of which he was extravagantly vain, and the last military exploit of his life. He was sent to Rome with the news of the victory.

Antiochus, in the action of Thermopylae, and in his flight, lost his whole army, except five hundred horse, which escaped with him to Elatia, from whence they passed to Chalcis. The conqueror, to make the best use of his advantage, marched into Boeotia. The inhabitants of several revolted cities came to meet him; and as he every where gave proofs of his clemency and moderation, the greatest part of this country submitted; and, presently after, all Eubœa: for Antiochus, upon the approach of the Roman army, left Chalcis, embarked for Asia with his new Queen, and retired to Ephejus. Acilius laid siege to Heraclea, at the foot of mount Oeta. The city being taken, after a stout resistance of the Ætolian garrison, the soldiers retired into the citadel. It was commanded by that Damocritus, who, when Flamininus asked a copy of the decree whereby the Ætolics called Antiochus into Greece, had answered, he would give it him upon the banks of the Tiber. He surrendered at discretion.

Philip, in pursuance of an agreement between him and the Roman general, was at this time besieging Lamia, a strong town about seven miles from Heraclea. The place was on the point of surrendering, when the Consul, having reduced Heraclea, sent to the King to quit his enterprize; alledging, that it was but just, the Roman soldiers, who had conquered the Ætolics in battle, should have the rewards of the victory. Philip with reluctance complied, and marched away. The city, presently after, opened her gates to Acilius.

A few days before Heraclea was taken, the Ætolics, assembled in council at Hypata, had sent Thoas into Asia, to press the Syrian to return with an army into Europe: But now they bent their thoughts wholly to a peace, and for that purpose dispatched deputies; who presented themselves in a suppliant manner before the Consul. Phœneas, their speaker, having in a long harangue endeavoured to move the compassion of the conqueror, at length concluded with saying, that “the Ætolics yielded themselves and their all to the ^b Faith of the people of Rome.” “Do you so?” said Acilius: “Then deliver up to us Amynander and the ^b Polyb. Legat. 13. says they were deceived by the words εἰς τὴν πίστιν αὐτῶν ἰσχυρίζεσθαι fidei se permittere, not knowing that they signified among the Romans, to surrender at discretion.

Y. R. 562.
Bef. Chr.
100.
261 C. n. l.

Pol. b. Leg.
13.

“ chiefs of the Athamanes, Dicaearchus the Ætolian, and Menetus the “ Epirat, who made the city of Naupactus revolt from us.” The Consul had scarce finished, when Phœneas answered, “ We did not give ourselves “ up to servitude, but to your faith; and I am persuaded, it is because “ you are unacquainted with the customs of the Greeks, that you enjoin “ us things so contrary to them.” Acilius haughtily replied, “ You “ little Greeks! do you talk to me of your customs? of what is fit and “ decent for me to do? You; who have surrendered yourselves at “ discretion, and whom I may lay in irons, if I please? Here, lictors, “ bring chains for the necks of these men:” Phœneas and his Colleagues, quite astonished, represented to the Consul, that, though they were very willing to obey his orders, yet they could not execute them without the consent of the Ætolian diet. He was prevailed upon to grant them ten days truce, to bring him a positive answer from thence.
The preliminaries on which the Roman General insisted, highly provoked the council. While they were in great perplexity and doubt, what measures to take, one Nicander, an active man, who had gone from Ætolia to Ephesus and returned in twelve days, brought considerable sums of money from Antiochus; and also certain advice, that the King was making might-ty preparations for war. This determined the assembly to lay aside the thoughts of peace. They drew all their forces to Naupactus, and resolved to sustain a siege there to the last extremity. Acilius, considering that by the reduction of this place he should give the finishing stroke to the conquest of Ætolia, and quell for ever the most restless of the Greek nations, marched thither and invested it.

Pictarch's life of Flaminius.
Liv. B. 36.
c. 31.

In the mean time Flaminius, who had resided a good while at Chal-cis, which he had saved from being sacked, (when taken by Acilius) and where he was honoured even to adoration, went thence to settle a peace between the Acheans and the city of Messene; and he subjected the latter to the states of Achaia. There was at this time a dispute between the Romans and Acheans about Zacynthus, an island in the Ionian sea.
This island, Philip of Macedon had given to Amynder, who made one Hierocles, of Agrigentum, governor of it. Hierocles, after the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylae, seeing that Amynder was driven out of Atthania by Philip, sold Zacynthus to the Acheans; but Flaminius remonstrated, in the diet of Achaia, that an island, which only the success of the Roman arms had made to change it's masters, belonged of Right to the Romans. The assembly having referred the matter to his own honour, he thus answered: “ If I thought that your possessing the “ island in question could be of any benefit to you, I would counsel the “ Senate and people of Rome to let you hold it. But as a tortoise when “ collected within it's shell is safe from all harm, and when it thrusts out “ any part of itself, exposes that part to be trod upon and wounded:
“ In like manner, you Acheans, who are encompassed with the sea, may “ safely unite, and united preserve, all within the limits of Peloponnesus;
“ but

“ but if you transgress those bounds, and make acquisitions beyond them, these members of your state will be exposed to insults, by which the whole body must be affected.” The issue was, that the Asians relinquished their pretensions to the island.

Y. R. 562.
Bis. Chr.
190.
261 Conf.

While the Romans were besieging Naupactus, King Philip (who had obtained permission from the Consul to reduce the towns which had fallen off from their alliance with Rome) made himself master of Demetrias, extended his conquests in Dolopia, Aperantia, and Perræbia, (territories of Thessaly, or bordering upon it) and was gradually recovering the many places which had been formerly taken from him by the Romans. Flaminius, not pleased with this progress of the Macedonian, whom he looked upon as a more dangerous enemy than the Ætolians, went to the camp before Naupactus to reprove Acilius for having consented to the enterprizes of Philip. As the besieged, who were now reduced to great extremity, had formerly experienced Flaminius's clemency, they, upon the news of his arrival, sent deputies to him, imploring his protection. He became their intercessor with the Consul, and obtained for them a suspension of arms, till they could dispatch ambassadors to Rome, to negotiate a peace there. The Epirots at the same time sent thither, to excuse some advances they had formerly made to Antiochus; and as it did not appear that they had committed any act of hostility against the Republic, she chose rather to admit their apology, than draw new enemies upon herself. But the ambassadors of Philip were yet more favourably received than those of Epirus. He begged leave to hang up, in the capitol, a crown of gold of an hundred pounds weight, in memory of the first advantage the Romans had gained over Antiochus. The Fathers readily accepted the King's present; and in return, restored to him his son Demetrias, then a hostage at Rome; promising at the same time, that, if he continued steady to the Republic in the prosecution of the war, she would remit the tribute he was engaged to pay her.

Liv. B. 36.
c. 34.

During these transactions, Livius the Roman Admiral was pursuing the war against Antiochus at sea. The King, for some time after his return to Ephesus, had imagined himself secure from any further hostilities on the part of Rome. He never dreamt that the Romans would follow him into Asia; and was kept in this delusion by the ignorance or flattery of his courtiers. Hannibal roused him out of his lethargy: He said, there was more cause to wonder, that the Romans were not already in Asia, than to doubt of their coming: That the King might be well assured, he would very soon have a war with them in Asia, and for Asia; and that, as Rome aspired to universal empire, she would infallibly ruin him, if he did not ruin her. Antiochus, thus awakened, went in person, with what ships he had ready, to Chersonesus, to garrison the places in that country, and thereby make it difficult for the Romans to pass into Asia that way. At the same time he ordered Polyxenidas to equip the rest of his fleet with all diligence. Upon the news of these naval preparations.

Polybius.
Legat. 15.

Liv. B. 36.
c. 41.

parations, Livius sailed to the coast of Asia, with a fleet of 105 decked ships, including the squadron of Lumenus King of Pergamus. Polyxenidas having got together a hundred, some say two hundred ships, came to an engagement with the enemy in the Ionian gulph. The Romans obtained the victory with the loss of only one vessel; the Syrans lost twenty three.

About the time of this success of the Roman arms in the Levant, the reduction of the Boian Gauls is said to have been completed by the Consul Scipio Nasica, and one half of their lands given to new colonies sent thither from Rome.

Y. R. 463.
B. C. 197.
262 C. 70.

Liv. B. 37.
C. 1.
Polyb.
Livy 16.

To L. Cornelius Scipio, the brother, and C. Lælius, the friend of the Great Scipio, were transferred the consular fasces for the new year. They began the exercise of their office with introducing to the Senate the ambassadors from Naupactus. The Fathers required of the Ætolians, that they should either submit implicitly to the will of the Senate; or pay the Republic a thousand Talents, and engage themselves to be enemies to all the enemies of Rome. The ambassadors, knowing that the Ætolians had not a thousand talents to give, and that they dreaded the severity of the Romans too much to yield to them at discretion, could consent to neither of these demands: Whereupon they were ordered to leave Rome that very day, and Italy in a fortnight.

Liv. B. 37.
C. 1.

The Senate had not yet assigned to the Consuls their provinces. Lælius, who had a great interest in the assembly, and was perhaps the abler General, artfully proposed to his Collegue, that instead of drawing lots, they should leave the matter to the determination of the Conscrip't Fathers. L. Scipio knew not how to decline this offer; yet took time to consider of it; and consulted his brother. Africanus, without any hesitation, advised him to accept the proposal; and when the Senate came to deliberate upon the affair, he, to their great surprize, offered to serve under his brother in quality of his lieutenant. There needed no further argument to make the Fathers immediately assign Greece to L. Scipio.

P. 4.
Liv. B. 37.
L. 1. E. 17.
4. 7.

The two brothers embarked at Brundisium, with thirteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, including auxiliaries and volunteers, and landed at Apollonia: from thence they marched through Epirus and Thessaly, and at length arrived before Amphissa, the citadel of which Acilius was besieging, having already taken the town. Hither came some deputies from the Athenians, to intercede with the Consul for the Ætolians, now shut up in Naupactus by a blockade. Lucius Scipio was at first inexorable, notwithstanding that his brother joined his mediation to that of the Athenians; yet in the end consented to grant them a truce, that they might have an opportunity to try once more a negotiation with the Senate of Rome. Acilius having resigned the command of his army to the Consul, returned home.

C H A P. VI.

Philip conducts the two Scipios through Macedon and Thrace to the Hellespont.

Antiochus desires to treat with the Roman Admiral.

Hannibal shut up in Pamphylia by the Rhodians.

A sea fight between the Romans and Syrians.

Antiochus sends proposals of peace to Scipio.

The battle of Magnesia.

Scipio concludes a peace with Antiochus.

ALL Greece being now quiet, the two Scipios were at full liberty to pass into Asia. In order to this, they judged that the safest way was to conduct their forces by land to the Hellespont, and consequently through Macedon and Thrace. However, before they set out, they had the precaution to dispatch a young Roman to Pella, where Philip resided at this time, to learn his real dispositions, and whether the steps he had taken were like those of a friend, or of an enemy. The King had prepared every thing to facilitate the march of the Romans through his dominions. He came in person to meet the Scipios on his frontiers, was extremely obliging in all his behaviour, and accompanied them as far as the Hellespont.

In the mean time, Livius, in conjunction with the Pergamenian fleet, took Sestos, and afterwards invested Abydos; but raised the siege upon the news that Polyxenidas had destroyed a Rhodian squadron. The Roman Admiral soon after resigned his command to the Prætor Æmilius, sent from Rome to succeed him.

Antiochus was now full of business; and, turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of pains and assiduity brought almost nothing to pass. He and his son Seleucus entered the territories of Pergamus on different sides. Seleucus laid siege to the capital. This brought Eumenes to the defence of his own country; and he was quickly followed by Æmilius, and also by the Rhodians, who, since their last defeat, had equipt a new squadron. Upon the junction of these fleets, and the news of Scipio's approach, Antiochus, fearing to be hard pressed both by land and sea, dispatched an agent to Æmilius to propose a peace. The Roman, ambitious of the honour of finishing the war, readily hearkened to the motion; and the Rhodians were not averse to it: but Eumenes, who had different views, prevailed to have this answer sent to the King, That nothing could be concluded with regard to a peace, before the arrival of the Consul.

The Syrian, after laying waste the country of Pergamus, invaded Troas, took Persea, and some other towns, and then retired to Sardis. His son Seleucus.

Y. R. 563.
Bef. Chr.
189.
262 Conf.

Polyb. Legat. 21.

Y. R. 563.
Bell. Cret.
156.
262. Cret.

Seleucus was soon forced to quit the dominions of Eumenes, chiefly by the able conduct of Diopbarus, a Megalopolitan, whom the Achaëans had sent with a thousand men, to the relief of Pergamus.

Com. Nep.
Lif. 1.
Hist. 1.
Liv. B. 37.
c. 23.

After this the confederate fleets separated: Æmilius stationed himself at Samos, to watch the fleet under Polyxenidas; and Eumenes sailed to the Hellepont to prepare every thing for Scipio's passage into Asia. Eudamas the Rhodian Admiral went to oppose Hannibal, who was bringing a reinforcement of ships from Syria. The two squadrons met off Syria in Pamphylia. In the engagement, the Carthaginian had the advantage on the left, where he in person commanded; but his right being vanquished and forced to sheer off, all the Rhodian ships jointly attacked him, put him to flight, and chased him into a port of Pamphylia. Eudamus left Chariclitus with twenty ships to block him up there, and with the rest joined the Roman fleet.

P. 15. L.
Liv. 37.
Liv. B. 37.
c. 23.

On the advice of this ill success, Antiochus employed his endeavours to engage the assistance of Prusias King of Bithynia: He represented to him by letters, That the views of the Romans were to destroy all monarchies, being determined to suffer, throughout the whole world, no empire but their own. "First Philip was subdued; then Nabis;
" I am attacked the third: And, since Eumenes has yielded himself to " voluntary servitude, the fury of Roman ambition, when it has over" turned my kingdom, will fall next upon yours; nor will it ever cease
" its destructive progress, till it has borne down all kingly power."

To efface the impressions made by these letters, Scipio Africanus wrote to Prusias, assuring him, "that Rome, so far from being an enemy to
" Kings, had made it her constant practice, with regard to the monarchs
" in friendship with her, by every kind of honour to augment their " majesty. The petty Kings in Spain, who had put themselves under " her protection, she had made great Kings. Masiniissa she had not only
" placed in his father's throne, but had given him the kingdom of Syphax;
" so that he was now the most potent of all the African Kings; nay,
" equal in majesty and power to any Monarch in the world. Philip
" and Nabis, though conquered in war, had yet been left in possession " of their dominions. Rome had restored to Philip his son (the pledge " of his fidelity) remitted to him the tribute he owed the Republic;
" and suffered him to possess himself of some towns not belonging to " Macedon. He added, that Nabis would have been held in the same " consideration by the Senate, if his own madness first, and then the
" fraudulent artifice of the Ætolians, had not undone him." This latter gave a check to the King's inclination to assist Antiochus. But Æmilius, the Roman admiral and ambassador to him from the Republic, absolutely fixed him in a neutrality, by convincing him, not only that the Romans were more likely to be victorious than Antiochus, but that their friendship was more to be depended upon than his.

Antiochus, disappointed of his hopes of aid from Prusias, and having little confidence in his own land-forces, ordered Polyxenidas to bring to a battle, if possible, the Roman fleet then lying at Samos. For tho' the King had no encouragement from past trials to expect victory; yet, as the Pergamenian squadron and a part of the Rhodian were at this time separated from the Roman, he had now a better chance to succeed than before; and he considered, that could he get the mastery at sea, he should then be able to hinder the Scipios from invading his Asiatic dominions. Polyxenidas encountered the Roman fleet, consisting of eighty ships, off Myonnesus in Ionia. He was totally vanquished. Of eighty nine ships, his whole strength, he lost forty two; the rest escaped to Ephesus. The King, when he heard of this misfortune, impatiently exclaimed, "that some God disconcerted his measures; every thing fell out contrary to his expectation; his enemies were masters of the sea; Hannibal was shut up in a port of Pamphylia; and Philip assisted the Romans to pass into Asia." In his fright, believing it impossible for him to defend places at a distance, he very unadvisedly withdrew the garrison from Lyfsmackia, which might have held out a great while against the Consul's army and retarded his approach. He also evacuated Abydos, which commanded the Hellepont, gathered all his forces about him at Sardis, and sent into Cappadocia for assistance from his son-in-law King Ariarathes.

The Consular army, attended by Eumenes and the Rhodians, passed the Hellepont without opposition. Upon the first advice of their landing in Asia, Antiochus, struck with terror, immediately sent proposals of peace to Scipio, offering to quit his pretensions in Europe, and likewise all the cities in Asia, that were then in alliance with Rome; and to bear half the expence which the Romans had been at, in the war. The Consul insisted on the King's paying the whole expence of the war, his confining himself within mount Taurus, (a chain of mountains which begins towards the West of Lycia, and separates Cilicia from Northern Asia) and his compensating Eumenes for the injuries he had suffered. The ambassador thinking these conditions intolerable, applied himself privately to Scipio Africanus, to whom he had particular instructions to make his court, offering him the restitution of his son (who by some accident had fallen into the hands of the Syrians) and even a partnership with Antiochus in the empire, if he would be content without the title of King. Africanus gave this answer to the ambassador: "I am the less surprized, that you are unacquainted with the character of the Romans, and of me, to whom you are sent; since I find you are ignorant of the fortune and situation of him who sends you. If your master imagined, that an anxiety about the event of the war would engage us to make peace with him, he should by guarding Lyfsmackia have kept us out of the Cberfonesus; or he should have stopt us at the Hellepont. But now, after he has suffered us to pass into Asia, and thereby has received our yoke, he ought to submit to it patiently, and not pretend to treat

VOL. II.

A a a

" with

V. R. 567.
B. C. Chr.
190.
262 C. Chr.

App. in
Syr. p. 105.

Polyb.
Legat. 23.

Liv. B. 37.
c. 36.

Y. R. 563.
Bef. Chr.
179.
262 Conf.

“ with us upon a foot of equality. For my own part, I shall esteem the “ King’s restoring me my son, as the noblest present his munificence “ can make me : his other offers my mind certainly will never need—
“ I pray the Gods, my fortune never may. If Antiochus will be con“ tented with my private acknowledgments for a personal favour, he “ shall ever find me grateful : In my public capacity, I can neither give “ him any thing, nor receive any thing from him. All I can at pre“ sent do for his advantage is, to send him this honest advice : Let him “ desist from the war, and refuse no conditions of peace.”

Antiochus, believing that should he be vanquished, nothing worse would be imposed, than what the Consul had required, turned his thoughts wholly to war. He assembled all his troops, and encamped them not far from Tkazarra in Lydia. Soon after, hearing that Scipio Africanus was fallen sick near Elæa, he generously sent him his son, without ransom. The joy of the Roman, on this occasion, was so great, that it gave a turn to his distemper, and helped to cure him. To the Syrian messengers he spoke thus :
“ Tell the King, I thank him ; I can at present make him no other return, “ except advising him not to hazard a battle till he hears that I am gone
“ to the Roman camp.” Antiochus, in pursuance of this advice, [the meaning of which it is hard to guess] declined fighting, and retired to Magnesia. But the Consul, ambitious perhaps of gaining a victory in the absence of his brother, followed the Syrian so close, and pressed him so hard, that he could not, without discouraging his troops, avoid an engagement. The King’s army consisted of seventy thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse ; the Consul’s of not above thirty thousand men. They came to a battle near Magnesia ; Antiochus lost five and fifty thousand men, including the prisoners ; the Romans not more than three hundred foot and twenty-five horse. Though this victory was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of the King of Pergamus and his brother Attalus, yet Lucius Scipio had so entirely the honour of it, that he acquired the surname of Asiaticus.

And now the King of Syria, eager to procure a peace upon any terms, sent ambassadors to the Roman camp at Sardis, to make his submissions. It was by P. Scipio they made their application to the General. A council, at their request, being called to hear what they had to offer, the chief of them spoke to this effect. “ Our commission is not to “ make proposals, but to know of you, Romans, by what means the “ King may expiate his fault, and obtain of his conquerors forgive-“ nefs and peace. It has always been your practice, with a peculiar “ greatness of mind, to pardon the Kings and nations you have van“ quished ; your present victory, which has made you Lords of the “ world, certainly demands a more illustrious display than ever of that “ magnanimity. Your only care now, having no longer any conten“ tion with mortals, should be to imitate the Gods, in tendering the “ preservation of human kind.”

It had been previously determined by the Council, what answer should be given to these ambassadors, and that Africanus should give it. He is reported to have expressed himself in the following manner: "Of things in the power of the Gods to give, they have bestowed upon us what they think proper: our courage and steadiness, which depend upon our own minds, have been the same in all fortunes. Hannibal could tell you this, if you yourselves did not know it by your own experience. As soon as we crossed the Hellepont, before we saw the King's camp, and when the event of the war was yet doubtful, we insisted upon the same conditions of peace, with which we shall now content ourselves, after victory has declared for us. Antiochus shall give up all his pretensions in Europe; and in Asia, confine himself within mount Taurus: he shall pay us fifteen thousand talents of Eubæa *, for the expences of the war, five hundred down, two thousand five hundred when the Senate and people of Rome shall have confirmed the treaty, and one thousand annually for twelve years; four hundred talents he shall pay to Eumenes, and also the corn that was due to his father. And as the Romans can have no peace where Hannibal is, we, above all, insist upon his being delivered up to us, together with Thoas the Ætolian, Mnasilochus the Acarnanian, Philo and Eubulidas, Chalcidians. For security of the peace we demand twenty hostages whom we shall name. If Antiochus hesitates to accept of these terms, let him reflect, that it is more difficult to reduce a King from the height of power to a middle fortune, than from this to cast him down to the lowest." The ambassadors had orders to refuse no conditions; all were accepted, and the affair concluded: but Hannibal could not be delivered up; for, hearing of the King's defeat at Magnesia, he had escaped out of the Syrian dominions.

Y. R. 563.
Bef. Chr.
189.
262 Conf.

* Two million nine hundred six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds.
Arbuthnot.

C H A P. VII.

A new commotion in Ætolia.

Eumenes comes to Rome, to ask the reward of his services.

The Rhodians oppose his pretensions.

The Ætolians obtain a peace.

The Romans carry the war into Galatia.

The laws of Lycurgus abolished at Lacedæmon.

The affairs of Asia settled by commissioners from Rome.

WHILE the Scipios were thus settling peace in Asia, the Ætolians dispossessed Philip of the greatest part of Albamea, restored it to its rightful king, Arpynder, and made some other conquests in the Macedonian. Rome, upon an embassy from Amynder, confirmed him in the possession of his dominions.

Y. R. 564.
Bef. Chr.
133.
= 53 Cons.

After the election of M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius Fulvius, to the Consulship, ambassadors came from Ætolia to negotiate a peace; but these, instead of addressing the Senate in the manner of suppliants, enumerated their services to the Republic, and talked of their own courage in such a strain as seemed to reproach the Romans with the want of courage. The Senate hereupon directly asked them, whether they would surrender at discretion; to which they not answering any thing, the Fathers ordered them out of the temple, and passed a decree, that they should leave the city that very day, and Italy in a fortnight; adding, that if any ambassadors from Ætolia came to Rome for the future, without the consent of the Roman commander in that country, they should be treated as enemies.

Liv. B. 37.
c. 52. & seq.
Polyb. L. 5.
§ 25.

Presently after, Aurelius Cotta, a messenger, sent by Scipio with the news of his success, arrived at Rome; and with him came Eumenes King of Pergamus, the ambassadors from Antiochus, and some from Rhodes. When Cotta had imparted the news to the Senate, and, by their order, to the people assembled; and when, in consequence of it, supplications and thanksgivings, as usual, had been decreed, the Fathers gave audience to Eumenes. The King having in few words made his compliment of thanks for the succour he had received from them against Antiochus, and congratulated them on their complete victory over the Syrian, added, with a seeming modesty (no uncommon mask of impudence) As to my services to the Republic, I had rather you should hear them from your own Generals than from me. Hereupon the Senate entreated him not to be so over modest, but to prevail upon himself to say what he thought it reasonable the people of Rome should do for him; assuring him, that the Fathers were disposed to recompence his merit to the utmost of their power. To this Eumenes: “Had the option of a reward been given, me from any other quarter, I should gladly have seized the present opportunity of consulting this most august assembly: that thereby I might avoid the danger of seeming to transgress the bounds of modesty and moderation in my desires. Certainly then, since it is you who are to bestow the reward, it becomes me to leave it wholly to your generosity.” Upon this a most extraordinary contest of civility arose; the Senate still urging him to declare his wishes, and he as steadily persisting in his silence on that head. At length, to put an end to the dispute, he withdrew. The Fathers nevertheless directed, that he should be called in again, saying, “that it was absurd to suppose the King ignorant of what he hoped, or what he came to ask; that he knew Asia much better than the Senate, and must know what countries lay convenient for his own kingdom.” Eumenes then said; “I should have still persisted in my silence, Conscrip Fathers, if I did not know that the Rhodian ambassadors are to be presently called in, and that, after:”
“they,

“ they have been heard, I shall be under a necessity of speaking. My “ present task is the more difficult; because what they intend to request “ will seem not only to have no view to my prejudice, but to have none
 “ to their own proper interest: for they will plead the cause of the Greek “ cities, and the justice of setting them at liberty. But if they obtain this,
 “ is it not evident, that they will alienate from us the affections, not only “ of the cities which shall be freed, but even of those that are in our de“ pendence, and have long paid us tribute? The Rhodians, on the other “ hand, having obliged the Greeks by so great a benefit, will, under the “ name of allies, hold them in subjection. Such is the advantage they “ propose to themselves, and yet they will disclaim their having any views “ of interest. They will alledge, that what they sue for is becoming your “ dignity to grant, and agreeable to your constant practice. But you, “ Fathers, are not to be imposed upon by all this. You will not only “ avoid the injustice of depressing too much some of your allies, and “ beyond measure exalting others, but of putting those who have borne “ arms against you into a better condition than your friends and asso“ ciates.” Then, after a pompous enumeration of all the services done by him or any of his family to the Roman name, services which he set forth as unequalled by any thing which any ally of the Republic had ever performed, he thus proceeded: “ But you ask me, what it is “ that I request. Since in obedience to you, Conscript Fathers, I must “ speak, I shall say: That if you have confined Antiochus within “ Mount Taurus, in the intention to keep for yourselves all the country “ between that and the sea, there is no nation whose neighbourhood I “ should more covet, or think a greater security to my kingdom. But “ should it be your resolution to withdraw your armies out of that “ country, and relinquish it, I will venture to affirm, that none of your “ allies is more worthy to possess it than myself. But it is a glorious “ thing to free cities from slavery! I think so indeed, if they have “ committed no hostilities against you: but if they took part with “ Antiochus, how much more becoming your prudence and equity is it, “ to consult the advantage of your well deserving allies, than of your “ enemies?”

It was visible in the countenances of the Senators that they were much pleased with the King, and would reward him amply. When the Rhodian ambassadors came to be heard, the chief of them began by mentioning the long friendship of their state with the Republic, and the services it had done her in her wars with Philip and Antiochus. He then expressed a concern, that he was obliged to oppose the pretensions and demands of Eumenes, a Prince who not only was a friend of Rhodes, but had deserved so well of the Romans in the late war. “ Our respect for the King “ is indeed the only thing which embarrasses us; for, that consideration “ apart, our cause is in no degree difficult for us to maintain, or for “ you

Y. R. 564.
 Bef. Chr.
 188.
 263 Conf.

Y. R. 352.
B. Chr.
133.
see Const.

“ you to determine. Were the case such, that you must either subject “ free cities to the domination of Eumenes, or suffer him to go without “ a sufficient reward of his merit, the matter might perhaps admit of “ doubt and deliberation. But fortune has well provided that you “ should not be reduced to that necessity. Your victory, by the “ bounty of the Gods, is as rich, as it is glorious. Besides the Greek “ colonies, you are thereby become masters of Lycania, the two “ Phrygias, all Pisidia, the Cberfonefus, and the bordering countries ;
“ any one of which is vastly larger than the whole of Eumenes’s “ kingdom. And should you give all these to him, you would “ make him equal to the greatest monarchs. It is easy to enrich “ your allies by the spoils of the war, without departing from your “ own institution. The cause you assigned for your wars with Philip “ and Antiochus was the liberty of the Greeks. Let Barbarians, let “ those to whom a master’s will has always been a law, have Kings ; “ since they delight in Kings : but let the Asiatic Greeks, who have the “ same spirit as the Romans, experience that regard for universal li“ berty, which made you the deliverers of Greece. It may indeed be “ said that these Greek cities declared for Antiochus : And did not “ many of the Greek nations in Europe enter into a league with Philip ?
“ Yet you restored to these their laws and liberties : This is all we “ ask for the Asiatic Greeks. Can you not refuse to Eumenes’s covetous “ ambition, what you denied to your own just revenge ? In this and “ all the wars you have had in Greece and Asia, with what courage and “ fidelity we have assisted, we leave you to judge : In peace, we offer “ you an advice, which if you pursue, the whole world will think the “ use you make of your victory more glorious than the victory itself.”

This discourse seemed Roman, and did not fail to have its effect on the Senate. They determined to send ten Commissioners into the Levant to settle all matters there ; but at the same time pronounced in general, that Lycania, the two Phrygias, and the two Mysias, should for the future be subject to Eumenes. Lycia, that part of Caria which was next to Rhodes, and the country lying towards Pisidia they adjudged to the Rhodians. In both these dispositions were excepted the Greek cities which had paid tribute to Antiochus, and taken part with the Romans in the war. These were to be free. As for the Syrian ambassadors, they had no business at Rome, but to get the peace approved ; and this was done.

After dispatching these affairs, Fulvius and Manlius left the city. The first sailed for Greece, to reduce the Ætolians ; the second to Asia ; whence, Scipio, having delivered up the command of the army to him, returned to Rome, and was there honoured with a triumph.

Li. B. 33.
c. 3.

Fulvius landed at Apollonia, and began his campaign by laying siege to Ambracia, a considerable city on the borders of Epirus. It was in the hands hands of the Ætolians, and vigorously defended by them; but they at length capitulated. And then the Ætolian nation, with Fulvius's leave, sent to Rome to solicit a peace. The Senate at first would hardly hear the entreaties of their ambassadors. Some Athenian deputies who appeared in their behalf were more favourably received. These had an eloquent man named Damis at their head. He confessed, that the Romans had reason to be angry with the Ætolians, who, for great benefits received, had not made a suitable return; but to charge this ingratitude upon the body of the nation, this, he said, was contrary to reason and truth. “In all states the multitude are like the sea. In its natural situation the sea is always smooth and calm, and perfectly safe to those who embark upon it; but when it comes to be ruffled and agitated by impetuous winds and storms, nothing is more raging and terrible. Thus the Ætolians, while in their natural state, and uninfluenced from abroad, were of all the Greeks the most tractable, and best inclined to the Roman people; but when a boisterous Tboas and a Dicæarchus, from Asia, a Meneftas and a Democritus, in Europe, began to blow, then were the multitude put into a commotion; they were hurried on to speak and to act in a manner unlike themselves. To the authors then of these mischiefs and disturbances, be inexorable, Conscript Fathers; but spare the multitude, and receive them again into favour. Let them now owe their preservation to your clemency. This, added to all your former benefits, will fix them for ever in affection and fidelity to Rome.” The Senate granted the Ætolians a peace, but upon terms that put them in a worse condition than any of the states of Greece, though they had been the first that brought the Romans into that country.

Y. R. 564.
Bef. Chr.
188.
263 Conf.

During these transactions, the Consul Manlius in Asia marched against the Gallo-Greeks (or Galatians) to take revenge for the assistance they had given Antiochus in the late war. They were originally Gauls, who, in the time of Brennus, after various adventures, passing through Thrace had entered Asia, and settled in an inland country beyond Caria and Phrygia. The Consul was assisted in his long march by Seleucus the King of Syria's son, and by Attalus the brother of Eumenes; and he drew considerable contributions from the petty Kings through whose countries he passed, and who came to pay him homage. The Galatians upon his approach forsook their towns and cities, and retired to the tops of high mountains with their effects and provisions. He vanquished the several nations of them (the Tolistoboi, Tetlosagi and Trocmi) successively, and reduced them to sue for peace. He would not treat with them upon the spot, but made them send their deputies to Ephesus, whither he retired with his army; and thither likewise repaired the ambassadors of all the Princes of Asia with presents and submissions.

Liv. B. 36.
c. 12.

Liv. B. 33.
c. 19.

Y. R. 565.
Bef. Chr.
187.
264 Conf.

IN Italy M. Valerius Messala, one of the Consuls chosen for the new year, was ordered to Pisa to watch the motions of the Ligurians, who had

Liv. B. 38.
c. 55.

Y. R. 563.
B. C. 171.
171.
212 C. 171.

had committed some recent hostilities against the Romans: and C. Livius Salinator, the other Consul, had Gaul decreed him for his province. Fulvius and Minlius were continued in their respective commands as Pro-Consuls. Q. Fabius Labeo, the Roman Admiral, had at this time a triumph granted him for only recovering from the Cretans four thousand Roman slaves; though he had fought no battle to rescue them, and they had been delivered up to him, as soon as he appeared off the island with his fleet, and demanded them. By a Census taken this year, the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms, amounted to two hundred fifty eight thousand three hundred and eight.

1 B. 37.
171.

To return to the affairs of Greece. Fulvius had in his Consulship taken possession of the island of Cephalonia, which the Romans had reserved to themselves in their treaty with Ætolia, and which was a very convenient acquisition, as opening a way, for their legions, into Peloponnesus; from which it was but about twenty four miles distant. Some differences now happening between the Acheans and Lacedæmonians, Fulvius, judging the matter to be of great importance, thought proper to refer it to the Senate. The Conscript Fathers passed an ambiguous decree, which each party might interpret in its own favour; and this occasioned the two Republics to begin hostilities. Philopæmen, who commanded the Acheans, led his army to Lacedæmon, and by some acts of severity, so terrified the Lacedæmonians, that they became servilely submissive. At his command they demolished their walls, renounced the laws of Lycurgus, which they had observed seven hundred years, and subjected themselves to those of Achaia.

P. 563. Le.
171.
L. 171. B. 37.
171.

Then ten commissioners appointed by the Republic to settle the affairs of Asia landed at Ephesus with King Eumenes. From thence they went to Sigama, where the Pro-Consul Manlius met them; and they all together put the last hand to the treaty with Antiochus. Besides the articles formerly mentioned, it contained, that the King should deliver up all his long ships; that for the future he should have no more than ten armed galleys; that he should not sail beyond the promontory of Calchednus, unless to carry to Rome ambassadors, hostages or tribute; that he should deliver up all his elephants, and never train any more of those animals. Among the hostages demanded, the King's son, Antiochus, was one. Then they settled the bounds of the dominions of Eumenes and the Phœnicians. Lycia and Caria to the river Meander, except the town of Teimeſus, were given to the latter; Lyſimachia with the Chersonesus in Europe, the two Phrygiæ's, both the Myſias, Lycaonia, with Ephesus, Telmissus, and other towns in Asia to the former: The Romans reserved no part of the conquered countries for themselves. They were satisfied, for the present, with having extended the glory of their name and the terror of their arms, and with the immente spoils in gold, silver and rich moveables which they carried from Asia.

When

When Manlius and his army had crossed the Hellipont in their way home, they were attacked by a body of ten thousand Thracians, in a narrow pass, in a wood, where the Romans could not form themselves in order of battle. This danger escaped, yet with the loss of great part of the spoil, they continued their march through Thessaly and Epirus, and at length arrived at Apollonia, where they were to embark; but the season being now far advanced, the Pro-Consul passed the winter there.

In the mean time M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius having succeeded to the Consulate, would fain have passed into Greece and Asia; but as these countries were now quiet [and had lately been pretty well plundered] the Senate insisted upon their going to those places where the Republic had yet enemies to subdue; and obliged them both to march against the Ligurians. The Consuls obeyed, and, by the success they met with, pacified all between Etruria and the Alps.

At length Manlius arrived from Apollonia, and demanded a triumph of the Senate assembled in the temple of Bellona. His request met with opposition from some of the ten commissioners, who had been sent into Asia. They objected, that he had not only undertaken his expedition against the Galatians without the orders of the Republic, but had carried on the war more like a robber than a Roman Consul; and that his victories were too easy to merit any reward. They taxed him also with want of conduct, for suffering the Thracians to rob him in his return home*. Manlius pleaded, that the Gauls in Asia having assisted Antiochus, were proper objects of the resentment of the Romans; mentioned the battles he had won; and excused as well as he could his disaster in Thrace. After a long debate the assembly decree him a triumph.

*Y. P. 166.
Rom. Cons.
179.
265 Cons.
Liv. P. 28.
C. 42.*

C. 45.

C H A P. VIII.

Scipio Africanus arraigned before the Roman people.

Scipio Asiaticus arraigned and condemned.

THE present year was made very remarkable by the public prosecution of two men, whose eminent services to their country, it might naturally be thought, would have preserved them from any open attacks upon their fame or fortune. Scipio Africanus and his brother Asiaticus were successively accused before the people of taking bribes from Antiochus, and embezzling the public money.

* Livy makes one of the accusations against Manlius to have been his having formed a design to lead his army over mount Taurus, the total boundary of the Roman empire, as it was then called, on account of some verses in the Sybilline oracles, threatening slaughter and destruction to those Roman armies which should pass that limit.

Y. R. 565.
Bef. Chr.
136.
265 Cons.

Ann. Gall.
B. 4. c. 13.

At the instigation of Cato, as some authors report, two Tribunes, both of the name of Petilius, moved in the Senate, that Africanus might be obliged to give an account of all the money received from the King of Syrina, and of the spoil taken in that war. Scipio rising up and drawing a book out of his bosom, In this, said he, is contained an exact account of all you want to know; of all the money, and all the spoil. “Read it aloud.” Then, said the Tribunes, and let it afterwards be deposited in the treasury.” No, replied Scipio, that I will not do. I shall not put such an affront upon myself: and instantly he tore the book to pieces before their eyes.

L. v. B. 19.
c. 13.
25.

After this, a tribune named M. Nevius cited him to answer before the people to the accusations above mentioned. The prosecution of this great man was variously judged of. Some thought it an instance of the most shameful ingratitude, and more detestable than that of the Carthaginians in banishing Hannibal. Others said, that no citizen, how eminent soever, ought to be considered as above the laws, or too worthy to be accountable. “What man can safely be trusted with any thing, not to say with the public administration, if he is not to be answerable for his conduct? Force can be no injustice against him who will not endure a fair trial.”

Ann. Gall.
B. 4. c. 13.
L. 13. that all agree that Scipio took these words.

Nevius had no direct proof of his charge. He supported it only by surmises and presumptions. He took notice, that Scipio's son had been restored to him by Antiochus without ransom; adding, that the Syrion had paid court to him, as if peace or war with Rome depended upon him alone: that Scipio had acted more like a Dictator than a Lieutenant to his brother the Consul; and had gone into Asia with no other view, but to persuade the Greeks and all the eastern nations (as he had formerly done the Gauls, Spaniards, Sicilians, and Africans) that one man was the pillar and support of the Roman empire; that Rome, the mistress of the world, lay in shelter under the shadow of Scipio, and that his nods had succeeded to the decrees of the Senate, and the commands of the people. The Tribune also revived the old accusations relating to his luxury at Syracuse, and the affair of Pleminius. Scipio disdained to answer. It happened to be the anniversary of the battle of Zama. After saying something in general of his merit and services, he thus continued: On this day, Romans, I conquered Hannibal and the Carthaginians. Ill would it become us to spend it in wranglings and contention. Let us not be ungrateful to the Gods. Let us leave this rascal here, and go to the capitol; there to return thanks to the great Jupiter, for that victory and peace, which, beyond all expectation, I procured for the Republic. Instantly the tribes began to move; and the whole assembly followed him, except the Tribune himself and the public crier.

Scipio, notwithstanding this memorable triumph over his accuser Nevius, was again cited by the two Petiliuses, to answer to the same accusations.

accusations. It is not improbable that the tearing his accounts furnished his enemies with the chief advantage they had against him. He now gave way to the storm, and retired to Liternum, not far from Naples. L. Scipio appeared for him, and said, that he was sick; an excuse which did not satisfy his accusers: they were going on to get him condemned by default, when some of the Tribunes, at the entreaty of L. Scipio, interposed, and obtained to have a new day named for the trial. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes, who had been always an avowed enemy of the Scipios, but was a man of great probity, would not suffer his name to be added to those of his colleagues in the decree. He declared, that he not only thought Scipio's excuse sufficient, but, if he came to Rome and asked his assistance, would put an end to the process. He added, “P. Scipio by his exploits, the honours conferred on him by the Republic, the consent of Gods and men, is raised to such a height, that to make him stand as a criminal before the Rostra, and bear the reproaches and insults of young men, is a greater dishonour to the Roman people than to him. Will no merit, no dignities ever procure a sanctuary for great men, where their old age, if not revered, may at least be inviolate?” This unexpected declaration from an old enemy of the Scipios had a great effect on the multitude, and even on the accusers themselves; who said they would take time to consider what was fit for them to do. The Senate presently after assembled, and ordered thanks to be returned to Tib. Gracchus for having made his private resentment give way to the public good. The prosecution was dropt. Africanus, without any desire of returning to Rome, spent the remainder of his days at Liternum; and there, at his death, he ordered his body to be buried^a.

Scipio Asiaticus stood his trial, and was condemned, together with one of his Lieutenants and his Quæstor, as guilty all three of having defrauded the treasury of great sums of money, received by them in Asia for the public account. The Lieutenant and the Quæstor gave security to pay what was judged to be due from them; Scipio refused to give bail, still insisting, that he had accounted for all he had received. They were going to lead him to prison, when Tib. Gracchus interposed. He said, he would not indeed hinder the proper officer from raising the money^b out of Scipio's effects, but would never suffer a Roman General

Y. R. 566.
Bef. Chr.
186.
265 Conf.

^a It is not certainly known when he died, and Livy, who tells the story of the trial more amply than it is related above, says, that authors so differ about the circumstances of the prosecution, that he knows not what to believe. In these particulars, however, most of them agree: That Scipio was publicly prosecuted, that he tore his book of accounts, that he disdained to answer at his trial, that he carried away the people to the capitol, that he was afterwards cited again, and that he then retired.

It is also uncertain which of the brothers was first prosecuted.

^b Livy thinks it amounted to four millions of the smaller sesterces, which, according to Arbutnot, make, of our money, 32,291*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and says, that Antias must be mistaken when he makes amount to fifty times that sum.

Y. R. 566.
Ecl. Con.
155.
265 C. 26.

ALL C. 26.
B. 1. 1. 19.

Y. R. 567.
Ecl. Con.
155.
265 C. 26.

L. P. 12.
C. 3. 2. 15.

to be thrown into the same prison in which the Generals of the enemy taken by him in battle, had been confined. His effects being seized and appraised, were not found to be of value sufficient to pay the sum in question; nor was there any thing amongst them which could be deemed to have been brought from Asia. The friends and relations of Asinius would, by presents, have more than made up his loss, but he refused to accept of any thing beyond bare necessities. In return for the generous part Gracchus had acted, the Scipios gave him in marriage Cornelia the daughter of Africanus.

The Consulship of Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Marcus Philippus was chiefly spent in suppressing and punishing a monstrous society of debauchees, which had been formed at Rome under the name of Bacchanalia. In the end of the year Marcus was defeated by the Ligurians, and lost four thousand of his men.

CHAP. IX.

The Roman Senate send two commissioners secretly into Macedonia to take cognizance of Philip's proceedings. The Commissioners treat him badly. The Romans exercise a tyrannic power in Achæia. Lycertus, Leader of the State, renounces against it in vain; and the Achæians through fear submit.

Y. R. 48.
Ecl. Con.
155.
265 C. 26.

Y. R. 48.
Ecl. Con.
155.
265 C. 26.

Y. R. 48.
Ecl. Con.
155.
265 C. 26.

IN the beginning of the Consulship of Appius Claudius Pulcher and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, three Commissioners, the chief of whom was Q. Cælius Metellus, were sent into Greece to terminate certain disputes of the King of Macedon with the King of Pergamus and some states of Greece.

Philip, since his peace with Rome, had neglected nothing to strengthen himself against a new war, whenever it should be unavoidable. He had increased his revenues by promoting trade, and by the profits of his mines, in which he employed a great number of men. To recruit his people, exhausted by the late wars, he not only encouraged marriages and the bringing up of children, but transplanted into Macedon a great multitude of Italians. These being strangers to the Romans, and therefore not intimidated by them, he settled them in some towns on the sea coast, charging the former inhabitants to remove into Emathia, anciently called Paonia. After the victory over Nimæolus in Greece, the Consul Arrius had permitted the Macedonians to make war upon Illyria and the Atabarians, and to lay siege to those towns in Thessaly and Perthetia which belonged to the Illyrians. Philip easily expelled Argæander and took several towns in Thessaly, and Perthetia, and among the rest Demetrias. He also laid upon some places in Thrace. The Romans, always jealous of his his power, had constantly watched his motions and had given him several mortifications. By the treaty of peace concluded between him and T. Flaminius, it had been referred to the determination of the Senate, whether certain towns of Macedon which had revolted from the King, during the time of a truce with the Romans, should be restored to him; and the Fathers had given sentence against him. They had also confirmed Amynder in the possession of great part of his dominions which the Ætolians had recovered from the Macedonian. And now Amynder claimed the rest of his towns. The Thessalians and Perrhæbians likewise demanded back theirs; alledging, that though Philip had taken them from the Ætolians, yet these had only usurped them. Some of the complainants broke out into harsh invectives against the King; which he answered with heat and haughtiness. The Roman Commissioners finished the whole affair by a short decree, That Philip should withdraw his garriſons from all the places in question, and confine himself, on that side, within the ancient bounds of the kingdom of Macedon.

Y. R. 468.
B. C. 184.
267. Conf.

Liv. B. 32.
c. 23.

c. 25. & c.

Then they removed to Thessalonica, to hear the complaints of the ambassadors from Eumenes King of Pergamus, who pretended that the cities of Maronea and Ænus, now possessed by Philip, of right belonged to their master; because by their nearness they seemed appendages of Cerſyreia and Insulæchia, which he had received, by grant from the Senate of Rome. The Maronites also complained, that their town had been seized by the Macedonian, and that his soldiers tyrannized in the place. Philip answered in a manner that was not expected. "It is not with the " Maronites and Eumenes only that I have a controversy, but with you,
" also, Romans, from whom I have long observed that I can obtain no
" justice. Some cities of Macedon had revolted from me during a truce;
" I thought it but just that these should be restored to me; not that " they would have made any great addition to my kingdom (for they " are but small towns, and situated on the extremities of it) but such an " example might have had very ill consequences with regard to my other " subjects. Yet this you denied me. In the Ætolian war I was desired
" by the Consul Acilius to besiege Lamia. After many fatigues and en" counters, when I was upon the point of scaling the walls, and taking
" the town, Acilius forced me to withdraw my troops. As some com" pensation for this injury, I was permitted to recover a few castles (as " they should be called, rather than towns) of Thessaly, Perrhæbia, and
" Ætolia. These you took from me a few days ago.

" Eumenes's ambassadors just now mentioned it as a truth beyond all
" dispute, that it is more equitable to give what Antiochus formerly " held, to their master, than to me. I am quite of another opinion,
" Eumenes could not have held his kingdom, not only if you had not " been victorious, but if you had not made war upon Antiochus. Eu- " menes is therefore obliged to you, not you to him. But so little was " any part of my kingdom in danger from the Syrian, that he volunta-

1 " rily

Y. R. 567.
 1st Cons.
 173.

“ rily offered me, as the price of an alliance, three thousand talents, “ fifty ships of war, and all the Greek cities which I had formerly held.
 “ These offers I rejected: nor did I dissemble my being an enemy to “ him, even before Attilius led your army into Greece. After the Con-“ sul’s arrival, I conducted whatever part of the war he committed to “ me; and when Scipio marched his forces by land to the Hellepont,
 “ I not only gave him a safe passage through my dominions, but made “ good roads for him, built bridges, and supplied him with provisions.
 “ Not contented with this, I took the same care of his passage through “ Thrace, where, besides other things, I had to guard against his being “ attacked by the Barbarians. For this my zeal, not to call it merit, “ ought you not rather to have added something to my kingdom, and “ amplified it by your munificence, than (as you now do) to take from “ me what I already possess, either in my own right, or by your favour?
 “ The cities of Macedon, which you own to have been justly mine,
 “ are not restored. Eumenes comes to spoil me, as he did Antiochus;
 “ and to cover a most impudent falsehood, cites the decree of the ten “ Commissioners, than which decree nothing can be a clearer confuta-“ tion of his pretensions. It is there indeed plainly and expressly said, “ that the Cbesonejus and Lyfmacchia are given to Eumenes. But where is “ there any mention made of Enes, Maronea and the cities of Thrace?
 “ What he did not dare so much as to ask of the Commissioners, “ shall he obtain from you, as in consequence of a grant from them?
 “ Upon what footing am I to be for the future? If you propose to “ pursue me as an enemy, go on, as you have begun; but if you have “ any regard for me as a King in friendship and alliance with you, I beg “ you would not offer me so great an indignity.”

The ambassadors are said to have been moved with the King’s discourie; to which they made this perplexed answer. “ If the cities in “ question have been given to Eumenes by the decree of the ten Com“ missioners, we will change nothing in that disposition. If Philip has “ taken them in war, he shall hold them as the reward of victory. If “ neither of these be true, the cognizance of the affair shall be referred “ to the Senate of Rome; and in the mean time Philip shall withdraw his “ garrisons, that things may be upon an equal footing between the two “ parties.”

To this harsh treatment of Philip by the Romans, Livy imputes that war, which his son Perjes afterwards made against them, and which he received as it were by legacy from his father.

Y. R. 569.
 2d Cons.
 175.

The Roman Commissioners from Macedon went into Acbaia, from whence, much dissatisfied with the Achaëans, they returned to Rome (where P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Porcius Licinus had been chosen Consuls for the new year.) They gave an account of their negotiation to the Senate, and at the same time introduced the ambassadors of Philip and Eumenes, and also those from the Thessalians, Lacedæmonians and Achaëans.
 It

It was nothing but a repetition of the same complaints and same answers that had been made in Greece. The Senate appointed a new commission, at the head of which was Appius Claudius, to go into Macedon and Greece, and examine whether the Theffalians and Perrhæbians were put into possession of those towns which Philip had promised to deliver up to them; and to order him to evacuate Ænos, Maronea, and all the places he held on the sea coast of Thrace. They were also directed to go into Peloponnesus, where the former Commissioners had not done any thing, because it had been refused to convene a council to give them audience. Of this refusal Q. Cecilius, the head of that commission, complained heavily. The ambassadors from Lacedæmon also made complaints of the Achaëans; of which more hereafter. As to Cecilius's charge, the Achaean ministers excused themselves by citing a law which forbade summoning a Diet, unless on occasion of peace or war, or when ambassadors came from the Senate with letters or written orders. That they might never more make this excuse, the Senate gave them to understand, that as they, whenever they would, might have an audience of the Fathers at Rome, it was fitting that Roman ambassadors should meet with the like respect in Achaia.

Y. R. 569.
Bef. Chr.
187.
268 Conf.

Liv. B. 39.
c. 33.

Polybius
Legat. 42.
42.

When Philip, on the return of his ambassadors, had learnt from them, that he must absolutely evacuate Ænos and Maronea, he took council of his passions, and remembering that the Maronites had behaved themselves insolently, when they pleaded against him for their liberty, he gave orders to Onomastus, his Lieutenant for the guard of the sea coast, to take such measures as might make them repent of their desire of freedom. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the King's officers, who had long dwelt at Maronea, to let in a body of Thracians by night, that they might sack the town and exercise in it all cruelties of war. This was done, but so resented by the Roman ambassadors, who had better intelligence of these proceedings than could have been imagined, that they directly charged the King with the crime; which, they said, was no less an insult on the Roman people, who had undertaken the protection of the Maronites, than a cruelty to the innocent sufferers. Philip denied his having had any share in the bloody act, and laid it upon the Maronites themselves; affirming that they in the heat of their factions and quarrels (some being inclinable to him, others to Eumenes) had cut one another's throats. Nay he made no scruple to propose to the ambassadors to examine the Maronites themselves; as well knowing, that they, terrified by the late execution of his vengeance, durst not accuse him; because he would still be in their neighbourhood, and the Romans not near enough to protect them. Appius Claudius answered, that it was needless to make enquiries about a thing already known; that he was well informed of what had been done, and by whom; and if the King would clear himself, he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined

Polybius
Legat. 44.
Liv. B. 39.
c. 34.

Y. R. 569
E. R. C. 12.
183.
268 C. 12.

examined by the Senate. Philip at this changed colour, and was confounded; yet recovering himself, he said, that Calpurnius should be at their disposition: but as to Quintus, who had not been at Merone, nor near it at the time of the slaughter, he refused to give him up. His true reason was, that he feared lest a man, who had been much in his confidence, and whom he had employed in many such execrable commissions, might reveal other secrets to the Senate besides what regarded the Maronites: And that Calpurnius might tell no tales, he took care to have him poisoned in his way to Italy. The Roman ambassadors at their departure let the King plainly see that they were dissatisfied with his conduct: He began to fear that he should have a war to sustain before he was sufficiently prepared for it. To gain time, he resolved to employ his younger son Demetrius as his ambassador to the Senate; with whom the young prince had acquired much favour when he was a hostage in Rome.

Liv. B. 39.
C. 35.

The same ambassadors who had been with Philip, made their progress through the rest of Greece, and took cognizance of the complaints of some banished Lacedæmonians against the Acheans, for having beat down the walls of Lacedæmon, slaughtered many of the citizens, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus. To these accusations Lycortas the father of Polibi the historian, Prætor of Acadæa, answered, That the complainants were notoriously the very men who had committed the murders they complained of: that as to throwing down the walls of Lacedæmon, it was perfectly agreeable to Lycurgus's institution, who had forbid his citizens all kinds of fortification: that the tyrants of Lacedæmon, who built those walls, had in effect abolished the ordinances of Lycurgus, governing the city by their own lawless will; and that the Acheans, not knowing any better laws than their own, had communicated them to the Lacedæmonians, whom they found in reality without laws or any tolerable polity, and had associated to the other states of Peloponnesus.

• See p.
324

He concluded with words to this effect: “The Acheans, being “ friends and faithful allies of Rome, think it strange to see themselves “ thus compelled to give an account of their actions, as vassals and slaves “ to the Roman people. If the voice of Flaminius's * herald was not “ an empty sound, why might not we as well enquire about your pro“ ceedings at Capua, as you take cognizance of what we have done at “ Lacedæmon. You will say, perhaps, that, by the league between us, “ we are only in appearance free; in reality, subject to Rome. I am “ sensible of it, Appius; and, if I must not, I will not be angry. But I “ beseech you, whatever distance there be between the Romans and Ache- “ ans, let not us your allies be upon the same, not to say a worse foot with “ you than enemies; your enemies and ours. That the Lacedæmonians “ might be upon an equality with us, we gave them our own laws, and “ made

“ made them a part of the Achaean body. The vanquished, not content with the laws and privileges which satisfy the victors, would have us violate compacts that have been confirmed by the most solemn oaths. No, Romans, we honour you, and, if you will, we fear you too; but we reverence more, we dread more, the immortal Gods.” Appius had little to reply, and was therefore very brief. Thinking it no time for gentle management, he only advised the Diet, “ by a ready compliance to merit favour, while they might, and not to wait till they were compelled to obedience.” The assembly heard this imperious language with inward rage; yet, fear prevailing, they only desired that the Romans would themselves make what change they pleased with regard to the Lacedaemonians, and not force the Achaens, by any act of their own, sacrilegiously to break their oaths.

V. R. 669.
B.C. Chr.
137.
268 Conf.

C H A P. X.

*Cato chose Censor against the inclination of the nobles.
His conduct in that Office.*

THERE happened, this year, a remarkable struggle, amongst the great men of Rome, for the office of Censor. Cato being one of the candidates, the nobles, who not only envied him as a new man, but dreaded his severity, set up against him seven powerful competitors. Valerius Flaccus, who had introduced him into public life, and had been his colleague in the consulship, was a ninth candidate; and these two united their interests. On this occasion Cato, far from employing soft words to the people, or giving hopes of gentleness and complaisance in the execution of the office, loudly declared from the rostra, with a threatening look and voice: “ That the times required firm and vigorous magistrates to put a stop to that growing luxury which menaced the Republic with ruin; Censors, who would cut up the evil by the roots, and restore the rigour of ancient discipline.” It is to the honour of the people of Rome, that, notwithstanding these terrible intimations, they preferred him to all his competitors, who courted them by promises of a mild and easy administration: The Comitia also appointed his friend Valerius to be his colleague, without whom, he had declared, that he could not hope to compass the reformations he had in view.

Liv. B. 39.
c. 40. & seq.
Plut. life
of Cato.

Cato's merit upon the whole was superior to that of any of the great men who stood against him. He was temperate, brave and indefatigable, frugal of the public money, and not to be corrupted. There is scarce any talent requisite for public or private life which he had not received from nature, or by industry acquired. He was a great soldier, an

Y. R. 569.
Bef. Chr.
183.
258 Cons.

able statesman, an eloquent orator, a learned historian, and very knowing in rural affairs. Yet with all these accomplishments, he had great faults. His ambition being poisoned with envy, disturbed both his own peace and that of the whole city as long as he lived. Though he would not take bribes, he was unmerciful and unconscionable in amassing wealth, by all such methods, as the law did not punish. It was one of his sayings, according to Plutarch, that "the man the most to be admired, the most glorious, the most divine, was he, at whose death it appeared by his accounts, that he had added more to his patrimony than the whole value of it."

The first act of Cato in his new office, was naming his colleague to be Prince of the Senate; after which the Censors struck out of the list of the Senators the names of seven persons; among whom was Lucius, the brother of T. Flamininus. Lucius, when Consul and commanding in Gaul, had with his own hand murdered a Boian of distinction, a deserter to the Romans; and he had committed this murder purely to gratify the curiosity of his pathic, a young Carthaginian, who, longing to see somebody die a violent death, had reproached the general for bringing him away from Rome just when there was going to be a fight of gladiators.

Titus Flamininus, full of indignation at the dishonour done to his brother, brought the affair before the people; and insisted upon Cato's giving the reason of his proceeding. The Censor related the story; and, when Lucius denied the fact, put him to his oath: The accused refusing to swear, was deemed guilty, and Cato's censure approved. Yet he greatly hurt his own character when, at the review of the knights, he took away the horse of Scipio Asiaticus; this act being by every body ascribed to a malicious desire of insulting the memory of Africanus.

But no part of the Censor's conduct seemed so cruel to the nobles and their wives, as the taxes he laid upon luxury in all its branches; dress, household furniture, womens toilets, chariots, slaves and equipage*. The people however in general were pleased with his regulations, inasmuch that they ordered a statue to be^b erected to his honour in the temple of Health, with an inscription that mentioned nothing of his victories or triumph, but imported only, that by his wise ordinances in his censorship he had reformed the manners of the republic.

* These articles were all taxed at three per cent. of the real value.

^b Plutarch relates, that before this, upon some of Cato's friends expressing to him their surprise, that, while many persons wish-out merit or reputation had statues, he had none; he answered, "I had much rather it should be asked, why the people have not erected a statue to Cato, than why they have."

C H A P. XI.

Complaints brought to Rome from Greece and Asia against Philip of Macedon.

The Senate make a decree in relation to a dispute between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians.

The death of Philopœmen.

The death of Hannibal.

WHEN it was universally known that the Conscript Fathers would receive accusations against the King of Macedon, from whatever quarter they should come ; the city, in a short time, swarmed with ambassadors from the numerous states of Greece. King Eumenes, who never wanted matter of invective against Philip, sent ministers to Rome without delay. And even some private men went thither with complaints of personal injuries. After the several complainants had delivered themselves in the Senate, it lay upon Demetrius, now ambassador from his father, to answer all. The Senators, considering his youth, and how unequal he was to the task of disputing with so many artful wranglers ; and observing also how much he was embarrassed (as indeed were they themselves) by the abundance and variety of the matters objected, asked him, Whether his father had not furnished him with some notes to help his memory ? and, he owning that he had a little book for that purpose, they desired him to read aloud what it contained in relation to the points in question. The truth was, they had no desire to hear the son declaim, but to find out with certainty what the father thought and intended : And thus much the memorial discovered ; That the King was excessively piqued : For up and down in it were scattered such expressions as these : Although Cæcilius and the other ambassadors did not deal fairly by me in this business—Although this was unjustly given against me—Notwithstanding the ill treatment and the insults I have undeservedly met with on all hands—

Demetrius excused, as well as he could, whatever facts had given offence, and were not to be denied ; promising an exact conformity for the future, to the good pleasure of the Senate. The fathers answered : “ That Philip “ could not have done any thing more prudent, or more agreeable to “ them, than sending his son Demetrius to make his apology : That “ they could overlook, forget, bear with many past provocations ; and “ believed they might confide in Demetrius’s promises : That though he “ was returning into Macedon, his heart, they knew, would remain with “ them as a hostage ; and that, as far as was consistent with filial piety, “ he would always be a friend to the Roman people : That out of regard

C c c 2

“ to

Q. FABIVS LABEO and
M. CLAV-DIUS MARCELL-VS, Consuls.
Y. R. 570.
Bef. Chr.
182.
269 Cons.

Polyb. Le-
gat. 46.
Liv. B. 39.
c. 46.

Y. R. 570.
Ref. Chr.
182.
189 Cons.

“ to him they would send ambassadors into Macedon to set to rights, in “ an easy and amicable manner, whatever had been done amiss; and for “ their so doing, they would have Philip sensible, that he was indebted to “ his son Demetrius.”

The dispute between the Lacedæmonians and the Acheans was the next affair that came under the deliberation of the Senate; and they pronounced a decree to the following effect: That those of the Lacedæmonians, who had been sentenced to death by the Acheans, had been unjustly condemned; and that the banished should be restored; but that Lacedæmon should remain a member of the Achean body.

I. 3. 14.
p. 47. 2.
Excerpt. 2p.
Vale.

Q. Marcius, appointed ambassador to the court of Macedon, had orders to go also into Peloponnesus, not only to put in execution what was now decreed, but to take cognizance of some new commotions there, occasioned by the Messenians breaking off from the Achean association, and setting up for an independent state. One Dinocrates was come to Rome to solicit their cause. This man having learnt that T. Flamininus, named ambassador to Bitynia, would in his way thither pass through Greece, applied himself to him; who being an inveterate enemy of Philopæmen, was easily engaged in the interest of the Messenians. Dinocrates imagined he had now gained his point, and he accompanied the Roman to Naupætus: whence as soon as they landed, Flamininus wrote to the Prætor Philopæmen and other principal magistrates of Achaia, to convoke a Diet. The magistrates, knowing that Flamininus had no commission from the Senate in relation to the affairs of Greece, returned answer, “ That they would do as he desired, if by letter, he would “ signify what the business was which he had to lay before the assembly;
“ an intimation of it to the people, previous to their meeting, being
“ by the laws absolutely necessary.” The Roman not thinking it advisable to put his business in writing, all the high expectations of Dinocrates and the Messenians fell to the ground.

Liv. B. 39.
c. 45.

Soon after, Philopæmen, having levied such forces as in haste he could, marched against the Messenians, who, under the conduct of Dinocrates, had begun hostilities. In a skirmish which ensued, and while the Achean General gallantly exposed his person, to secure the retreat of his men, overpowered by numbers, he was, by the falling of his horse, thrown to the ground, and taken prisoner. The enemy carried him bound to Messene, and there shortly after put him to death.

This

Liv. B. 39.
c. 46, 50.
Phil. Sic of Philo-pæmen.

“ When Philopæmen was brought prisoner to Messene, the multitude, pitying the misfortune of so great a man, and remembering with gratitude some good offices he had formerly done their city, and also thinking that by his means an end might be put to the present war, universally inclined to spare him. But Dinocrates and his party, the authors of the revolt, and who had the government in their hands, hurried him out of sight of the people, under pretence of asking him some questions relating to the present state of things. And not daring to trust him in the custody of any one man,

This year is said by some authors to have been remarkable for the death of three most illustrious Generals, Scipio, Philopæmen, and Hannibal. But Livy contends, that Scipio must have been dead at the ^b time when Cato entered on his censorship; because this Censor named his colleague Valerius to be President of the Senate, a dignity which Scipio Africanus had held for the three preceding lustra, and of which he would not have been deprived during his life, without being expelled the Senate; and of such expulsion there is not the least hint in any author.

Y. R. 570.
Bef. Chr.
182.
269 Conf.

As to Hannibal, it has been before observed, that Antiochus covenanted with the Romans to deliver him up, but was prevented by his flight into Crete; whence he afterwards went into Bithynia, to King Prusias, and did him eminent service in his wars. It has been also mentioned, that the Senate employed Flamininus on an embassy to Prusias. The pretence for it was, to make him desist from hostilities against the King of Pergamus; but it seems probable, that the chief business of Flamininus was to terrify the Bithynian into a base betraying of his Carthaginian guest^c. Prusias, if we may believe Plutarch, earnestly entreated the Roman ambassador not to press him to so dishonourable an action: But Livy tells us, that the cowardly King complied upon the first demand. Hannibal, well acquainted with Prusias's character, had in the castle of Libyssa, where he resided, formed certain subterraneous passages, whereby to make his escape in case of danger. Word being brought him, that the castle was surrounded by soldiers, he had recourse to his passages. When he found that the issues of these were also beset, he did not hesitate a moment in preferring death to captivity. Taking into his hand a ^d poison which he had long

Justin. B.
32. c. 4.
Plut. life of Flamin.

man, even for a night, they put him down, fast bound, into a kind of vault or cavern, where they used to keep their treasure in time of war, and the mouth of which they covered with a great stone moved by an engine. Philopæmen, now 70 years of age, just recovered from a long illness, and grievously wounded in the head by his fall when taken prisoner, lay in this place, without light and without air, while his enemies were debating what to do with him. The fear they had of his resentment, should he be set at liberty, made them determine to put him to death without delay; for which purpose they let down the executioner into the vault. Philopæmen was lying stretched upon his cloak, when seeing a man standing by him with a lamp in one hand, and a cup of poison in the other, he with difficulty raised himself, and taking the cup, asked him, Whether he knew any thing of Lycortas and the Megalopolitan horsemen. The executioner answering, that they had almost all escaped; It is well, replied Philopæmen, We are not every way unfortunate; then without the least mark of discomposure, he drank off the poison, and laying himself down upon his cloak, soon after expired.

Divine honours were afterwards paid to him by his countrymen; and he was stiled, as Plutarch tells us, The last of the Greeks.

^b Cicero [de Senect.] makes Cato say the same thing.

^c Valerius Antias (ap. Liv. B. 39, c. 56.) says expressly, that Flamininus, L. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio Nasica, were sent ambassadors to Prusias to procure the death of Hannibal.

^d According to Juvenal, Hannibal kept this poison in a ring. Juvén. Sat. 10.

kept.

Y. R. 570.
 Def. Chr.
 152.
 269 Conf.
 Liv. B. 39.
 c. 52.

kept ready against such an exigence, he said: Let us deliver Rome from her perpetual fears and disquiet, since she has not patience to wait for the death of an old man. Flaminius's victory over an enemy unarmed and betrayed will not do him much honour with posterity. Then having invoked the Gods to take vengeance upon Præfias for his violation of hospitality, he swallowed the poison and died^c.

^c He was about 65.

Rollin.
 Hist. Rom.
 Tom. 7. l.
 245-5.

^f A late pious and learned author of a Roman History, after relating the death of Hannibal and Scipio, draws the characters of those two celebrated Captains; compares them; and then leaves it to his reader to give the preference as he shall see cause. He enumerates the talents and qualities that make a complete General. 1. Extensive genius to form and execute great designs. 2. Profound secrecy. 3. A thorough acquaintance with the characters of the Generals with whom he is to fight. 4. Attention to keep his troops under strict discipline. 5. A plain, sober, frugal, laborious manner of living. 6. Skill in an equal degree to employ force and stratagem. 7. Prudence to avoid hazarding his person without necessity. 8. Art and ability for conducting a battle. 9. The talents of speaking well, and dexterously managing the minds of men.

Our author gives a summary of what the Historians have said to the praise of both Commanders, in these respects; and, from the whole, is inclined to think that Hannibal has the advantage. "There are however two difficulties which hinder him from deciding: one drawn from the characters of the Generals whom Hannibal vanquished; the other, from the errors he committed. May it not be said, (continues our author) that those victories which have made Hannibal so famous, were as much owing to the imprudence and temerity of the Roman Generals, as to his bravery and skill? When a Fabius and afterwards a Scipio was sent against him, the first stoppt his progress at once, the other conquered him."

I do not see why these difficulties should check our author's inclination to declare in favour of the Carthaginian. That Fabius was not beaten by Hannibal, we cannot much wonder, when we remember how steadily the old man kept his resolution never to fight with him. But from Fabius's taking this method to put a stop to the victories of the enemy, may we not conclude that he knew no other, and thought Hannibal an over-match for him? And why does our author forget Publius Scipio, (Africanus's father) a prudent and able General, whom Hannibal vanquished at the Ticin. Livy relates some victories of Hannibal over the celebrated Marcellus; but neither Marcellus, nor any other General, ever vanquished Hannibal before the battle of Zama, if we may believe Polybius, (B. 15. c. 16.) Terentius Varro indeed is represented as a headstrong rash man; but the battle of Cannæ was not lost by his imprudence. The order in which he drew up his army is no where condemned; and Chevalier Folard thinks it excellent. And as to the conduct of the battle, Æmilius Paullus, a renowned Captain, a disciple of Fabius, had a greater share in it than his colleague. The imprudence with which Varro is taxed, was his venturing, against his colleague's advice, with above 90,000 men, to encounter, in a plain field, an enemy who had only 50,000, but was superior in horse. And does not the very advice of Æmilius, and the charge of temerity on Varro for not following it, imply a confession of Hannibal's superiority, in military skill, over Æmilius, as well as Varro? It ought likewise to be observed, that Hannibal's infantry had gained the victory over the Roman infantry, before this latter suffered any thing from the Carthaginian cavalry. It was otherwise when Scipio gained the victory at Zama. His infantry would probably have been vanquished but for his cavalry. Hannibal with only his third line of foot (his Italian army) maintained a long fight against Scipio's three lines of foot, and seems to have had the advantage over them, when Masiniſſa and Lælius, with the horſe, came to their assistance. Polybius indeed ſays, that Hannibal's Italian forces forces were equal in number to all Scipio's infantry, but this is contradicted by Livy, and is not very credible. The authority of Polybius, who was an intimate friend of Scipio Æmilianus, is, I imagine, of but little weight, in matters where the glory of the Scipios is particularly concerned. His partiality and flattery to them are in many instances but too visible.

The errors of which Hannibal is accused are, his not marching to Rome immediately after his victory at Cannæ, and his suffering his troops to ruin themselves by debauchery at Capua.

Our author himself seems to believe, that the first was not really an error. [See what has been said upon this head, p. 170. n. g.]

As to the second charge, it is a manifest slander. The behaviour of Hannibal and of his troops, after they came out of their winter quarters at Capua, is a sufficient proof that they had lost nothing of their martial spirit^a. If Hannibal's soldiers were so unmannered as Livy would have us believe, why did not the Romans drive them out of Italy? How came the Carthaginian to be conqueror in every action, great and small, as, Polybius says, he was^b?

After speaking of the errors imputed to the Carthaginian, our author adds, "As for Scipio, I do not know that any thing like these was ever objected to him." He forgets that neglect of discipline was frequently objected to Scipio by Fabius and Cato; unjustly perhaps, but not more unjustly than it is objected to Hannibal by Livy.

Our author having considered both Generals with respect to their military qualities, adds to his discourse a section with the title of MORAL AND CIVIL VIRTUES. And, "Here it is (says he) that Scipio triumphs.—The reader will not be much at a loss in whose favour to declare; especially if he looks upon the shocking portrait which Livy has left us of Hannibal." But our author himself, after looking upon this portrait, judges that it does not resemble the original; there being no mention, in Polybius or Plutarch, of that cruelty, perfidiousness, and irreligion, with which Livy charges the Carthaginian. The reader may therefore be at a loss in whose favour to decide, notwithstanding any thing that Livy has said, or any thing that our author has said, or is going to say; for he declines making a parallel of these two Generals with regard to moral and civil virtues [the virtues of a good citizen.] "He will content himself (he says) with mentioning some of those which in Scipio shined the most." Whether these brightnesses are such as give our author cause to say, C'est ici le triomphe de Scipion, we shall presently see.

He ranges the virtues in the following order.

I. Generosity, Liberality.

He tells us, that Scipio freely parted with his money, and mentions his wonderful generosity in restoring the Spanish hostages without ransom.

Now we find that Hannibal had the very same virtues, or to speak more properly, made use of the same policy. He parted with his money to purchase the friendship of the Gauls; and when, by his victories in Italy, he had taken great numbers of Italians prisoners; he set free, without ransom, all that were not Romans.

II. Gentleness, Benignity.

We are told that Scipio treated his officers politely, that he praised and rewarded those who had performed well.

From the words which Livy puts into Hannibal's mouth, just before the battle of the Ticin, there is reason to conclude that he acted in the like manner. Whether Hannibal would have been so gentle to mutineers, as Scipio was at the Sucro (and for which our author extols him) it is not easy to say: his temper having never been tried by a mutiny among his soldiers. Nor do I well conceive how Scipio, consistently with common prudence, could, in his situation have been more severe. He put to death all the ringleaders of the sedition, thirty five in number.

But certainly our author is very unlucky in the instance he chuses to give of Scipio's gentleness in reproof. "His reprehensions were softened by such an air of affectionate kindness as made them amiable. The reproof he was obliged to give ^a See p. 180. and 186. n. g.

^b B. 15. c. 12. and 16.

^c See p. 134.

" Mafniſſa

" Masniſſa, who, blinded by his paſſion, had married Seſtenciſſa, a declared enemy of the Roman people, is a perfect pattern for imitation in the like delicate circumſtances." Now the reader may remember, that this gentle amiable reproof, was accompanied with a broad hint, that Masniſſa muſt give up the woman he had married, and was paſſionately in love with, to be a ſlave to the Romans, and led in triumph before Scipio's chariot.

III. Justice.

" It was by this virtue (ſays our author) that Scipio rendered the Roman domination ſo gentle and agreeable to the allies and the conquered nations, and made himſelf ſo tenderly beloved by them, that they conſidered him as their protector and father."

One would think that a writer ſo well acquainted with the hiſtory of thoſe times, meant this remark as railery inſtead of panegyric. For could he really believe that either the Spaniards or the Africans found any pleaſure in wearing the Roman yoke? Or that the Spaniards had a high opinion of the juſtice of Scipio, who came among them under pretence of delivering them from ſubjection to Carthage, and then reduced them under the domination of Rome? The truth is, notwithstanding all that is ſaid by the Hiſtorians of his juſtice, clemency, and benignity, he carried on the war in Spain not only with great injuſtice, but with great cruelty. The facts contradict the panegyrick.

As to Scipio's ſhining juſtice in not violating the Carthaginian embassadors, who in their return to Rome accidentally fell into his hands, it is not worth taking notice of. But (not to mention the affair of Pleminius) there is a glaring inſtance of his injuſtice recorded by Livy, (B. 44. c. 62.) and which the reader may find in p. 241 of this volume.

IV. Greatneſs of Soul.

In what did Scipio diſplay this virtue? Why truly in reſuſing the title of King, which the Spaniards offered him; a reſuſal which made them wonder. But the Spaniards did not know that every ſenator of Rome thought himſelf much above any of the petty Kings in Spain. Beſides, can it be reckoned a proof of ſingular magnanimity, that a man honoured in an extraordinary manner by his country, ſhould not, for any temptation, turn a rebel to it?

The other inſtance of Scipio's greatneſs of ſoul, many will perhaps think to be the greateſt blemiſh in his character; his diſdaining to give an account of his conduct when legally ſummoned to do it.

I cannot but think, that Hannibal, when he freed Carthage from the tyranny of the perpetual judges; and when, by obliging the nobles to account for the public money they had embezzled, he prevented an unneceſſary and oppreſſive tax from being impoſed on the people, made a better figure as a citizen and a commonwealths-man than Scipio, when he tore his book of accounts; or when he triumphed over the Tribune Nerius, by carrying away the multitude to the capitol, that they might beg of Jupiter (as Livy ſays) to grant them always leaders like Scipio. And when Hannibal goes into baniſhment, lamenting the miſfortunes of his country more than his own; he certainly ſhews greater magnanimity than the Roman, when flying from Rome to avoid a trial; or when ordering, at his death, that his body ſhould not be buried in his ungrateful country: [ſo ungrateful as to aſk him what he had done with the public money.]

V. Chaſtity.

In proof of Scipio's excelling in this virtue, we have the ſermon he preached to Masniſſa, and the ſtory of the Celtiberian beauty. As to the latter, I would not wiſh the reader to believe Valerius Antias, who reports that Scipio acted a quite contrary part to what is given him by Livy and Polybius. But if Scipio was chaſte, this gives him no right to triumph over Hannibal; for Juſtin tells us, that the Carthaginian was ſo continent, with regard to women, that nobody would have believed him to be an African.

VI. Religion.

Our author himſelf has had the charity to take Hannibal's part, and to answer Livy's indictment againſt him for irreligion. He cites Hannibal's pilgrimage to Gades; a viſion which he verily believed came to him from the Gods, to foretel to him

^d See p. 283.

^h See p. 283.

^e See p. 246.

ⁱ See p. 245.

^f Liv. B. 33. c. 48.

^k Ap. A. Gell. L. 6. c. 8.

^g Liv. B. 38. c. 53.

^l B. 32. c. 4.

him the success of his enterprize; the godly expressions in the treaty between him and King Philip; his not robbing the temple of Juno Lacinia; and lastly, his invoking the Gods at the time of his death, to take vengeance on Prusias for his breach of hospitality. All these together sufficiently prove that Hannibal had religion.

As for Scipio, our author says, “ he does not know, whether this Roman had read the Cyropædia, but that it is evident, he imitated Cyrus in every thing, and above all in religious worship. From the time that he put on the manly gown, that is from the age of seventeen, he never began any business, public or private, till he had first been at the capitol to implore the help of Jupiter.” Our author goes on, “ What the religion was, either of Cyrus or Scipio, is not here the question. We know very well that their religion could not but be false. But the example given to all Commanders and all men, to begin and finish all their actions with prayer and thanksgiving, is for that reason the stronger. For what would they not have said and done, if they, like us, had been illuminated with the light of the true religion, and had been so happy as to know the true God?”

Were I to answer this question of our pious and learned author, I should say that Cyrus, Hannibal, and Scipio, had they known the true God and the true religion, would probably have said and done as the Christian conquerors and destroyers of mankind have since said and done. They would have uttered some prayers from time to time; and on certain occasions have walked in processions: they would have had chaplains, and offices of devotion, and religious ceremonies, and fasting days, and thanksgiving days, and, with all these, would have gone on plundering and slaughtering the innocent and weak, and gloriously laying waste the world. If they had not done these mighty mischiefs, it is more than probable we should have heard little of their virtues.

I FLATTER myself that the reader will be greatly edified by the zeal expressed, in the foregoing observations, for the support of Hannibal's moral character. But should it be otherwise, I shall still be content, if I may only be excused for not attempting to draw at large, the characters of those shining heroes we meet with in the Roman story. The truth is, I am unequal to the task of character-drawing; and were I not, I should still decline it, that I might not be charged with the affectation of a new kind of colouring. For I cannot, from the actions of the Scipios, Marcellus, Flaminius, Æmilius, Paullus, Mummius Achaicus, and such like worthies, form those high ideas of their virtue, which their Panegyrist, both ancient and modern, would have us entertain.

C H A P. XII.

The Roman Senate temporize with regard to the Achæans.

Philip lays a scheme to bring the Baitarnæ into Dardania. His cruelty to his subjects.

The malice of Perſes to his brother Demetrius; and the consequences of it.

Y. R. 571.
Bell. Græc.
lib. 5.
c. 13.
P. 13.

Lib. 5.

Q. MARCIUS, the Roman ambassador, who had been sent into Macedonia and Greece, returned to Rome in the consulship of L. Emilius Paulus and Cn. Bævius Tamphilus. With regard to the Achæans he reported, that he found them bent to keep the direction of affairs wholly in their own hands, and to refer nothing to the arbitration of the Senate; but added, that if their ambassadors, then at Rome, met with a cold reception, and if the least intimation were given them, that their proceedings displeased the Conscrip Fathers, the Lacedæmonians would certainly follow the example of the Messenians; in which case the Achæans would soon grow submissive, and most earnestly implore the protection of Rome. When therefore the Achæan ministers, in virtue of the treaty between Rome and Achæia, demanded “ assistance “ against the Messenians, or, if that could not be granted, that at least “ the sending arms or provisions from Italy to the enemy might be pro- “ hibited,” it was answered, That should the Lacedæmonians, or the Corinthians, or the Argives disjoin themselves from the Achæan confederacy, the Achæans would have no reason to wonder if Rome looked upon it as a matter that no way concerned her. But, notwithstanding this declaration, when the Fathers learnt soon after, that Lycortas, the successor of Philopæmen, had revenged his death, and reduced the Messenians to surrender at discretion, they graciously assured the same ambassadors, “ that they “ had taken care, no arms nor provisions should be carried from Italy to “ Messene.”

This change of language to the Achæans upon the news of the unexpected success of their arms, was perhaps owing to the near prospect the Romans had of a war with the Macedonians; for Marcus reported to the Senate, that, though Philip had done all they had enjoined him; yet it was evident, from his manner of complying, that his obedience would last no longer than necessity forced him to it. Nor indeed was the ambassador in this mistaken: for as Philip could not but see that the intention of the Romans was to possess themselves of his kingdom, by means seemingly consistent with their honour, if they could so contrive it. If not, by any means whatever; he turned all his thoughts to put himself in a condition to assert his independence. This was not easy to be effected. In the former war he had lost much both of strength and reputation: His subjects could not bear to hear of a new war with Rome: And there was neither King nor State in his neighbourhood that would venture to espouse his cause against the Romans. He formed a scheme therefore to allure the Besternæ (a robust and hardy people dwelling beyond the Danube) to leave their country and settle in Dardania; promising them, together with great rewards, his assistance to extirpate the natives; who (lying on the borders of Macedon) had taken every opportunity to give him disturbance. And he was to purchase of some Thracian Princes a passage through their country for these Barbarian strangers. It is said, that besides the strengthening of Macedon, he had a further view in calling the Besternæ to his assistance. He thought they might be usefully employed even to invade Italy, marching through Illyricum and the countries upon the Adriatic. Some years passed before this project took any effect. In the mean time he applied himself very diligently to train his people to war, exercising them in some small expeditions against the wild nations on the confines of his dominions.

Y. B. 571.
P. C. 1.
1. 1.
27. 27.
1. 3. 4.
C. 35.
B. 4. 1. 5.
& 27.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his kingdom and in his own house. The multitude of people, which he had transplanted, much against their wills, into *Emathia, being extremely discontented with the change, uttered bitter execrations against him: And he became the detestation of all his subjects in general, when, the more effectually to secure himself against domestic enemies, he barbarously caused to be massacred the children of all those whom he had at any time tyrannically put to death. Polybius ascribes what afterwards happened to Philip, in his own family, to an especial vengeance of Heaven poured on him for these cruelties.

Polyb. Exa
cern. ap.
Valef.
Liv. B. 40.
C. 3.
* See p. 372.

It is hard^m to say what the Romans intended by the extraordinary favour they shewed to Demetrius the King's younger son. But certain it is, that their favour to him, and his mutual respect for them, made the father extremely jealous of him: A jealousy that was increased by the partial regard the people in general had for Demetrius, to whom they thought themselves indebted for the continuance of the peace with Rome,

Polyb. L. 2.
B. 50.
L. 1. B. 39.
C. 53.

^m The most probable conjecture seems to be, that the Conscrip Fathers, well acquainted with Demetrius, and knowing him to be a fool, thought him the fitter to be King of a country, which they intended to make their own. For, that he was a very weak youth seems evident from hence, that, while the King, suspecting him of a warmer heart to the Romans than to him, put an ill construction upon many of his actions, which perhaps were innocent (and particularly that assiduous court he paid to every ambassador from the senate) the Prince took no pains to destroy this impression in his father's mind; but on the contrary was always admiring and commending whatever was Roman; carrying this folly so far, as to lose all patience, if any body happened to say, that Rome (the worst built city in the world) was ill contrived.

D d d 2

and

Y. R. 571.
Bel. Chr.
131.
270 Cons.

Liv. B. 40.
c. 5. & 6.

c. 20.

and who, they hoped and believed would, by means of the Romans, succeed Philip in the throne; and this their partiality to the younger son was yet more strongly resented by the elder than by the father. ^b Perjes not only conceived an implacable hatred to his brother, but formed a steady resolution to compass his destruction. In this view he ^c accused Demetrius of an attempt to assassinate him; and even pretended to know, that he had undertaken this murder in the confidence that he should be supported by the Romans. We are told, there was no solid proof of the charge. The King, however, having called some of his council to be his assessors, sat in judgment to try the cause. Livy has given us at large the pleadings of the two princes, or rather what they might have said, if they had possessed his talents. When Philip had heard both his sons, he told them, “that he would not judge between them upon “an hour’s hearing of their altercations, but upon a future observation “of their life and manners, their words and actions.”

The King naturally inclined to his elder son, and was confirmed in that inclination by his hatred to the Romans; yet he had not so high an opinion of Perjes’s veracity, as not to doubt concerning what he had alleged against his brother. His doubts made him wretched; and he dreaded to have them removed; because he could reap nothing but sorrow from a discovery of the truth. Nevertheless such discovery was expedient, in order to the regulation of his conduct in disposing of his kingdom. Full of anxiety, he [in the Consulship of P. Cornelius Cethegus and M. Bibulus Tamphilus] sent Philacles and Apelles to Rome, with the ^b Perjes is said by some writers to have been Philip’s son by a concubine; in which respect Demetrius had the advantage of him, being indisputably legitimate. But perhaps this is only a Roman tale.

^c The occasion of it was this. There had been the day before, a general muster and review of the army. It was customary for the troops, after they had been reviewed, to divide themselves into two bodies, and come to a mock fight, in which the combatants made use of poles, instead of the usual weapons. In the last fight between the two divisions of the army, each being heated by more than ordinary eagerness for victory, as if they had been contending for the kingdom, some hurt was done. Perjes’s side at length recoiled. This vexed him, but his friends thought that a good use might be made of it. It might afford matter of complaint against Demetrius, as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of the sport. Each of the brothers was that day to give an entertainment to his own companions, and each of them had spies in the other’s house to observe what passed. One of Perjes’s intelligencers behaved himself so uncautiously that he was discovered, and well beaten by fear of Demetrius’s guests. Demetrius knew nothing of this. When grown warm and merry with wine, Why should not we go to my brother’s, said he, and join company with him? and if he is angry with us for what happened to-day, we will put him into good humour again. All approved the motion, except the four who had so roughly treated Perjes’s spy. Yet Demetrius would not suffer them to stay behind. These, to secure themselves from being insulted, carried swords hid under their clothes: a precaution however not so secretly taken, but that Perjes had notice of it; who thereupon caused his doors to be shut; and, when Demetrius with his drunken companions arrived, spoke to them, from a window, in reproachful words, accusing them of murderous intentions. Liv. B. 40. c. 6. & 7.

character.

character of ambassadors to the Senate; but whose chief business was to learn, if possible, what had past in private between Demetrius and any of the great men there, especially T. Flaminius: who not long before had, in a letter to the King, commended his prudence in sending his younger son on the late embassy to Rome; and had counselled him to send him thither again with a greater and more honourable retinue of Macedonian nobles. These two ambassadors whom Philip thought unbiassed to either of the brothers, but who were indeed wholly devoted to Perſes, returned, and brought to the King a letter, pretended to be written to him by Flaminius, whose seal they had counterfeited. In this letter, the writer, in behalf of Demetrius, whom he owned to be faulty, deprecated the King's anger; and pressed him to believe, that whatever unwarrantable enterprizes the young Prince, through ambition of a throne, might have formed, yet certainly he had projected nothing against the life of any one of his own blood. He added, that as for himself, he was not a man that could be thought the adviser of any impious undertaking whatsoever.

Y. R. 572.
Euf. Chr.
18c.
271 Conf.

Liv. B. 40.
c. 23.

Philip had some months before discovered, by means of one Didas, Governor of Pæonia, who had worked himself into Demetrius's confidence, that the young Prince intended to escape to Rome, imagining, he could no where else be in shelter from the suspicions of his father and the malice of his brother. The pretended letter from Flaminius, added to this discovery, determined the King to put his son to death. Yet lest to do it avowedly and openly should give the alarm to the Romans, and raise a suspicion of his having hostile intentions against the Republic, he judged it best to have the criminal taken off silently, and by fraud. To Didas was committed the execution. A cup of poison, which he insidiously gave the Prince, in the expectation that it would dispatch him speedily and quietly, not taking the desired effect, but causing in him such torment, as revealed the treachery, and made him loudly complain both of his father and Didas, this traitor sent into his chamber a couple of ruffians, who, by smothering him, finished the tragedy.

C H A P. XIII.

Transactions of the Romans from the year 572 to 578.

FROM the year 564, when the Consul Manlius vanquished and plundered the Galetians *, to the year 582, in which began the second Macedonian war, little was performed by the Romans in the way of arms, except the conquest of Istria. Indeed the wars against the Ligurians and Spaniards continued almost without any interruption; but in these there happened nothing very memorable.

* See p. 367.

At

Y. R. 572.

S. C. 11.

Y. R. 573.

Y. R. 573.

At Rome, in the present year ^b 572, one Orchius, a Tribune of the people, got a sumptuary law passed, limiting the number of guests which any man should be allowed to have at his table.

The next year, M. Porcius Cato and C. Calpurnius Piso being Consuls, was enacted the famous Villian law, regulating the ages requisite for bearing the several magistracies. What these ages were is not agreed among the learned. Yet from Cicero Phil. 5. it would seem that the age for Quæstor was 31, Curule Ædile 37, Prætor 40, Consul 43.

Y. R. 574.

The year following was remarkable for having two brothers at the same time in the consulship, Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Manlius Acidianus Fulvianus, the latter so called, because adopted into the Manlian family.

Y. R. 575.

A. Manlius Vulso (who had for his colleague M. Junius Brutus) led an army into Istria; the conquest of which country was completed by the

Y. R. 576.

Consul C. Claudius Pulcher, whose colleague Tib. Sempronius Gracchus suppressed a rebellion in Sardinia.

Y. R. 577.

To these succeeded Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus and Q. Petillius Spurinus.

Liv. B. 41.

c. 15.

*A. 127222.

While the Senate were in debate concerning the troops to be raised for the service of the year, Cornelius, who had been suddenly called out of the assembly by a ^c ciator, returned, after some time, with a countenance full of trouble and consternation. The Conscrip Fathers suspending their deliberations, became all anxiety and attention. Cornelius then informed them, "That the liver of an ox (six years old) which he had sacrificed was all melted away in the boiler; that when the thing was first told him he could not believe it; that he caused the water to be poured out of the pot, and then saw the rest of the entrails entire; but, for the liver, it was all vanished, no mortal could tell how."

* Subs.

The fathers, terrified by this prodigy, were yet more terrified when the other Consul let them know, that of four oxen which he had successively sacrificed to Jupiter, not one had proved such as could please him. Both the Consuls received strict orders to continue sacrificing oxen, till the omens were good. It is reported (says Livy) that all the Deities were propitiated except the Goddess ^d Healt or Safety; but that Petillius had no luck in sacrificing to her. What followed? Cornelius coming down the hill of Alba, was seized with an apoplectic fit, lost the use of some of his limbs, and soon after died at Cumæ, whither he had been conveyed for the benefit of the waters. Petillius conducted the war in Liguria: The enemy being lodged upon a mountain called ^e Letum, the Consul,

* Death.

^b In this year the books which King Numa had ordered to be buried with him, and of which mention has been made in Vol. I.

p. 62. were accidentally found, and ordered to be burnt, by the senate, as containing doctrines pernicious to religion.

in an harangue to his foldiers, told them, se eo die Letum capturum esse, that he should that day take Letum (the enemy's post;) not attending, says Livy, to the ambiguity of the words, which also import, that he should that day catch his death: And accordingly he was that day killed in a conflict with the enemy. The Latin historian adds, that upon so remarkable a fulfilling of the melancholy omen, the keeper of the sacred chickens was heard to say, that something had gone wrong even with them, at the taking the auspices before the battle, and that the Consul knew it well enough.

Y. R. 577.
Bef. Chr.
175.
276 Conf.

In the place of Cornelius, C. Valerius Lævinus had been chosen, Petillius holding the comitia; but the ablest divines and lawyers were of opinion, that since the ordinary Consuls of that year had both perished, one by sickness, the other by the sword, the extraordinary, or substituted Consul, could not hold the comitia for a new election of magistrates.

C H A P. XIV.

Perfes, after the death of his father Philip, succeeds him in the throne.
He renews the treaty with Rome, and endeavours to gain the good-will of the Greeks.

The Romans are jealous of his growing power.

IN the Consulship of P. Mucius Scævola and M. Æmilius Lepidus, certain ambassadors, who had been sent by the Conscrip't Fathers into Macedon [to seek a pretence for invading and conquering that country] returned to Rome. Their report, which was very short, will be mentioned when the reader has first had an account of some changes in the state of Macedon since it was last spoken of.

Y. R. 578.
Bef. Chr.
174.
277 Conf.

King Philip was dead. He had lived but two years after the murder of his son Demetrius, and had passed those years in the extremest melancholy and wretchedness of mind. For Perfes, having got rid of his rival brother, paid no longer any respect to his father, but let himself be courted and worshipped by the people, as if he were already on the throne. The old King was in a manner left desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousness of such expectation. Thus neglected and deserted, his thoughts ran frequently back to his son Demetrius; of whom he began now to regret the loss, not without some suspicion of foul play on the part of Perfes in relation to his brother. One man there was of his court, and but one, his cousin-german Antigonus (the son of his uncle Ecbecrates) that continued faithful to him. Antigonus, by his fidelity to Philip, had drawn upon himself the hatred of Perfes; and well foresaw, how dangerous that hatred would.

Liv. B. 40.
c. 54. & 60.

V. R. 5-3.
E. C. 1.
172
C. 1.

would be to him, if ever the prince should ascend the throne. He no longer therefore observed the softening of the King's mind at the remembrance of Demetrius, and how apt he was to the belief, that unfair practices had been used to compass that Prince's destruction, but he applied himself diligently to listen to what people said upon that subject, and industriously to bring the matter into discourse, often joining with those who complained of the rashness of the King's act. He found that Philocrates and Apelles, the ambassadors who had bought the pretended letter from Flaminius, lay under the suspicion of fraud; and that it was commonly whispered in the palace, that Xybus, their secretary, had counterfeited the hand-writing and the seal of the Roman. Antigonus accidentally meeting this Xybus, laid hold of him, and brought him into the palace. There leaving him in custody with some officers, he went to the King, and acquainted him, that he had found the man who could best satisfy him whether his son Demetrius had died justly or by treachery. Xybus being examined in Philip's presence, and threatened with torture, after some little hesitation confessed the whole matter. Philocrates was instantly seized. Some say, that being confronted with Xybus he owned the fact; others, that he bore the torture without confessing any thing. Apelles, then absent from court upon some commission, having notice of Xybus's being arrested, made his escape and fled into Italy. As for Perses, he was grown too powerful to be under any necessity of flying his country; he only took care to keep at a distance from his father; who despairing of ever being able to bring him to corporal punishment, bent his thoughts to hinder his succession to the throne, and secure it to Antigonus. And this had he lived

^b May not this circumstance, joined with some others in the story, justify a doubt, whether this pretended discovery of truth was not itself a fraud, contrived by Antigonus, who hoped by the success of it to gain the kingdom? Was Italy a country where Apelles, if guilty of forging a letter from Flaminius to the destruction of Demetrius, (a Prince so much in favour with the senate) could hope to find an asylum? Yet though Philip demanded him, the Romans did not deliver him up, as appears from Livy, (B. 42. c. 5.) who also tells us, that Philocrates, by some Historians, is said to have denied the crime to the last, though confronted with Xybus, and put to the torture. Why may not the letter in question have been genuine? Livy, who makes it a point to justify Demetrius, and load Perses, (doubtless because a victim destined by the Romans to destruction) allows, not only that Demetrius was vain and insolent, on account of the extraordinary regard the senate expressed for him, but that several months before Apelles and Philocrates brought the letter from Italy, he had formed the design of withdrawing from his father's obedience, and escaping to his friends at Rome. Might not Flaminius, knowing this and perhaps some other unjustifiable practices of Demetrius, which had brought him under his father's displeasure, write a letter to the King, to deprecate his anger, and dissuade him from any measures too severe against the Prince: in which deprecation he might hope to succeed the more easily, by assuring Philip, that whatever wicked schemes of ambition the young man had formed, they could not take place, since they would have no countenance from Rome?

a little

a little longer than he did, he would doubtless have effected. But in making a progress through his kingdom, for this very purpose, he fell sick at Amphipolis, and died; [year of Rome 574] His physician Calligenes concealed his death till Perjes arrived; to whom he had given notice of the King's condition, upon the first indication of the distemper's being mortal. Antigonus was not at Amphipolis: He had been sent, much against his will, as ambassador from Philip to quicken the march of the Bastarnæ, and was coming with Cotto, one of their leaders, to let the King know, that they had passed the Danube, and were advancing; a prodigious multitude, with their wives and children. Not far from Amphipolis he heard a rumour of Philip's death, and was soon after arrested and slain by the order of Perjes, who had taken possession of the kingdom.

Y. R. 578.
Ecl. Chr.
174.
277 Conf.

The more firmly to establish himself, Perjes sent ambassadors to Rome to get his title to the crown recognized by the Senate, and to renew the league that had been made between his father and the Republic; both which requests he obtained. Nor did he neglect any thing which he thought might help to conciliate to him the good will of the Greeks, and his other neighbours. To ingratiate himself with his subjects, he recalled by edicts (published in the island of Delos, at Lelphi, and in the temple of Itonia Minerva) all the Macedonians who had fled their country for debt, or had been banished thence by the judges; promising them, not only impunity, but restitution of their estates, with the profits of them during their absence. He remitted also all debts due to his exchequer, and released all persons that were in custody either for treason, or the suspicion of it. By such actions of generosity and clemency he made the Greeks universally conceive the highest hopes of him. Add to this, that in his person and in all his deportment there was a royal dignity; and having carefully shunned the vices of incontinence and intemperance, to which his father had been addicted, he had a strength of body, that would enable him to sustain the hardships of war, as well as the fatigues of civil government. Such, says Polybius, was Perjes in the beginning of his reign.

Polyb. Ex-corp. ex
Lib. 20.
ap. Valer.

The Bastarnæ (as mentioned above) were upon their march to the country of Dardania, when Philip, who had invited them thither, died. This event embarrassed them: For the Thracians, with whom Philip had settled the price of their passage, now disputed it. A battle ensued, in which the Thracians had the worst. Nevertheless we find that the whole multitude of the Bastarnæ, except 30,000, returned home, because (if we may believe Livy and P. Orosius) it was miraculously bad weather. The 30,000 came on and entered Dardania; where we find them three years after. For the Dardans then sent ambassadors to Rome, to ask help against those invaders; adding, that they were yet less afraid of the Bastarnæ than of Perjes, who was in league with them. This furnished the Ro-

Polyb. Legal. 62.

V. R. 578.
Bel. Chr.
174.
277. Cons.

Liv. B. 41.
c. 19.

mans, with a pretext to visit the King with ambassadors, who should pry into his conduct and design.

When these ministers returned, the whole of their report amounted only to this; that there was war in Dardania. Perfes, apprehending some design against him, had appointed ambassadors to accompany the Romans in their journey home, and to assure the Conscrip Fathers, that he had not sent for the Bastarne, and that they did not act by his advice. The Senate answered, "That they neither accused the King nor acquitted him of that fault; that they only admonished him to be very careful, religiously to observe the treaty between the Republic and him."

V. R. 579.
Bel. Chr.
175.
278. Cons.

Liv. B. 41.
c. 22.

The following year, when the consular fasces had been transferred to Sp. Postumius Albinus and Q. Mucius Sacerola, some Roman ambassadors who had passed into Africa (it does not appear under what pretence of business) reported, at their return home, "That having gone first to Mafnissa, they had received much better accounts from him of what had been doing at Carthage, than they afterwards got from the Carthaginians themselves; that unquestionably ambassadors had been there from Perfes, and admitted to audience by night in the temple of Æsculapius; and that Mafnissa affirmed, what the Carthaginians themselves could not confidently deny, that they had sent ambassadors into Macedon." Hereupon the Fathers resolved, that they too would send ambassadors into Macedon; and accordingly three were ordered thither.

About this time the Dolopians, subjects of Perfes, refusing (for what reason is unknown) to submit to his authority, and appealing from their King to the Romans, he marched with an army, and by force speedily reduced them to obedience. The Romans (as we shall see hereafter) would needs make this an act of presumption in the King, and resent it as if he had invaded some country of their Italian allies.

Perfes, after this expedition, made another, under the pretence of religion. He crossed mount Oeta, and visited the temple of Apollo at Delphi. His army being with him, the Greeks were at first much terrified at his sudden appearance among them: but he staid only three days at Delphi, and then, through Phokis and Thessaly, returned into his own country, not having done the least act of hostility in any place through which he had passed. With the cities in his way he had amicably treated in person; and to those at a distance he had sent ambassadors or letters, desiring that the memory of all misunderstandings between his father and them might be buried with his father, since his own inclination was to live in amity with all his neighbours. The Romans would have been better pleased if the Macedonian had done some violences in his progress. Nor did they fail, for want of such cause of quarrel, to make it a crime that he had acted the contrary part, and, by a friendly behaviour, courted the good will of the Greek states.

The

The King was more especially solicitous to recover the friendship of the Acheans, which his father had so far lost, that by a solemn decree they had forbid any Macedonian to enter their territories. Whatever reasons of policy the Acheans might have for the continuance of this decree during the war of Philip with the Romans, it seemed inhuman afterwards, and a nourishing of deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. It was besides very prejudicial to them; their slaves daily running away, and taking refuge in Macedon, whence they knew they should not be reclaimed; for though there was no decree forbidding the Acheans to enter that kingdom, yet the masters of the slaves could not possibly think it safe for them to go thither. Perfes took advantage of this circumstance: He apprehended all the run-aways, and, by a letter to the Achean Diet, made a friendly offer to restore the fugitives; exhorting, at the same time, the magistrates to think of some effectual means to prevent the like escape for the future. Xenarchus, the Prætor, read to the Diet this letter; which the greater part heard with much pleasure, and especially those who were going, contrary to all expectation, to recover their slaves. But Callicrates, a partizan of the Romans, and who, to raise himself by their favour, had cast off all regard for his country, advised the assembly to be well aware of what they did; affirming, that the manifest aim of the King's civility was to make them break friendship with Rome, a friendship on which their all depended. "For I suppose," said he, you have no doubt but there will be a war between the Romans and Perfes. You know that Philip was making preparations for a rupture. He slew his son for no other reason but his affection to Rome. And what was the first thing that Perfes did after his coming to the throne? He brought the Bastarnæ into Dardania. It is true, they are gone away again. Had they staid, they would have been worse neighbours to the Greeks than the Gauls are to the Asiatics. But did their departure make Perfes give over all thoughts of the war? No, If the truth may be spoken, he has already begun it; witness his expedition against the Delopians. And as for that extraordinary journey to Delphi and his wonderfully kind behaviour to the Thessalians, whom he hates; What do you think of all this? Was it any thing more than an artifice to draw men over to his party? Every body understands the meaning of his compliment to us. My advice is, that we let things continue as they are, till we see whether the peace between Rome and Macedon will remain inviolate."

To this, Archo, the Prætor's brother: "Callicrates, I see, has a mind to make it difficult for those who disagree with him in opinion, to answer him. Why else does he bring the Romans into the question? I observe, that he is surprizingly well instructed in the councils of foreign courts. He knows every thing. He gives us an account of the most secret transactions: He even divines what would have happened if

Y. R. 579.
Ref. Chr.
177.
2-8 Conf.

Polyb. Legat. 58. & Excerpt. ex L. 28.
Liv. B. 41. c. 23.

c. 24.

Y. R. 579.
Bef. Chr.
173.
278 Conf.

“ Philip had lived: He knows how it comes to pass that Perfes inherits
“ the kingdom; what the Macedonians are meditating; and what the “ Romans think: And upon all this knowledge he forms his opinion.
“ But now, as for us, who neither know why nor how Demetrius died, “ nor what Philip if he had lived would have done; we ought, I think,
“ to govern ourselves only by what we do know. And this we know:
“ that Perfes upon his accession to the throne was acknowledged King
“ by the Romans; that they renewed their league with him; and that “ they afterwards sent to him ambassadors who were kindly received.
“ To me these things seem tokens of peace, and not of war: nor do
“ I see how the Romans can be offended, if, as we followed their steps “ in making war, we follow them likewise in making peace. Why the “ Acheans alone are to carry on an insupportable war against the Macedo- “ mans, I do not comprehend. Our neighbours are in commerce with “ Perfes; and nothing more is proposed for the Acheans: No league, “ no alliance, nothing but such a correspondence as common humanity “ requires; nothing therefore that can justly offend the Romans. Why “ then all this stir? Why do we distinguish ourselves from our neigh“ bours? Is it to make them suspected and hated, by our flattering the “ Romans more than they? Should there be a war, Perfes himself does “ not doubt but we shall side with Rome. In a time of peace, enmity, “ if not wholly laid aside, should at least be suspended.” Those who had been pleased with the King’s letter, greatly applauded this discourse:
Yet the Roman faction found a pretence to get the debate adjourned.
They alledged, that Perfes, having sent only a letter, and not an em-bassador, had failed in the ceremonial. It surely was not natural, considering upon what terms the two states had been for some time, that he should send a minister, before it could be known that a minister would be received; yet since this was made an objection, Perfes, to remove it, dispatched an ambassador to them in form. But now, the dread of Rome prevailing in the council, he was refused audience; and for this the Acheans were soon after highly commended by the Romans; who thereby discovered their hatred to Perfes, though hitherto he had given them no provocation^a.

Liv. B. 42.
c. 46.

Val. Max.
E. 3. c. 5.
L. B. 4.
c. 5.

^a This year a son of Scipio Africanus stood Candidate for the Pratorship, and would have lost his election, if the competitor Cicereius, who had been his father’s secretary, had not, out of respect for the family, desisted from his pretension, and even used his interest for Scipio. After he was chosen, and that it fell to his lot to be Prator Peregrinus, his relations persuaded him to renounce the exercise of that office, as utterly unfit for it: nor did he sit to pronounce one decree. They also prevailed with him to lay aside a ring he wore, whereon was the head of his father, whom he disgraced by his incapacity; and the Censors this year struck his name out of the list of the Senators. Nevertheless Cicero speaks of this Scipio as of a man of parts, though of an infirm habit of body. Cic. de Senect. c. 11. & Brut. c. 19.

The streets of Rome, by order of the Censors, were this year paved for the first time. Liv. B. 41. c. 27.

C H A P.

C H A P. XV.

The report of some Roman ambassadors who had been sent to Perſes.

The Senate order a new embaffy to him.

The cruelty of the Conſul Popillius towards a petty nation of Liguria.

Eumenes comes to Rome to accuſe Perſes of deſigns againſt the Republic.

The embaffadors from Perſes are ill received by the Senate.

He employs aſſaſſins to murder Eumenes; and is accuſed of deſigning other murders by poiſon.

The Carthaginians ſend to Rome complaints of Maſiniſſa's uſurpations.

Some Roman embaffadors report the ill reception they had met with from Perſes.

THE three embaffadors, ſent into Macedon, returned to Rome (in the beginning of the Conſulſhip of L. Poſthumius Albinus and M. Popillius Lænas) complaining, “that they had not been able to obtain “an audience of the King; it having been ſometimes pretended, that “he was abſent, ſometimes that he was ſick, and both falſely:” They added, “that he was undoubtedly preparing for war, and would “ſoon take the field.” The Senate, not long after this report, reſolved to trouble Perſes with five more embaffadors; at the head of whom was C. Valerius: and theſe were from Macedon to go to Alexandria to renew a league of friendſhip with Ptolemy.

Y. R. 582.
Ref. Chr.
172.
279 Conf.
Liv. B. 42.
c. 2.

POPILLIUS the Conſul, without orders from the Senate, and without any provocation, led an army againſt the Statelliates, a people of Liguria, and came to a battle with them before the gates of their town called Caryſtum. He ſlew 10,000 of the enemy, and took 700 priſoners, with the loſs of 3000 of his men. The vanquiſhed, having collected their ſcattered troops, found, that the number of the citizens loſt was greater than of thoſe which remained. They ſurrendered therefore, without making any conditions; never imagining that the Conſul would treat them worſe than former generals had treated their priſoners. Yet Popillius not only plundered the town; but demolished it, and ſold the inhabitants for ſlaves. Of this proceeding he ſent an account to the Conſcript Fathers; who, being highly offended with it, decreed, that, returning the money to the purchaſers, he ſhould reſtore to the captives their liberty and effects; and them

c. 6.

c. 7.

then quit the province. Popilius would not obey; but, having put his army into winter quarters at Pisa, came home in as great wrath, says Livy, with the Fathers, as he had expressed against the Ligurians.

Y. R. 581.
Bel. Cœ.
171.
250 Cons.

When the fasces had been transferred to P. Ælius Ligus and C. Popilius Lenas (both Plebeians) Ælius, at the instigation of the Senate, would have revived the affair of the injury done to the Ligurians; but was turned aside from his purpose by his colleague, the delinquent's brother, who threatened to oppose him and to render null whatever he should do in that process. The Senate hereupon became so angry with both, that, though the war against Macedon was just on the point of being declared, they absolutely refused them the conduct of it, nor would even grant them a decree to levy soldiers for the war in Liguria.

Liv. B. 42.
C. 5.
Popilius
Legat. 74

About this time Eumenes King of Pergamus came to Rome. Besides his hereditary quarrel with the Macedonian, he had a particular hatred to him, on account of the great progress he made in the esteem and affection of the Greeks; while his own reputation among them was every day decreasing: In proof of which, the Achaëans had lately abrogated, as extravagant and illegal, certain honours that had been decreed him in their country. Eumenes had doubtless learnt the intentions of the Romans with regard to Perses, and would therefore not be backward in making his court to the Senate upon such an occasion; hoping perhaps to be rewarded with some part of the Macedonian kingdom, as he had, for his service against Antiochus obtained a good share of that Prince's dominions. The Senate received the King with great honours: and though he had little to say which they knew not before, yet they listened to him with the utmost attention, pondering all his words, as if the weight of them were to turn the balance that before was equal. He introduced his discourse with saying, "That the cause of his journey to " Rome was (besides the desire of visiting those Gods and men, by " whose favour he enjoyed that fortune which had left him nothing
" to wish for) that he might in person warn the Senate to prevent the " designs of the Macedonian." He then spoke of the murder of Demetrius, a Prince always averse from a Roman war; Philip's invitation of the Bastarnæ, by whose help he was to have invaded Italy: The expedition of Perses against the Delopians: The esteem which the Greek and Asiatic cities had for him: "I do not see, said Eumenes, for what " merit, what munificence of his, so much respect is paid him; nor can
" I certainly tell, whether this be owing to the good fortune of Perses, " or (which I am loth to say) to a hatred of the Romans. He is " in great authority even with the Asiatic Kings. Seleucus, the son
" and successor of Antiochus the Great, has given him his daughter

Liv. B. 42.
C. 11.

* We find that justice was afterwards done to the Statellates, but that Popilius, though prosecuted, escaped punishment, by the artifice of the Prætor who was to try him. Liv. B. 42. c. 22.

“ Laodice in marriage: Yet Perfes did not ask her; Seleucus offered “ her. Prusias King of Bitynia has by earnest entreaties obtained, “ for a wife, the sister of Perfes: and these marriages have been so“ lemnized with congratulations and presents from numberless em-“ bassadors. The Baotians, who never could be brought to make a “ league with Philip, have made one with his son. The Achaean coun“ cil, if a few friends of Rome had not opposed it, would have let him “ into Acbaia. At the same time, they were putting affronts upon me, “ to whom they are more obliged than can be well expressed. And who “ does not know, that the Ætolians, in their domestic feuds and seditions, “ had recourse for assistance, not to the Romans, but to Perfes? And “ without the support of these associations and friendships abroad, he “ has strength enough at home for the war; 30,000 foot, 5000 horse, “ corn for ten years, that he may not be driven to live by spoil, or take “ from his own subjects; money enough (not to speak of his mines) to “ pay 10,000 mercenaries for ten years; arms sufficient for three such “ armies as he has now on foot^c; the Thracians near at hand to supply “ him with as many recruits as he shall require.”

Y. R. 581.
 Bef. Chr.
 171.
 280 C. n.

The King added, “ I have not taken up these things, Conscrip“ turs, upon uncertain report, nor given an easy credit to them, as “ wishing them to be true of an enemy: But I bring you accounts of “ what, by a thorough enquiry, I have discovered as certainly, as if “ you had employed me to be your spy, and I had seen them with my “ own eyes.”

Eumenes proceeded to accuse Perfes of some facts which might either be denied or justified; as that he had procured the death of certain persons, friends to the Romans: dethroned Abrupolis, a petty King of Illyricum, who had invaded Macedon; given assistance to the Byzantines, contrary to the treaty with Rome; made war upon the Dolopians; and led an army through Thessaly and Doris.

He concluded thus: “ Since you, Conscrip“ turs, have quietly
 “ and patiently born these things, and the Macedonian fees, that you have “ abandoned Greece to him, he is very sure, that he shall meet with no “ army to oppose him, before he passes into Italy. How safe or how “ honourable for you this may be, you are the best judges. As for me, “ I should have been ashamed, if Perfes had got the start of me, and had “ brought the war hither, before I had come to give you notice of the “ danger^d.”

^c This army and these stores were left to Perfes by his father.

^d Though Livy (B. 42. c. 5.) says very fine things of Eumenes (in comparing him with Perfes) and tells us, that the cities, under his domination, were so happy that they would not change condition with any free cities; yet one cannot help thinking that, by this speech, which he has put into the King's mouth, he intended to shew him in a ridiculous light.

Y. R. 581.
 Bel. Chr.
 1-1.
 =So Conf.

Sir W. R.

Liv. B. 42.
 c. 14.

It would be very foolish to imagine that the Senate stood in fear of Perfes's invading Italy. Nevertheless, as they always sought plausible pretences for their wars; and as they could find none at present, they took advantage of this visit from Eumenes to make it believed, that he had given them some intelligence of the greatest importance to their preservation; and such as would justify their attacking Macedon. To induce this belief, it was necessary to make a profound secret of all that the King had said; because it amounted to no more than what every body knew from the report of the Roman ambassadors. And had the Fathers, upon such report, or tales invented by flatterers and spies, commenced a war against Perfes, the injustice and oppression would have been manifest to all the world. But when the danger threatening them was so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest measures for their own security? This imminent danger their affected secrecy would help to magnify in the imagination of the public. Not a word therefore of what the King had said transpired. It was only known, for the present, that he had been in the senate house. The rest, says Livy, did not come out till the war was over.

After a few days, the Senate gave audience to Perfes's ambassadors; but, being predetermined, would neither admit their defence, nor have regard to their deprecation. Whereupon Harpalus, chief of the embassy, said, "The King earnestly wishes, that you would believe him, when he declares, That neither by words nor actions has he given you any cause to look upon him as your enemy: but if he finds, that you are seeking a pretence of quarrel with him, he will not want courage to defend himself. The chance of war is equal, and the event uncertain."

The cities of Greece and Asia, anxious to know what Eumenes's journey to Rome and the Macedonian embassy would produce, had sent deputies thither under various prettexts. The Rhodians, in particular, did not doubt but the King of Pergamus would give them a share in whatever crimes he should think proper to charge upon Perfes. Satyrus, chief of the embassy from Rhodes, used therefore all his interest with the Senators of his acquaintance to get an opportunity of being heard against Eumenes: which when he had obtained, he, with great acrimony, accused him not only of having stirred up the Lycians, their subjects, to a revolt, but of being more oppressive to Asia than ever Antiochus had been. Such discourse, though agreeable to the Asiatic cities, (for they also favoured Perfes) was displeasing to the Senate, and of no benefit to the Rhodians. The Fathers favoured Eumenes the more for the combination formed against him: they loaded him with honours and presents.

Harpalus,

Harpalus, returning into Macedon with all possible diligence, told his master, that he had left the Romans, not indeed making preparations for war, but so ill disposed, that unquestionably they would not defer it long. The King, fully convinced that he should soon be attacked, laid a plot to begin the war, with spilling the blood of Eumenes, the man whom of all men he most hated. It was known that the Pergamenian, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, intending a sacrifice to Apollo. Perjes, for the assassination, employed a certain Cretan named Evander (General of his auxiliaries) and three Macedonians (men of experience in such enterprises) who placing themselves behind a ruined wall, that hung over a hollow way, so narrow, that only one could pass at a time, there waited the coming of the King and his retinue. Pantaleon, an Ætolian chief, walked foremost; Eumenes followed: just as he came under the wall, the ruffians rolled down two stones of a huge size, one of which lighting on his head, the other on his shoulder, he was struck to the ground; where a shower of smaller stones came pouring upon him and overwhelmed him. The assassins, imagining their business effected, made all haste to get away; and one of them not being able to keep pace with the rest, his companions slew him, to prevent a discovery.

Upon seeing the King fall, his attendants, except Pantaleon, had all fled away in a fright. Running now together again, they took him up senseless; still warm, however, and breathing. After a short time he came to himself; and the next day they put him on board his ship, which conveyed him first to Corinth, and thence to the island of Ægina. Here he was cured, but, during his recovery, was kept so secretly, that fame, throughout all Asia, confidently reported him dead. Attalus believed it sooner than became the brotherly affection that had always remarkably subsisted between them; for (as Livy adds) thinking himself now the undoubted inheritor of the kingdom, he discoursed with his brother's wife and the Governor of the Citadel of Pergamus. Of this Eumenes had private information, yet, when he returned safe home, all the reproof which Attalus received from him, at their meeting, was a whisper, to forbear marrying the Queen till he were well assured of the King's death.

While the rumour of the Pergamenian's being assassinated was yet fresh at Rome, Valerius, head of the last embassy into Macedon and Greece, returned home, and brought with him Praxo, a woman of great distinction at Delphi, to whom Perjes had, by letter, recommended the assassins, to be by her entertained. He produced also one Rammius, a citizen of Brundysium, at whose house all the generals and Roman ambassadors, as well as the King's ministers, used to lodge, in their journies to and from Italy. This man declared, that being lately at the Macedonian court, he had been there tampered with to poison such of his guests as the King should occasionally name to him.

VOL. II.

F f f

These

Y. R. 581.
Bef. Chr.
171.
280 Conf.

Plut. in Apophth.
Liv. B. 42.
c. 17.

V. R. 42.
 B. C. 23.
 177
 250 C. 23.

These stories, true or false, obtained easy belief at Rome: They served to swell the account of Perſes's crimes, and make appear more fully the justice and necessity of a Macedonian war. The Senate being dissatisfied, for the reasons formerly mentioned, with the present Consuls, commissioned Sicinnius, the Prætor Peregrinus, to pass with an army into Epirus, and there continued till a successor should arrive.

V. R. 42.
 B. C. 23.

* See 1.
 222.
 177, B.
 420 C. 23.

ABOUT this time came ambassadors from the Carthaginians with a new complaint against Masiniſſa. He had been encroaching upon them ever since their defeat at Zama. How he took from them the country of Emperia has been already mentioned*. This usurpation was followed by another. Gala, the father of Masiniſſa, had conquered some lands from the Carthaginians, which afterwards Syphax conquered from Gala, and restored to the first owners, out of love to his wife Scopaniſſa, the daughter of Aſdruba! Upon these lands the Numidian seized; and, by Roman arbitration, was permitted quietly to possess them; an injury which the Carthaginians had scarcely digested, when Masiniſſa came upon them again, and took from them above 70 towns and castles without any colour of right. It was of this that the present ambassadors complained. They represented the grievous oppression which Carthage laboured under by reason of those articles in her treaty with the Romans, which restrained her from making war, out of her own territory, or against any confederate of Rome. "Now (said they) although the " towns and castles lately seized by Masiniſſa are unquestionably within " our territory, and therefore the driving him thence would be only
 " a defensive war; yet, as he is a confederate of Rome, we fear even " to defend ourselves against him, without your permission. We beg
 " therefore, that Carthage may either have justice by arbitration, or be " suffered to defend herself by force of arms; or at least (if favour must " prevail over truth) that you would be pleased to determine, once for " all, what part of her dominions she shall give up to Masiniſſa. If " none of these requests can be obtained, we then desire, that you will
 " let us know in what we have offended, since the time that Scipio
 " granted us peace, and vouchsafe to punish us yourselves in such man" ner as you shall think proper. It would be better for the Carthagi" nians, and more agreeable to them, to live slaves to the Romans in " safety, than to be free, but continually exposed to the oppressions of " Masiniſſa: We had rather perish at once than draw our breath at the " mercy of that Numidian hangman." This said, the ambassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground.

B. C. 23.
 23.

Gaius, the son of Masiniſſa, being present, the Senate asked him what answer he could make to these complaints. He said, "That his " father had given him no instructions relating thereto; that neither " could he well have given any, the Carthaginians not having im-
 " parted to him the subject of their embassy, nor even their intention
 " of

“ of sending an embassy to Rome. It was indeed known that they “ had of late held secret councils by night, in the temple of Æscula- “ pius, and dispatched ambassadors to the Senate; for which reason his “ father had sent him to entreat them not to give credit to the accusa“ tions of their common enemy, who hated Masiniſſa for no other “ reason but his constant fidelity to the Roman people.” The Senate replied, “ That they had done, and would do, whatever they could “ to honour Masiniſſa; but that justice must not give place to favour;
 “ and that it was not consistent with their equity to countenance him “ in taking from the Carthaginians any lands, which by their treaty they “ were quietly to enjoy.” With this mild reproof they dismissed Gi- luffe, making him the usual presents (as they did also to the Carthagini- ans) and bidding him tell his father, that they expected he should send ambassadors more fully instructed in this affair.

Y. R. 581.
 Eof. Chr.
 171.
 280 C. of.

About the same time, three ambassadors, of which Cn. Servilius Clepio was chief, returned from Macedon to Rome. They had been sent to demand satisfaction for the wrongs which Perſes had done, (meaning those pretended injustices about which Eumenes had harangued in the Senate, and, in case of refusal, to renounce friendship with him in the name of the Republic. Their report was, “ That they had seen “ mighty preparations for war in all the towns of Macedon; that they “ had long waited in vain for an audience of the King; and at length,
 “ in despair of obtaining it, had set out to return home: That then “ they were called back, and introduced to him. That they put him in “ mind of the league made with his father, and renewed with himself:
 “ by which he was expressly restrained from making war out of his own “ dominions; or against any state in alliance with Rome. That they

Liv. B. 42.
 c. 25.

“ In the form of the treaty between Phi- lip, and the Romans, as it is given by Poly- bius, we find no condition forbidding the King to make war abroad, without leave of the Republic. But Livy inserts a clause to that effect.

It is likely (says Sir W. R. *) that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace, whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entering shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the King's hands, that he could no more make war abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that seem an article of the peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Ma- cedonian might not bear defensive arms without their permission; then had Perſes very just reason to find himself aggrieved.

 For since they had allowed his father, without control, to make war in Thrace (whilst they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence; why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own rebels; or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon?
 By such allegations Perſes maintained the right of his cause in very mild sort when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as unjust [if after all, it be true that he did so] he ministered occasion to the ambassadors to give him defiance.

* Hist. of the World. B. 5. c. 6. §. 3.

Y. R. 531.
Bef. Chr.
170.
250 Cons.

“ had rehearsed to him all the facts spoken of by the King of Pergamus (they themselves having found them to be true;) that they had besides, mentioned some private conferences he had held, for several days, in the island of Samothrace, with ambassadors from the cities of Asia. And lastly, that in the name of the Senate they had demanded satisfaction for these injuries.

“ Hereupon, said they, the King broke out into a passion, frequently calling the Romans avaricious and proud, who thought it fitting that he should regulate all his words and actions at the nod of their daily ambassadors, with whom they pestered him, and who were no better than mere spies. After he had talked loudly and long in this strain, he ordered us to come again the day following, when he would give us, he said, an answer in writing. He did so; and it was to this effect. That he had nothing to do with the treaty made with his father: That he had renewed it, not because he approved of it, but because, upon his first accession to the kingdom, he was obliged to bear with every thing. That if the Romans would make a new treaty with him, it must be upon equal terms; and he would then consider what his interest required; as they, he doubted not, would take care of theirs. As soon as he had delivered us this writing, he flung away, and while they were making us withdraw, we declared, That we renounced his friendship and alliance. The King in wrath turned back, and raising his voice, ordered us to leave his kingdom in three days. We came away, having neither at our arrival, nor while we continued at his court, received any mark of hospitality or civility.”

C H A P. XVI.

The second Macedonian War.

FIRST YEAR of the War.

The disposition of the Greek and Asiatic States at this time.

The levies at Rome for the war. The speech of a centurion on this occasion.

Perseus sues in vain to the Senate for peace.

A conference between him and Marcius a Roman ambassador in Thessaly.

The King makes another fruitless attempt to obtain peace.

Y. R. 532.
Bef. Chr.
170.
251 Cons.

WHEN the people of Rome, upon a motion by the Consuls, P. Licinius Crassus and C. Cassius Longinus, decreed war against Perseus, the Republic had few open enemies, and no real friends.

After.

After the victory over Antiochus, although Macedon, Pergamus, the commonwealth of the Achaëans, and all the other States of Greece were governed by the same laws and magistrates as before the Romans came among them, and made alliances with them; yet the people which Rome had subdued to her laws and magistrates, were no more really her vassals, than the Kings and nations which she called her allies. For, by her ambassadors abroad, or the decrees of her Senate at home, she exercised such an empire over those allies, that no laws made by them could take place, if she interposed her will to the contrary. Nor was their election of magistrates so free as not to be influenced by the good pleasure of the overbearing Republic. Add to this, that she had assumed to herself the right of deciding all quarrels between her allies; and had made it a part of her policy not to suffer, without reproof, and sometimes menaces, any of her friends to take arms, even in their own defence, before they had consulted the oracle at Rome.

Y. R. 582.
Bef. Chr.
170.
281 Conf.

This method of proceeding, whatever interpretation was put upon it by such as were actuated by private interest or fear, could not but be very grating to all generous and free spirits. The Greek States began now universally to apprehend the evil which Philopamen had foretold; the miserable subjection to which Greece would be reduced by the Roman patronage. It was so evident both to these States and to the bordering Kings, or became soon so evident, that the view of Rome was to reduce Macedon to the condition of a Roman province, which would make her their near and most dangerous neighbour, that if we may believe Polybius, Perfes, for a very moderate sum of money well applied, might have brought all those States, and all or most of those Kings, to have espoused his cause*. Of this the Historian is so positive, that he says no wise man will dispute it with him. And some events which happened in the course of the war, will shew this opinion not to have been ill founded. We shall find that even Eumenes had not always that anxiety for the welfare of Rome which he expressed in his late speech to the Senate. At present however, not only he, but the Kings of Syria, Egypt, and Cappadocia, offered their assistance to the Romans. The last of the three sent his son to be educated at Rome. Prusias, King of Bitthynia, though married to a sister of Perfes, observed an exact neutrality: the Greeks durst not refuse their aid: Carthage was in slavery to Rome. Masinissa lent his assistance: for he judged, says Livy, that should the Romans prove conquerors, his affairs would remain in their present situation; should they be vanquished, he doubted not to become master of all Africa. On the other hand, Perfes had no associate but Cotys King of the Odrysians in Thrace. Gentius, a King of Illyricum, was indeed suspected at Rome of being in the Macedonian interest, but he had not yet openly declared for either side.

Legat. 77.

Liv. B. 42.
c. 29.

* Polybius seems to speak of the time when Perfes's arms having prospered for two years together, his affairs had a promising aspect.

After

V. R. 32.
 E. R. 62.
 170.
 231 C. 61.
 L. 1. B. 42.
 6. 15.
 6. 12. A. 53.

After the people of Rome had voted the war, the Conscript Fathers regulated the levies for the year. They appointed Salpustius Gallus, the Prætor Urbanus, to raise four Roman legions, 12,000 foot and 1200 horse of the allies; the legions to be commanded by four Tribunes, chosen from among the Senators. This army was to be in readiness to march whither the Fathers should direct. One of the Consuls was to have, for the defence of Italy, two legions of 5000 foot and 200 horse each; and of the allies 12,000 foot and 600 horse. To the Consul, who should go into Macedon, the Senate assigned two legions, of 6000 foot and 300 horse each; and 16000 foot and 800 horse of the Italian confederates. They granted him also the privilege of choosing whom he pleased of the Veteran soldiers and Centurions, that were under fifty years old, though the law obliged no man above forty-five to serve in the army. The people on this occasion waved their right of naming a certain number of the legionary Tribunes, and left the choice of them to the Consuls and Prætors.

Macedon fell by lot to Licinius, and Italy to Cassius. They carried on the levies with extraordinary rigour; yet many presented themselves voluntarily to Licinius, knowing that the soldiers who had served in the first Macedonian war, and in the war against Antiochus, had returned home rich. But when his legionary Tribunes were appointing the Centurions, twenty-three of those who were called upon to serve, and who had been Principiles, or first Centurions of the Triarii, refused to enlist themselves, and appealed to the Tribunes of the Commons. Two of the college would have referred the matter to the Consuls, but the other eight were for taking cognizance of it themselves, and righting the appellants if aggrieved. At the desire of Licinius the affair was brought before the people. M. Popilius, who had been Consul two years before, appeared as advocate for the Centurions. He said, that the Veterans had served the legal time, and were worn out with age and the fatigues of war; that nevertheless they did not refuse to give the remainder of their strength to the Republic; they only desired that they might not be placed in a lower rank than what they had last held in the army. Licinius ordered the decree of the Senate to be read: it imported, that war should be commenced against Perjes, and that as many as possible of the Veteran Centurions should be enrolled for that war, exempting none under fifty years old. He then entreated the people that, in the present case of a war so near Italy, and against so powerful a King, they would not obstruct the levies, nor hinder the Consul from so placing every man as was most for the benefit of the Republic; or at least that they would refer the matter to the Senate. Licinius having ended, one of the twenty-three appellants asked permission of the Consul and the Tribunes to speak a few words to the people. This being granted, he said, "My name, Romans, is Sp. Ligustinus; I am of the Confruentian tribe, and of Sabine extraction. My father left me an acre of
 I " ground,

“ ground, and a little cottage, in which I was born and bred, and in “ which I now dwell. As soon as I was of an age to marry, my father “ gave me to wife his brother’s daughter. I had no fortune with her,
 “ but she was free born, chaste, and an excellent breeder; a richer man “ would not desire a better. We had six sons and two daughters:
 “ the girls are married; four of my sons are men grown. I was lifted a “ soldier for the first time in the Consulship of P. Sulpicius and C. Au- “ relius: I served two years a private man, in the army that went into “ Macedon against King Philip. The third year T. Quinctius Flaminius, “ in reward of my courage, made me a Centurion of the tenth Order “ of the Hastati. Philip being vanquished, we returned to Rome, and “ were disbanded. Presently after I went a volunteer with the Consul
 “ M. Porcius into Spain. Those who have served under him and other “ Generals well know, that there is not a more nice observer, or more “ critical judge of military virtue than he. This General thought me “ worthy of the post of first Centurion of the Hastati. After this I “ entered a volunteer in that army which was sent against the Æto- “ lians and King Antiochus. I was then by M. Acilius made first Cen-“ turion of the Principes. Antiochus being driven out of Greece, “ and the Ætolians subdued, we were brought back into Italy; and

Y. R. 582.
 Bef. Chr.
 170.
 281 Conf.

^b We cannot have a tolerable notion of the CENTURIONS, without remembering, that every one of the thirty Manipuli in a legion was divided into two Ordines or ranks; and consequently the three bodies of the Hastati, Principes and Triarii into twenty Ordines a-piece, as into ten Manipuli. Now every Manipulus was allowed two Centurions, or captains, one to each Order or Century: And to determine the point of priority between them, they were created at two different elections. The Thirty who were made first always took the precedence of their fellows; and therefore commanded the right hand orders, as the others did the left.

The Triarii or Pilani [so called from their weapon, the Pilum] being esteemed the most honourable, had their CENTURIONS elected first; next to them the Principes, and afterwards the Hastati; whence they were called Primus & Secundus Pilus, Primus & Secundus Princeps, Primus & Secundus Hastatus; and so on.

Here it may be observed, That Primipilus is called sometimes in historians, for the CENTURIONS of those orders; and the same Centurions are sometimes stiled Principes Centurionum, and Principes Centurionum.

We may take notice too, what a large field there lay for promotion; first through all the orders of the Hastati, then quite through the Principes, and afterwards from the last order of the Triarii to the Primipilus, the most honourable of the Centurions, and who deserves to be particularly described. This officer, besides his name of Primipilus, went under the several titles of Dux Legionis, Præfectus Legionis, Primus Centurionum, and Primus Centurio; and was the first Centurion of the Triarii in every legion. He presided over all the other Centurions, and generally gave the word of command by order of the Tribunes. Besides this he had the care of the eagle, or chief standard of the legion; hence Aquilapraefectus is to bear the dignity of Primipilus; and hence Aquila is taken by Pliny for the said office. Nor was this station only honourable, but very profitable too; for he had a special stipend allowed him, probably as much as a knight’s estate; and when he left that charge, was reputed equal to the members of the Equestrian order, bearing the title of Primipilarius, in the same manner as those, who had discharged the greatest civil offices, were stiled ever after Consulares, Censorii, &c. Kennet. Antiq. B. 4. c. 7.

“ here

T. R. 682.
 Bef. Chr.
 172.
 251 Conf.

“ here I served in two campaigns, such as the Legions then made every “ year. Afterwards I served twice in Spain; the first time under Q.
 “ Fulvius Flaccus; the second under the Prætor Tib. Sempronius Grac- “ chus. I was amongst those whom, for their bravery, Flaccus distin“ guished by bringing them home to assist at his triumph; and I returned “ into the same province at the desire of Tiberius Gracchus. In the space “ of a few years I was four times first Centurion of the Triarii. I have “ received 34 military rewards from my Generals; and among these “ six Civic crowns. I have made two and twenty campaigns, and “ am past fifty years old. But had I not served my full time, and “ if my age did not exempt me, yet, P. Licinius, as I can furnish you “ four soldiers, instead of one, it is but reasonable I should be excused “ from serving any more. But I say all this only to shew the justice of “ my cause. So long as I am judged fit to bear arms, I shall never seek “ to decline it. Let the Legionary Tribunes place me in the post for “ which they think me proper. It shall be my care that no soldier in “ the army surpass me in bravery: That this has always been my “ care, the Generals under whom I have made my campaigns can testify.
 “ And you, fellow soldiers, though you have appealed, and your ap“ peal be well founded, yet, as in your younger days you never did any “ thing against the authority of the Magistrates and Senate; you will “ now, I am persuaded, think it right to let yourselves be disposed of as “ they judge convenient; and esteem every post honourable in which you “ can contribute to the defence and preservation of the Republic.”

The Consul, after highly praising Ligustinus's virtue, took him to the Senate-house, where he received the thanks of the Conscrip Fathers. And the Tribunes of the soldiers, as a reward of his merit, declared him first Centurion of the first legion. The other appellants, following his example, desisted from their appeal; so that the levies went on without farther opposition.

Besides the forces abovementioned, as destined for Macedon, were granted, at the request of Licinius, 2000 Ligurians, and a certain number of Cretan archers. The Senate also asked of Masiniſſa a body of Numidian horse and some elephants.

Liv. B. 42.
 c. 36.

About this time ambassadors came from Perſes. They were not allowed to enter the city, because war had been already declared against their master. Being admitted to audience in the temple of Bellona, they said, “ That the King wondered why the Romans had transported an “ army into his neighbourhood; that if the Senate could be prevailed “ upon to recal it, he was ready, at their determination, to make sa“ tisfaction for any injuries, they should think, he had done to their “ allies.” The army the ambassadors spoke of was that under the Prætor Cn. Sicinnius, who with 5000 foot and 300 horse lay encamped near Apollonia. Sicinnius had sent Sp. Carvilius to Rome to confront the Macedonian ministers in the Senate. When Carvilius had accused Perſes of some

some usurpations upon the neighbouring states, and of several other facts which he pretended the King had done or was preparing to do: the ambassadors were asked what they had to say in their master's justification. They answered, that they had no further commission than what they had delivered; whereupon they were bid to tell the King, that if he had a mind to give satisfaction, he might treat with the Consul P. Licinius, who would shortly be in Macedon with an army; but that it was to no purpose to think of sending more ambassadors to the Senate, for they would not be suffered to pass through Italy. With this answer the Fathers dismissed the Macedonians, and ordered them to leave Italy in eleven days. Shortly after, the Senate dispatched five of their body, L. Decimius, Q. Marcius Philippus, A. Atilius, and two of the Cornelian family, to visit Greece and the neighbouring countries. Attended by a thousand soldiers, they landed at Cercyra; whither letters came to them from Perfes, asking, for what reason the Romans had sent forces into Greece, and were taking possession of the towns? They would return him no answer in writing, but told the messenger who brought the letters, that what the Romans did was for the defence of the Greek cities.

And now the ambassadors separating, L. Decimius repaired to Gentius of Illyricum, to persuade him, if possible, to take part with the Republic in the war. He had no success; and even fell under a suspicion at his return to Rome, of having received bribes from the Illyrian King.

The Cornelii made a progress through Peloponnesus, exhorting the several states of that country to assist Rome against Perfes, with the same alacrity and faithfulness as in the wars against Philip and Antiochus. Though the Romans employed gentle words and the soft stile of persuasion, the Greeks were now so well acquainted with Roman courtesy, that without hesitation they promised their ready aid^m; for though not

^m Sir W. Raleigh thinks that this ready compliance of the Greeks to the will of the Romans may justly be imputed to the timorous conduct of Perfes, who, as we have seen, no sooner learnt that a small body of Roman soldiers were landed in Epirus, than he sued to the Senate for peace.

“ Since therefore it was known that a very small thing would serve to terrify him, and consequently that it would at all times be in the power of the Romans, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those who had assisted him; little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him.” May not the conduct of the Macedonian, which Sir Walter styles timorous, have been the effect of just policy? For as the King saw plainly that the Romans were determined to attack him; could he do any thing wiser, even in the view of defending himself in the best manner, than, by offers of satisfaction for injuries complained of, to make it evident to all the world, that the war was unnecessary, and therefore unjust, on the part of the Romans? We shall find that he took great pains to convince all the neighbouring states of this truth, that he might thereby induce them to side with him. It is to be observed, that no one part of Perfes's conduct does in any degree suit with that violent and brutal behaviour which, by the report of Servilius Cæpio and his colleagues*, he used towards them: There may be room therefore to doubt the truth of that report, at least we may well suspect that they gave him sufficient provocation by their insolent manner of treating him.

* See p. 403, 404.

Y. R. 482.
Bel. Car.
170.
291. C. 171.

only the bulk of the people, but also the wisest and best men, who had nothing in view but the good of their country, wished success to Perfes; yet doubtless fear got the better of their inclinations.

2. Marcus and A. Atilius went into Epirus, Ætolia and Thessaly, to fix the people of those countries in the interest of Rome. While the two Romans were at Larissa, Perfes sent to ask an interview with Marcus. The ambassadors, according to their instructions, prefaced the request with mentioning, that Marcus's father had formerly been the guest and friend of king Philip. Marcus answered, that he had often heard his father speak of that friendship, and was far from having forgot it when he undertook his present commission; and that as soon as possible, he and his colleague would meet the King at the river Peneus, near Dium.

Perfes was much pleased with Marcus's insinuation, that he had come into Greece with a view to serve him, and began to entertain hope of an accommodation. Soon after, a day being appointed for the conference, they both came to the banks of the Peneus. The question now was, which of them should pass the river. Perfes claimed the compliment, on account of his royal dignity; Marcus thought it due to the majesty of the Roman name: besides, the King had asked the conference. The ambassador put an end to the dispute by a dull jest, which his bearing the surname of Philip furnished him with; Let the younger, said he, come to the elder; the son to the father. The King easily suffered himself to be persuaded; but then he was for crossing with all his retinue: To this Marcus objected, insisting, that he should come with only three attendants, or else give hostages: Not that the Roman suspected any treachery, says Livy, but that the deputies from the several cities (of whom there was a great concourse at the interview) might see the superiority of the Republic to the King of Macedon. Perfes gave hostages, and, with all his train of attendants, passed over to Marcus. They saluted each other, not as enemies meeting to parly, but like familiar friends. When both were seated, Marcus, after a short pause, broke silence.

Liv. B. 42.
c. 40.

“ I believe you expect that I should answer the letter you sent to us at “ Corcyra, in which you ask, why we, who are ambassadors, come at“ tended with soldiers, and put garrisons into several towns. Not to an“ swer your question would perhaps look like pride; and the proper an“ swer, I fear, you may think too harsh. But since he who breaks a league “ should be made sensible of his error either by words or by arms; I,
“ who had rather the commission to make war against you, should be “ given to any body than to me, shall take upon me the disagreeable task “ of reproving my friend. The senate think, that since your accession to “ the throne, you have done but one thing which you ought to have done;
“ the sending ambassadors to renew the league: And yet they judge that it “ would have been better not to renew it, than to renew it, and after“ wards break it. Abrupolis, a friend and ally of the Roman people, “ you have driven from his kingdom: The murderers of Artetarus

“ (of

“ (of all the Illyrian Kings the most faithful to Rome) you received “ into your protection; thereby shewing (to say nothing worse) that “ you rejoiced at the murder. You went with an army through Theffaly
 “ and Malæa to Delphi, contrary to our treaty: In violation of the same “ treaty you sent succours to the Byzantines. You secretly made a
